Ver. 11. φόβος μέγας: evidently one purpose in the infliction of this stern penalty was at once obtained, see above on ver. 5.—ἐφ' ὅλην τὴν ἐκκλησίαν: St. Luke, as it seems, uses the word ἐκκλησία here for the first time. Dr. Hort thinks that he may employ it by anticipation, and that we cannot be sure that it was actually in use at this early date (Ecclesia, p. 49), but, as the same writer reminds us, our Lord's saying to St. Peter, Matt. xvi. 18, must have had its influence upon the minds and teaching of the Apostles. Moreover, we can see a special fitness in the employment here, after the preceding description, not only of the growth, but of the organisation of the Christian community, iv. 32 ff., and of the judgment which followed upon the attempt to challenge its powers and to violate its harmony, cf. Bengel's note, in loco. The context too probably marks a distinction between the members of the ἐκκλησία and those without (Weiss, Hort, Blass).

Ver. 12. δέ: merely transitional; ἐγίνετο marking the continuance of the miracles; διὰ τῶν χειρῶν characteristic of St. Luke in Acts, cf. ii. 23, vii. 25, xi. 30, xiv. 3, xv. 23, xix. 11. On Luke's fondness for this and similar phrases with χείρ, see Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 8; Lekebusch, Apostelgeschichte, p. 77. Such phrases, cf. διὰ στόματός τινος, are thoroughly Hebraistic; so also in iii. 13, Luke iii. 21, κατὰ πρόσωπον, and for other instances, Blass, Grammatik des N. G., pp. 126, 147.—Στοᾷ Σολ., iii. 11.—ἅπαντες, cf. ii. 1, including other believers as well as the Apostles, see below. ὁμοθυμαδὸν, see i. 14.

Ver. 13. τῶν δὲ λοιπῶν: variously interpreted (1) of the rest of the believers in contrast to the Apostles, but this is unnatural, as the Apostles are not elsewhere regarded as objects of fear to their fellow-believers, and ἅπαντες above certainly need not = ἀπόστολοι as Hilgenfeld interprets it. See, however, Alford, in loco, and Gore, Church and the Ministry, p. 256, note. J. Lightfoot applies ἅπαντες to the hundred-and-eight (the Apostles making up the hundred-and-twenty), who durst not join themselves ἀλλ' ἐμεγάλυνεν αὐτοὺς ὁ λαός· 14. μᾶλλον δὲ προσετίθεντο πιστεύοντες τῷ Κυρίῳ, πλήθη ἀνδρῶν τε καὶ γυναικῶν·) 15. ὥστε κατὰ[1] τὰς πλατείας ἐκφέρειν τοὺς ἀσθενεῖς καὶ τιθέναι ἐπὶ κλινῶν καὶ κραββάτων, ἵνα ἐρχομένου Πέτρου κἂν ἡ σκιὰ ἐπισκιάσῃ τινὶ

[1] κατα (τας) D*P 1, Chrys., Theoph., so Meyer; και εις τας ℵABD²(E), Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. κλινων EP, Chrys., Theodrt.; κλιναριων ℵABD, Cyr.-Jer., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. κραββατων B³EP; κραβαττων ℵAB*D, so W.H., Weiss, Hilg.; but see Blass, Grammatik, p. 12, who reads in β, κραβατος (grabatus), and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 56. επισκιασῃ ℵADEP, so Tisch. (W.H. alt.), Weiss, Hilg.; επισκιασει B 13, 31, W.H. following B, Wendt (probable). At end of verse D, Par. (Gig.[1], Wern.) add απηλλασσοντο γαρ απο πασης ασθενειας ην ειχε εκαστος αυτων, whilst E (Vulg., Lucif.) adds και ρυσθωσιν απο πασης ασθενειας ης ειχον. Variations between D and E may be due to retranslation from Latin, see Harris; Chase from assim. of Acts xix. 12, through Syriac; an explanatory addition of the result of Peter's shadow falling upon them according to Weiss, Codex D, p. 64; but Belser sees in vv. 15 and 16 in β original, revised in α.

in the dignity and office of Apostleship, properly so called, having seen the judgment that one of the Twelve had brought upon Ananias, one of their own number (as Lightfoot ranks Ananias amongst the hundred-and-twenty); (2) of non-believers as contrasted with ἅπαντες; this is adopted by Blass, but it obliges him to translate κολλᾶσθαι, se eis immiscere = interpellare, vexare, whereas the word is more often used, as he admits, both in the Acts and in the LXX of friendly intercourse דָּבַק, Deut. x. 20, 2 Sam. xx. 2, 2 Kings xviii. 6, Ps. cxviii. (cxix.) 31, cf. Acts viii. 29, ix. 26, x. 28, xvii. 34; (3) of the rest including ὁ λαός, who stood aloof from joining their lot, but at the same time regarded them with respect; (4) of the rest, i.e., rulers, scribes, priests, men of position, as contrasted, ἀλλά, with the λαός, the populace, cf. iv. 21, where the same contrast is marked (so Hort, Page, Rendall), see also Luke xxi. 38. For κολλᾶσθαι see further on ver. 36.

Ver. 14. μᾶλλον δέ προσετίθεντο: the favour of the people which still protected the Church (cf. ver. 17) resulted in further increase of believers, "were the more added," um so mehr; imperfect, signifying the continuous growth of the Church; on the verb see ii. 41. πλήθη, plural (only here in N.T.), because not only men as in iv. 4, but women also (Weiss), but Bengel "pluralis grandis: jam non initur numerus, uti 4, 4," to the same effect Blass, "sæpe fiebat ut magnus numerus accederet, inde plur. hic tantum N.T.". On St. Luke's characteristic fondness for this and similar words see iv. 32. γυναικῶν: this mention of women forms as it were an introduction to the further mention in vi. 1 ff., cf. viii. 3, where women are again mentioned amongst the victims in the general persecution of the Church (see Plumptre's note, in loco). This constant reference to the share of women in the ministry of the Gospel and the life of the Church is characteristic of St. Luke in both his writings.

Ver. 15. ὥστε καὶ εἰς, "insomuch that they even," R.V.—κατὰ, T.R., so Alford, Meyer, "all down the streets," as if the streets were entirely beset with sick folk (see Holtzmann, in loco).—πλατείας, feminine of the adjective πλατύς, sc., ὁδός, a broad way, so here, the open streets, in classical Greek, and frequently in LXX, chiefly for Hebrew, רְחֹב, Tobit xiii. 17, Judith i. 14, vii. 14, 22, 1 Macc. i. 55, ii. 9, 3 Macc. i. 18, used by St. Luke three times in his Gospel, x. 10, xiii. 26, xiv. 21, but only here in Acts, see below on ix. 11. For κλινῶν read κλιναρίων, which is found only here in N.T., not at all in LXX, and very rarely in other Greek authors, Aristoph., Frag., 33, d, and Arrian, Epict. Diss., iii., 5, 13, where it is used for the couch of a sick person; Artem., Oneir., ii., 57. As Dr. Hobart points out, St. Luke employs no less than four different words for the beds of the sick, two in common with the other Evangelists, viz., κλίνη (not in John), and κράβαττος (not in Matthew). But two are peculiar to him, viz., κλινίδιον (Luke v. 19, 24), and κλινάριον only here. Neither word is found in the LXX, but κλινίδιον, although rare elsewhere, is used in Artem., also in Plutarch, and Dion. Hal. (Antiq. Rom., vii., 68), for a litter for carrying the sick, Hobart, Medical αὐτῶν. 16. συνήρχετο δὲ καὶ τὸ πλῆθος τῶν πέριξ πόλεων εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ, φέροντες ἀσθενεῖς καὶ ὀχλουμένους ὑπὸ πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων, οἵτινες ἐθεραπεύοντο ἅπαντες.[1]

[1] εις DEP demid., Arm., Chrys., so Meyer; om. ℵAB vers., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. οιτινες εθεραπευοντο απαντες, D, Par. (Gig., Lucif.) read και ιωντο παντες; both verbs almost equally common. At end of verse "duo codices Bergeri" add et magnificabant Dominum J. C., added by Blass in β (Greek); cf. Acts xix. 17.

Language, etc., pp. 116, 117. Dr. Kennedy sees in κλινίδιον an instance of rare words used by the comic poets, especially Aristophanes, found also in the N.T., and almost nowhere else, and hence a proof of the "colloquial" language of the N.T. writers (Sources of N. T. Greek, pp. 76-79). But the fact remains that the word in question is found only in St. Luke, and that both it and κλινάριον were employed for the couch of a sick person.—ἐρχομένου Πέτρου, genitive absolute, "as Peter came by," R.V. (very frequent in Luke), it does not mean, as Felten admits, that none of the other Apostles possessed such powers.—κἄν = καὶ ἐάν — even if it were only his shadow, "at the least his shadow," R.V., cf. Mark v. 28, vi. 56, 2 Cor. xi. 16; the usage is not unclassical, Soph., Elect., 1483; Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 170; Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 118 (1893).—ἐπισκιάσῃ with dative, Luke i. 35, Mark ix. 7; B so W.H., future indicative σει, a construction common with ὅπως in classical Greek (Page); for other examples of the future indicative with ἵνα see Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 81 (1893), of which several are found in the N.T., although not in classical Greek; cf. Luke xiv. 10, xx. 10, 1 Cor. ix. 18, 1 Pet. iii. 1, Acts xxi. 24, W.H.; John vii. 3, Gal. ii. 4, etc.; Burton, u. s., p. 86. Undoubtedly this action of the people showed the lively power of their faith (Chrys., Theod., Aug.), but the further question arises in spite of the severe strictures of Zeller, Overbeck, Holtzmann, as to how far the narrative indicates that the shadow of Peter actually produced the healing effects. Ver. 16 shows that the sick folk were all healed, but Zöckler maintains that there is nothing to show that St. Luke endorses the enthusiastic superstition of the people (so J. Lightfoot, Nösgen, Lechler, Rendall). On the other hand we may compare Matt. ix. 20, Mark vi. 56, John ix. 5, Acts xix. 12; and Baumgarten's comment should be considered that, although it is not actually said that a miraculous power went forth from Peter's shadow, it is a question why, if no such power is implied, the words should be introduced at all into a narrative which evidently purports to note the extraordinary powers of the Apostles. The parallels just instanced from the Gospels could, of course, have no weight with critics who can only see in such comparisons a proof that the Acts cannot rise above the superstitious level of the Gospels, or who start like Renan with "an absolute rule of criticism," viz., the denial of a place in history to all miraculous narratives. β adds ἀπηλλάσσοντο γὰρ κ.τ.λ.: but even here, as Blass says, Luke does not distinctly assert that cures were wrought by the shadow of Peter, although there is no reason to deny that the Evangelist had this in mind, since he does not hesitate to refer the same miraculous powers to St. Paul. Hilgenfeld refers vv. 14-16 to his "author to Theophilus," and sees in the expressions used in ver. 16 a reminiscence of Luke vi. 17.

Ver. 16. δὲ καὶ: very common in St. Luke, Luke ii. 4, iii. 9, v. 10, ix. 61, xiv. 12, etc., and also nine times in Acts. St. John uses it frequently, but seldom in Matt. and Mark; used for the sake of giving emphasis.—πέριξ only here, strengthened for περί, not in LXX, but see Hatch and Redpath, found in Acta Andr. et Matth. Apocr., 26 (see Lumby's note), in classics from Æschylus.—τῶν π. πόλεων, "the cities round about Jerusalem," omitting εἰς before Ἱερουσ.—ὀχλουμένους: only here in N.T., cf. Luke vi. 18, οἱ ἐνοχλούμενοι (W.H., R.V.) ὑπὸ πν. ἀκαθ. Both verbs are peculiar to St. Luke in the N.T. in connection with disease (ἐνοχλεῖν is used in Heb. xii. 15 in a different sense), and both were often used by medical writers. In Tobit vi. 8, ὀχλῇ the simple verb is used of the vexing and disturbing of an evil spirit, and ἐνοχλεῖν is used several times in the LXX, of being troubled with sicknesses, Gen. xlviii. 1, 1 Sam. xix. 14, xxx. 13, Mal. i. 13. So J. Weiss, who is by no means inclined to overrate Dr.

17. Ἀναστὰς[1] δὲ ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς καὶ πάντες οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ, ἡ οὖσα αἵρεσις τῶν Σαδδουκαίων, ἐπλήσθησαν ζήλου, 18. καὶ ἐπέβαλον τὰς χεῖρας αὐτῶν ἐπὶ τοὺς ἀποστόλους, καὶ ἔθεντο αὐτοὺς ἐν τηρήσει

[1] αναστας, Par. reads Αννας, "cod. Dubl. ap. Berger" (Blass); so also Prov. after αναστ. δε—Blass follows Par. in β. αναστας is no doubt a very common word, but it is quite characteristic of St. Luke. Western reading may have possessed the true text, cf. iii. 6, but if Αννας is original then αναστας is a corruption, not a revision.

Hobart's work, regards the use of the two verbs just mentioned as the employment in St. Luke of technical medical terms, Evangelium des Lukas, pp. 273, 274 (1892); found in Hipp., Galen, Dioscorides, cf. in the latter, Mat. Med., iii., 116, τοὺς ὑπὸ ξηρᾶς βηχὸς καὶ ὀρθοπνοίας ὀχλουμένους θεραπεύει, see also Luke vi. 19, viii. 46, for a like effect following on the manifestation of the miraculous powers of Christ.

Ver. 17. ἀναστὰς, see on i. 15, cf. vi. 9: it may denote a hostile intention (but need not force this), Mark iii. 26, Luke x. 35, Matt. xii. 41, in LXX, Job xvi. 8; see Overbeck, Blass, Weiss; ὁ ἀρχ., i.e., Annas not Caiaphas, iv. 6.—πάντες οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ: the context seems to imply that more are included than referred to in iv. 6.—ἡ οὖσα αἵρεσις(= οἵ εἰσιν αἵρεσις), a rare employment of the relative in the N.T., but found in Luke and Paul, most of all in the latter; cf. Acts xvi. 12, 1 Cor. iii. 17, Gal. iii. 16, Ephes. iii. 13, vi. 2, Phil. i. 28, etc. (cf. Rev. iv. 5, v. 9); Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 192 (1896).—αἵρεσις: (1) a choosing, choice, so in classical writers, cf. also LXX, Lev. xxii. 18, 21, 1 Macc. viii. 30; (2) that which is chosen, a chosen method of thought and action; (3) later, a philosophic principle; those who have chosen certain principles, a school, a sect, so six times in Acts. It is used thrice elsewhere in N.T., 1 Cor. xi. 29, Gal. v. 20, 2 Pet. ii. 1 in the plural, of factions or parties within the Church; in its later ecclesiastical use, applied to doctrines, "heresies," which tended to cause separation from the Church. The word need not therefore be used in a bad sense, although it is so used of the Nazarenes, cf. xxiv. 5, 14, xxviii. 22, whilst on the other hand St. Paul uses it of the Pharisees, xxvi. 5 (cf. xv. 5), in no depreciatory sense (cf. its use by Josephus of the Sadducees, Ant., xx., 9, 1). Lumby gives a disparaging use of the word in Apocr. Act. Phil. in Hellad., 10, see his note. It is not expressly said by St. Luke that Annas was a Sadducee, although he seems to imply it. But this is not in itself inconceivable (see iv. 1) in spite of the strictures of Zeller and Overbeck; Josephus distinctly says, u. s., that the son of Annas who bore his father's name was of the sect of the Sadducees, and if he mentions this as something peculiar, and as showing why the younger Annas was so bold and insolent (Zeller, cf. Nösgen's note, in loco), yet there is no difficulty in supposing that the elder Annas was at least associated with the Sadducees if only for political reasons.—ζήλου: jealousy, R.V., so rightly A.V in xiii. 45; Wycliffe "envy," cf. Rom. xiii. 13, 1 Cor. iii. 3, 2 Cor. xi. 2, Gal. v. 20, James iii. 14, 16, Clem. Rom., Cor., iii., 4 and iv.-vi. (cf. Numb. xxv. 10, 11, 1 Macc. viii. 16, οὐκ ἔστι φθόνος οὐδὲ ζῆλος ἐν αὐτοῖς, and ii. 54, 58, Psalms of Solomon, ii., 27), and in some places of the jealousy which God has, as in 2 Cor. xi. 2, Numb. xxv. 10, 11, and cf. Psalms of Solomon, ii., 27, iv., 2, 1 Macc. ii. 54. But φθόνος is capable only of an evil signification. By Aristotle ζῆλος is used in its nobler sense (Rhet., ii., 11), as opposed to τὸ φθονεῖν, but it seems to be used by other writers as = φθόνος or coupled with it. The meaning is defined by the context. Trench, N. T. Synonyms, i., 99. Here the envy and jealousy of the Sanhedrim was provoked by the popular favour shown to the disciples, and hence to their doctrine of the resurrection.

Ver. 18. ἐπέβαλον τὰς χεῖρας: a phrase used twice in St. Luke's Gospel, and three times in the Acts, cf. Gen. xxii. 12. Cf. Hebrew שָׁלַח יָד אֶל.—ἐν τηρήσει δημοσίᾳ, "in public ward," R.V. δημ. used here as an adjective, only found in N.T. in Acts, in the three other passages used as an adverb, xvi. 37, xviii. 28, xx. 20 (2 Macc. vi. 10, 3 Macc. ii. 2), cf. Thuc., v., 18, where τὸ δημόσιον = the public prison. See note above on iv. 3. Hilgenfeld is so far right in pointing out that the two imprisonments, iv. 3 and v. 18, are occasioned by two different causes, in the first case by the preaching of the Apostles

δημοσίᾳ.[1] 19. ἄγγελος δὲ Κυρίου διὰ τῆς νυκτὸς ἤνοιξε τὰς θύρας τῆς φυλακῆς, ἐξαγαγών τε αὐτοὺς εἶπε, 20. Πορεύεσθε, καὶ σταθέντες to the people, and in the second by the reverence which their miracles gained from the people.

[1] αυτων om. ℵABD 15, Vulg., Syr. Pesh., Arm., Lucif., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; but retained by EP, verss., Bas., Chrys., Meyer. At end of verse D adds και επορευθη εις εκαστος εις τα ιδια, so Hilg.; cf. John vii. 55; see Harris and Chase, who both think that the gloss comes from John, l. c., but the resemblance is not verbal. εις τα ιδια is characteristic of St. John, but it is also found in Acts xxi. 6.

Ver. 19. ἄγγελος δὲ K.: the narrative must be accepted or rejected as it stands. As Wendt, following Zeller in earlier days, candidly admits, every attempt to explain the narrative by referring the release of the prisoners to some natural event, such as an earthquake or lightning, or to some friendly disposed person, who with the assistance of the gaoler opened the prison doors, and who was mistaken by the Apostles for an angel in the darkness and excitement of the night, is shattered at once against the plain meaning of the text. Nor can it be deemed satisfactory to believe that St. Luke has unconsciously given us two narratives of the liberation of St. Peter, here and in xii., and that the former is merely an echo of the later deliverance transferred to an earlier date (Weiss, Sorof, Holtzmann). But St. Luke had the best means of knowing accurately the events narrated in xii. from John Mark (see below on chap. xii., and Ramsay, St. Paul, etc., p. 385), Introd., p. 17, and there is no ground whatever for supposing that xii. is simply an embellished version of this former incident. Attempts have been made to show that St. Luke introduces the same doubling of narratives in his Gospel (Wendt, Holtzmann), e.g., the sending forth of the disciples in ix. 3 and x. 1, but the former chapter is concerned with the mission of the Twelve, and the latter with that of the Seventy. Further objections have been made as to the uselessness of the miracle—the disciples are found, to be imprisoned again! But not only was the miracle a source of fresh strength and faith to the disciples, but—as Hilgenfeld notes—their release can scarcely be described as purposeless, since it called forth a public transgression of the command of silence imposed upon the two chief Apostles, iv. 17-21. Moreover, the deliverance was another indication to the Sadducees, if they would have accepted it, that it was useless for them to attempt to stay the movement. "Quis ergo usus angeli?" asks Blass; and he answers: "Sed est aliquis: augetur enim apostolorum audacia (21), tum ira adversariorum magis accenditur; nihilominus Deus suos perire non patitur". That the Sadducees should ignore the miracle (ver. 28) is surely not strange, although it may well have influenced their subsequent deliberations; that the action of the Sadducees should now be more coercive than on the former occasion was only natural on the part of men who feared that vengeance would be taken on them for the death of Jesus by an uprising of the people (vv. 28 and 26).—διὰ νυκτὸς = νυκτός, νύκτωρ (cf. Luke ii. 8) in classical Greek. The phrase is used four times by St. Luke in Acts, cf. xvi. 19, xvii. 10, xxiii. 31, and cf. Luke v. 5 (and ix. 37, D, διὰ τῆς ἡμέρας): nowhere else in N.T. In all the passages Meyer thinks that the expression means throughout the night, but such a meaning would be inconsistent with the context at all events here and in xvi. 19; and xvii. 10 is doubtful.—See Blass, Grammatik des N. G., p. 129, "by night" (nachts). Simcox speaks of this expression in Acts as an "almost adverbial phrase," Language of N. T., p. 140.

Ver. 20. Πορεύεσθε: characteristic of St. Luke both in Gospel and Acts. The word appears here in Acts for the first time, and it is found in St. Luke's Gospel about fifty times, and in this book nearly forty (Friedrich, Lekebusch).—σταθέντες, ii. 14, on this pictorial use of the word, see Page's note, and Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 42; so also ἀναστάς, ἐπιστάς, ἐγερθείς, καθίσας, στραφείς—here it intimates the boldness with which the Apostles were to proclaim their message.—ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ: they were to speak not only boldly but publicly.—τῆς ζωῆς ταύτης (cf. xiii. 26, τῆς σωτηρίας ταύτης, and Rom. vii. 24), i.e., the life to which the whole Apostolic preaching referred, the life which the Sadducees denied, bestowed by Him who was Himself the Resurrection and the Life, cf. iii. 15, iv. 12. This or a similar explanation is accepted by Holtzmann, λαλεῖτε ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ τῷ λαῷ πάντα τὰ ῥήματα τῆς ζωῆς ταύτης. 21. ἀκούσαντες δὲ εἰσῆλθον ὑπὸ τὸν ὄρθρον εἰς τὸ ἱερόν, καὶ ἐδίδασκον.[1] παραγενόμενος δὲ ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς καὶ οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ, συνεκάλεσαν[2] τὸ συνέδριον καὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γερουσίαν τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραήλ, καὶ ἀπέστειλαν

[1] ακουσαντες δε, E, Pesh. read εξελθοντες δε εκ της φυλακης, received by Blass in β; but cf. xvi. 40; may have been omitted on revision, or added for exactness. After εδιδασκον Prov., Wern. add εν τω ονοματι K. I.; cf. iv. 18, ix. 27.

[2] For συνεκαλεσαν D has εγερθεντες το πρωι και συγκαλεσαμενοι (so also Hilg.); may be addition for sake of clearness, or omitted in revision; assim. to our Lord's trial and the Jewish authorities seems unnecessary.

Wendt, Weiss, Zöckler, Blass. On the attempt to explain the words as simply = these words of life, see Winer-Moulton, xxxiv. 3, b., and see also Grimm, sub v. ῥῆμα.

Ver. 21. ὑπὸ τὸν ὄρθρον, "about daybreak," R.V., i.e., without delay they obeyed the angel's command (Weiss). The words may also indicate the customary usage of Palestine where the heat was great in the daytime. The people rose early and came to our Lord to hear Him, Luke xxi. 38 (John viii. 2). ὑπὸ = sub, circa (of time), so in classical Greek, Blass, Grammatik des N. G., p. 132. The first sacrifice took place in the Temple very early, Edersheim, Temple and its Services, p. 132, and it may be that the Apostles went to catch the people at the hour of their early devotions (Plumptre).—ὑπό is used nowhere else in the N.T. with an accusative in this sense, cf. Tobit vii. 11, S, al; ὑπὸ τὴν νύκτα, 3 Macc. v. 2.—παραγενόμενος: having come, i.e., to the place where the Sadducees met, not merely pleonastic; the verb may fairly be regarded as characteristic of St. Luke in both his writings—it occurs eight times in his Gospel and thirty in the Acts, and frequently absolutely as here—elsewhere in N.T. only eight or nine times, frequent in LXX.—τὸ συνέδριον καὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γερουσίαν: does γερουσία represent an assembly or body in addition to the συνέδριον, or do the two words represent the same Court? The word γερ. appears nowhere else in the N.T., but in the LXX it is used in several places of the Jewish Sanhedrim, 1 Macc. xii. 6, 2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 44, xi. 27, Jud. iv. 8, xiv. 4, xv. 8. In the N.T. the Sanhedrim is also called πρεσβυτέριον, Luke xxii. 66, Acts xxii. 5. If the two words denote the same body καὶ must be regarded as merely explicative (so Wendt as against Meyer) to emphasise the solemn importance and representative nature of the assembly (so Grimm-Thayer to signify the full Sanhedrim sub v. γερ. and so apparently Blass). If we adopt Rendall's view καί may still be explicative, but in another way, specifying the comprehensive character of this meeting as compared with the hasty and informal gathering in iv. 5, 6 (cf. Kuinoel's view, in loco). The difficulty has caused others to suggest that γερ. refers to men of age and experience who were asked to join the Council as assessors, or to some other assembly larger than the Sanhedrim and only summoned on special occasions. For the former view, Lumby and Plumptre (see also Page's note) refer to Mishna, Joma, i., 1, where mention is made of "the chamber of the assessors," parhedrin = πάρεδροι. Further we may note, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 172, E.T., in a note on this passage points out that as there can be no doubt as to the identity of the two conceptions συνέδριον and γερουσία (so too Zöckler and Weiss, in loco), καί must be taken as explanatory, or St. Luke makes a mistake in assuming that the συνέδριον was of a less comprehensive character than the γερουσία, "the Sanhedrin and all the elders of the people together". Schürer prefers the latter alternative, but the former may reasonably be maintained not only from the Greek text but also because St. Luke's information admittedly derived from a Jewish-Christian source is not likely to have been inaccurate. Hilgenfeld agrees with Weiss that in the source the O.T. expression γερουσία, Exod. iii. 16, iv. 29, xii. 21, stood alone, but that the reviser prefixed the usual expression συνέδριον which in v. 27 and 34 is found without any addition. Ver. 22. ὑπηρέται: apparently some of the Temple guard, ver. 26; see above on ὁ στρατηγός, iv. 1, and Edersheim, Temple and its Services, pp. 119, 120. In the N.T. the word is not used of the military.—ἀναστρέψαντες: used only here in this sense (xv. 16 is not strictly a parallel), cf. LXX, Gen. viii. 9, 1 Kings xxi. (xx.) 5, and frequently.

Ver. 23. ἐν πάσῃ ἀσφαλείᾳ, "in all safety," R.V. (not cum omni diligentia, Vulgate); "in omni firmitate," Flor.; in LXX generally μετά with genitive; cf. 2 Macc. iii. 22, xv. 1, μετὰ πάσης ἀσφ. The Vulgate is misleading; the words mean not that the prison had been carefully shut, but that it was found in a state of perfect security.

Ver. 24. ὅ τε ἱερεὺς καὶ ὁ στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ καὶ οἱ ἀρχ.: if we retain ὁ ἱερεύς it must mean the high priest, ver. 27, cf. 1 Macc. xv. 1; Jos., Ant., vi., 12, 1. But Weiss and Wendt both follow W.H. and R.V., and omit ἱερεὺς καὶ ὁ (so Blass β). ὁ στρατ. and οἱ ἀρχ. are thus closely united by the τε καί, inasmuch as the former in the flight of the prisoners had the greatest responsibility, and the ἀρχ. had occasioned the imprisonment, ver. 17. The στρατ. τοῦ ἱερ. was present at the meetings of the Sanhedrim, and assisted in their deliberations.—ἀρχιερεῖς: see on iv. 1. The word is probably used as including the heads of the twenty-four courses, those who had been high priests and still retained the title, and also those referred to in iv. 6. Blass interprets quomodo hoc factum esse posset, cf. x. 17; Grammatik des N. G., p. 173. St. Luke alone uses the optative with ἄν in the N.T., cf. Luke i. 62, vi. 11, ix. 46, Acts v. 24, viii. 31, x. 17, xvii. 18 (Luke xv. 26, xviii. 36, Acts xxvi. 29, doubtful text); Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, pp. 80 and 133; see also Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 66 (1893).

Ver. 25. ἰδοὺ . . . εἰσίν: on the characteristic use of the verb εἶναι after ἰδοὺ or ἴδε in St. Luke's writings as compared with other N.T. writers and the LXX, see Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., pp. 200, 205 (1896); cf. ii. 7, xvi. 1, and Luke ii. 25, vii. 25, xi. 41, etc.—παραγεν., see on ver. 22.—ἑστῶτες, cf. ver. 20. antitheton: posuistis (Bengel).

Ver. 26. ἤγαγεν: but imperfect with W.H. and Weiss, so Blass "quia modus quo res gesta est describitur; perfecta res indicatur, ver. 27, ἀγαγόντες".—οὐ μετὰ βίας, "but without violence," R.V. Weiss compares with the whole phrase ἦγεν . . . βίας (Exod. xiv. 25); βία three or four times in Acts only, xxi. 35, xxiv. 7 (omit W.H., R.V.), xxvii. 41; used in the LXX in the same sense as here and with the genitive, cf. Exod. xiv. 25 (cf. i. 14), 3 Macc. iv. 7; classical usage more frequently has βίᾳ, ἐκ βίας, etc.—ἐφοβοῦντο γὰρ: the favour of the people which the Apostles so fully enjoyed at this time might well have caused an outbreak of fanaticism as later in the case of Stephen. The subjects to ἐφοβ. and to ἔστησαν (27) are ὁ στρατ. and οἱ ὑπηρέται. St. Chrysostom well comments on those who would thus fear—not God, but the people. On the Greek of the verse, see Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 116 (1896).—ἵνα μὴ λιθασθῶσιν: the reading μὴ undoubtedly correct, so W.H., Wendt, Weiss, Blass.—τὸν λαόν: denoting the persons feared, and μὴ λιθασ., the thing feared, so that the meaning is as in R.V., "for they were afraid that they should be stoned by the people," or ἐφοβοῦντο γὰρ τὸν λαὸν may be taken as parenthetical (so Weiss), and μὴ λιθασ. as limiting ἦγεν . . . βίας. In the N.T. after verbs of fearing the subjunctive only is used where after secondary tenses we should have expected the optative, or sometimes the subjunctive is explained as implying more certainty of a result. Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, pp. 95, 96.—λιθασ.: very seldom in Attic Greek, where we should expect καταλεύειν; only twice in LXX, 2 Sam. xvi. 6, 13, where usually λιθοβολέω (not used in classical writers, but six or seven times in N.T.); but λιθάζειν is found eight or nine times in N.T.

Ver. 27. ἔστησαν, cf. iv. 7, during the investigation the judges would sit, vi. 15, xxiii. 3, the accused, the witnesses, and those speaking, stood, Mark xiv. 57, 60, Acts iv. 7, v. 27, 34, vi. 13, xxiii. 9, O. Holtzmann, Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, p. 177.

Ver. 28. παραγγελίᾳ παρηγγείλαμεν: for the Hebraism cf. iv. 17, "we straitly," etc., R.V. (and A.V.), expressing intensity—"commanding, we commanded you," Wycliffe. The T.R. makes the clause a question, commencing with οὐ, but the evidence is too strong against it, evidently it was occasioned by the ἐπηρώτησεν, but St .Chrysostom adopts it, see Hom., xiii., 1. Bengel remarks on παραγγελίᾳ, "pudet dicere minando, iv. 17, nam non poterant punire". But St. Chrysostom rightly notes that they ought to have asked πῶς ἐξήλθετε, i.e., from the prison, but they ask as if nothing had happened. —ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τούτῳ, iv. 17, here as there the Council do not mention the name of Jesus, perhaps because they disdained it; in sharp contrast stands not only St. Peter's mention of the name, but his glorying in it, ver. 30, 31.—τὴν Ἱερουσαλὴμ: fem. here and elsewhere, cf. Gal. iv. 25, Rev. iii. 12, so in Matt.

[1] ο Π., article om. ℵABEHP, Bas., Chrys., so W.H., Weiss; ειπον, but -αν ℵABE, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss. At the commencement of the verse αποκ. . . . προς αυτον is omitted in D, and the words πειθαρχειν δει (δε in D) follow as part of the high priest's remarks; but Blass in β, following Flor., Gig., Lucif., adds to αποκ. δε Πετρος the words ειπεν προς αυτον, and proceeds "τινι πειθαρχειν δει Θεῳ η ανθρωποις;" making these words a question asked by Peter of the high priest, who replies, according to a further addition of Flor., Gig., ο δε ειπεν "Θεῳ". Weiss, Codex D, p. 64, thinks that the emendator took offence at the repetition of iv. 19, and thereupon places the words πειθαρχειν δε (not δει) κ.τ.λ. on the lips of the high priest as if he thus took up their own words contemptuously in addressing the Apostles, and the whole from βουλεσθε might thus originally have formed a question: "You wish to bring this man's blood upon us—but thus, indeed, to obey God rather than man? Such blood revenge cannot surely be the command of God;" but see further Blass, in loco, and Weiss, u. s. D, Flor., Gig. all add at the end of ver. 29, as introductory to ver. 30, ο δε Πετρος ειπεν προς αυτους.

ii. 3, Blass, Grammatik des N. G., p. 32; Winer-Schmiedel, p. 153.—διδαχῆς, "teaching," R.V., cf. Matt. vii. 28.—βούλεσθε: the charge was untrue—the wish was their own, not that of the Apostles, cf. Matt. xxvii. 25. St. Peter's earnest desire was that they should be saved.—ἐπαγαγεῖν, xviii. 6, xxii. 20, and 2 Sam. i. 16, cf. 2 Peter ii. 1, 5; nowhere else in N.T.—ἐφ' ἡμᾶς: to bring His blood upon us, i.e., the vengeance of the people for His murder. αἷμα pro φόνον, Hebraistic—no thought of divine punishment from their point of view; cf. LXX. Gen. xx. 9, Exod. xxxii. 34, Judges ix. 24, and cf. Josh. xxiii. 15 (in N.T., Matt. xxiii. 35, Rev. xviii. 24).

Ver. 29. St. Peter as the spokesman, primus inter pares; the Apostles as a body are associated with him in his answer: "but Peter and the Apostles," R.V. A.V. renders "Peter and the other Apostles," and we may understand an ellipse of ἄλλοι or λοιποί before οἱ ἀπόστολοι, Blass, Grammatik des N. G., p. 286.—ἀποκ., cf. Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 112 (1896).—πειθαρχεῖν: only used by St. Luke and St. Paul; cf. ver. 32, xxvii. 21, Titus iii. 1; in this chapter and in St. Paul, in its classical use, obeying one in authority, or τοῖς νόμοις, etc. The word is used in Polybius, and Josephus, and frequently in Philo, but only three times in the LXX; cf. 1 Esd. viii. 94, of obeying the law of the Lord. The reply of St. Peter, who speaks for all the Apostles, is practically the same as in iv. 19, but still more decisive in its tone as was natural after the recent command, ver. 20.

Ver. 30. ὁ Θεὸς τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν, cf. iii. 13. St. Peter, as before, will not dissociate himself from the commonwealth of Israel, or his hearers from the message and works of the Christ.—ἤγειρεν: does this word refer to the Resurrection, or to the sending of Jesus into this world, and His raising up by God as the Messiah? The former is the view taken by St. Chrysostom, Oecumenius, Erasmus, and amongst moderns by Meyer-Wendt, Nösgen, Alford, Overbeck, Felten, Blass, Holtzmann, Weiss, Hilgenfeld; but in iii. 15, iv. 10, the phrase is ἤγειρεν ἐκ νεκρῶν (cf. Ecclesiast. xlviii. 5: ὁ ἐγείρας νεκρὸν ἐκ θανάτου), although in x. 40, xiii. 37, the word evidently refers to the Resurrection. Others interpret the word as ἀνίστημι in iii. 22, and as in xiii. 22, ἤγειρεν αὐτοῖς τὸν Δαυείδ (cf. Luke i. 69, vii. 16), so Calvin, Bengel, De Wette, Lechler, Hackett, Page. One of the chief arguments for the former interpretation is the contrast marked in the next clause between the death of the Cross and the Resurrection, but this contrast would still be marked by the following verb. Is it not possible that, as in the days of old God had raised up a Saviour, or Saviours, for Israel, cf. Jud. ii. 18, ἤγειρε Κ. αὐτοῖς κριτάς, Jud. iii. 9, 15, ἤγειρε Κ. σωτῆρα τῷ Ἰ., St. Peter may now speak of Him as raising up Ἰησοῦς, i.e., a Saviour? see further, ver. 31.—διεχειρίσασθε, cf. xxvi. 21, "whom ye slew, hanging Him on a tree," R.V., not as in A.V., "whom ye slew and hanged on a tree," which would make the words refer to a Jewish mode of punishment, for, according to Jewish law, only those were hanged who were already dead (Deut. xxi. 22, Josh. x. 26). The word which means in middle to lay hands upon, and so to slay, to kill, is only used by St. Luke (not in LXX), and forcibly represents the guilt of the Jews in the murder of Jesus, as if they had perpetrated it with their own hands (cf. xxvi. 24), "made away with violently," Page; cf. instances in Wetstein (trucidastis).—κρεμάσαντες ἐπὶ ξύλου, LXX, Gen. xl. 19, Deut. xxi. 22, 23, Josh. x. 26, Esth. v. 14, vi. 4 (Gal. iii. 13). Although St. Luke uses κρεμασθείς of crucifixion, Luke xxiii. 39, St. Peter alone uses the exact phrase of the text given in x. 39, and so he too has ξύλον, 1 Pet. ii. 24, for the Cross (although St. Paul uses the same word, Acts xiii. 29). The word may therefore have a place amongst the many coincidences between St. Peter's addresses and the language of his Epistles, see above on pp. 121 ff. The fact that their victim was thus accursed in the eyes of the law aggravated their guilt, and at the same sharply contrasted their act and that of God; for a similar contrast see iii. 14, 15.

Ver. 31. ἀρχηγὸν καὶ σωτῆρα: the former word as it is used here without any qualification, cf. iii. 15, may imply, like σωτῆρα, a reference to the earlier days of Israel's history, when God raised up for them from time to time judges of whom the title ἀρχηγός, Jud. xi. 6, 11, might be used no less than σωτήρ. In Jesus of Nazareth, the Christ, St. Peter saw the true Leader and Saviour. For St. Peter no less than for St. Paul the ascended Jesus had led captivity captive and received gifts for men, cf. Luke xxiv. 47-49.—ὕψωσεν τῇ δεξιᾷ αὐτοῦ, cf. ii. 33: "exalt with his right hand," R.V., "at" margin. Here as elsewhere Briggs interprets τῇ δεξιᾷ as local not instrumental, and prefers R.V. margin, Messiah of the Apostles, p. 37, note; but see note on ii. 33 above. The verb is used also by St. John, iii. 14, viii. 28, xii. 32, and also by St. Paul, Phil. ii. 9 (see Westcott on St. John iii. 14). But in the passive (as twice in St. John) it is employed in the LXX of the high exaltation of the Servant of God, in the picture which had evidently passed before the eyes of St. Peter, Isaiah lii. 13; and he sees in the ascension of his Lord, and His spiritual sovereignty, a fulfilment of the prophecy of the suffering Servant, who is also a Prince and a Saviour.

Ver. 32. "And we are witnesses of these things," R.V. (W.H.), but in margin, "witnesses in Him," ἐν αὐτῷ (cf. Luke xxiv. 47); "nos in eo testes sumus," Iren., see also above critical notes. For an explanation of the reading in T.R. and the two genitives, see Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 84, note, and compare 2 Cor. v. 1, Phil. ii. 30, 1 Thess. i. 3.—ῥημάτων: here = Hebrew דָּבָר, cf. x. 37 (Grotius, Blass), the words standing for their contents, i.e., the things, the facts. Meyer understood the facts to be the Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus, but Wendt understands them to be the gifts of the Messianic salvation mentioned in ver. 31, and compares ver. 20. But the use of the word in ver. 20 need not limit its use here: the Apostles were called above all things to witness to the facts of Christ's life, x. 37, and the ζωή in ver. 20 depended upon the Resurrection. In Luke i. 37 R.V. has "no word," ῥῆμα, where A.V. has "no thing," cf. Luke i. 65, where A.V. has "things" in the margin

33. Οἱ δὲ ἀκούσαντες διεπρίοντο, καὶ ἐβουλεύοντο ἀνελεῖν αὐτούς.
34. ἀναστὰς δέ τις ἐν τῷ συνεδρίῳ[1] Φαρισαῖος, ὀνόματι Γαμαλιήλ,

(ῥήματα), and R.V. reads "sayings" in text: Luke ii. 15, where R.V. has "this thing" (ῥῆμα) in the text, and "saying" in margin; in ii. 19, 51, R.V. has "sayings" in the text, "things" in the margin —so in LXX, the same uncertainty, cf. Gen. xv. 1, xviii. 14, Exod. ii. 14, 15. ῥῆμα is used frequently by St. Luke in his writings, and much more so than by the other Evangelists; although it is found in all parts of the Acts, it is noticeable that it is employed more frequently in the earlier chapters, as in the first two chapters of the Gospel.—καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον δὲ: on the expression see iv. 8. The Holy Ghost συμμαρτυρεῖ with the Apostles, Rom. viii. 16 (cf. Acts xv. 28). We may well compare with these words of St. Luke our Lord's parting words in John xv. 26, 27. Here we have also the twofold witness—the historical witness borne to the facts—and the internal witness of the Holy Ghost in bringing home to men's hearts the meaning of the facts (see Westcott on St. John, in loco).—τοῖς πειθαρχοῦσιν αὐτῷ: not to be limited to the Apostles, although by repeating this verb used at the opening of the speech St. Peter intimates that the ὑπακοὴ τῆς πίστεως (Rom. i. 5) was the first requisite for the reception of the divine gift. In their own case the witness of the Spirit had been clearly shown, not only in the miracles which the Apostles had done, but also in the results of their preaching, in the enthusiasm of their charity, and we need not limit with Nösgen the thought of the gift of the Holy Spirit to the events of Pentecost. If this short speech of St. Peter, 29-32, reads like a summary of much which he is represented as saying on former occasions, we have no warrant for dismissing it as unhistorical, or even for supposing that St. Luke has only given us a summary of the address. It is rather "a perfect model of concise and ready eloquence," and a striking fulfilment of the Lord's promise, Matt. xi. 19. Nothing was more natural than that St. Peter and his fellow-Apostles, like men whose minds were finally made up, should thus content themselves with an emphatic re-assertion of the main issues involved in teaching which was already widely known, and with a justification of their disobedience to man by an appeal to the results which accompanied their obedience to God.

Ver. 33. διεπρίοντο: lit., were sawn asunder (in heart), dissecabantur, Vulgate (cf. use of findo in Persius and Plautus), cf. vii. 54 (Luke ii. 35), Euseb., H. E., v., i., 6 (see Grimm, sub v.). The word is used in its literal sense in Aristoph., Equites, 768, Plato, Conv., p. 193 a, and once in the LXX, 1 Chron. xx. 3. The rendering "sawed their teeth" would certainly require τοὺς ὀδόντας as in other cases where the verb (and the simple verb also) has any such meaning. Dr. Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, pp. 72, 73, also refers to its use in the comic poet Eubulus (Meineke), 3, 255, and classes it among the words (colloquial) common to the comic poets (including Aristophanes) and the N.T. Here we have not the pricking of the heart, ii. 37, which led to contrition and repentance, but the painful indignation and envy which found vent in seeking to rid themselves of the disciples as they had done of their Master.—ἀνελεῖν: the verb is found no less than nineteen times in Acts, twice in St. Luke's Gospel, and only two or three times in the rest of the N.T., once in Matt. ii. 16, Heb. x. 9 (2 Thess. ii. 8); often used as here in LXX and classical Greek; it is therefore not one of those words which can be regarded as distinctly medical terms, characteristic of St. Luke (so Hobart and Zahn), although it is much used in medical writers. The noun ἀναίρεσις, viii. 1, is only found in St. Luke, and is also frequent in medical writers, Hobart, Medical Language of St. Luke, pp. 209, 210; but this word is also used in LXX of a violent death or destruction, cf. Numb. xi. 15, Judith xv. 4, 2 Macc. v. 13. At the same time it is interesting to note that ἐπιχειρεῖν, another medical word characteristic of St. Luke, and used by him in the sense of attempting, trying, is found with ἀνελεῖν in Acts ix. 29, cf. Zahn, Einleitung, ii., p. 384, with which Hobart compares ὁ μὲν γὰρ ἰατρὸς ἀνελεῖν ἐπιχειρεῖ τὸ νόσημα (Galen), see in loco.

Ver. 34. ἀναστὰς, see ver. 17.—συνεδρίῳ: the word is used here and in ver. 27 above, without γερουσία, and this seems to indicate that in ver. 21 the Sanhedrim is meant, and no additional council.—Γαμαλιήλ: it has sometimes been urged that Saul, the persecutor, could not have been the pupil of such a man as is here described—a man who was so liberal in his religious opinions, and so adverse to political agitation. But whatever may have been the extent of his liberality, Gamaliel remained firmly attached to the traditions of the fathers, and whilst we may see in his recorded principle his abhorrence of wrangling and over-scrupulosity, we may also see in it a proof of his adherence to traditionalism: "Procure thyself a teacher, avoid being in doubt; and do not accustom thyself to give tithes by guess" (Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation, p. 128). But in itself there is nothing strange in the fact that Saul should surpass the zeal of Gamaliel, for not only does history often show us how one side of the teaching of a master may be exaggerated to excess by a pupil, but also the specific charge against Stephen of destroying the Temple and of changing the customs of Moses had not been formulated against St. Peter and his brother-Apostles, who still attended the Temple worship, and whose piety gained them the regard of the people. That charge against the first martyr was nothing less than the charge brought against Jesus of Nazareth: the burning words and scathing denunciations of Stephen could only be answered, as those of Jesus had been answered, by the counter charge of blasphemy, and the punishment of death (see Sabatier's L'Apôtre Paul, 21 ff.).

Gamaliel appears as an ordinary member, and there can be no reasonable doubt that the high priest was always the President during the Roman-Herodian period. Not until after the destruction of Jerusalem, when the priesthood had lost its importance, was a Rabbi chosen as President of a reconstituted Sanhedrim. For a summary of the views for and against the Rabbinic tradition that this Gamaliel was the President of the Sanhedrim, see Appendix iii., "The President of the Sanhedrim," by the late Rev. H. A. White, in Dr. Edersheim's History of the Jewish Nation, p. 522 ff. The influence of Gamaliel may easily be understood (1) when we remember that whilst the ἀρχιερεῖς belonged chiefly if not exclusively to the Sadducees, the Pharisees who also had seats in the Sanhedrim (cf. Acts xxiii. 6, and Jos., B. J., ii., 17, 3, Vita, 38, 39, C. Apion, ii., 22) possessed practically a predominating influence in the Council. The remark of Jos., Ant., xviii., 1, 4, gives us, as Schürer says, "a deep insight into the actual position of matters," Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 178 ff., E.T., and O. Holtzmann Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 175. (2) But we have also to take into account the personal influence of the man, which was no doubt at its height about the time described in Acts v.—he died A.D. 57-58. Not only was he the first teacher of the seven to whom the title Rabban was given (higher than that of Rab or Rabbi), but Jewish tradition respecting him shows the dignity and influence which attached to his name, Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, ii., 2, 236, and see on the titles given to Gamaliel, Derenbourg, Histoire de la Palestine, pp. 239-246, and Schürer, u. s., p. 364. We may see a further proof of his influence in the fact that a certain proviso with regard to the determining leap year, which was passed in the Sanhedrim in his absence, was only to come into force if it received the confirmation of Gamaliel (Edajoth, vii., 7). So far then St. Luke's account of the weight which would be carried by Gamaliel in the assembly is amply justified, and Schürer's description of the constitution of the Sanhedrim, u. s., p. 174 ff., is sufficient reply to the strictures of Jüngst

Eus. and Par. read κατελυθη (the latter dissolutus est = διελ. or κατελ.); see Blass, who maintains with Belser that this word rather than ανηρεθη is required by Gamaliel's argument, but why? αυτῳ, after this word διελ. omitted by D, και om. in d, and και εγεν. in Par.[1] but διελ. (dissoluti sunt) retained. against Gamaliel's appearance as a member of the Council, cf. Derenbourg, u. s., pp. 201, 213. On the words attributed to Gamaliel see below.—νομοδιδάσκαλος: only in St. Luke and St. Paul, cf. Luke v. 17, 1 Tim. i. 7, almost = γραμματεύς, νομικός, not found in LXX.—βραχύ (τι): = "a little while," R.V., Luke xxii. 58, "a little space," A.V.; ambiguous, in classical Greek the word might be used as either βραχύ, a short distance, Xen., Anab., iii., 3, 7, or ἐν βραχεῖ, "in a short time," Herod., v., 24, cf. Thuc., vi., 12. In Acts xxvii. 28 the word may be taken either of space or time (see Blass). In the LXX it is used of space in 2 Sam. xvi. 1, and 2 Sam. xix. 36, and most likely of degree in Psalm viii. 6 (although the expression may be taken of time, cf. Heb. ii. 7, 9, R.V.), and of time in Psalm xciii. 17, and in Isa. lvii. 17 (Weiss, Westcott; but see Hatch and Redpath, doubtful). But whether we take the word of space or time in this passage, it is noteworthy that St. Luke alone of the N.T. writers can be said to use βραχύ temporally (in Hebrews it is a quotation), Friedrich, and so Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 54.—ἔξω ποιεῖν (hinausthun): only here in this sense, cf. Blass, in loco, for classical instances, and cf. Psalm cxli. 8 (Symmachus)—Weiss, Wendt.

Ver. 35. ἄνδρες Ἰσραηλεῖται, see on ii. 22. προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς: phrase only found in St. Luke, cf. Luke xii. 1, xvii. 3, xxi. 34, and Acts xx. 28. προσέχειν without the pronoun is found six times in Matthew alone of the Evangelists, but in LXX frequently used in the phrase πρόσεχε σεαυτῷ. The phrase may be connected with ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις τούτοις, "as touching these men, what you are about to do," R.V., hence the reading ἀπὸ τῶν, etc., E. Or we may take it with μέλλετε πράσσειν, "what you are about to do to these men". In favour of the latter it may be said that the construction πράσσειν τι ἐπί τινι is very common, whereas προσέχειν ἑαυτοῖς is never found in construction with ἐπί, and that this rendering rightly marks the evidently emphatic position of τοῖς ἀνθρώποις (so Weiss, Wendt, Holtzmann, Hackett).—τί μέλλετε πράσσειν, quid acturi sitis, Vulgate. Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 36, μέλλειν never found with future infinitive except in the phrase μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι used in Acts, almost always has a present infinitive, although its force is akin to that of the future (Grimm-Thayer); also Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 120. μέλλειν is used over thirty times in Acts in all its parts, and is found very often in St. Luke's Gospel.

Ver. 36. πρὸ γὰρ τούτων τῶν ἡμερῶν: Gamaliel appeals to the experience of the past—the phrase is placed first with emphasis, cf. xxi. 38; on St. Luke's fondness for phrases with ἡμέρα see above, and Friedrich, pp. 9, 89. But whilst Gamaliel appeals to the past, his appeal is not to a remote but to a near past which was still fresh in the memories of his generation, perhaps because, as St. Chrysostom urges, such recent examples μάλιστα πρὸς πίστιν ἦσαν ἰσχυρά.—ἀνέστη, cf. vii. 18, like the Hebrew קוּם, and so constantly in LXX, Exod. i. 8, Deut. xiii. 1, xxxiv. 10, Judg. ii. 10, iv. 9, v. 7, etc.—Θεῦδας: St. Luke evidently places Theudas before Judas. But εἰς οὐδέν. 37. μετὰ τοῦτον ἀνέστη Ἰούδας ὁ Γαλιλαῖος, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις τῆς ἀπογραφῆς, καὶ ἀπέστησε λαὸν ἱκανὸν[1] ὀπίσω αὐτοῦ·

[1] ικανον om. ℵA*B 81, d, Vulg., Eus., Cyr.; so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. πολυν in CD, so Hilg., but not retained by Blass in β. απωλετο, Par. reads κατελυθη; "recte," says Blass, who receives κατελ. in β. This will be only consistent with the former rejection of ανηρεθη.

a difficulty arises from the fact that the only Theudas of this period known to us is placed by Josephus in the reign of Claudius, about the year 44, 45. He gave himself out as a false prophet, gathered round him "a great part of the people," and persuaded them to follow him to the Jordan with a promise that its waters should miraculously divide before him as in the days of Moses. But the Roman procurator, Cuspius Fadus, sent a troop of horse to meet him, some of his followers were slain, others taken captive, whilst he himself was made prisoner and beheaded, and his head sent to Jerusalem, Jos., Ant., xx., 5, 1. But a serious chronological discrepancy must be faced if the Theudas of Josephus is the Theudas of St. Luke. Gamaliel speaks of a Theudas who arose before the days of the enrolment, R.V., which marked the attempt of Judas, i.e., about 6-7 A.D. But are they the same? As early as the days of Origen their identity was denied (c. Cels., i., 57), see "Acts," B.D.², Bishop Lightfoot, p. 40, and in comparing the two accounts in Josephus and Acts there is no close resemblance beyond the name, see Nösgen, in loco, and Belser, Theol. Quartalschrift, i., p. 70 (1896). St. Luke speaks definitely of 400 followers; Josephus evidently considers that the pretender was much more successful, so far as numbers were concerned, for he writes: πείθει τὸν πλεῖστον ὄχλον. These and similar discrepancies are also well insisted upon by Zahn in his recent Introduction, ii., 416, 417 (1899), and his own conclusion is that only such ordinary words are common to the two accounts as Luke, ἀνῃρέθη; Jos., ἀνεῖλε; Luke, ἐπείθοντο; Jos., ἔπειθε; and that we cannot get beyond the bounds of possibility that the two authors refer to the same fact (on Zahn's criticism of Krenkel's view of the dependence of Luke on Josephus in the narrative, see u. s.). In referring to the appearance of the many false Messiahs, such as the Theudas of Josephus, Ant., xx., 5, 1, Dr. Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life, p. 66, remarks: "Of course this could not have been the Theudas of Acts v. 36, 37, but both the name and the movement were not solitary in Israel at the time"; see also Ramsay, Was Christ born in Bethlehem? p. 259. And no testimony could be stronger than that of Josephus himself to the fact that at the time of the Advent Judæa was full of tumults and seditions and pretenders of all kinds, Ant., xvii., 10, 4, 8; B. J., ii., 4, 1. The view has been maintained by many commentators that the Theudas of Josephus may reasonably be supposed to be one of the many false teachers and leaders mentioned by the Jewish historian and not always by name, who pandered to the feverish hopes of the people and gave themselves out as of kingly rank—(so recently Belser, Felten, Page, Plumptre, Knabenbauer). The name Theudas contracted from Theodorus may not have been so common as that of Simon or Judas (although on the other hand, see Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, p. 147)—"Josephus describes four men bearing the name of Simon within forty years, and three that of Judas within ten years, all of whom were instigators of rebellion"—but it was the Greek equivalent to several familiar Hebrew names, e.g., Jonathan, Matthias; and Bishop Lightfoot allows that there is something to be said for Wieseler's suggestion that on the ground of the name the Theudas here may be identified with Matthias, the son of Margalothus, an insurgent in the time of Herod, prominent in the pages of Josephus, Ant., xvii., 6, 2 (see also Zöckler on the whole question, Apostelgeschichte, p. 197, 2nd edit.). We must admit the objection of Wendt that this and other identifications of names and persons cannot be proved (and some of them certainly are very precarious, as Alford pointed out), but we cannot suppose that St. Luke could have made the gross blunder attributed to him in the face of his usual accuracy (see Blass, Acta Apostolorum, p. 90), or endorse with Schürer what he calls "the slight authority of the Acts in such matters" (Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 169). If it is hardly possible that Josephus can have been mistaken, although some writers have held that it is by no means impossible that even here he may have been (cf. Alford, Rendall, Belser, and compare the remarks of Zahn, ubi supra), we may at least claim the same probability of freedom from error for St. Luke, "temporum bene memorem se scriptor monstrat: quo minus est probabile eum de Theuda tam graviter errasse quam plerique putant" (Blass), and see the recent remarks of Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 252 ff. It cannot be said that some recent attempts at a solution of the difficulty are very promising; for whilst H. Holtzmann severely blames Blass for maintaining that some Christian had interpolated the name Theudas in the text of Josephus (see Blass, in loco, and p. xvi., edit. min.), he himself is prepared to endorse the view recently maintained amongst others by Clemen that the writer of Acts in his mention of Theudas gives us a vague but yet recognisable recollection of Jos., Ant., xx., 5, 1; see in loco and Theol. Literaturzeitung, 3, 1896, and 13, 1897. B. Weiss thinks that the notorious difficulty may easily be got rid of by supposing that the reviser inserted the example of Theudas in the wrong place, Einleitung in das N. T., p. 574.—λέγων εἶναί τινα ἑαυτόν: of consequence, really "somebody," cf. viii. 9 (and R.V.); "ein grosser Mann," Blass, Grammatik des N. G., p. 76; so we have its opposite, οὐδείς, cf. instances in Wetstein in classical Greek; so in Latin quidam, aliquis, Juvenal, i., 74; Cicero, ad Atticum, iii., 15; and cf. also 1 Cor. iii. 7, Gal. ii. 6, vi. 3; Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 148 (1893). And yet the jealous eye of the Pharisees was blind to the difference between such a man as Theudas, whom Gamaliel so contemptuously described, and the Apostles who sought not their own honour (Nösgen); cf. Vulgate, "dicens se esse aliquem," so Rhem. and Wycl., "saying that he was somebody".—προσεκολλήθη: better reading προσεκλίθη, a word not found elsewhere in N.T., cf. 2 Macc. xiv. 24; and so also in LXX, cf. Ps. xxxix. (xl.) 2, Symmachus; cf. Polyb., iv., 51, 5; so also πρόσκλισις; for its further use see Clem. Rom., Cor., xlvii., 4.—ὡσεὶ (ὡς) τετρακοσίων, see above on "Theudas".—ἀνῃρέθη, see also on ἀναιρέω, ver. 33, often of violent death in Acts. The two clauses stand in sharp contrast—the one emphasises the large number which joined Theudas, the other the fact that notwithstanding he was slain; cf. iv. 10.—διελύθησαν κ.τ.λ.: nowhere else in N.T., but its use is quite classical, cf. Thuc., ii., 12; Xen., Cyr., v., 5, 43; Polyb., iv., 2. Blass remarks that the whole phrase "apte de secta quæ paullatim dilabitur, minus apte de multitudine per vim disjecta".—ἐγένοντο εἰς οὐδέν: phrase only here in N.T. (cf. xix. 27), but see in LXX, Job xxiv. 25, Isa. xl. 17, Wisd. iii. 17, xx. 16. γίνομαι εἰς in LXX and also in classics; in N.T. cf. Luke xiii. 19, xx. 17, Acts iv. 11, and cf. 1 Thess. iii. 5. In the first passage it is Hebraistic; in the passage before us and in 1 Thess. the phrases are quite possibly Greek, cf. especially Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 143. The phrase is more frequent in St. Luke's writings than in any other books of the N.T., except the Apocalypse.

Ver. 37. Ἰούδας ὁ Γαλ.: here too an inaccuracy might have been charged against St. Luke, but it is to be noted that while Josephus speaks of Judas as a Gaulonite in one passage, Jos., Ant., xviii., 1, 1, he frequently, as both Belser and Wendt point out, speaks of him as a Galilean, cf. Ant., xviii., 1, 6; xx., 5, 2; B. J., ii., 8, 1, and 17, 8. But the name Galilean might easily be given to him because Galilee was the scene of his exploits, or because Gamala, his home, belonged to Lower Gaulonitis, which was reckoned as part of Galilee. The accuracy of St. Luke in the account of Judas is remarkable, for Gamaliel speaks of his insurrection as coming to nothing. He could so speak, say in 34 or 35 A.D., but not some ten years later, when the followers of Judas had again gathered together, and formed a kind of school or party, to say nothing of the rebellion of his three sons, James, Simon, and later, Menahem; see Belser, u. s., p. 61, so Lightfoot, u. s., Nösgen, and Alford's note.

As we consider the characteristics of such men as Theudas and Judas, it is difficult to suppose that the age which produced them could have produced the Messiah of the Gospels. He is, in truth, the Anti-Christ of Judaism. Instead of giving Himself out to be somebody, Jesus is meek and lowly of heart; instead of stirring revolt in Galilee, a burning furnace of sedition, His blessing is upon ἐάσατε αὐτούς[1]· ὅτι ἐὰν ᾖ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων ἡ βουλὴ αὕτη ἢ τὸ ἔργον τοῦτο, καταλυθήσεται· 39. εἰ δὲ ἐκ Θεοῦ ἐστιν, οὐ δύνασθε καταλῦσαι

[1] After αφετ. αυτους (W.H., R.V.) DE, Flor. insert μη μιαναντες τας χειρας (E has μολυνοντες), d non coinquinatas manus, e non coinquinantes manus, Flor. non maculetis manus vestras. Blass and Hilg. follow D. Chase thinks that the gloss arose in Syriac by assim. of O.T. passages, cf. Isa. lix. 3; but see Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 79 ff., as against this, and for the possible deriv. from Syriac through the trans. of δυνησεσθε (W.H., R.V.), and for theories that the gloss has moved away (as in other instances according to H.) from its right place. Belser sees in each word of the β recension in vv. 38 and 39 "the stamp of originality". Mr. Harold Smith suggests that there was a gloss on εασατε (αφετε) αυτους from ver. 33: μη αναιρουντες—ΜΗΑΝΑΙΡΟΥΝΤΕϹ—then μη became repeated—ΜΗΜΗΑΝΑΙΡΟΥΝΤΕϹ—the second μη became ΜΙ (by itacism), while ΑΙΡ dropped out after ΑΝ. This produces ΜΗΜΙΑΝΟΥΝΤΕϹ which would easily be read μη μιαναντες—τας χειρας being added for sense. ἀναιρεῖν is very common in Acts.

the peace-makers; instead of seeking a kingly crown, like Judas the Gaulonite, He withdraws from those who would take Him by force, and make Him a king; instead of preaching revolt and licence in the name of liberty for merely selfish ends, He bade men render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's; instead of defiantly bidding His followers to be in subjection to no man, and inaugurating a policy of bloodshed and murder, He bade them remember that whilst One was their Master and Teacher, they all were brethren. Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. iii., p. 80, E.T., well points out that we have a literary memorial of the views and hopes of the Zealots in the Assumption of Moses, which goes so far as to prophesy that Israel will tread on the neck of the eagle, i.e., the Romans, x. 8; but see also edition of Assumption of Moses by Prof. Charles, p. 42.

Ver. 37. ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις τῆς ἀπογ., see Blass, in loco, on St. Luke's accuracy. We must be careful to distinguish this from Luke ii. 1. The tribal method of numbering which forms an essential part of St. Luke's story in the Gospel may explain why no such serious disturbance followed as resulted from the Roman numbering and valuation which marked Quirinius' second Roman administration, "the great census," ἡ ἀπογ. (in 6-8 A.D.), taken when Judæa had just become a part of the Roman province of Syria. This "great census," taken after the Roman method, involved the imposition of a tax, Jos., Ant., xviii., 1, 1, and it was this impost which roused the indignation of Judas. To pay tribute to a foreign power was to violate an Israelite's allegiance to Jehovah: "We have no Lord and Master but God," was the watchword of Judas and his followers. For the whole subject see Ramsay, Expositor, April and June, 1897, and Was Christ born at Bethlehem? (1898), e.g., pp. 107, 108, 127, 139.—καὶ ἀπέστησε λαὸν: used here transitively, and here only in the N.T., cf. Deut. vii. 4, and in classical writers, Herod., i., 76. The verb ἀφίστημι is not found in any of the Gospels except St. Luke's, where it occurs four times, and in the Acts six times. It is not only one of the words characteristic of the two books, but also of St. Luke and St. Paul (so also μεθίστημι, see on xix. 26), as it is only found once outside St. Paul's Epistles (in which it is employed four times), viz., Heb. iii. 12; "drew away some of the people," R.V. There is no word which actually expresses this as in T.R., where we have ἱκανόν = "much," A.V.—ὀπίσω αὐτοῦ: this prepositional use of ὀπ. is not found in classical writers, where the word is always an adverb. In the N.T. and LXX the prepositional use is derived from Hebrew אַחֲרֵי, cf. xx. 30, Luke ix. 23, xxi. 8. Blass, Grammatik des N. G., p. 126.—διεσκορπίσθησαν: it is true that the sect revived under the name of Zealots, and played an active part in the Jewish wars, but there is no reason for charging St. Luke's account with inaccuracy (so Overbeck following De Wette). The fate of the leader and the dispersion of his followers was quite sufficient to point the moral which Gamaliel wished to draw.

Ver. 38. καὶ τὰ νῦν, cf. also in iv. 29, xvii. 30, xx. 32, xxvii. 22. τὰ neuter accusative absolute — as respects the present, now, cf. 2 Macc. xv. 8; thus in all parts of Acts, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, Klostermann, p. 53, so Zeller, Leke-bisch, Friedrich. The expression is quite classical. —ἐάσατε: ἐάω characteristic of Luke, and is only used once elsewhere in the Gospels, Matt. xxiv. 43 (also in 1 Cor. x. 13), but twice in St. Luke's Gospel, and seven times in Acts —ἀφίημι occurs only thrice in Acts; viii. 22, xiv. 17.—καταλυθήσεται, "will be overthrown," R.V. evertere, Blass, so Rendall. This rendering gives the proper force of the word; it is not διαλύομαι as in ver. 36, which might be rendered "will be dissolved," but κατά indicates subversion, cf. Rom. xiv. 20, Acts vi. 14, Gal. ii. 18; cf. 2 Macc. ii. 22, 4 Macc. iv. 16, and frequently ibid., Vulgate, "dissolvetur".

Harcl. mg. demid. add ουτε υμεις ουτε βασιλεις ουτε τυραννοι, so Hilg. Belser lays special stress on these words, whilst Weiss only sees here and in the following words of D unfortunate attempts at emending; cf. Wisd. xii. 14, ουτε βασιλευς η τυραννος, and see also below on vi. 10. D, Syr. Harcl. mg., Flor. demid., 33 mg., 180 add απεχεσθε ουν απο των ανθρωπων τουτων. Weiss sees an empty repetition of ver. 38, but Belser finds in απεχ. that which enables the construction of the following μηποτε και κ.τ.λ. to run quite smoothly.

Ver. 39. ἐάν . . . εἰ δὲ: it has sometimes been thought that the change of mood from subjunctive to indicative, "but if it is of God," as if indicating that the second supposition were the more probable (cf. Gal. i. 8, 9), indicates sympathy on the part of Gamaliel. It is of course possible that he may have been rendered favourably disposed towards the Christians by their strict observance of the Law, and by their appeal to a doctrine which widely divided Pharisees and Sadducees. Others have attributed the change in mood, not to Gamaliel at all, but to the author (so Overbeck, Holtzmann), and have maintained (so Blass, Weiss, cf. Winer-Moulton, xli. 2) that the indicative may be used because the second is the case with which the Council had actually to deal, the assertion, i.e., of the Apostles. There may also be an underlying contrast between the transitoriness of all mere human schemes, all of which would be overthrown, and the certainty of that which is "of God," and which has Him for its Author. There cannot be the least ground for supposing that Gamaliel's counsel was in its tenor a mere invention, as it bears the impress of a thorough Rabbinical wise saying, cf. Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, v., 24 (Taylor, p. 93, second edition). See too Herod., ix., 16; Eur., Hippol., vi., 76; for the construction, cf. Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 96, and Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., pp. 103, 113 (1893), who compares LXX, Gen. xliv. 23, 26.—οὐ δύνασθε: R.V. and W.H., δυνήσεσθε. καταλῦσαι with accusative of person in Xen., Cyr., viii., 5, 24; Plato, Legg., iv., p. 714, C., cf. 4 Macc. iv. 16. But without this addition it is usual to refer back to προσέχετε in ver. 35 (cf. Luke xxi. 34) for the construction of μήποτε; but μήποτε . . . εὑρεθῆτε may be explained on the principle that a verb of fearing is sometimes unexpressed, the idea of fear being supplied by the context (in clauses where μή with the subjunctive is found), Burton, u. s., p. 96.—μήποτε, "lest haply," its use in later Greek, Blass, Grammatik des N. G., p. 208. καί sometimes interpreted (so Alford, Wendt, Holtzmann), as if it meant not only against man but also against God. θεομάχοι: not found elsewhere, but cf. LXX, Job xxvi. 5, Symm., and in Prov. ix. 18, xxi. 16, applying the word to the Rephaim (see B.D.² "Giants"); in 2 Macc. vii. 19 we have θεομαχεῖν ἐπεχείρησας. In classical Greek the same verb is found, see Grimm and Wendt for instances; θεομαχία, Plato, Rep., 378, D. (as certain books of the Iliad were called, especially the xix.). The tolerance of the sentiments here attributed to Gamaliel is undoubtedly in perfect accordance with what we know of his character and opinions; the decisions attributed to him, e.g., that relating to the law of the Sabbath (Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, ii., 2, 237; see also Derenbourg, Histoire de la Palestine, pp. 239-246, and cf. also Renan, Apostles, p. 153, E.T.), are marked by a tendency to mildness and liberality; and perhaps a still more remarkable illustration of the same tendency is afforded by the enactment so often referred to him (Hamburger, u. s.) to allow to the poor of the heathen, as well as of Israel, the gleaning and a participation in the corn left standing in the corner of the fields, to inquire after the welfare of the Gentile poor, to maintain them, to visit their sick, to bury their dead (the prayer against heretics belonged not to this Gamaliel, but to Gamaliel II.). But the decision of Gamaliel was not prompted by any sympathy with the Christians; it was the judgment of toleration and prudence, but certainly nothing more, although it scarcely falls under the head of "cynical"; it was rather, as Ewald called it, that of an ordinary politician. No credence whatever can be attributed to the tradition that Gamaliel became a Christian, or that he was secretly a Christian, although we may sympathise with St. Chrysostom's words, "it cannot be that he should have continued in unbelief to the end". The Talmud distinctly affirms that he died a Jew, and, if he had betrayed his faith, we cannot understand the honour which Jewish tradition attaches to his name, "Gamaliel," B.D.[2]; Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 364. Wendt, while he refuses to admit the historical character of the speech of Gamaliel, is evidently puzzled to discover any definite grounds for St. Luke's wilful introduction of the famous Rabban into the scene (so too Feine). He therefore supposes that the decision in ver. 38, in which he sees a wise saying similar to those attributed to other Rabbis, was assigned by tradition to Gamaliel, and that St. Luke, who was in possession of the further tradition that Gamaliel had given a decisive judgment in the trial of the Apostles, introduces this saying into the speech which he attributes to Gamaliel as fitting to the occasion. But there is no indication in our authorities that the sentiment thus attributed to Gamaliel was in any way different from what might have been expected of him (see Schürer, Jewish People, u. s.). The chief objection to the speech, viz., the alleged anachronism involved in the mention of Theudas, really begs the question as to its authenticity, and even on the supposition of an inaccuracy in the point mentioned, we cannot get rid of the fact that the attitude of Gamaliel in itself betrays no inconsistency. It was this alleged anachronism which caused Spitta to refer the incident of Gamaliel in this chapter to his inferior source B., and to refuse to adopt the solution of Weiss and Feine, who solved the difficulty involved in the mention of Theudas by introducing the hand of a reviser.

Ver. 40. ἐπείσθησαν δὲ αὐτῷ: whatever scruples Gamaliel may have had in pressing matters against the Apostles, or even if the teaching of Christ, as some have conjectured, with much of which he might have sympathised as a follower of Hillel, had influenced his mind, or if, like Joseph of Arimathea, he too had not consented to the counsel and will of his fellow-Sanhedrists, there is no reason to suppose (see above) that he ever advanced beyond the compromise here suggested. It may be that Neander was right in his judgment that Gamaliel was too wise a man to render a fanatical movement more violent still by opposing it. Others however see in his words a mere laisser-aller view of matters, or a timid caution which betokened a mere waiter upon Providence. But at the same time there are occasions when Gamaliel's advice may not be out of place, see Bengel on ver. 38, and Farrar, St. Paul, i., 110 ff.—δείραντες, Deut. xxv. 3, 2 Cor. xi. 24: the punishment was for minor offences, and it was now inflicted upon the Apostles because they had trangressed the command enjoined upon them previously, iv. 18. The Pharisees, probably by their superior number in the Sanhedrim (Jos., Ant., xiii., 10, 6), were able to secure the following of Gamaliel's advice, and to prevent extreme measures against the Apostles, but they were not prepared to disregard the previous injunction of the Council which bade the Apostles refrain from uttering a word in the name of Jesus. But the Apostles themselves must have seen in the punishment a striking fulfilment of their Lord's words, as in the closing hours of His earthly life He foretold their future sufferings for His Name. The penalty which must have been a very painful one, although the command not to exceed forty stripes often led to its mitigation, was often inflicted by the synagogues, and not only by the great Sanhedrim, for all kinds of offences as against heretics and others. These verses 40-42, with the exception of the words ἐπείσθησαν δὲ αὐτῷ, were referred by Jüngst to the redactor on the ground that they do not fit in well after Gamaliel's speech, and that the Apostles would have been at once released, but the Apostles were punished for a transgression of the command previously laid upon them in iv. 18. According to Jüngst, who here follows Spitta, the original conclusion of the narrative is to be found in inserting after ver. 39, chap. vi. 7! Here we are told is a notice, which is quite out of place where it now stands, that a great number of the priests were obedient to the faith: this was the result of the speech of Gamaliel, and his warning not to be found "fighting against God"; a speech delivered in the Sanhedrim in the midst of the priests!

Ver. 41. οἱ μὲν οὖν: no answering δέ as after i. 6, ii. 41, but explained because immediately upon ἐπορεύοντο (which answers to ἀπέλυσαν) follows χαίροντες, marking the attitude of the Apostles, and showing how little they proposed to obey the injunction from fear of further punishment. But see also Mr. Rendall's note, and also his Appendix on μὲν οὖν, Acts, p. 163, in which he examines this view at length; according to him there is an answering δέ, but it is found in the antithesis to this sentence in chap. vi. 1, the connection being that the Apostles now became more absorbed in their spiritual work, and a murmuring arose in consequence of their neglect of the distribution of the common funds. But this antithesis does not seem natural, and a censure on the Apostles is not necessarily contained in vi. i. ff.—ἐπορεύοντο χαίροντες: "imperf. quia describitur modus" (Blass, Grammatik des N. G., p. 186; if one prophecy of their Lord had been already fulfilled, another was fulfilled in the sequel, Matt. v. 11, 12, Phil. i. 29.—κατηξιώθησαν . . . ἀτιμασθῆναι: oxymoron, cf. 2 Cor. vi. 8-10; cf. Bengel's note—he calls it "eximium oxy.". The verb καταξ. is used by St. Luke in his Gospel, xx. 35 (xxi. 36, T.R., but not W.H. or R.V.), and here; only found once elsewhere, 2 Thess. i. 5, in a passage where the thought of Christian suffering and inheritance is combined; 2 Macc. xiii. 12, 3 Macc. iii. 21, iv. 11, 4 Macc. xviii. 3. ἀτιμασθῆναι only used once elsewhere by St. Luke, cf. Luke xx. 11, where it is also found in connection with δέρω.—ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόμ., "the Name"—i.e., the Name κατ' ἐξοχήν, cf. 3 John 7, and James v. 14 (ii. 7) (τοῦ Κ. doubtful), cf. also Clem. This use of παύεσθαι with the participle almost entirely in Luke and Paul may be regarded as a remains of literary usage, Luke v. 4, Col. i. 9, Ephes. i. 16 (Heb. x. 2); Viteau, *Le Grec du N. CHAPTER VI.—Ver. 1. δὲ; cf. i. 15, and see above in v. 41. There seems no occasion to regard δὲ as marking a contrast between v. 41 and the opening of this chapter, or as contrasting the outward victory of the Church with its inward dissensions (as Meyer, Holtzmann, Zechler, see Nösgen's criticism in loco); simply introduces a new recital as in iii. 1. It may refer back to the notice in v. 14 of the increase of the disciples, and this would be in harmony with the context. On the expression ἐν ταῖς ἡμέρ. ταύτ., as characteristic of Luke, see above, and Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 9; in both his Gospel and the Acts expressions with ἡμέρα abound. Harnack admits that in passing to this sixth chapter "we at once enter on historical ground," Expositor, v., p. 324 (3rd series). For views of the partition critics see Wendt's summary in new edition (1899), p. 140, Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., p. 390 ff. (1895), and also in commentary below. Wendt sees in vi. 1-7 the hand of the redactor, the author of Acts ii. 5; others suppose that we have in vi. the commencement of a new Hellenistic source; so Feine, J. Weiss, Hilgenfeld. Clemen refers vi. 7, 8 to his Historia Petri, whilst ver. 9 commences his Historia Hellenistarum (vv. 1-6 belong to a special source); others again see in chap. vi. the continuance of an earlier source or sources.—πληθυνόντων, when the number of the disciples was multiplying (present part.); verb frequent in LXX, sometimes intrans. as here, Exod. i. 20, etc., and see Psalms of Solomon, x., 1, and note in Ryle and James' edition; cf. also its classical use in its more correct form, πληθύω, in the Acts: vi. 7, vii. 17, ix. 31, xii. 24. On St. Luke's fondness for this and similar words (Friedrich) see p. 73. Weiss calls it here a very modest word, introduced by one who knew nothing of the conversions in many of the preceding chapters. But the word, and especially its use in the present participle, rather denotes that the numbers went on increasing, and so rapidly that the Apostles found the work of relief too great for them.—μαθητῶν, the word occurs here for the first time in the Acts (surely an insufficient ground for maintaining with Hilgenfeld that we are dealing with a new source). The same word is found frequently in each of the Gospels, twenty-eight times in Acts (μαθήτρια once, ix. 36), but never in the Epistles. It evidently passed into the ancient language of the early Church from the earthly days of the ministry of Jesus, and may fairly be regarded as the earliest designation of the Christians; but as the associations connected with it (the thought that Jesus was the διδάσκαλος and His followers His μαθηταί) passed into the background it quickly dropped out of use, although in the Acts the name is still the rule for the more ancient times and for the Jewish-Christian Churches; cf. xxi. 16. In the Acts we have the transition marked from μαθηταί to the brethren and saints of the Epistles. The reason for the change is obvious. During the lifetime of Jesus the disciples were called after their relationship to Him; after His departure the names given indicated their relation to each other and to the society (Dr. Sanday, Inspiration, p. 289). And as an evidential test of the date of the various N.T. writings this is just what we might expect: the Gospels have their own characteristic vocabulary, the Epistles have theirs, whilst Acts forms a kind of link between the two groups, Gospels and Epistles. It is, of course, to be remembered that both terms ἀδελφοί and ἅγιοι are also found in Acts, not to the exclusion of, but alongside with, μαθηταί (cf., e.g., ix. 26, 30, xxi. 4, 7, 16, 17): the former in all parts of the book, and indeed more frequently than μαθηταί, as applied to Christians; the latter four times, ix. 13, 32, 41, xxvi. 10. But if our Lord gave the charge to His disciples recorded in St. Matt. xxviii. 19, bidding them make disciples of all the nations, μαθητεύσατε (cf. also Acts xiv. 21 for the same word), then we can understand that the term would still be retained, as it was so closely associated with the last charge of the Master, whilst a mutual discipleship involved a mutual brotherhood (Matt. xxiii. 8). St. Paul in his Epistles would be addressing those who enjoyed through Christ a common share with himself in a holy fellowship and calling, and whom he would therefore address not as μαθηταί but as ἀδελφοί and ἅγιοι. They were still μαθηταί, yet not of man but of the Lord (only in one passage in Acts, and that a doubtful one, ix. 43, is the word μαθηταί or μαθητής used of any human teacher), and the word was still true of them with that significance, and is still used up to a period subsequent (we may well believe) to the writing of several of Paul's Epistles, Acts xxi. 16. How the word left its impress upon the thought of the Church, in the claim of the disciple to be as his Master, is touchingly evidenced by the expressions of St. Ign., Ephes. i. 2; Magn., ix., 2; Rom. iv. 2; Tral., v., 2 (St. Polyc., Martyr, xvii., 3, where the word is applied to the martyrs as disciples of the Lord, and the prayer is offered: ὧν γένοιτο καὶ ἡμᾶς συγκοινωνούς τε καὶ συμμαθητὰς γενέσθαι). — γογγυσμὸς and γογγύζειν are both used by St. Luke (cf. Luke v. 30), by St. John, and also by St. Paul, Phil. ii. 14, and 1 Cor. x. 10, the noun also by St. Peter, i. 4, 9. The noun is found seven times in the LXX of Israel in the wilderness (cf. 1 Cor. x. 10); so in Phil. ii. 14 it is probable that the same passage, Exod. xvi. 7, was in the Apostle's mind, as in the next verse he quotes from the Song of Moses, Deut. xxxii. 5, LXX; so γόγγυσις is also found in LXX with the same meaning, Numb. xiv. 27. γογγυσμός is also found in Wisd. i. 10, Ecclus. xlvi. 7, with reference to Numb. xiv. 26, 27, and twice in Psalms of Solomon v. 15, xvi. 11. In Attic Greek τονθυρισμός would be used (so τονθρίζω and τονθυρίζω). Phrynichus brands the other forms as Ionian, but Dr. Kennedy maintains that γογγυσμός and γογγύζειν from their frequent use in the LXX are rather to be classed amongst "vernacular terms" long continued in the speech of the people, from which the LXX drew. Both words are probably onomatopoetic.—Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, pp. 38-40, 72, 73, 76; see also Rutherford, New Phrynichus, p. 463; Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 106. Here the word refers rather to indignatio clandestina, not to an open murmuring. —Ἑλληνιστῶν. The meaning of the term, which was a matter of conjecture in St. Chrysostom's day, cannot be said to be decided now (Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 48). The verb Ἑλληνίζειν, to speak Greek (Xen., Anab., vii., 3, 25), helps us reasonably to define it as a Greek-speaking Jew (so also Holtzmann and Wendt). The term occurs again in ix. 29 (and xi. 20? see in loco), and includes those Jews who had settled in Greek-speaking countries, who spoke the common Greek dialect in place of the vernacular Aramaic current in Palestine, and who would be more or less acquainted with Greek habits of life and education. They were therefore a class distinguished not by descent but by language. This word "Grecians" (A.V.) was introduced to distinguish them from the Greeks by race, but the rendering "Grecian Jews" (R.V.) makes the distinction much plainer. Thus in the Dispersion "the cultured Jew was not only a Jew but a Greek as well"; he would be obliged from force of circumstances to adapt himself to his surroundings more or less, but, even in the more educated, the original Jewish element still predominated in his character; and if this was true of the higher it was still more true of the lower classes amongst the Hellenists—no adoption of the Greek language as their mode of speech, no separation of distance from the Holy City, no defections in their observances of the law, or the surrender as unessential of points which the Pharisees deemed vital, could make them forget that they were members of the Commonwealth of Israel, that Palestine was their home, and the Temple their pride, see B.D.[2], "Hellenist," Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 282, E.T.; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, ii., 3, "Griechenthum". But bearing this description in mind, we can the more easily understand the conflict with Stephen, and his treatment by those who were probably his fellow-Hellenists. If as a cultured Hellenist St. Stephen's sympathies were wider and his outlook less narrow than that of the orthodox Jew, or of the less educated type of Hellenist, such a man, who died as St. Stephen died with the prayer of Jesus on his lips (see Feine's remarks), must have so lived in the spirit of his Master's teaching as to realise that in His Kingdom the old order would change and give place to new. But the same considerations help us to understand the fury aroused by St. Stephen's attitude, and it is not difficult to imagine the fanatical rage of a people who had nearly risen in insurrection because Pilate had placed in his palace at Jerusalem some gilt shields inscribed with the names of heathen gods, against one who without the power of Pilate appeared to advocate a change of the customs which Moses had delivered (see Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, p. 69).—Ἑβραῖοι—in W.H. with smooth breathing, see W.H., Introduction, p. 313, and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 40; here those Jews in Palestine who spoke Aramaic; in the Church at Jerusalem they would probably form a considerable majority, cf. Phil. iii. 5, and Lightfoot's note. In the N.T. Ἰουδαῖος is opposed to Ἕλλην (Rom. i. 16), and Ἑβραῖος to Ἑλληνιστής, Acts vi. 1. In the former case the contrast lies in the difference of race and religion; in the latter in the difference of customs and language. A man might be called Ἰουδαῖος, but he would not be Ἑβραῖος in the N.T. sense unless he retained in speech the Aramaic tongue; the distinction was therefore drawn on the side of language, a distinction which still survives in our way of speaking of the Jewish nation, but of the Hebrew tongue. See Trench, Synonyms, i., p. 156 ff. In the two other passages in which Ἑβρ. is used, Phil. iii. 5 and 2 Cor. xi. 22, whatever difficulties surround them, it is probable that the distinctive force of the word as explained above is implied. But as within the nation, the distinction is not recognised by later Christian writers, and that it finds no place at all in Jewish writers like Philo and Josephus, or in Greek authors like Plutarch and Pausanias (Trench, u. s.).—πρὸς, cf. St. Luke v. 30, ἐγόγγυζον πρὸς τ. μαθητὰς αὐτοῦ.—παρεθεωροῦντο: not found elsewhere in N.T. and not in LXX, but used in this sense in Dem. (also by Diodorus and Dion. Hal.) = παρορᾶν, Attic: imperfect, denoting that the neglect had been going on for some time; how the neglect had arisen we are not told—there is no reason to suppose that there had been previously Palestinian deacons (so Blass in β, critical notes), for the introduction of such a class of deacons, as Hilgenfeld notes, is something quite new, and does not arise out of anything previously said, although it would seem that in the rapidly growing numbers of the Church the Hebrew Christians regarded their Hellenist fellow-Christians as having only a secondary claim on their care. Possibly the supply for the Hellenists fell short, simply because the Hebrews were already in possession. The Church had been composed first of Galileans and native Jews resident in Jerusalem, and then there was added a wider circle—Jews of the Dispersion. It is possible to interpret the incident as an indication of what would happen as the feeling between Jew and Hellenist became more bitter, but it is difficult to believe that the Apostles, who shared with St. James of Jerusalem the belief that θρησκεία consisted in visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction, could have acted in a spirit of partiality, so that the neglect, if it was due to them, could be attributed to anything else than to their ignorance of the greatness of the need.—διακονίᾳ, see below on ver. 2.—καθημερινῇ: not found elsewhere in N.T. or in LXX, only in Judith xii. 15. It is a word only used in Hellenistic Greek, cf. Josephus, Ant., iii., 10, 1; but it may be noted that it is also a word frequently employed by medical writers of a class of fevers, etc. See instances in Hobart, pp. 134, 135, and also in Wetstein, in loco.—αἱ χῆραι αὐτῶν: not merely a generic term for the poor and needy—under the Mosaic dispensation no legal provision was made for widows, but they would not only receive the privileges belonging to other distressed classes, but also specific regulations protected them — they were commended to the care of the community, and their oppression and neglect were strongly condemned — it is quite possible that the Hellenistic widows had previously been helped from the Temple Treasury, but that now, on their joining the Christian community, this help had ceased. On the care of the widow in the early Church, see James i. 27 (Mayor's note); Polycarp, Phil., vi., 1, where the presbyters are exhorted to be εὔσπλαγχνοι μὴ ἀμελοῦντες χήρας ἢ ὀρφανοῦ ἢ πένητος, and cf. iv. 3. The word χήρα occurs no less than nine times in St. Luke's Gospel, three times in the Acts, but elsewhere in the Evangelists only three times in St. Mark (Matt. xxiii. 14, omitted by W.H. and R.V.), and two of these three in an incident which he and St. Luke alone record, Mark xii. 42, 43, and the other time in a passage also peculiar to him and St. Luke (if we are justified in omitting Matt. xxiii. 14), viz., Mark xii. 40.

Ver. 2. προσκαλεσάμενοι δὲ οἱ δώδεκα: whatever may have been the irritation caused by the pride or neglect of the Hebrews, the Apostles recognised that there was ground for complaint, and thus showed not only their practical capacities, but also their freedom from any partiality. οἱ δώδ.: only here in Acts, but cf. 1 Cor. xv. 5, where St. Paul uses the title as if it were well and widely known, and required no explanation from him. It is found six times in St. Luke's Gospel, and no less than ten in St. Mark's. See also above i. 26, ii. 14. — τὸ πλῆθος = the whole Church, not the hundred-and-twenty, as J. Lightfoot. The expression is a general one, and need not imply that every single member of the Church obeyed the summons. For the word πλῆθος and the illustration of its use in religious communities on the papyri by Deissmann, see p. 73. The passage has been quoted in support of the democratic constitution of the Apostolic Church, but the whole context shows that the government really lay with the Apostles. The Church as a whole is under their direction and counsel, and the Apostles alone determine what qualification those chosen should possess, the Apostles alone lay hands upon them after prayer: "The hand of man is laid upon the person, but the whole work is of God, and it is His hand which toucheth the head of the one ordained, if he be duly ordained" (Chrys., Hom., xiv.). The dignity of the Apostles, and their authority as leaders of the Church and ordainers of the Seven, is fully recognised by Feine, but he considers that their position is so altered, and the organisation of the Church so much more developed, that another source and not the Jerusalem Quellenschrift must be supposed; but if, as Feine allows, such passages as iv. 34, v. 2, belong to the Jerusalem source, it would appear that the authority of the Apostles in the passage before us was a very plain and natural development.—καταλείψαντας: on the formation of the first aorist see Blass, Grammatik, p. 43, and also Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 18; Winer-Schmiedel, p. 109.—διακονεῖν τραπέζαις: there seems to be an intentional antithesis between these words and τῇ διακονίᾳ τοῦ λόγου in ver. 3. The Twelve do not object to the work of ministering, but only to the neglect of ministering to the higher sustenance for the sake of the lower (Hort, Ecclesia, p. 206); thus Bengel speaks of the expression as used with indignation, "Antitheton, ministerium verbi". διακονία and διακονεῖν are used for ministrations to man, although more usually of man to God; cf. Acts xix. 22, of service to St. Paul, διακονία, Acts xi. 29, xii. 25, of service to the brethren of Judæa in the famine, Rom. xv. 25, 31, 2 Cor. viii. 4, ix. 1, 12, 13, of the Gentile collections for the same purpose, so too probably in Rom. xvi. 1 of the service rendered by Stephanas to travelling Christians, cf. Heb. vi. 10, and its use of the verb in the Gospels of ministering to our Lord's earthly wants, Luke viii. 3, x. 40 (both noun and verb), John xii. 2; cf. also Luke xii. 37, xxii. 27, Matt. iv. 11, Luke iv. 39; see further on the use of the word in classical Greek, Hort, Ecclesia, p. 203. The word had a high dignity conferred upon it when, in contrast to the contemptuous associations which surrounded it for the most part in Greek society, Epictetus remarks that it is man's true honour to be a διάκονος of God (Diss., iii., 22, 69; 24, 65; iv. 7, 20; cf. iii. 26, 28), and a dignity immeasurably higher still, when the Son of Man could speak of Himself as in Matt. xx. 28, Mark x. 45; cf. Luke xxii. 27. "Every clergyman begins as a deacon. This is right. But he never ceases to be a deacon. The priest is a deacon still. The bishop is a deacon still. Christ came as a deacon, lived as a deacon, died as a deacon: μὴ διακονηθῆναι, ἀλλὰ διακονῆσαι" (Lightfoot, Ordination Sermons, p. 115). In the LXX the verb does not occur at all, but διάκονος is used four times in Esther i. 10, ii. 2, vi. 3, 5, of the king's chamberlains and of the servants that ministered to him, and once in 4 Macc. ix. 17; διακονία is also found in two of the passages in Esther just quoted, vi. 3 and 5, where in A we read οἱ ἐκ τῆς διακονίας (BS διάκονοι), and once in 1 Macc. xi. 58, of the service of gold sent by Jonathan to Antiochus. What is meant by the expression here? does it refer to distribution of money or in kind? The word in itself might include either, but if we were to limit διακονία to alms, yet the use of the word remarked upon above renders the service higher than that of ordinary relief: "ministration," says St. Chrysostom (although he takes it of alms, Hom., xiv.), "extolling by this at once the doers and those to whom it was done". But τραπέζαις presents a further difficulty; does it refer to the tables of exchange for money, a rendering which claims support from Matt. xxi. 12, xxv. 27, Luke xix. 23, John ii. 15, or to tables for food, Luke xvi. 21, xxii. 21, 30? Possibly the use of the word in some passages in the N.T., and also the fact that the διακονία was καθημερινή, may indicate the latter, and the phrase may refer to the actual serving and superintending at the tables at which the poor sat, or at all events to the supplying in a general way those things which were necessary for their bodily sustenance. Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte (second edition), refers the word to the ministration of the gifts of love offered at the Eucharist in the various Christian houses (so Scaliger understood the expression of the Agapæ). Mr. Humphry reminds us that the words were quoted by Latimer (1548) in a sermon against some bishops of his time who were comptrollers of the mint.

Ver. 3. ἐπισκέψασθε οὖν: the verb, though frequently used by St. Luke in both his writings, is not elsewhere used in the sense of this verse, "look ye out," cf. σκέπτεσθαι in Gen. xli. 33.—μαρτυρουμένους, cf. Heb. xi. 2, 39, and cf. 4, 5, and 1 Tim. v. 10, Acts x. 22, xxii. 12, also xvi. 2; cf. its use also in Clem. Rom., Cor., xvii., 1; xviii. 1, etc.; Ignat., Phil., xi., 1; Ephes., xii. 2. See also the interesting parallels in Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 93. In Jos., Ant., iii., 2, 5, and xv., 10, 5, it is used as here, but of hostile testimony in Matt. xxiii. 31, John xviii. 23.—ἑπτά: why was the number chosen? Various answers have been given to the question: (1) that the number was fixed upon because of the seven gifts of the Spirit, Isa. xi. 2, Rev. i. 4; (2) that the number was appointed with regard to the different elements of the Church: three Hellenists, three Hebrews, one Proselyte; (3) that the number was regulated by the fact that the Jerusalem of that day may have been divided into seven districts; (4) that the number was suggested by the Hebrew sacred number—seven; (5) Zöckler thinks that there is no hypothesis so probable as that the small Jerusalem ἐκκλησίαι κατ' οἶκον were seven in number, each with its special worship, and its special business connected with alms-giving and distribution—alms-giving closely related to the Eucharist or to the Love-Feasts; (6) the derivation of the number from Roman usage on the analogy of the septemviri epulones advocated by Dean Plumptre, officials no doubt well known to the Libertini (see also B.D.[2] "Deacon," and the remarks of Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 375, on Roman organisation and its value). This is far more probable than that there should be any connection between the appointment of the Seven and the two heathen inscriptions quoted by Dr. Hatch (Bampton Lectures, p. 50, note 56), in which the word διάκονος is used of the assistants in the ritual of sacrificial and temple feasts at Anactorium in Acarnania and Metropolis in Lydia (see on the other hand, Hort, Ecclesia, p. 210), for in the incident before us the word διάκονος is not used at all, and later in the history, xxi. 8, Philip is described not by that title but as one of the Seven. Nor is there any real likeness to be found between the office assigned to the Seven and that of the Chazzan or officer of the Jewish synagogue (ὑπηρέτης, Luke iv. 20), who corresponded rather to our parish-clerk or verger, and whose duties were confined to the synagogue; a nearer Jewish parallel is to be found in the צְדָקָה גַּבָּאֵי, collectors of alms, but these officers would rather present a parallel to the tax-gatherers than to those who ministered to the poor (see "Deacon" in Hastings, B.D.). Whilst, however, these analogies in Jewish offices fail us, we stand on much higher ground if we may suppose that as our Lord's choice of the Twelve was practically the choice of a number sacred in its associations for every Israelite, so the number Seven may have been adopted from its sacredness in Jewish eyes, and thus side by side with the sacred Apostolic College there existed at this period another College, that of the Seven. What was the nature of the office? Was it the Diaconate in the modern sense of the term? But, as we have noted above, the Seven are never called Deacons, and therefore it has been thought that we have here a special office to meet a special need, and that the Seven were rather the prototypes of the later archdeacons, or corresponded to the elders who are mentioned in xi. 30 and xiv. 23. On the other hand St. Luke,

from the prominence given to the narrative, may fairly be regarded as viewing the institution of the office as establishing a new departure, and not as an isolated incident, and the emphasis is characteristic of an historian who was fond of recording "beginnings" of movements. The earliest Church tradition speaks of Stephen and Nicolas as ordained to the diaconate, Iren., Adv. Haer., i., 26; iv., 15, and the same writer speaks of Stephen as "the first deacon," iii., 12; cf. also the testimony of St. Cyprian, Epist., 3, 3, and the fact that for centuries the Roman Church continued to restrict the number of deacons to seven (Cornelius, ap. Euseb. H. E., vi., 43). It is quite true that the first mention of διάκονοι in the N.T. (although both διακονία and διακονεῖν are used in the passage before us) is not found until Phil. i. 1, but already a deaconess had been mentioned in writing to the Church at Rome (xvi. 1, where Phœbe is called διάκονος), in the Church at Philippi the office had evidently become established and familiar, and it is reasonable to assume that the institution of the Seven at Jerusalem would have been well known to St. Paul and to others outside Palestine, "and that analogous wants might well lead to analogous institutions" (Hort, and to the same effect, Gore, The Church and its Ministry, p. 403). But if the Seven were thus the prototypes of the deacons, we must remember that as the former office though primarily ordained for helping the Apostles in distribution of alms and in works of mercy was by no means confined to such duties, but that from the very first the Seven were occupied in essentially spiritual work, so the later diaconate was engaged in something far different from mere charity organisation; there were doubtless qualifications demanded such as might be found in good business men of tact and discretion, but there were also moral and spiritual qualities which to a great extent were required of the διάκονοι no less than of the πρεσβύτεροι and ἐπίσκοποι: there was the holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience, there was the moral and spiritual courage which would enable the διάκονοι to gain even in the pursuit of their διακονία "great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus," 1 Tim. iii. 13 (Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 138 ff.); see also on the whole subject, Felten, Apostelgeschichte, p. 139 ff.; Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 206 ff.; Lightfoot, Philippians, "Dissertation on the Christian Ministry," and Real-Encyclopädie für protest. Theol. und Kirche (Hauck), "Diakonen" (Heft 38, 1898).—σοφίας: practical wisdom, prudentia, cf. 1 Cor. vi. 5 (Blass, so Grimm); in ver. 10 the use of the word is different, but in both places σοφία is referred to the Spirit, "it is not simply spiritual men, but full of the Spirit and of wisdom . . . for what profits it that the dispenser of alms speak not, if nevertheless he wastes all, or be harsh and easily provoked?" Chrys., Hom., xiv.—οὓς καταστήσομεν (on the reading whom ye, which was exhibited in some few editions of A.V., see Speaker's Commentary, in loco): the appointment, the consecration, and the qualifications for it, depend upon the Apostles—the verb implies at all events an exercise of authority if it has no technical force, cf. Titus i. 5. The same shade of meaning is found in classical writers and in the LXX in the use of the verb with the genitive, with ἐπί, sometimes with a dative, sometimes with an accusative: Gen. xxxix. 4, xli. 41, Exod. ii. 14, xviii. 21, Num. iii. 10, Neh. xii. 44, Dan. ii. 48, 49, 1 Macc. vi. 14; cf. its use in Luke xii. 14, 42, 44. The opposite is expressed by μεταστήσασθαι ἀπὸ τῆς χρ., Polyb., iv., 87, 9; 1 Macc. xi. 63 (Wendt).—χρείας: the word might mean need in the sense of necessity, Latin opus, want, 2 Chron. ii. 16, Wisdom xiii. 16, 1 Macc. iii. 28, or it might mean business, Latin negotium, officium. In the LXX it seems to be employed in both senses, as also in classical writers, but here both A. and R.V. render "business" (so in Polybius), cf. Judith xii. 10 AB., 1 Macc. x. 37, xi. 63, xii. 45 (χρεία is found no less than eight times in 1 Macc., seven times in 2 Macc., once in 3 Macc.); see Wetstein for uses of the word in Philo and Josephus.

Ver. 4. ἡμεῖς δὲ: in marked contrast to the service of tables, etc., but still every work in the Church, whether high or low, was a διακονία.—τῇ διακ. τοῦ λ., see above.—προσκαρτερήσομεν, "will continue steadfastly," R.V., see above on i. 14.—τῇ προσ., "the prayer" (Hort); the article seems to imply not only private prayer and intercession, but the public prayer of the Church.

Ver. 5. ἤρεσεν ἐνώπιον: phrase not usual in classical Greek; but ἐνώ. in this sense, so κατενώπιον ἔναντι κατέναντι, derived from the LXX (ἐναντίον frequent in LXX, is also classical); cf., e.g., Deut. i. 23 A, 2 Sam. iii. 36, 1 Kings iii. 10, xx. (xxi.) 2, Jer. xviii. 4, Ju. vii. 16, xiii. 20, 1 Macc. vi. 60, viii. 21 (ἐναντίον, S), where the whole phrase occurs. Blass, Grammatik, p. 125, and see on iv. 10.—πλήθους, cf. Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 60, and above on p. 73.—ἐξελέξαντο, see above, cf. xv. 22, 25, always in the middle in N.T. (Luke ix. 35 doubtful), so in LXX. Blass, Grammatik, p. 181, nearly always = בָּחַר. On the importance of the step thus taken as marking a distinct stage in the organisation of the Church, and in the distribution of work amongst the members of what was now a true body politic, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 372; Hort., Ecclesia, p. 52, and on its further importance in the emancipation of the Church, see Lightfoot's "Paul and the Three". The choice of the names has often been held to indicate the liberal spirit in which the complaint of the Hellenists was met, since the Seven bear purely Greek names, and we infer that the bearers were Hellenists, "elegerunt ergo Graecos non Hebræos, ut magis satisfacerent murmuri Graecorum" Cornelius à Lapide. But the inference is not altogether certain, however probable (see Wendt, Felten), for Greek names, e.g., Philip, Didymus, Andrew, were also found amongst the Palestinian Jews. Bengel holds that part were Hebrew, part Hellenist, whilst Gieseler hazarded the opinion that three were Hebrews, three Hellenists, and one a proselyte. But we cannot conclude from the fact that they were probably Hellenists, that the Seven were only charged with the care of distribution amongst the Hellenist section of the Church, as there is nothing in the narrative to warrant this. We cannot say that we know anything of the Seven except Stephen and Philip—Stephen the preacher and martyr of liberty, Philip the practical worker (Lightfoot, "Paul and the Three"). Baronius hazarded the fanciful conjecture that Stephen as well as Saul was a pupil of Gamaliel. Both Stephen and Philip were said to have been amongst the Seventy, Epiphanius, Haer., xx., 4 (but see Hooker, v., lxxviii., 5). If so, it is possible that they may have been sent to labour in Samaria as our Lord had laboured there, Luke ix. 52, xvii. 11; and possibly the after work of Philip in that region, and possibly some of the remarks in St. Stephen's speech, may be connected with a mission which had been committed to Hellenistic Jews. See further on his name and work, Dean Plumptre, in loco, and also below, notes on chap. vii. He may well be called not only the proto-martyr, but also the first great Christian Ecclesiastic (B.D.[1] "Stephen").—The description given of Stephen (as of Barnabas, so closely similar, xi. 24, cf. Numb. xxvii. 18 of Joshua) shows that the essential qualifications for office were moral and spiritual; see also below on Φίλιππον.—πλήρη: in some MSS. the word appears as indeclinable, W.H. margin, so in ver. 3, xix. 28, Mark viii. 19, 2 John 8. Blass, Grammatik, p. 81. St. Luke uses the adjective twice in his Gospel, and eight times in the Acts; on his fondness for such words, see p. 73.—πίστεως: not in the lower sense of honesty or truthfulness, but in the higher sense of religious faith, cf. xi. 24, "non modo fidelitate sed fide spirituali," Bengel.—Φίλιππον, cf. viii. 5, xxi. 8: we may probably trace his work also along the coasts of Palestine and Phœnicia, cf. viii. 40, xv. 3, xxi. 3, 7 (Plumptre's notes on these passages), and no doubt St. Luke would have learnt from him, when he met him at Cæsarea, xxi. 8, much that relates to the early history of the Church, Introd., 17. It would appear both in his case and in that of St. Stephen that the duties of the Seven could not have been confined to service of the tables. In the deacons M. Renan saw a proclamation of the truth that social questions should be the first to occupy the attention of man, and the deacons were, for him, the best preachers of Christianity; but we must not forget that they did not preach merely by their method and works of charity, but by a proclamation of a Saviour and by the power of the Holy Ghost. In the reference to Philip in xxi. 8 as simply "one of the Seven" we may fairly see one of the many proofs of the unity of the authorship of Acts, see Salmon, Introd., chapter xviii., and Lightfoot, "Acts," B.D.[2], and see further, Salmon in the same chapter, on the proof which is afforded in the account of Philip of the antiquity of the Acts; see below also on xxi. 8.—Πρόχορον: tradition says that he was consecrated by St. Peter Bishop of Nicomedia, and a fabulous biography of John the Evangelist had his name attached to it, as a companion of the Apostle in Asia, and his biographer—but we cannot attach any credence to any such professed information; see Blass, in loco, Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., 1895, p. 426; B.D.[1] iii. sub v. Of Simon, Parmenas, Nicanor, it cannot be said that anything is known, as is frankly admitted by the Romanist commentator Felten.—Νικόλαον προσήλυτον Ἀ.: that the name proselyte is given to him has been held by many to mark him out as the only proselyte among the Seven; otherwise it is difficult to see why he alone is so designated (so Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 375, Lightfoot, Hort, Weiss, Felten, and amongst earlier writers, De Wette and Ewald). No doubt he was a proselyte of the higher and more complete type (a "proselyte of the gate," the lower type—as distinct from a "proselyte of righteousness"—is always in Acts φοβούμενος or σεβόμενος τὸν θεόν), but Ramsay sees in his election to office another distinct step in advance: "the Church is wider than the pure Jewish race, and the non-Jewish element is raised to official rank," although, as Ramsay himself points out, there was nothing in this step out of harmony with the principle of the extreme Judaistic party (St. Paul, p. 375, cf. 157). The case of Cornelius was of a different kind, see below on chap. x. But the notice is all the more interesting because it contains the first mention of the Church afterwards so important, the Mother Church of the Gentiles, Antioch in Syria, and this may point to the reason of the description of Nicolaus as a proselyte of Antioch. It was a notice of special interest to St. Luke if his own home was at Antioch, but we cannot say positively that the notice means that Nicolaus was the only proselyte among the Seven. That the Jews were numerous at Antioch and had made many proselytes we learn from Jos., B. J., vii., 3, 3: of the supposed connection between this Nicolaus and the sect of the Nicolaitans, Rev. ii. 6, 14, we may hesitate to say with Blass that it is worthy of no more credit than the notice which attaches to Prochorus, although we may also well hesitate to accept it, but it has been advocated by Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 297, and recently by Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 199. Zöckler goes so far as to see in the list of the Seven a copy of the list of the Apostles, inasmuch as the most distinguished is placed first, the traitor last. But Nicolaus would be fitly placed last if he were the only proselyte. The Patristic evidence in support of the connection in question is by no means conclusive, see Ritschl, Altkatholische Kirche, p. 135 and note (second edition), Felten, Apostelgeschichte, p. 140, and Wendt, in loco, Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., p. 425 (1895). Holtzmann on Rev. ii. 6 holds that the Nicolaitans, who are not to be connected with Nicolaus the deacon, may = symbolically, the Bileamites, ver. 14; so Grimm, sub. v. Νικολαΐτης, if we take the latter as coinciding with the Hebrew בִּלְעָם = destruction of the people.

Ver. 6. ἔστησαν, cf. i. 23; for ἐνώπιον, see above.—καὶ προσευξάμενοι ἐπέθηκαν αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας: change of subject. This is the first mention of the laying on of hands in the Apostolic Church. No doubt the practice was customary in the Jewish Church, Num. xxvii. 18, Deut. xxxiv. 9; see also Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 281, and Jesus the Messiah, ii., 382, and Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie, ii., 6, pp. 882-886, "Ordinirung, Ordination"; Hort, Ecclesia, p. 216; Gore, Church and the Ministry, pp. 187, 382; but the constant practice of it by our Lord Himself was sufficient to recommend it to His Apostles. It soon became the outward and visible sign of the bestowal of spiritual gifts in the Apostolic Church, cf. Acts viii. 15, xiii. 3, 1 Tim. iv. 14, v. 22, 2 Tim. i. 6, and every convert was instructed in its meaning as one of the elementary teachings of the faith, Heb. vi. 2. That the act was a means of grace is evident from St. Paul's words, for he reminds Timothy of the grace thus bestowed upon him, 1 Tim. iv. 14, 2 Tim. i. 6, and from the narrative of St. Luke in viii. 15, 17, and passages below. But that it was not a mere outward act dissociated from prayer is evident from St. Luke's words in the passage before us, in viii. 17, xiii. 3, and xix. 6. See especially Hooker, v., lxvi., 1, 2; see below in viii. and xiii., and Gore, Church and the Ministry, especially note G. Holtzmann would draw a distinction between the laying on of hands here and in viii. 17, xix. 6. Here, he contends, it only corresponds to the customary usage at the ordination of a Rabbi, as the Seven had already received the Holy Ghost, ver. 3, 5, cf. xiii. 1. But ver. 8 undoubtedly justifies us in believing that an accession of power was granted after the laying on of hands, and now for the first time mention is made of St. Stephen's τέρατα καὶ σημεῖα μεγάλα (see St. Chrysostom's comment).

Ver. 7. τῶν ἱερέων: the reading Ἰουδαίων is advocated by Klostermann, Probleme in Aposteltexte, pp. 13, 14, but not only is the weight of critical evidence overwhelmingly against it, but we can scarcely doubt that St. Luke would have laid more stress upon the first penetration of the Christian faith into districts outside Jerusalem—this is represented as the result of the persecution about Stephen, viii. 4; cf. John xii. 42 (see also Wendt, 1899, p. 145, note). The whole verse shows that the γογγυσμός had not interfered with the growth of the Church. The conjecture that in the word ὄχλος reference is made to the priests of the plebs in contrast to the learned priests is in no way satisfactory; if this had been the meaning, the words would have been πολλοί τε ἱερεῖς τοῦ ὄχλου, and no such distinction of priests is anywhere noticed in the N.T., see further below.—ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ: Hilgenfeld (so Weiss) considers that, as this notice implies that there were disciples outside Jerusalem, such a remark is inconsistent with the statements of the after-spread of the Church in this chapter and in viii., and that therefore the words ἐν Ἰ. are to be referred to the "author to Theophilus". But so far from the words bearing the interpretation of Hilgenfeld, the historian may have introduced them to mark the fact that the growth of the Church continued in Jerusalem, in the capital where the hierarchical power was felt, and that the growth included the accession of priests no less than of laymen.—ὑπήκουον τῇ πίστει: the imperfect may denote repetition—the priests kept joining the new community, Blass, in loco; cf. Rom. i. 5, xi. 16, 17, x. 16, 2 Thess. i. 8—the verb (very frequent in LXX) is only used in Acts in this place in the sense given, but often in St. Paul's Epistles. No doubt when the number of Jewish priests was so large (according to Josephus, twenty thousand) both poor and wealthy would have been included in the statement, and we cannot limit it to the Sadducees. It must be borne in mind that the obedience of these priests to the Christian faith need not of necessity have interfered with the continuance of their duties in the Temple (so Felten), especially when we remember the attitude of Peter and John; but the words certainly seem to mark their complete obedience to the faith (see Grimm-Thayer, sub v. πίστις, i. b, α), and in face of the opposition of the Sadducees and the more wealthy priestly families, an open adherence to the disciples of Jesus may well have involved a break with their former profession (Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 49, and Ecclesia, p. 52). May there not have been many among the priests waiting for the consolation of Israel, men righteous and devout like the Pharisee priest or priests, to whom perhaps we owe that expression of the hopes of the pious Jew in the Psalms of Solomon, which approach so nearly in style and character to the Hymns of the priest Zacharias and the devout Symeon in the early chapters of St. Luke's Gospel? see Ryle and James's edition, Psalms of Solomon, Introd., lix., lx. Spitta refers the whole verse to his source B, as a break in the narrative, without any connection with what follows or precedes. Clemen assigns vi. 1-6 to his special source, H(istoria) H(ellenistarum); vi. 7 to his H(istoria) Pe(tri). Jüngst assigns vi. 1-6. 7[b, c] to his source B, 7[a] to his R(edactor). The comment of Hilgenfeld on ver. 7 is suggestive (although he himself agrees with Spitta, and regards the verse as an interpretation), "Clemen und Jüngst nicht einmal dieses Verstein ungeteilt".

Ver. 8. πλήρης πίστεως, but χάριτος, R.V. Vulgate, gratia = divine grace, xviii. 27, not merely favour with the people—the word might well include, as in the case of our Lord, the λόγοι χάριτος which fell from his lips (Luke iv. 22). On the word as characteristic of St. Luke and St. Paul, see Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, pp. 28, 96; in the other Gospels it only occurs three times; cf. John i. 14, 16, 17. See Plummer's note on the word in St. Luke, l. c.—δυνάμεως: not merely power in the sense of courage, heroism, but power to work miracles, supernatural power, cf. viii. 13 and Luke v. 17. That the word also means spiritual power is evident from ver. 10.—ἐποίει, "was doing," imperfect, during Stephen's career of grace and power the attack was made; notice imperfect combined with aorist, ἀνέστησαν, see Rendall's note. In ver. 8 Spitta sees one of the popular legendary notices of his source B. St. Stephen is introduced as the great miracle-worker, who is brought before the Sanhedrim, because in v. 17, a parallel incident in B, the Apostles were also represented as miracle-doers and brought before the same assembly; it would therefore seem that the criticism which can only see in the latter part of the Acts, in the miracles ascribed to St. Paul, a repetition in each case of the miracles assigned in the former part to St. Peter, must now be further utilised to account for any points of likeness between the career of St. Stephen and the other leaders of the Church. But nowhere is it said that Stephen was brought before the Sanhedrim on account of his miracles, and even if so, it was quite likely that the ζῆλος of the Sanhedrim would be stirred by such manifestations as on the former occasion in chap. v.

Ver. 9. ἀνέστησαν: in a hostile sense, cf. Luke x. 25, Mark xiv. 57, and see above on v. 17.—τῆς συναγωγῆς: in Jerusalem, Alexandria, Rome and the larger towns there was no doubt a considerable number of synagogues, but the tradition that assigned no less than four hundred and eighty to Jerusalem alone is characterised by Schürer as a Talmudic myth (Jewish Temple, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 73, E.T., so too Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, pp. 83, 252, but see also Renan, Apostles, p. 113, E.T.). The number four hundred and eighty was apparently fixed upon as the numerical equivalent of the Hebrew word for "full," in Isa. i. 21, a city "full of judgment". The names which follow have been variously classified, but they have always proved and still prove a difficulty. Ramsay considers that the bad form of the list is due to the fact that St. Luke is here dependent on an authority whose expressions he either translated verbatim or did not understand, Expositor (1895), p. 35. One thing seems certain, viz., that Λιβερτίνων does not refer to any town Libertum in the neighbourhood of Carthage, which has been urged as an explanation of the close juxtaposition of Cyrene, also in Africa. The existence of a town or region bearing any such name is merely conjectural, and even if its existence could be demonstrated, it is improbable that many Jews from such an obscure place should have been resident in Jerusalem. There is therefore much probability that St. Chrysostom was correct in referring the word to the Libertini, Ῥωμαῖοι ἀπελεύθεροι. The Libertini here were probably Roman "freedmen" who were formerly captive Jews brought to Rome by Pompey, B.C. 63 (Suet., Tib., 36; Tac., Ann., ii., 85; Philo, Legat. ad Gaium, 23), and afterwards liberated by their Roman masters. These men and their descendants would enjoy the rights of Roman citizenship, and some of them appear to have returned to Jerusalem, where they had their own community and a synagogue called συναγ. Λιβερτίνων (according to Grimm-Thayer, sub v. Λιβερτ., some evidence seems to have been discovered of a "synagogue of the Libertines" at Pompeii), see Schürer, Jewish Temple, div. ii., vol. ii., pp. 57, 276, 277; O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 89; and Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 201 (second edition). But a further question arises as to the number of synagogues intended. Thus it has been maintained that they were five in number. This is Schürer's decided view, Weiss, Meyer (in earlier editions), so Hackett, so Matthias, Handbuch zum N. T., V. Apostelgeschichte, 1897. By other writers it is thought that reference is made to two synagogues. This is the view advocated by Wendt as against Meyer. Wendt admits that as in the places named there were undoubtedly large numbers of Jewish inhabitants, so it is possible that in Jerusalem itself they may have been sufficiently numerous to make up the five synagogues, but his own view is based upon the ground that τῶν before ἀπὸ Κ. καὶ Ἀ. is parallel with the τῶν after τινες (so Holtzmann, Felten). So too Zöckler, who depends upon the simple καί before Κυρηναίων and Ἀλεξ. as pointing to one group with the Libertines; τῶν ἀπὸ Κ. καὶ Ἀσίας forming a second group. Dr. Sanday, Expositor, viii., p. 327 (third series), takes the same view of two synagogues only, as he considers that it is favoured by the Greeks (so too Dean Plumptre and Winer-Moulton, xix., 5*a*, note, but see also Winer-Schmiedel, p. 158; cf. critical note above). Mr. Page is inclined to think that three synagogues are intended: (1) i.e., of the Libertini, (2) another of the men of Alexandria and Cyrene, (3) another of the men of Cilicia and Asia; whilst many writers from Calvin, Bengel and others to O. Holtzmann and Rendall hold that only one synagogue is intended; so Dr. Hort maintains that the Greek suggests only the one synagogue of the Libertines, and that the other names are simply descriptive of origin—from the south, Cyrene, and Alexandria; from the north, Cilicia, and Proconsular Asia. On the whole the Greek seems to favour the view of Wendt as above; καὶ Κυρην. καὶ Ἀλεξ. seem to form, as Blass says, a part of the same appellation with Λιβερτίνων. Blass himself has recently, Philology of the Gospels, p. 49 ff., declared in favour of another reading, Λιβυστίνων, which he regards as the correct text, Λιβερτίνων being corrupt although differing only in two letters from the original. In the proposed reading he is following Oecumenius and Beza amongst others; the same reading is apparently favoured also by Wetstein, who gives both the passages to which Blass refers, one from Catullus, lx., 1, "Leæna montibus Libystinis," and the other from the geographical Lexicon of Stephanus Byzantinus. Λιβυστίνων would mean Jews inhabitants of Libya, not Libyans, and the synagogue in question bore the name of Λιβυσ. καὶ Κυρηναίων καὶ Ἀλεξ., thus specifying the African Jews in the geographical order of their original dwelling-places.—Κυρηναίων, see on ii. 9, and below, xi. 20, xiii. 1.—Ἀλεξ.: probably there was no city, next to Jerusalem and Rome, in which the Jewish population was so numerous and influential as in Alexandria. In his new city Alexander the Great had assigned the Jews a place: their numbers rapidly grew, and, according to Philo, two of the five districts of the town, named after the first five letters of the alphabet, were called "the Jewish," from the number of Jews dwelling in them, one quarter, Delta, being entirely populated by them. Julius Caesar and Augustus confirmed their former privileges, and they retained them for the most part, with the important exception described by Philo, during subsequent reigns. For some time, until the reign of Claudius, they had their own officer to represent them as ethnarch (alabarch), and Augustus appointed a council who should superintend their affairs according to their own laws, and the Romans evidently recognised the importance of a mercenary race like the Jews for the trade and commerce of the city. Here dwelt the famous teacher Philo, B.C. 20-A.D. 50; here Apollos was trained, possibly under the guidance of the famous philosopher, and here too St. Stephen may have belonged by birth and education (Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 253). St. Paul never visited Alexandria, and it is possible that the Apostle may have felt after his experience at Corinth, and the teaching of Apollos (1 Cor. i. 12), that the simplicity of his own message of Christ Crucified would not have been acceptable to hearers of the word of wisdom and the lovers of allegory. On the causes which tended to produce a distinct form of the Jewish character and faith in the city, see B.D.[2] "Alexandria," and Hastings, B.D., sub v.; Stanley's Jewish Church, iii., xlvii.; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, ii., 1, 47. We know that Alexandria had, as was only likely, a synagogue at Jerusalem, specially gorgeous (Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 253); on the history of the place see, in addition to literature already mentioned, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., pp. 73, 228, 229, 244, E.T.; Jos., Ant., xiv., 7, 2; x., 1; xix., 5, 2.—Κιλικίας: of special interest because Saul of Tarsus would probably be prominent amongst "those of Cilicia," and there is no difficulty in supposing with Weiss and even Spitta (Apostelgeschichte, p. 115) that he belonged to the members of the Cilician synagogue who disputed with Stephen. To the considerable Jewish community settled in Tarsus, from the time of the Seleucidæ, Saul belonged. But whatever influence early associations may have had upon Stephen, Saul by his own confession was not merely the son of a Pharisee, but himself a Pharisee of the Pharisees in orthodoxy and zeal, Gal. i. 14, Phil. iii. 5. It would seem that there was a synagogue of the Tarsians at Jerusalem, Megilla, 26*a* (Hamburger, u. s., ii., 1, 148); see also B.D.[2] "Cilicia," Schürer, u. s., p. 222; O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 100. The "Jews from Asia" are those who at a later date, xxi. 27, are again prominent in their zeal for the sacredness of the Holy Place, and who hurl against Paul the same fatal charge which he now directs against Stephen (Plumptre, in loco; Sabatier, L'Apôtre Paul, p. 20).—συνζητοῦντες: not found in LXX or other Greek versions of the O.T., or Apocrypha, although it may occur, Neh. ii. 4, in the sense of request, but the reading is doubtful (see Hatch and Redpath). In the N.T. it is used six times by St. Mark and four times by St. Luke (twice in his Gospel), and always in the sense of questioning, generally in the sense of disputatious questioning. The words of Josephus in his preface (sect. 5), B. J., may help us to understand the characteristics of the Hellenists. The same verb is used by

St. Paul himself, as in this same Jerusalem he disputed, possibly in their synagogue, with the Hellenists on behalf of the faith which he was now seeking to destroy, Acts ix. 29. In modern Greek the verb has always the meaning to discuss, to dispute (Kennedy).

Ver. 10. καὶ οὐκ ἴσχυον ἀντιστῆναι: the whole phrase is an exact fulfilment of Luke xxi. 15, cf. 1 Cor. i. 17, ii. 6. πνεῦμα, as Wendt points out, was the Holy Spirit with which Stephen was filled, cf. 3, 5. Vulgate renders "Spiritui Sancto qui loquebatur," as if it read ᾧ; see critical notes.

Ver. 11. ὑπέβαλον: only found here in N.T., not in LXX in this sense; subornaverunt; Vulgate, submiserunt (Suet., Ner., 28), cf. Appian, B. C., i., 74, ὑπεβλήθησαν κατήγοροι, and Jos., *B. The R.V. renders both prepositions against: cf. Dan., LXX, vii., 25, and iii. 29 (96; LXX and Theod.).

Ver. 12. συνεκίνησαν: not found in LXX or other Greek versions of O.T., or in the Apocrypha, cf. Polyb., xv., 17, 1, so too in Plutarch. As this word and συνήρπασαν are found only in St. Luke it is perhaps worth noting that they are both frequent in medical writers, see below.—τὸν λαὸν: a crafty design to gain the people first, not only because they had hitherto favoured the Nazarenes, but because the Sanhedrim would be more inclined to take action if they felt that the people were with them, cf. iv. 26.—ἐπιστάντες, see on iv. 1.—συνήρπασαν, "seized him," R.V.; "caught," A.V., signifies rather capture after pursuit than a sudden seizure (Humphry); only in St. Luke in the N.T., once in his Gospel, viii. 29, and Acts xix. 29, xxvii. 15. In the first passage it is used of the demoniac of the country of the Gerasenes; many times the evil spirit συνηρπάκει αὐτόν; see 2 Macc. vii. 27, Prov. vi. 25, 2 Macc. iv. 41, 4 Macc. v. 4. The word is also quite classical, see Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 204, 243; on the hostility against Stephen and its causes, see above. At this word συνήρπ. Hilgenfeld would stop, and the rest of the verse, ἤγαγον to vii. 2, is referred by him to his "author to Theophilus". The leading Stephen before the Sanhedrim is thus excluded by Hilgenfeld, because nothing is said of the previous summoning of the Council as in iv. 5, 6! and the introduction of false witnesses and their accusation is something quite different from the charge of blasphemous words against Moses and God! In somewhat the same manner Spitta refers vi. 1-6, 9-12^a^, to his source A, and sees so far a most trustworthy narrative, no single point in which can fairly be assailed by criticism, Apostelgeschichte, p. 115, whilst vi. 7 f., 12^b^-15 constitute B, a worthless document on account of its legendary and fictitious character—instituting a parallel between the death of Stephen and that of Christ, and leaving nothing historical except the fact that Stephen was a conspicuous member of the early Church who died as a martyr by stoning. But whilst Hilgenfeld and Spitta thus treat the passage beginning with καὶ ἤγαγον, Jüngst refers these verses and the rest of the chapter as far as ver. 14 to his source A, whilst the previous part of ver. 12, συνεκίνησαν—αὐτόν, is in his view an insertion of the Redactor. Clemen regards the whole incident of the bringing before the Sanhedrim as a later addition, and as forming part of his Historia Petri, the revolutionary nature of Stephen's teaching being placed in the mouth of false witnesses, and the fanaticism of the Jews being lessened by their susceptibility at any rate to the outward impression made by their opponents (ver. 15).

Ver. 13. οὗτος: here and in ver. 14 used contemptuously, iste, so Vulgate; cf. vii. 40, xviii. 18, xix. 26, ὁ Παῦλος οὗτος.—οὐ παύεται λαλῶν: the words in themselves are sufficient to indicate the exaggerated and biassed character of the testimony brought against Stephen —" invidiam facere conantur," Bengel, βλάσφημα omitted, see above.—μάρτυρας ψευδεῖς, "false," inasmuch as they perverted the meaning of Stephen's words, which were no blasphemy against Moses or against God, although no doubt he had taught the transitory nature of the Mosaic law, and that the true worship of God was not confined to the Temple (see Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i., 64, 83, E.T., and Wendt, p. 148 (1899)). So also in the very same manner Christ's words had been perverted (John ii. 21, cf. Mark xiv. 56, Matt. xxvii. 63), and it is likely enough that the spirit of His teaching as to the Sabbath, the laws of purifying, the fulfilling of the law, breathed again in the words of His disciples. But such utterances were blasphemous in the eyes of the Jewish legalists, and Stephen's own words, vii. 48, 49, might well seem to them an affirmation rather than a denial of the charges brought against him.—κατὰ τοῦ τόπου τοῦ ἁγίου τούτου: if τοῦτον is retained (W.H.), phrase could refer not only to the Temple as the holy place, but also to the place of assembly of the Sanhedrim, where according to ver. 15 the charge was brought, which was probably situated on the Temple Mount on the western side of the enclosing wall, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 190, E.T., so Hilgenfeld and Wendt, and also Blass, who adds " itaque etiam τούτου (B, cf. 14) recte se habet," although he omits the word in his own text. Weiss thinks that the word dropped out because it could have no reference to a scene in the Sanhedrim.

Ver. 14. ὁ Ναζ. οὗτος: not part of the words of Stephen, but of the witnesses—see however Blass, in loco.—καὶ καταλύσει: the closest similarity to the words in Mark xiv. 58 (cf. Matt. xxvi. 61), and in both passages the same verb καταλύειν is used. It is also found in all three Synoptists in our Lord's prophecy of the destruction of the Temple, Matt. xxiv. 2, Mark xiii. 2, Luke xxi. 6, and we find it again in the bitter scorn of the revilers who passed beneath the cross (Mark xv. 29, Matt. xxvii. 40). The prophecy, we cannot doubt, had made its impression not only upon the disciples, but also upon the enemies of Jesus, and if St. Stephen did not employ the actual words, we can easily understand how easily and plausibly they might be attributed to him.—ἀλλάξει τὰ ἔθη, cf. Ezra vi. 11, Isaiah xxiv. 5. ἔθος is used by St. Luke seven times in Acts, three times in his Gospel, and it is only found twice elsewhere in the N.T., John xix. 40, Heb. x. 25; in the Books of the Maccabees it occurs three or four times, in Wisdom iv. 16 (but see Hatch and Redpath), in Bel and the Dragon v. 15, in the sense of custom, usage, as so often in the classics. Here it would doubtless include the whole system of the Mosaic law, which touched Jewish life at every turn, cf. xv. 1, xxi. 21, xxvi. 3, xxviii. 17. For the dignity which attached to every word of the Pentateuch, and to Moses to whom the complete book of the law was declared to have been handed by God, see Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 307, E.T., and Weber, Jüdische Theologie, p. 378 (1897). We have moreover the testimony of Jewish literature contemporary with the N.T. books, cf., e.g., Book of Jubilees, placed by Edersheim about 50 A.D., with its ultra-legal spirit, and its glorification of Moses and the Thorah, see too Apocalypse of Baruch, e.g., xv., 5; xlviii., 22, 24; li., 3; lxxxiv., 2, 5.

Ver. 15. ἀτενίσαντες, see above on i. 10.—ὡσεὶ πρόσωπον ἀγγέλου, cf. LXX, Esth. v. 2, where Esther says to the king in reverence εἶδόν σε κύριε, ὡς ἄγγελον Θεοῦ; in 2 Sam. xiv. 17, 20, the reference is not to outward appearance, but to inward discernment (see Wetstein, τοῦτον, καὶ ἀλλάξει τὰ ἔθη ἃ παρέδωκεν ἡμῖν Μωϋσῆς. 15. καὶ ἀτενίσαντες εἰς αὐτὸν[1] ἅπαντες οἱ καθεζόμενοι ἐν τῷ συνεδρίῳ, εἶδον τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ὡσεὶ πρόσωπον ἀγγέλου.[2]

[1] ατενισαντες εις αυτον, but in D ητενιζον δε αυτω; and at the end of verse D, Flor. add εστωτος εν μεσω αυτων; cf. iv. 7, etc. (and see below).

[2] On the words in Flor., "stantis inter illos," see esp. Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 70 ff. Blass regards the words as favourable to his theory and as part of Luke's own text. Hilg. retains them. Harris sees in them an instance (amongst many in D) of a wrongly inserted gloss from vii. 1; cf. Mark xiv. 60.

who refers also to Gen. xxxiii. 10, and quotes other instances from the Rabbis, e.g., Dixit R. Nathanael: parentes Mosis viderunt pulchritudinem ejus tanquam angeli Domini: and we have the same expression used by St. Paul in Acta Pauli et Theklæ, 2; ἀγγέλου πρόσωπον εἶχεν. See too Schöttgen, in loco. R. Gedalja speaks of Moses and Aaron when they came to Pharaoh as angels ministering before God). At such a moment when Stephen was called upon to plead for the truth at the risk of his life, and when not only the calmness and strength of his convictions, but also the grace, the beauty of his Master, and the power of His spirit rested upon him, such a description was no exaggeration, cf. a striking passage in Dr. Liddon's Some Elements of Religion, p. 180. It was said of the aged Polycarp, as he faced a martyr's death: τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ χάριτος ἐπληροῦτο, and "to have lived in spirit on Mount Tabor during the years of a long life, is to have caught in its closing hours some rays of the glory of the Transfiguration". But if the brightness on the face of St. Stephen is represented by St. Luke as supernatural (as Wendt admits), we are not called upon to conclude that such a description is due to the glorification of the Saint in Christian legend: "the occasion was worthy of the miracle," the ministration of the Spirit, ἡ διακονία τοῦ πνεύματος, in which St. Stephen had shared, might well exceed in glory; and a brightness like that on the face of Moses, above the brightness of the sun, might well have shone upon one who like the angels beheld the face of the Father in heaven, and to whom the glory of the Lord had been revealed: "As if in refutation of the charge made against him, Stephen receives the same mark of divine favour which had been granted to Moses" (Humphry). St. Chrysostom speaks of the face of Stephen as being terrible to the Jews, but lovable and wonderful to the Christians (cf. Theophylact, in loco). But although St. Stephen's words must afterwards have proved terrible to his opponents, we scarcely associate the thought of terror with the verse before us; we may speak of such faces as that of the proto-martyr as αἰδέσιμα but scarcely as φοβερά. It is possible that the representation of St. Stephen in sacred art as a young man may be due to this comparison of his face to that of an angel, angels being always represented as in the bloom of youth (Dr. Moore, Studies in Dante, first series, p. 84).

CHAPTER VII.—Ver. 1. The question of the high priest breaks in upon the silence (Holtzmann). St. Chrysostom, Hom., xv., thought that the mildness of the inquiry showed that the assembly was overawed by St. Stephen's presence, but the question was probably a usual interrogation on such occasions (Felten, Farrar).—On εἰ see i. 6, and Blass, Grammatik, p. 254.

Ver. 2. Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ καὶ πατέρες, cf. St. Paul's address, xxii. 1, and also note on xxiii. 1. On St. Stephen's speech see additional note at the end of chapter.—ὁ Θεὸς τῆς δόξης: lit., "the God of the glory," i.e., the glory peculiar to Him, not simply ἔνδοξος, a reference to the Shechinah, Exod. xxiv. 16, 17, Ps. xxix. 3, Isa. vi. 3, and in the N.T. cf. 1 Cor. ii. 8, and James ii. 1 (John i. 14). The appearances to Abraham and Moses were similar to those later ones to which the term Shechinah was applied. Such words were in themselves an answer to the charge of blasphemy; but Stephen proceeds to show that this same God who dwelt in the Tabernacle was not confined to it, but that He appeared to Abraham in a distant heathen land. ὤφθη: there was therefore no need of a Temple that God might appear to His own (Chrys., Hom., xv.; see Blass, in loco).—τῷ πατρὶ ἡμῶν: emphatic, cf. vv. 19, 38, 39, 44, 45; St. Stephen

VII. 1. Εἶπε δὲ ὁ ἀρχιερεύς, Εἰ ἄρα ταῦτα οὕτως ἔχει; 2. ὁ δὲ ἔφη, Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ καὶ πατέρες, ἀκούσατε. ὁ Θεὸς τῆς δόξης ὤφθη τῷ πατρὶ ἡμῶν Ἀβραὰμ [1] ὄντι ἐν τῇ Μεσοποταμίᾳ, πρὶν ἢ κατοικῆσαι

[1] vii. 2-4. For T.R. Blass reads (2) (οντι εν τη Μεσοποταμιᾳ εν Χαρραν μετα το αποθανειν τον πατερα αυτου); (3) και ειπεν προς αυτον "Εξελθε απο . . . δειξω"; (4) και μετῳκισεν αυτον. In Par. we read "cum esset in Mesopotamia in Charran postquam mortuus est pater ipsius, et dixit . . . monstravero, et inde transtulit eum," etc. This reading agrees almost entirely with that adopted by Blass, but it contains the word bracketed by him in ver. 2, and also apparently κακειθεν (et inde) (see below). The difficulties in these verses are attributed by Blass and Belser to Alexandrian copyists. An explanatory note was added very early to ver. 2 οτε Α. εξελθεν εκ γης Χαλδαιων και κατῳκησεν εν Χαρραν κακει ην μετα το αποθανειν τον πατερα αυτου. These words (which may easily have been derived from the narrative in Genesis) were thought by the Alexandrian copyists to be the additional words of Luke himself, and they inserted them (inferserunt in ver. 4, Blass) in ver. 4 as they could not add them at the end of ver. 2, οτε being changed into τοτε, Αβρααμ being omitted, and κακειθεν being substituted for κακει, whilst the words μετα το αποθ. τον πατερα αυτου, originally belonging to ver. 2 (so Par. above), were then omitted altogether and added in the text after κακειθεν; then between the words Μεσοπ. and εν Χαρραν, which are joined together in Par., these copyists (audacissimum, Blass) inserted πριν η κατοικησαι αυτον, no doubt with the view of showing that Stephen referred not only to the later injunction from Haran to Canaan but to the earlier one from Ur to Haran. But there is no need to suppose that the text was thus tampered with (see Wendt's note, p. 154, edit. 1899), and whatever difficulties this part of the speech contains, they may be easily explained on the supposition that Stephen in these verses, as elsewhere, was expressing himself in accordance with well-known traditions. In support of his view Blass (so Belser) appeals to Irenæus, iii. 12, who quotes the whole passage from vii. 2, ὁ θεὸς τῆς δ., to ver. 8, τὸν Ἰσαάκ, omitting what Par. omits, and thus being in agreement with it on the whole in Belser's judgment. But Blass admits that Irenæus (who apparently leaves out all not in LXX) also omits words which occur in ver. 2, partly in all authorites and partly in Par. (Gig.): οντι εν τη Μ. εν Χαρραν μετα το αποθ. τον πατερα αυτου: "delenda igitur haec quoque" (see above) "neque ea quidquam desiderabit," Blass, Praef. xv. (Acta Apost. secundum formam quae videtur Romanam). Belser is not prepared to go so far as this, but he sees in the original text of Luke a much simpler version of Stephen's speech; no reference is made to the original dwelling-place of Abraham in Ur, and only the call given to him in Mesopotamia (in Haran) is specified. According to Belser the original text reads thus: (Ver. 2) ὁ θεος της δοξης ωφθη τῳ πατρι ημων Α. οντι εν τη Μ. μετα το αποθανειν τον πατερα αυτου, (Ver. 3) και ειπεν προς αυτον· εξελθε εκ της γης σου και της συγγενειας σου, και δευρο εις την γην, ην αν σοι δειξω. (Ver. 4) και μετῳκισεν αυτον εις την γην ταυτην, etc. (Beiträge zur Erklärung der Apostelgeschichte, p. 48). See further on Gen. xii. 1-3 and the quotation here, in the passages in Philo, and in Clem. Rom., Cor., x., 2, Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, p. 154.

thus closely associates himself with his hearers. Wetstein comments: "Stephanus ergo non fuit proselytus, sed Judæus natus," but it would seem from Wetstein himself that a proselyte might call Abraham father; cf. his comment on Luke i. 73, and cf. Ecclus., xliv., 21; Speaker's Commentary, "Apocrypha," vol. ii.; see also Lumby's note, in loco, and cf. Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 326, note, E.T.—Μεσοποταμίᾳ: a difficulty at once arises in comparing this statement with the Book of Genesis. Here the call of Abraham is said to have come to him before he dwelt in Haran, but in Gen. xii. 1, after he removed thither. But, at the same time Gen. xv. 7, cf. Josh. xxiv. 3, Neh. ix. 7, distinctly intimates that Abraham left "Ur of the Chaldees" (see "Abraham," Hastings' B.D., p. 14, and Sayce, Patriarchal Palestine, pp. 166-169, as to its site) in accordance with the choice and guidance of God. St. Stephen applies the language of what we may describe as the second to the first call, and in so doing he was really following on the lines of Jewish literature, e.g., Philo, De Abrah., ii., 11, 16, Mang., paraphrases the divine counsel, αὐτὸν ἐν Χαῤῥάν, 3. καὶ εἶπε πρὸς αὐτόν, "Ἔξελθε ἐκ τῆς γῆς σου καὶ ἐκ τῆς συγγενείας σου, καὶ δεῦρο εἰς γῆν ἣν ἄν σοι δείξω." 4. τότε ἐξελθὼν ἐκ γῆς Χαλδαίων, κατῴκησεν ἐν Χαῤῥάν· κἀκεῖθεν, μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν τὸν πατέρα αὐτοῦ, μετῴκισεν αὐτὸν εἰς τὴν γῆν

and then adds διὰ τοῦτο τὴν πρώτην ἀποικίαν ἀπὸ τῆς Χαλδαίων γῆς εἰς τὴν Χαῤῥαίων λέγεται ποιεῖσθαι. Moreover the manner of St. Stephen's quotation seems to mark the difference between the call in Ur and the call in Haran (R.V., not Charran, Greek form, as in A.V.). In Gen. xii. 1 we have the call to Abraham in Haran given as follows: ἔξελθε ἐκ τῆς γῆς σου καὶ ἐκ τῆς συγγενείας σου καὶ ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου τοῦ πατρός σου. But the call in Ur, according to St. Stephen's wording, is one which did not involve the sacrifice of his family, for Abraham was accompanied by them to Haran, and so the clause ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου κ.τ.λ. is omitted because inappropriate. Of course if we omit ἐκ before τῆς συγγενείας (see critical notes), St. Stephen's words become more suitable still to the position of Abraham in Ur, for we should then translate the words, "from thy land and the land of thy kindred" (Rendall, cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.). St. Stephen may naturally have referred back to Abraham's first migration from Ur to Haran, as desiring to emphasise more plainly the fact that since the call of God came to him before he had taken even the first step towards the Holy Land by settling in Haran, that divine revelation was evidently not bound up with any one spot, however holy.—Χαῤῥάν, Gen. xi. 31, xii. 5, xxvii. 43, LXX, in the old language of Chaldea = road (see Sayce, u. s., pp. 166, 167, and "Haran" Hastings' B.D., and B.D.², i. (Pinches)), in Mesopotamia; little doubt that it should be identified with the Carræ of the Greeks and Romans, near the scene of the defeat of Crassus by the Parthians, B.C. 53, and of his death, Lucan, i., 104; Pliny, N.H., v., 24; Strabo, xvi., p. 747. In the fourth century Carræ was the seat of a Christian bishopric, with a magnificent cathedral. It is remarkable that the people of the place retained until a late date the Chaldean language and the worship of the Chaldean deities, B.D.², "Haran," and see Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 4, p. 499, and references cited by him for identification with Carræ (cf. Winer-Schmiedel, p. 57).

Ver. 4. μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν: St. Stephen apparently falls into the same chronological mistake as is made in the Pentateuch and by Philo (De Migr. Abrah., i., 463, Mang.). According to Gen. xi. 26 Terah lived seventy years and begat Abraham, Nahor, Haran; in xi. 32 it is said that Terah's age was 205 years when he died in Haran; in xii. 4 it is said that Abraham was seventy-five years old when he left Haran. But since 70 + 75 = 145, it would seem that Terah must have lived some sixty years after Abraham's departure. Perhaps the circumstance that Terah's death was mentioned, in Gen. xi. 32, before the command to Abraham to leave Haran, xii. 1, may be the cause of the mistake, as it was not observed that the mention of Terah's death was anticipatory (so Alford). Blass seems to adopt a somewhat similar view, as he commends the reading in Gigas: "priusquam mortuus est pater ejus," for the obedience of the patriarch, who did not hesitate to leave even his father, is opposed to the obstinacy of the Jewish people (see Blass, in loco). Other attempts at explanation are that reference is made to spiritual death of Terah, who is supposed to have relapsed into idolatry at Haran, a view which appears to have originated with the Rabbis, probably to get rid of the chronological difficulty (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.; Meyer-Wendt, in loco), but for which there is absolutely no justification in the context; or that Abraham need not have been the eldest son of Terah, but that he was mentioned first because he was the most famous, a view adopted with more or less variation by Wordsworth, Hackett, and recently by Felten (see too B.D.², p. 16, note), but apparently in opposition to the authority of Hamburger, who states that Terah was seventy years old when Abraham was born, that he was alive when Abraham departed at the age of seventy-five, being released from the duty of caring for his father by the more imperative command to obey the call of God. Lumby quotes from Midrash Rabbah, on Genesis, cap. 39, that God absolved Abraham from the care of his father, and yet, lest Abraham's departure from Terah should lead others to claim the same relaxation of a commandment for themselves, Terah's death is mentioned in Holy Scripture before Abraταύτην εἰς ἣν ὑμεῖς νῦν κατοικεῖτε[1]· 5. καὶ οὐκ ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ κληρονομίαν ἐν αὐτῇ, οὐδὲ βῆμα ποδός· καὶ[2] ἐπηγγείλατο αὐτῷ δοῦναι εἰς κατάσχεσιν αὐτήν, καὶ τῷ σπέρματι αὐτοῦ μετ' αὐτόν, οὐκ ὄντος αὐτῷ τέκνου. 6. ἐλάλησε δὲ οὕτως ὁ Θεός, "Ὅτι ἔσται τὸ σπέρμα αὐτοῦ πάροικον ἐν γῇ ἀλλοτρίᾳ, καὶ δουλώσουσιν αὐτὸ[3] καὶ κακώσουσιν, ham's departure, cf. Gen. xi. 32, and xii. 1. One other solution has been attempted by maintaining that μετῴκισεν does not refer to the removal, but only to the quiet and abiding settlement which Abraham gained after his father's death, but this view, although supported by Augustine and Bengel, amongst others, is justly condemned by Alford and Wendt. The Samaritan Pentateuch reads in Gen. xi. 32, 145 instead of 205, probably an alteration to meet the apparent contradiction. But it is quite possible that here, as elsewhere in the speech, Stephen followed some special tradition (so Zöckler).—μετά with infinitive as a temporal proposition frequent in Luke (analogous construction in Hebrew), cf. Luke xii. 5, xxii. 20, etc., cf. LXX, Baruch i. 9; Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 165 (1893).—μετῴκισεν, subject ὁ Θεός: cf. for a similar quick change of subject vi. 6. Weiss sees in this the hand of a reviser, but the fact that Stephen was speaking under such circumstances would easily account for a rapid change of subject, which would easily be supplied by his hearers; verb only in ver. 43 elsewhere, in a quotation—found several times in LXX, and also in use in classical Greek.

Ver. 5. κληρονομίαν: the field which Abraham bought, Gen. xxiii. 9-17, could not come under this title—the field was Abraham's purchase, not God's gift as κληρονομία (see Meyer - Wendt, and Westcott, Heb. vi. 12, additional note, also Bengel, in loco); ver. 16 sufficiently shows that Stephen was fully acquainted with Abraham's purchase of the field.—οὐδὲ βῆμα ποδός, cf. Deut. ii. 5, xi. 24, same Hebrew (cf. Heb. xi. 9), "spatium quod planta pedis calcatur" (Grimm); cf. also its use in Xen. It may have been a kind of proverbial expression, cf. Gen. viii. 9 (Schöttgen).—καὶ ἐπηγγείλατο, cf. Gen. xii. 7 (xvii. 8, xlviii. 4), so that here again God appeared unto Abraham in what was a strange and heathen land. See also for verb, James i. 12, ii. 5. On the force of the word see p. 54.—εἰς κατάσχεσιν: "in possession," R.V., the A.V. renders the word in its secondary or derivative sense, which is found in ver. 45.—οὐκ ὄντος αὐτῷ τέκνου: the faith of Abraham "tecte significatur" (Blass), first because nothing was given—there was only a promise—and secondly because the promise was made while yet he had no child.

Ver. 6. δέ: not in contrast to the fact just mentioned that Abraham had no child, but introducing a fuller account of God's promise. The quotation is from LXX, Gen. xv. 13, with a few alterations; in LXX and Heb., the second person, not the third, is used; instead of οὐκ ἰδίᾳ in LXX, ἀλλοτρίᾳ, cf. Heb. xi. 9; and instead of αὐτούς, αὐτό corresponding to σπέρμα. Wendt takes ὅτι as "recitantis," and not with Meyer as a constituent part of the quotation itself, LXX: Γιγνώσκων γνώσῃ ὅτι κ.τ.λ.—πάροικον in LXX as a stranger or sojourner in a country not one's own, several times in combination with ἐν γῇ ἀλλοτρίᾳ, cf. Gen. xxi. 23, 34, xxvi. 3, and in N.T. cf. this passage and ver. 29. In Eph. ii. 19, 1 Pet. ii. 11, the word is also used, but metaphorically, although the usage may be said to be based on that of the LXX; cf. Epist. ad Diognet. v., 5, and Polycarp, Phil., inscript. See Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 102.—ἔτη τετρακόσια: so too Gen. xv. 13. The period named belongs not only to κακώσουσιν but also to ἔσται, as Meyer rightly observes. But in Exod. xii. 40 four hundred and thirty years are mentioned as the sojourning which Israel sojourned in Egypt, and in both passages the whole space of time is so occupied; or, at all events it may be fairly said that this is implied in the Hebrew text in both Gen. xv. 13 and Exod. xii. 40:

ἔτη τετρακόσια. 7. καὶ τὸ ἔθνος, ᾧ ἐὰν[1] δουλεύσωσι, κρινῶ ἐγώ," εἶπεν ὁ Θεός· "καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα ἐξελεύσονται, καὶ λατρεύσουσί μοι ἐν τῷ τόπῳ τούτῳ." 8. καὶ ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ διαθήκην περιτομῆς· καὶ οὕτως ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰσαάκ, καὶ περιέτεμεν αὐτὸν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ὀγδόῃ·

[1] εαν ℵACEHP, so Tisch., W.H. alt., Weiss; αν BD, so W.H. δουλευσωσι ℵBEHP, d, Vulg., Chrys., Lach., Weiss, Wendt, so in LXX, Gen. xv. 14; δουλευσουσι ACD 26, 96, Sah., Ir., so Tisch., Alford, W.H., R.V., so Blass in β (see his Proleg. to Acta Apost., p. 35, and Grammatik, p. 212). In vii. 3 on the contrary the LXX has ην αν σοι δειξω; only ℵ reads εαν, perhaps anticipating the reading in vv. before us (Weiss). Winer-Schmiedel, p. 52, points out that δουλευσουσιν, though well attested, is open to suspicion.

cf. also for the same mode of reckoning Philo, Quis rer. div. her., 54, p. 511, Mang. But neither here nor in Gal. iii. 17 is the argument in the least degree affected by the precise period, or by the adoption of one of the two chronological systems in preference to the other, and in a speech round numbers would be quite sufficient to mark the progressive stages in the history of the nation and of God's dealings with them. For an explanation of the point see Lightfoot, Gal. iii. 17, who regards the number in Genesis as given in round numbers, but in Exodus with historical exactness (to the same effect Wendt, Felten, Zöckler). But in the LXX version, Exod. xii. 40, the four hundred and thirty years cover the sojourn both in Egypt and in Canaan, thus including the sojourn of the Patriarchs in Canaan before the migration, and reducing the actual residence in Egypt to about half this period, the Vatican MS. reading four hundred and thirty-five years after adding καὶ ἐν γῇ Χαναὰν (the word five, however, πέντε, being erased), and the Alexandrian MS. reading after ἐν Χαναὰν the words αὐτοὶ καὶ οἱ πατέρες αὐτῶν, making the revision in the chronology more decisive. This is the chronology adopted in Gal. iii. 17, and by Josephus, Ant., ii., 15, 2; but the latter writer in other passages, Ant., ii., 9, 1, and B.J., v., 9, 4, adopts the same reckoning as we find here in Acts. But see also Charles, Assumption of Moses, pp. 3, 4 (1897).

Ver. 7. The oratio recta is introduced by the words εἶπεν ὁ Θεός . . . κρινῶ ἐγώ emphatic, cf. Rom. xii. 19. In this verse the quotation is a free rendering of Gen. xv. 14, the words ὧδε μετὰ ἀποσκευῆς πολλῆς being omitted after ἐξελ., and the latter part of the verse being apparently introduced from Exod. iii. 12. And so at length, after so long a time, God appointed for Himself a "holy place," cf. vi. 13 (Blass).—ᾧ ἐὰν δουλεύσωσι, cf. LXX, Gen. xv. 14, and see critical note above, cf. also Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 123.

Ver. 8. διαθήκην, fœdus (Grimm, Blass), the same word is used in LXX, Gen. xvii. 10, and with two or three exceptions uniformly in LXX for "covenant," so too in the Apocrypha with apparently two exceptions. The ordinary word for "covenant," συνθήκη, is very rare in LXX (though used by the later translators, Aquila, Sym., Theod., for בְּרִית, but see also Ramsay, Expositor, ii., pp. 322, 323 (1898)). But the word διαθ. would be suitably employed to express a divine covenant, because it could not be said that in such a case the contractors are in any degree of equal standing (συνθήκη). In the N.T. the sense of "covenant" is correct (except in Gal. iii. 15 and Heb. ix. 16). But in classical writers from the time of Plato διαθήκη generally has the meaning of a will, a testament, a disposition of property, and in the Latin renderings of the word in the N.T. we find uniformly testamentum in cases where the sense of "covenant" is beyond dispute (Luke i. 72, Acts iii. 25 d. dispositionis; and here d. has dispositionem, also in Rom. xi. 27), cf., e.g., in this verse, Vulgate and Par. No doubt the early translators would render διαθήκη by its ordinary equivalent, although in the common language it is quite possible that testamentum had a wider meaning than the classical sense of will, see Westcott, Hebrews, additional note on ix. 16; Lightfoot on Gal. iii. 15; A. B. Davidson, Hebrews, p. 161; and "Covenant" in Hastings' B.D. and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.; Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, pp. 47, 48; and more recently Ramsay, Expositor, ii., pp. 300 and 321 ff. (1898).

11, and so in Gen. xxvi. 14, xxx. 1, Isa. xi. 13, Ecclus. xxxvii. 10; used also in a bad sense in Acts xvii. 5, 1 Cor. xiii. 4, James iv. 2, and so in classical writers. It may be used here absolutely, as in A.V. (see Grimm, Nösgen), or governing Ἰωσήφ, as in R.V.—ἀπέδ. εἰς, cf. for construction Gen. xlv. 4.

Ver. 10. ἦν ὁ Θεὸς μετ᾽ αὐτοῦ, cf. Gen. xxxix. 2, 21, 23 (cf. Luke i. 28, 66).—ἐξείλετο . . . ἐκ: the same construction in Gen. xxxii. 11, Exod. iii. 8, and in N.T., Acts xii. 11, xxvi. 17, Gal. i. 4; so in classical Greek. The middle force of the verb in the sense of causing to be saved is lost.—χάρις, cf. ii. 41. The word means primarily, as the context shows, favour with man, cf. Gen. xxxix. 21; but this χάρις was also a divine gift: ἔδωκεν. It is significant also that Pharaoh speaks of Joseph, Gen. xli. 38, as a man in whom the spirit of God is, although no doubt the expression refers primarily to Joseph's skill in foretelling and providing against the famine.—σοφίαν: in interpreting the king's decree, Gen. xli. 25 ff.—ἐναντίον, so in Gen. xxxix. 21.—βασ. Αἰγ.: without the article as in Hebrew (Blass), cf. Gen. xli. 46; see also Winer-Schmiedel, p. 185.—καὶ κατέστησεν, sc., Pharaoh, cf. change of subject as in ver. 4, in which Weiss also sees the hand of a reviser, but see above. The same word is used in Gen. xli. 43, and cf. for ἡγούμενον the same chap., ver. 41, where the sense of the title is shown—the exact word is used of Joseph in Ecclus. xlix. 15 (ἡγούμενος ἀδελφῶν); in N.T. four times in Luke, see Luke xxii. 26, Acts vii. 10, xiv. 12, xv. 22; elsewhere only in Hebrews, cf. xiii. 7, 17, 24.

Ver. 11. λιμὸς, cf. Luke iv. 25, where ἐπί follows.—χορτάσματα: sustenance, R.V., fodder, provender for their cattle, cf. Gen. xxiv. 25, 32, xlii. 27, Judg. xix. 19; only here in N.T., cf. Polyb., ix., 43. The want of it would be a most pressing need for large owners of flocks. Blass takes it as meaning frumentum, corn, food for man as well as for beasts, since χορτάζειν, both in LXX and N.T. (Mark viii. 4, cf. vii. 27, 28), is used of the food of man, cf. Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, pp. 82, 156.

Ver. 12. σῖτα, but σιτία in R.V. (Blass follows T.R.), cf. LXX, Prov. xxx. 22 = properly food made of corn opposed to χόρτος (σῖτα not elsewhere in N.T., but in LXX τὰ σῖτα, corn, frumenta). In Gen. xlii. 2 we have σῖτος. But as Wendt points out, in the words which follow: πρίασθε ἡμῖν μικρὰ βρώματα we have what may well correspond to σιτία.—ὄντα: on the participle after verbs of sense, e.g., ὁρῶ, ἀκούω, οἶδα, in classical Greek, construction same as here—especially in Luke and Paul in N.T., cf. Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 196 (1893).—πρῶτον = "the first time," R.V. = τὸ πρότερον opposed to ἐν τῷ δευτέρῳ, ver. 13, which is only found here in N.T.: generally δεύτερον (cf. ἐκ δευτέρου, 1 Macc. ix. 1 and Dan. ii. 7 (LXX)).

Ver. 13. ἀνεγνωρίσθη: the compound verb apparently from LXX, Gen. xlv. 1.—φανερὸν ἐγέν., cf. Luke viii. 17, iv. 36, i. 65, vi. 49, etc.; on Luke's fondness for periphrasis with γίνομαι, see Plummer on Luke iv. 36.—τὸ γένος τοῦ Ἰ.: R.V. had been only mentioned incidentally "became manifest" when Joseph's brethren came, and he revealed himself to them, so that Pharaoh and his household were aware of it, ver. 16. It was not until later that five of Joseph's brethren were actually presented to Pharaoh, xlvii. 1 ff. (Hackett).

Ver. 14. μετεκαλέσατο: four times in Acts, and nowhere else in N.T., cf. x. 32, xx. 17, xxiv. 25, only once in LXX, H. and R., cf. Hosea xi. 2, A; so εἰσκαλέομαι, only once in N.T., cf. Acts x. 23; not in LXX or Apocrypha. Both compounds are peculiar to St. Luke in N.T., and are frequent in medical writers, to "send for" or to "call in" (although Polyb. in middle voice, xxii. 5, 2, in same sense) a physician, Hobart, Medical Language, etc., p. 219. In Attic Greek we should have μεταπέμπεσθαι.—ἐν ψυχαῖς ἑβδομήκοντα πέντε: ἐν = Hebrew בְּ, cf. Deut. x. 22, in (consisting in) so many souls, cf. Luke xvi. 31. Here in Deut., LXX, as also in Hebrew, we have the number given as seventy (although in A, seventy-five, which seems to have been introduced to make the passage similar to the two others quoted below) who went down into Egypt. But in Gen. xlvi. 27, and in Exod. i. 5, LXX, the number is given as seventy-five (the Hebrew in both passages however giving seventy as the number, although in Gen. xlvi. 26 giving sixty-six, making up the seventy by adding Jacob, Joseph, and his two sons). For the curious Rabbinical traditions current on the subject, see Lumby, Acts, p. 163. In Gen. xlvi. 27 the LXX make up the number to seventy-five by adding nine sons as born to Joseph while in Egypt, so that from this interpolation it seems that they did not obtain their number by simply adding the sons and grandsons, five in all, of Ephraim and Manasseh from Gen. xlvi. 20 (LXX) to the seventy mentioned in the Hebrew text, as Wetstein and others have maintained. But there is nothing strange in the fact that Stephen, as a Hellenist, should follow the tradition which he found in the LXX. Josephus in Ant., ii., 7, 4; vi., 5, 6, follows the Hebrew seventy, and Philo gives the two numbers, and allegorises about them. See Meyer-Wendt, p. 174, note, Hackett, Lumby, in loco, and Wetstein. Nothing in the argument is touched by these variations in the numbers.

Ver. 15. The frequent mention of Egypt may perhaps indicate that Stephen meant to emphasise the fact that there, far away from the land of promise, God's Presence was with the chosen race (who were now all in a strange land) and His worship was observed.—μετετέθησαν: only here in this sense in N.T. Some have supposed that only οἱ πατέρες and not αὐτός is the subject; this would no doubt avoid the first difficulty of the verse, viz., that Jacob was buried in Shechem, whereas according to Gen. l. 13 he was laid to rest in the cave of Machpelah. But a further difficulty must be met. Joseph is the only son of the Patriarch who is expressly stated to have been buried in Shechem, Josh. xxiv. 32, and of the removal of the bodies from Egypt nothing is said. But the silence as to the latter fact need not trouble us, as whether we accept the tradition mentioned by Josephus or by St. Jerome, they both presuppose the removal of the bodies of the Patriarchs to the promised land, cf. the discussion on Exod. xiii. 19. Mechilta (Lumby, p. 164), Wetstein, in loco, and see also the tradition in the Book of Jubilees, chap. xlvi., that the children carried up the bones of the sons of Jacob, and buried them in Machpelah, except those of Joseph. But another tradition is implied in Sot. 7 b. According to Josephus, who probably repeats a local tradition, Ant., ii., 8, 2, they were buried at Hebron. But according to

St. Jerome their tombs were shown at Shechem, and the Rabbinical tradition mentioned by Wetstein and Lightfoot places their burial there, a statement supported by a Samaritan tradition existing to this day (Palestine Exploration Fund, December, 1877, see Felten and Plumptre, in loco). When we consider the prominent position of Shechem as compared with Hebron in the time of Joshua, there is nothing strange in the fact that the former place rather than Machpelah should have been chosen as the resting-place not only of Joseph but also of his brethren. Plumptre has ingeniously contended that St. Stephen might have followed the Samaritan tradition, cf. Acts vi. 5, and see Expositor, vol. vii., first series: "The Samaritan element in the Gospels and Acts," p. 21 ff., although we need not suppose that in this reference to the hated Samaritans Stephen proposed to show that not even they had been rejected by God. There is certainly no difficulty in supposing that here and elsewhere Stephen might easily have adopted some popular tradition, and at all events the fact that the mistake, if it is one, is left unnoticed by the historian is a plain proof of the truthfulness of the record. But a further difficulty. Abraham purchases the cave of Machpelah, but from Ephron the Hittite, Gen. xxiii. 16. The sons of Hamor sell a field, but to Jacob—a field at Shechem, Gen. xxxiii. 19, Josh. xxiv. 32. How can we explain this with reference to the statement in the text? Shechem was the earliest settlement of Abraham when he entered Canaan, and there he built an altar, Gen. xii. 6, 7. But no devout Hebrew worshipper, with all his reverence for holy places, would be content to see the altar so consecrated belonging to others, and so exposed to desecration; the purchase of the ground on which an altar stood would therefore seem to follow as a kind of corollary from the erection of an altar on that ground. This is at all events a more satisfactory solution than omitting the word Ἀβραάμ or exchanging it for Ἰακώβ (see Hackett). Of course the reading of R.V., W.H. (as above), prevents a further difficulty as to the rendering of τοῦ Συχέμ if the reading τοῦ Συχέμ is retained, cf. Wendt, critical note, p. 157 (edition 1899), who follows A.V. in supporting "the father of Sichem," so Hackett, but see on the other hand Plumptre, Acts, in loco, and Felten, in loco. For the way in which the two purchases and the two burials may have been confused in popular tradition, see Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 302, 2nd edit. (cf. Bengel, Stier, Nösgen).

Ver. 17. καθὼς: not "when" as in A.V., but "as" R.V., prout, quemadmodum, cf. Mark iv. 33: "in the degree that": Felten thinks that it is temporal, as in 2 Macc. i. 31.—τῆς ἐπαγγελίας, cf. ii. 33.—ἧς: Attic attraction.—ὤμοσεν: but if we read with R.V., etc., ὡμολόγησεν "vouchsafed," so in classical Greek, cf. Jer. li. 25 (LXX), Matt. xiv. 7 (ὤμοσεν, a gloss from the LXX according to Wendt).—ηὔξησεν ὁ λ. καὶ ἐπληθύνθη, cf. Exod. i. 7, so in a strange land the blessing was continued (Weiss).

above. ἕτερος not ἄλλος, probably meaning the native sovereign after the expulsion of the Shepherd Kings, "Joseph," B.D.[2]; "Egypt," B.D.[2], pp. 886, 887; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 5, pp. 759, 760; Sayce, Higher Criticism and the Monuments, p. 237.—ἄχρις οὗ: only in Luke amongst the Evangelists, Luke xxi. 24, Acts vii. 18, xxvii. 33. Sayce, following Dr. Naville, argues in favour of Ramses II. as the Pharaoh of the Oppression, see u. s. and Expository Times, January and April, 1899, but see on the other hand the number of February, p. 210 (Prof. Hamond), and Expositor, March, 1897, Prof. Orr on the Exodus. Joseph settled under the Hyksos or Shepherd Kings, but the words "who knew not Joseph" should apparently refer, according to Dr. Sayce, not to the immediately succeeding dynasty, i.e., the eighteenth, in which a Canaanite might still have occupied a place of honour, but rather to the nineteenth, which led to the overthrow of the stranger, and to a day of reckoning against the Hebrews. But it becomes difficult to speak with absolute confidence in the present state of Egyptological research, see Expositor, u. s., p. 177. οὐκ ᾔδει: in Robinson's Gesenius, p. 380, the word is taken literally, or it may mean "who does not know Joseph's history or services"; others take it "who had no regard for his memory or services". Hamburger understands by it that Joseph was quite forgotten under the new national dynasty, whilst Nösgen refers to the use of οἶδα in Matt. xxv. 12.

Ver. 19. κατασοφισάμενος: in Exod. i. 10 we have the same verb "let us deal wisely with them" here translated "deal subtilly"; Vulgate, "circumveniens," cf. Rhemish version: "circumventing our stock" (γένος, as in iv. 36); cf. Judith v. 11, x. 19, in both passages the same verb is used, translated (R.V.), v. 11, "dealt subtilly"—the Syriac, probably nearest to the Hebrew, "dealt wisely with them," i.e., the Egyptians dealt so with the Hebrews. In the second passage, R.V., word is rendered "might deceive"; same verb in Syriac as in Exod. i. 10, Heb.; Speaker's Commentary, "Apocrypha," i., p. 290. Josephus and Philo use verb in same sense as in text; see for the force and meaning of κατά here, Page and Rendall.—ἐκάκωσε, cf. Exod. i. 11, where the same word is used of task-masters afflicting the people with burdens. For other ways in which Pharaoh is said to have afflicted the people, see Jos., Ant., ii., 9, 1.—τοῦ ποιεῖν κ.τ.λ., "that they [or he, margin] should cast out their babes," R.V. But a comparison with Exod. i. 22 (LXX) justifies us in taking these words, as in R.V. margin, as describing the tyranny of Pharaoh, not as declaring that the parents themselves exposed their children. For the construction see Blass, Grammatik, p. 231; cf. 1 Kings xvii. 20, etc., genitive of result, see Page on iii. 12, and in loco, and Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 157.—ἔκθετα: only here in N.T. and not in LXX, but used with γόνος in Eur., Andr., 70.—εἰς τὸ: expressing the purpose, cf. Luke v. 17.—ζωογονεῖσθαι: in the active the verb is used three times, in Exod. i., of the midwives saving the Hebrew children alive, ver. 17, 18, 22 (cf. Judg. viii. 19, etc.), vivum conservare. In the N.T. the word is only used by St. Luke here and in his Gospel, chap. xvii. 33, and once by St. Paul, 1 Tim. vi. 13 (see R.V. margin). St. Chrysostom comments on the thought that where man's help was despaired of, and the child was cast forth, then God's benefit did shine forth conspicuous, Hom., xvi.

Or the expression may be rendered "fair to God," i.e., in the judgment of God; cf. δυνατὰ τῷ Θεῷ, 2 Cor. x. 4 and James ii. 5, τοὺς πτωχοὺς τῷ κόσμῳ. Page and Wendt

For other instances of the use of the word see LXX, Num. xxii. 32, Judges iii. 17, and Judith xi. 23, Susannah, ver. 7; in the last two passages used of physical fairness, prettiness (cf. Arist., Eth. Nic., iv., 3, 5, and instances in Wetstein). In 2 Macc. vi. 23 it is also used, and ἀστείως in 2 Macc. xii. 43 in the general sense of right and good, honestly.—ἀνετράφη μῆνας τρεῖς, cf. Exod. ii. 2, verb used only by St. Luke, twice in this chapter, and in xx. 3, once in Luke iv. 16, but cf. margin, W.H.—not used in LXX, but in Wisdom vii. 4 (where A has ἀνεστρ.), and see also 4 Macc. x. 2 and xi. 15 (but A.R., τραφ.). The word is used in classical Greek, as in Wisdom vii. 4 and here, of a child nourished to promote its growth (although sometimes with the idea of improving the mind, cf. Acts xx. 3). In the N.T. it is peculiar to St. Luke, and it is just the word which a medical man would use, frequently found in medical writings, opposed to ἰσχναίνω; see L. and S., sub v., and Hobart, Medical Language, p. 207.

Ver. 21. ἐκτεθ.: the regular word for exposure of children in classical Greek; see also Wisdom xviii. 5, peculiar to Luke in N.T., and only here in this sense; cf. Exod. ii. 3, and β critical note above.—ἀνείλετο—same word in Exod. ii. 5. The verb, though very frequent in Luke in the sense of to kill, is only used here in the sense of A. and R.V., Vulgate, sustulit—but cf. Aristoph., Nub., 531; Epict., Diss., i. 23, 7. ἑαυτῇ: as in contrast to the child's own mother. According to tradition, Pharaoh's daughter designed him for the throne, as the king had no son, Jos., Ant., ii., 9, 7.—εἰς υἱόν, Exod. ii. 10; cf. xiii. 22, 47; Simcox, Language of N. T., p. 80.

Ver. 22. ἐπαιδεύθη, cf. xxii. 3 here with instrumental dative, or, better, dative of respect or manner; not mentioned in Exodus, but see Philo, Vita Moys., ii., 83, Mang., and also Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 343, E.T.; cf. the knowledge of magic ascribed to Pharaoh's wise men in Exod. vii. 11, and "Jannes and Jambres," B.D.[2], and also 1 Kings iv. 30, and Isa. xix. 2, 11, 12; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums "Zauberei," i., 7, 1068, and references in Wetstein, in loco. παιδεύω, both in LXX and N.T., used in the sense of training; cf. Prov. v. 13 (Jos., C. Apion, i., 4), 1 Tim. i. 20, Titus ii. 12, and also in the sense of chastising, so often in LXX and in N.T., and also similarly used in classical Greek. The passage is also important because it helped to fix the attention of cultivated early Christian writers upon the wisdom of Greek poets and philosophers, and to give a kind of precedent for the right pursuit of such studies; cf. Clem. Alex., Strom., i., 5, 28; vi., 5, 42; Justin Martyr, Dial. c. Tryph., c., 1-4; see Dean Plumptre's note, in loco.—ἦν δὲ δυνατὸς, cf. xviii. 24, and especially Luke xxiv. 19; see also Ecclus. xxi. 7, Judith xi. 8. If αὐτοῦ is retained, the mode of expression is Hebraistic (Blass). There is no contradiction with Exod. iv. 10, and no need to explain the expression of Moses' writings, for Stephen has in his thoughts not so much, as we may believe, the oratorical form as the powerful contents of Moses' words (e.g., his prophetical teaching, Hamburger, "Moses," Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 5, 772). Josephus speaks of him as πλήθει ὁμιλεῖν πιθανώτατος, Ant., iii., 1, 4 (see also Jos., Ant., ii., 10, 1, for the traditional exploits of Moses, and Hamburger, u. s., p. 771).

Ver. 23. ὡς, cf. i. 10, Lucan. The exact age is not mentioned in O.T., but it was traditional (Weiss refers its mention to the reviser, perhaps introduced as a parallel to ver. 30). give twenty years; his dwelling in Midian occupied forty years, and he governed Israel for the same period, xiii. 18. See Midrash Tanchuma on Exod. ii. 6 (Wetstein, with other references, so too Lumby).—ἐπληροῦτο, "but when he was well-nigh," etc., R.V., lit. "when the age of forty years was being fulfilled to him" (imperf. tense), cf. Luke xxi. 24, Acts ii. 1, ix. 23, xxiv. 27, and ver. 30 below; so repeatedly in LXX.—ἀνέβη ἐπὶ τὴν καρδίαν αὐτοῦ, cf. 1 Cor. ii. 9 for the expression, probably taken from LXX, Isa. lxv. 17, cf. Jer. iii. 16, xxxii. 35, Ezek. xxxviii. 10, and 2 Kings xii. 4. The phrase is an imitation of the Hebrew. Gesenius compares the phrase before us with Heb., Ezek. xiv. 3, 4; see also Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 66 (1896).—ἐπισκέψασθαι, cf. Luke i. 68, 78, and vii. 16, cf. Exod. iv. 31, of God visiting His people by Moses and Aaron (Acts xv. 14). In each of these passages the verb is used of a divine visitation, and it is so used by St. Luke only amongst N.T. writers, except Heb. ii. 6 = Ps. viii. 5, LXX. It is used elsewhere in Matt. xxv. 36, 43, James i. 27, Acts vi. 3, xv. 36 (cf. Judg. xv. 1). The word is used of visits paid to the sick, cf. Ecclus. vii. 35, and so in classical Greek (see Mayor on James i. 27), often in medical writings and in Plutarch (Grimm, sub v., and Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 105); mostly in the LXX, as always in the N.T., in good sense (Gen. xxi. 1, Ps. viii. 4, lxxix. 14, Ecclus. xlvi. 14, Judith viii. 33, but also with reference to divine punishment, Ps. lxxxviii. 31, 32, Jer. ix. 9, 25, xi. 22, xxxiv. (xxvii.) 8, etc.), cf. its use in Psalms of Solomon, where it is generally employed with reference to divine visitation, either for purposes of punishment or deliverance. In modern Greek = to visit, same sense as in LXX and N.T.; Kennedy, u. s., p. 155. For its old English sense of visit, as looking upon with kindness, Lumby compares Shaks., Rich. II., i., 3, 275: "All places that the eye of heaven visits".—τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς αὐτοῦ: though in a king's palace, and far removed in one sense from his people, Moses remembers that he is an Israelite, and that he has brethren; while others forgot their brotherhood he reminded them of it: "motivum amoris quod Moses etiam aliis adhibuit ver. 26," Bengel, cf. Exod. ii. 10, and Heb. xi. 24, 25.

Ver. 24. ἀδικούμενον, "wronged," i.e., by blows, Exod. ii. 11.—ἠμύνατο: only here in N.T. (sc., τὸν ἀδικοῦντα); in active the verb means to defend, "debebat scribere ἤμυνε," says Blass, but in the middle it means defence of oneself, or of a friend, with the collateral notion of requital or retaliation on an enemy (see Rendall). In the middle it has also the meaning of avenging, and therefore might mean here "he took vengeance on" or "he repulsed" (cf. Josh. x. 13, 2 Macc. x. 17, Wisdom xi. 3, and Jos., Ant., ix., 1, 2), although this is expressed in the next words.—ἐποίησεν ἐκδίκησιν, cf. Luke xviii. 7, 8, xxi. 22; lit., "wrought an avenging," Rom. xii. 19 (cf. Heb. x. 30), 2 Cor. vii. 11, 2 Thess. i. 8, 1 Pet. ii. 14. This and similar expressions are common in LXX, Judg. xi. 36, Ps. cxlix. 7, Ezek. xxv. 17, 1 Macc. iii. 15, vii. 9, 24, 38; ἐκδ. in Polybius with ποιεῖσθαι, iii., 8, 10.—καταπονουμένῳ: only here and in 2 Pet. ii. 7; cf. 2 Macc. viii. 2 (R has κατα-π α τ ούμ., of the Jews oppressed, trodden down, in the days of Judas Maccabæus), 3 Macc. ii. 2, 13; used in Polyb. and Josephus, etc. The exact word is found in Didache, v., 2.—πατάξας: lit., to strike, hence to kill, in Biblical language only, cf. Exod. ii. 12 and 14, and ver. 28 below: so also in Matt. xxvi. 31, Mark xiv. 27 (Zech. xiii. 7, LXX). The verb is very frequent in LXX. "Smiting the Egyptian," R.V.—τὸν Αἰγ.: not previously mentioned, but implied in ἀδικ., which involves an oppressor; as in ver. 26 the facts are regarded by St. Stephen as known to his audience.

what grounds Moses based his expectation (see however Lumby's note, in loco). The verb is found in Luke ii. 44, iii. 23, and seven times in Acts, but elsewhere in the Gospels only three times in St. Matthew; it is used three times by St. Paul. It is frequently found in ii. and iv. Macc., twice in Wisdom and once in Ecclesiasticus.—διὰ χειρὸς αὐτοῦ, ii. 23. δίδωσι, "was giving them," R.V. (not "would give," A.V.), as if the first step in their deliverance was already taken by this act, so συνιέναι, "understood," R.V. (not "would understand," A.V.). In Jos., Ant., ii., 9, 2, 3, reference is made to the intimation which was said to have been vouchsafed by God to Amram the father of Moses that his son should be the divine agent who was expected to arise for the deliverance of the Hebrews, and whose glory should be remembered through all ages. It has been sometimes thought that St. Stephen had this tradition in mind.—οἱ δὲ οὐ συνῆκαν: Mr. Page notes the rhetorical power in these words, cf. ver. 53 καὶ οὐκ ἐφυλάξατε.

Ver. 26. ὤφθη: Wendt commends Bengel, who sees in the word the thought that he appeared ultro, ex improviso, cf. ii. 3, vii. 2, Heb. ix. 28.—συνήλασεν: but if we read συνήλλασσεν, see critical note = imperfect, de conatu, cf. Matt. iii. 14, Luke i. 59, xv. 14, Acts xxvi. 11, see Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 12, from συναλλάσσω, only found here in N.T., not in LXX or Apocrypha, but in classical Greek, cf. Thuc., i., 24. —ἱνατί = ἵνα τί γένηται; cf. iv. 25, and Luke xiii. 7 (Matt. ix. 4, xxvii. 46, 1 Cor. x. 29), and with the words ἱνατί ἀδικεῖτε ἀλλήλους; Exod. ii. 13 (Moulton and Geden); used several times in LXX, also by Aristoph. and Plato. Like the Latin ut quid? see Grimm, sub v., and for spelling; and comp. also Blass, Gram., p. 14, and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 36.—ἄνδρες, ἀδελφοί ἐστε: the fact of their brotherhood aggravated their offence; it was no longer a matter between an Egyptian and a Hebrew as on the previous day, but between brother and brother—community of suffering should have cemented and not destroyed their sense of brotherhood. Hackett and Alford take ἄνδρες as belonging to ἀδελφοί (not as = κύριοι, 'Sirs' in A. and R.V.), men related as brethren are ye, cf. Gen. xiii. 8.

Ver. 27. ἀπώσατο for Attic ἀπεώσατο (see also ver. 45), not found in the O.T. parallel, but added by Stephen, cf. ver. 38, compare LXX, Jer. iv. 30. The word may be introduced to emphasize the contumaciousness of the people, which in Stephen's narrative is the motive of the flight of Moses; in Exodus, Moses flees from fear of Pharaoh, and the answer of the Hebrew demonstrates to him that his deed of yesterday was known—but there is no contradiction in the two narratives. The matter would become known to Pharaoh, as the words of the Hebrew intimated; it could not be hidden; and in spite of the attempt at concealment on the part of Moses by hiding the body in the sand, his life was no longer safe, and so he fled because he had nothing to hope for from his people. Stephen's words would be quite consistent with the narrative in Exodus (Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, p. 163, as against Overbeck).

Ver. 28. Cf. Exod. ii. 14.

Ver. 29. ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τούτῳ· Weiss points out that Moses fled on account of this word, because he saw that his people would not protect him against the vengeance of Pharaoh. Jos., Ant., ii., 11, 1, makes the cause of the flight of Moses not the words which told him that his deed was known, but the jealousy of the Egyptians, who represented to the king that he would prove a seditious person. — Μαδιάμ: generally taken to mean or to include the peninsula of Sinai (Exod. ii. 15, and iii. 1), and thus agrees with the natural supposition that his flight did not carry Moses far beyond the territory of Egypt (cf. Exod. xviii. 1-27). The name Midianites would be applied to the descendants of Abraham's fourth son by Keturah, who in various clans, some nomadic, some mercantile (e.g., those to whom Joseph was sold), may be described as Northern Arabs. (Dr. Sayce, u. s., p. 270, maintains that Moses to get beyond Egyptian territory must have travelled further than to the S. peninsula of our modern maps, and places Sinai in the region of Seir, with Midian in its close neighbourhood.) Amongst one of these tribes Moses found a home in his flight, Hamburger, "Midian," Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 5, 755. Hackett, Acts, p. 104, "Midian," B.D.[1]. —οὗ ἐγένν., cf. Exod. ii. 22, iv. 20, xviii. 3. Weiss thinks the notice due to a reviser, who wished to show that Moses had given up his people, and made himself a home in a strange land.

Ver. 30. πληρωθέντων, see ver. 23, cf. Exod. vii. 7, "fulfilled," R.V. ὤφθη, ver. 2, so the second fundamental revelation of God to Israel took place in the wilderness far away from the Promised Land (Weiss), see also ver. 33.—τεσσαράκοντα, cf. i. 3.—Σινᾶ: there is no contradiction between this and Exod. iii. 1, where the appearance is said to take place in Horeb, for whilst in the N.T. and Josephus Sinai only is named for the place of the law-giving, in the O.T. the two names are interchanged, cf. also Ecclus. xlviii. 7. According to Hamburger the two names are identical, signifying in a narrower sense only one mountain, the historical mountain of the giving of the law, but in a wider sense given to a whole group of mountains. Thus Hamburger declines to accept the view that Horeb was the name of the whole ridge of mountain-cluster, whilst Sinai specially denotes the mountain of the law-giving, since Horeb is also used for the same event (cf. Exod. iii. 1, xvii. 6, xxxiii. 6), Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 7, 940. See also B.D.[1], "Sinai," Wendt, edition (1899), in loco; Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopædia, iv., "Sinai" (also for literature); and Grimm-Thayer, sub v. According to Sayce, Higher Criticism and the Monuments, p. 263 ff., Sinai is a mountain of Seir, rather than of the Sinaitic peninsula so called. The same writer lays stress upon the fact that Sinai is associated with Seir and Edom, Deut. xxxiii. 2, Judg. v. 4, 5, and maintains that it is nowhere in the O.T. transported to the Sinaitic peninsula of our modern maps. The word Σινᾶ is an indeclinable noun τό (sc., ὄρος); Josephus τὸ Σιναῖον and τὸ Σιναῖον ὄρος; Grimm-Thayer, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 91, Blass, Gram., 8, 32; and see also Sayce, u. s., p. 268, 269, and Patriarchal Palestine, p. 259, who renders as adjective "(the mountain)

For the same mode of expression cf. Acts xxvii. 23 with xxiii. 11. See references in Felten, in loco, and Liddon, Bampton Lectures, Lect. ii., and "Angel," B.D.². Otherwise we can only say that Jehovah Himself speaks through the Angel (Weiss, Blass, in loco).—ἐν φλογὶ πυρὸς βάτου: words interchanged as in LXX A, Exod. iii. 2; according to Hebrew πυρὸς ἐκ τοῦ βάτου—πυρός here = an adjective, rubus incensus (Blass, Weiss); cf. 2 Thess. i. 8, ἐν πυρὶ φλογός. For gender of βάτος see ver. 35.

Ver. 31. κατανοῆσαι: this careful observation is implied in the narrative of Exodus though the word is not employed. It is a favourite word with St. Luke, and is used by him four times in his Gospel and four times in Acts, elsewhere in Gospels only in Matt. vii. 3 (five times in Epistles). On its force see Westcott on Heb. iii. 1: "oculos vel mentem defigere in aliquo" Grimm; properly = to take notice of, so in classical Greek; it is used also in the sense of observing, looking at, cf. James i. 27; and in a general sense, to see, cf. LXX, Ps. xciii. 9, cf. xc. 8; and also, to consider, Heb. x. 24 (Mayor, note on James i. 27). In the LXX, where it is frequent, it is used with both shades of meaning.

Ver. 32. ἔντρομος γεν. (cf. x. 4, ἔμφοβος γεν.), xvi. 29, cf. Exod. iii. 6, expression used only in Acts in these two passages (Heb. xii. 21, quotation from LXX). ἔμφοβος is found five times in Luke, in Gospel xxiv. 5, 37, in Acts x. 4, xxiv. 25 (only once elsewhere, in Rev. xi. 33, with ἐγένοντο), and in each passage with γενόμενος. ἔντρομος, Dan. (Theod.) x. 11, Wisdom xvii. 10, 1 Macc. xiii. 2, and in Ps. xvii. (xviii.) 7, lxxvi. (-vii.) 18, ἔντρομος ἐγενήθη ἡ γῆ—the word is also used by Plutarch.

Ver. 33. λῦσον, cf. Josh. v. 15, λῦσον A., cf. Exod. iii. 5; in classical Greek, λῦσαι, omitting σου. On the custom of worshipping bare-footed, as the priests when actually engaged in the Temple, or as the Arabs enter their mosques with bare feet, or the Samaritan the holiest place on Gerizim, see instances, both classical, Juvenal, Sat., vi., 158, and from Josephus and others, Wetstein and Wendt, in loco. The latter refers to an Egyptian custom the order of Pythagoras ἀνυπόδητος θῦε καὶ προσκύνει, Jamblich., Vit. Pyth., 23, and cf. 18 in Wetstein.—τὸ ὑπόδημα, cf. xiii. 25, and John i. 27, where in each passage the singular is used. Both Weiss and Wendt note the significance of the verse—a strange land is consecrated (cf. vi. 13, τόπος ἅγιος) by the presence of God—the Jews thought that the Temple was the only holy place, cf. add. note for significance in connection with the aim of St. Stephen's speech, and St. Chrysostom's comment in loco.

Ver. 34. ἰδὼν εἶδον: Hebraism, so LXX, Exod. iii. 7, and so frequently, e.g., Ps. xl. 1, cf. Matt. xiii. 14, Heb. vi. 14 (Gen. xxii. 17), the participle with the verb emphasising the assurance. But similar collocations are not wanting in classical Greek, see Page, in loco, and Wendt, who compares 1 Cor. ii. 1. The phrase ἰδὼν εἶδον occurs in Lucian, Dial. Mar., iv., 3 (Wetstein). "I have surely seen," R.V., so in A. and R.V., Exod. iii. 7, see Simcox, Language of N. T., p. 130, and Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 217 (1896).—καὶ νῦν δεῦρο ἀποστελῶ, but cf. Exod. iii. 10; ἀποστείλω; see critical notes. On the hortatory subj. in first person singular with δεῦρο or ἄφες prefixed, see Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 74, cf. Matt. vii. 4, Luke vi. 42, but translated by the revisers, "I will send," with an imperative force as of a divine command (see Rendall's note, in loco). For classical instances cf. Wendt, in loco.

Ver. 35. τοῦτον: followed by the triple οὗτος, a significant and oratorical repetition—anaphora or repetition of the pronoun, cf. ii. 23, v. 31 (so Bengel, Blass, Viteau, see also Simcox, Language of the N. T., pp. 65, 66). It plainly appears to be one of the purposes, although we cannot positively say the chief purpose, of the speech to place Moses in typical comparison to Jesus and the behaviour of the Jews towards Him, ver. 25.—(καὶ) ἄρχοντα καὶ λυτρωτὴν: Moses was made by God a ruler and even more than a judge—not δικαστής but λυτρωτής. But just as the denial of the Christ is compared with the denial of Moses, cf. ἠρνήσαντο and ἠρνήσασθε in Acts iii. 13, so in the same way the λύτρωσις wrought by Christ is compared with that wrought by Moses, cf. Luke i. 68, ii. 38, Heb. ix. 12, Tit. ii. 14 (so Wendt, in loco) "omnia quæ negaverant Judæi Deus attribuit Moysi" (Blass). λυτρωτής in LXX and in Philo, but not in classical Greek. In the Sept. the word is used of God Himself, Ps. xix. 14, lxxviii. 35 (cf. Deut. xiii. 5, and Psalms of Solomon, ix. 1).—ἐν χειρὶ, cf. xi. 21, but σύν is closer to the classical σὺν θεοῖς with the helping and protecting hand, ἐν χειρὶ = בְּיַד, cf. Gal. iii. 19.—τῇ βάτῳ: ὁ Attic, ἡ Hellenistic, but in N.T. it varies, in Luke xx. 37 feminine, in Mark xii. 26 (and in LXX) masculine (W.H.); Blass, Gram., p. 26; Grimm-Thayer, sub v.

Ver. 37. οὗτός, cf. ver. 35, cf. Deut. xviii. 15, and iii. 22, above. The introduction of the prophecy may mean that St. Stephen wished in this as in the preceding and following verse to emphasise the position and the work of Moses, and to mark more strongly the disobedience of the people. Blass regards οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Μ. κ.τ.λ. as intended to show that Moses, whom the Jews accused Stephen of injuring, was himself by his own words a supporter of the claims of Christ: "hic est ille M. qui dixit".

Ver. 38. οὗτός: again emphatic use.—ἐκκλησίᾳ: "in the congregation," R.V. margin: held in the wilderness for the giving of the law, although the word does not occur in Exod. xix., but cf. Deut. xxxi. 30, Josh. viii. 35 (ix. 2). By Wycliffe the word was translated "Church" here, but afterwards "congregation," so in Tynd., Cranm., Gen., until A.V. again rendered "Church," cf. Heb. ii. 12, and on the word see above on v. 11, Hort, Ecclesia, p. 3 ff., and B.D.² "Church". In Heb. ii. 12, R.V. reads "congregation" in text (but "Church" in margin), following Tynd. and Cranm., and Ps. xxii. 22 from which the quotation is made (where both A. and R.V. have "congregation"). Schmiedel would dismiss the word as a later gloss, which has been inserted here in a wrong place, see Wendt (edit. 1899), p. 160, note.—γενόμ. . . . μετὰ, cf. ix. 19, xx. 18 (Mark xvi. 10); no Hebraism, cf. σύν in Luke ii. 13.—τοῦ ἀγγέλου τοῦ λαλ., but in Exodus Moses is said to speak with God, cf. ver. 30 above, and see also ver. 53, "who was with the angel . . . and with our fathers," i.e., who acted as the mediator between the two parties, who had relations with them both, cf. Gal. iii. 19, and Philo, Vit. Moys., iii., 19, where Moses is called μεσίτης καὶ διαλλακτής, cf. also Heb. ii. 2, and Jos., Ant., xv., 5, 3; the latter passage represents Herod as saying that the Jews learned all that was most holy in their law δι' ἀγγέλων παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ (see Westcott Hebrews, and Wetstein on Gal. iii. 19). On the title μεσίτης as given to Moses, see further Assumption of Moses, i., 14, and Charles' note and introd. lxiii., but it does not follow that the inference is justified that the Apocryphal Book in question was known to the writer of St. Stephen's speech. Dr. Charles maintains this on the ground of three passages, but of (1) it may be said that the term μεσίτης evidently could have been known from other sources than Acts, (2) the parallel between ver. 36 and Assumption of Moses, iii., 11, is, as Dr. Charles admits, an agreement verbally "for the most part," but the words "Egypt, the Red Sea, and the wilderness for forty years" might often be used as a summary of the history of Israel at a particular period, whilst the context with which the words are here associated is quite different from that in Assumption of Moses, l.c., and (3) there is no close resemblance between the prophecy from Amos quoted in ver. 43 below and the prophecy in Assumption of Moses, ii., 13; in both the phraseology is quite general. Perhaps the omission of the word μετά before τῶν πατέρων gives emphasis to the privilege of "our fathers," when one can speak of being with the angel and with them, Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 159. Thus Moses prefigures the Mediator of the new coventant, cf. Heb. viii. 15, ix. 15, xii. 24, and the mention of this honour bestowed upon Moses emphasises still more fully the indignity which he received from his countrymen, cf. St. Chrysostom on the force of οὗτος in this verse.—λόγια, cf. Rom. iii. 2, as in LXX

(see also in Exod. i. 19, in contrast to feeble, languid), cf. Spenser, Faërie Queene, iii., 8, 5. Here the word has the sense of living, i.e., enduring, abiding, cf. "thy true and lively [living] word" in prayer for the Church Militant, cf. 1 Pet. i. 23, R.V.

Ver. 39. ἐστράφησαν, i.e., in their desires after the Egyptian gods, cf. ver. 40, not "turned back again," but simply "turned" (Rendall, in loco). The words cannot be taken literally (as Corn. à Lap. and others), or we should have to render "who may go before us in our return to Egypt," which not only is unsupported by the Greek, but cf. Exod. xxxii. 4, 1 Kings xii. 28; see also on this verse, Exod. xvi. 3, Num. xi. 4, 5, but the desires there expressed marked a later date.

Ver. 40. προπορεύσονται (Exod. xvi. 3, Num. xi. 4, 5), only elsewhere in N.T., in Luke i. 76, with which cf. Deut. xxxi. 3. The words in Acts are taken from Exod. xxxii. 1, 23; frequent in LXX, 1 Macc. ix. 11 (but see H. and R.), and also in Xen. and Polyb.—οὗτος, iste, cf. vi. 14, the same anacoluthon as in LXX, Exod. xxxii. 23, so in the Heb., "who brought us up": no mention of God—they ascribed all to Moses (Chrysostom); see Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 135 (1896).

Ver. 41. ἐμοσχοποίησαν: not in LXX or in classical Greek; in Exod. xxxii. 2, ἐποίησαν μόσχον.—ἀνήγαγον θυσίαν, cf. 1 Kings iii. 15 (and 2 Sam. vi. 17, A.), for similar use of the word, "quia victima in aram tollitur," Grimm.—εὐφραίνοντο, cf. Exod. xxxii. 6 and 18; the word is very frequent in LXX, and several times with ἐν, cf., e.g., 2 Chron. vi. 41, Ecclesiast. xiv. 5, 1 Macc. iii. 7; χαίρειν ἐν, Luke x. 20; used only by St. Luke amongst the Evangelists, six times in his Gospel, twice in Acts (but ii. 26 is a quotation). Bengel points out that God rejoices in the works of His own hands, and men in the work of God's hands, but not as here—half irony in the words.

Ver. 42. ἔστρεψε: properly intransitive. Weiss takes it transitively: God turned them from one idol worship to another; but here probably means that God turned away from them, in the sense that He cared no longer for them as before; so Grimm, sub v.; or that He actually changed so as to be opposed to them; cf. Josh. xxiv. 20, Heb., so Wet stein "Deus se ab iis avertit," and cf. LXX, Isa. lxiii. 10.—παρέδωκεν, cf. Rom. i. 24, and εἴασε in xiv. 16; Ephes. iv. 19, "gave themselves up". ἑαυτοὺς παρέδωκαν, from the side of man.—λατρεύειν τῇ στρατιᾷ τοῦ οὐρ., cf. Deut. xvii. 3, 2 Kings xvii. 16, xxi. 3, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3, 5, Jer. viii. 2, xix. 13, a still grosser idolatry: "antiquissima idolatria, ceteris speciosior" Bengel. The created host was worshipped in place of Jehovah Sabaoth, "the Lord of Hosts". The word, though used always in the N.T. of religious service, is sometimes applied to the worship of idols, as well as of the One God; cf. Rom. i. 25 (LXX, Exod. xx. 5, xxiii. 24, Ezek. xx. 32), so λατρεία is used of the worship of idols in 1 Macc. i. 43; see Trench, Synonyms, i., p. 142 ff.—ἐν βίβλῳ τῶν προφ.: here part of the Hebrew Scriptures which the Jews summed up under the title of "the Prophets," as a separate part, the other two parts being the Law and the Hagiographa (the Psalms, Luke xxiv. 44); or Twelve Minor Prophets which probably formed one book.—Μὴ σφάγια κ.τ.λ.: a quotation from Amos v. 25-27, with little variation—the quotation in ver. 42 is really answered by the following verse. The question does not mean literally that no sacrifices were ever offered in the wilderness, which would be directly contrary to such passages as Exod. xxiv. 4, Num. vii. 9. The sacrifices no doubt were offered, but how could they have been real and effectual and acceptable to God while in their hearts the people's affections were far from Him, and were given to idol deities? μή, expecting a negative answer = num (see Zöckler's note, in loco).—οἶκος: nominative for vocative, as often, as if in apposition to the ὑμεῖς contained in προσηνέγκατε (Blass). Some emphasise μοι = mihi soli, or suppose with Nösgen that the question is ironical.

Ver. 43. The answer of God to His own question: καί should be explained "ye actually took up" ("yea," R.V., in Amos v. 26); ἀνελάβετε, "ye took up," i.e., to carry in procession from one halting place to another. τὴν σκηνήν, properly σκηνή = סִכּוּת, which has sometimes been explained as the tent or tabernacle made by the idolatrous Israelites in honour of an idol, like the tabernacle of the covenant in honour of Jehovah, but R.V. renders "Siccuth your king" (margin, "the tabernacle of your king"), Amos v. 26, see below.—τοῦ Μολόχ: s in LXX, but in Hebrew, מַלְכְּכֶם, i.e., your king (as A.V. in margin, Amos v. 26). The LXX, either as explanatory, or perhaps through another reading מִלְכֹּם, 2 Kings xxiii. 13, here render by the name of the idol. Sayce also (Patriarchal Palestine, p. 258) renders "Sikkuth your Malik," i.e., the Babylonian god Sikkuth also represents "Malik," the king, another Babylonian deity (= Moloch of the O.T.). Most commentators maintain that ver. 26 (Amos v.) is not in the original connected with ver. 25 as the LXX render, referring the latter verse back to Mosaic times. The LXX may have followed some tradition, but not only does the fact that the worship of Moloch was forbidden in the wilderness seem to indicate that its practice was a possibility, but there is also evidence that long before the Exodus Babylonian influence had made itself felt in the West, and the statement of Amos may therefore mean that the Babylonian god was actually worshipped by the Israelites in the wilderness (Sayce, u. s., p. 259). In margin of R.V. we have "shall take up," i.e., carry away with you into exile (as a threat), while others take the verb not in a future but in a perfect sense, as referring to the practice of the contemporaries of the prophet: "de suo tempore hæc dicit Amos" (Blass). Siccuth or rather Saccuth is probably a proper name (a name given to Nin-ip, the warlike sun-god of Babylonia (Sayce)), and both it and Kewan (Kaivan), כִּיּוּן, represent Babylono-Assyrian deities (or a deity), see Schrader, Cun. Inscript. and the O. T., ii., 141, 142, E.T.; Sayce, u. s., Art. "Chiun" in Hastings' B.D., and Felten and Wendt, in loco. For the thought expressed here that their gods should go into captivity with the people, cf. Isa. xlvi. 2.—καὶ τὸ ἄστρον . . . Ῥεμφάν, T.R.—but R.V. Ῥεφάν, on the reading see critical notes, and Wendt, p. 177. For the Hebrew (Amos v. 26) כִּיּוּן Chiun, the LXX has Ῥαιφάν. How can we account for this? Probably LXX read the word not Chiun but Kewan כֵּיוָן (so in Syr. Pesh., Kewan = Saturn your idol), of which Ῥαιφάν is a corruption through Καιφάν (cf. similar change of כ into ר in Nah. i. 6, כאשׁ in LXX ἀρχάς as if ראשׁ, Robinson's Gesenius, p. 463). Kewan = Ka-ai-va-nu, an Assyrian name for the planet Saturn, called by the same name in Arabic and Persian (Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 2, 216, and Art. "Chiun," u. s.); and this falls in perfectly with the Hebrew, "the star of your god" (your star-god) — אֱלֹהֵיכֶם כּוֹכַב, the previous word, צַלְמֵיכֶם, "your images," being placed after the two Hebrew words just quoted, cf. LXX (but see also Sayce, u. s., who renders "Chiun, your Zelem," Zelem denoting another Babylonian deity = the image or disc of the sun). It seems plain at all events that both in the Hebrew and in the LXX reference is made to the divine honours paid to the god Saturn. In the words "ye took up the star," etc., the meaning is that they took up the star or image which represented the god Saturn—your god with some authorities (so in LXX, see Blass, in loco). ὑμῶν, i.e., the deity whom these Israelites thus placed on a level with Jehovah. If we take כִּיּוּן Chiun = the litter, or pedestal, of your gods, i.e., on which they were carried in procession, as if from כּוּן (a meaning advocated by Dr. Robertson Smith), and not as a proper name at all: "the shrines of your images, the star of your God," R.V. margin, Amos v. 26, we may still infer from the mention of a star that the reference is to the debasement of planet worship (so Jerome conjectured Venus or Lucifer). It is to be noted that the vocalisation of Siccuth and Chiun is the same, and it has been recently suggested that for the form of these two names in our present text we are indebted to the misplaced zeal of the Massoretes, by the familiar trick of fitting the pointing of one word to the consonant skeleton of another—here the pointing is taken from the word שִׁקּוּץ, "abomination," see Art., "Chiun," u. s.—τοὺς τύπους, simulacra: in LXX, in opposition to σκηνή and ἄστρον. If the σκηνή is to be taken as meaning the tent or tabernacle containing the image of the god, it might be so described. τύποι is used, Jos., Ant., i., 19, 11; xv. 9, 5, of the images of Laban stolen by Rachel.—προσκυνεῖν αὐτοῖς: not in LXX, where we read τοὺς τύπους αὐτῶν οὓς ἐποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς.—ἐπέκεινα βαβυλῶνος: in LXX and Hebrew "Damascus". ἐπέκ. only here in N.T., but in classical authors, and in LXX, Gen. xxxv. 16 (21), Jer. xxii. 19 (and Aquila on passage in Genesis). "Babylon" may have been due to a slip, but more probably spoken designedly: "interpretatur vaticinium Stephanus ex eventu" (as the Rabbis often interpreted passages), see Wendt, in loco, and Lightfoot. It may be that St. Stephen thus closes one part of his speech, that which shows how Israel, all through their history, had been rebellious, and how punishment had followed. If this conjecture is correct, we pass now to the way in which Stephen deals with the charge of blasphemy against the temple.

Ver. 44. Here again we notice that the first sanctuary of the fathers was not the temple, nor was it erected on holy ground, but ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ according to αὐτὴν κατὰ τὸν τύπον ὃν ἑωράκει· 45. ἣν καὶ εἰσήγαγον διαδεξάμενοι οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν μετὰ Ἰησοῦ, ἐν τῇ κατασχέσει τῶν ἐθνῶν ὧν ἐξῶσεν[1] ὁ Θεὸς ἀπὸ προσώπου τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν, ἕως τῶν ἡμερῶν Δαβίδ· 46. ὃς εὗρε χάριν ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ ᾐτήσατο εὑρεῖν σκήνωμα

God's direct command.—ἡ σκηνὴ τοῦ μαρτ.: it is possible that there was in the speaker's mind a contrast to the σκηνή in ver. 43, but the connection is not clearly drawn out, ἀσυνδέτως, "ut in oratione concitatiore" (Blass).—ἡ σ. τοῦ μαρτυρίου, "the tabernacle of the testimony". The same phrase in LXX is used (incorrectly as Meyer noted) to translate the Hebrew tabernacle of the congregation or tabernacle of meeting, i.e., of God with His people, cf. Exod. xxvii. 21. But the tabernacle was justly called μαρτυρίου, because it contained "the ark of the testimony," LXX, Exod. xxv. 9 (10), κιβωτὸς μαρτυρίου, and so frequently in the rest of the book, and xxxi. 18, τὰς δύο πλάκας τοῦ μαρτυρίου. The tabernacle might properly be so called as a witness of God's presence, and a testimony to the covenant between God and His people. See also Westcott on Heb. viii. 5, additional note.—διετάξατο, cf. xx. 13, xxiv. 23; only in St. Luke and St. Paul in N.T., except once in Matt. xi. 1; in Gospel four times, in Acts four or five times, and frequent in LXX. Grimm compares disponere (verordnen).—καθὼς δ. ὁ λαλῶν: "even as he appointed who spake," R.V.; "per reverentiam appellatio siletur" Blass; cf. Exod. xxv. 40, Heb. viii. 5.—κατὰ τὸν τύπον, cf. Wisdom ix. 8, where the command is given to Solomon.—μίμημα σκηνῆς ἁγίας ἣν προητοίμασας: "according to the figure," R.V., i.e., pattern, likeness, cf. ver. 43 and Rom. v. 14. Again we see how far Stephen was from denying the divine sanction given to Moses for the tabernacle. In the thought thus implied lies the germ of Hooker's great argument, Eccles. Pol., iii., 11 (Plumptre).

Ver. 45. διαδεξάμενοι: having received in their turn, i.e., from Moses, only here in N.T., cf. 4 Macc. iv. 15; so also in classical Greek, in Dem. and in Polyb., cf. διαδοχῆς, "in their turn," Herod., viii., 142: (on the technical meaning of διάδοχος, to which in the LXX διαδεχόμενος is akin to the term of a deputy, or of one next to the king, see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, pp. 111, 112).—μετὰ Ἰησοῦ, cf. Heb. iv. 8, where Syr. Pesh. has "Jesus the son of Nun" (but not here).—ἐν τῇ κατασχέσει τῶν ἐθνῶν: "when they entered on the possession of the nations," R.V., lit., in the taking possession of the nations, i.e., of the land inhabited by the nations (Wendt). A.V. follows Vulgate; frequent in LXX, cf. Jos., Ant., ix., 1, 2, and Test. xii. Patr., x., used by Philo in the sense of a portion given to keep (Grimm-Thayer).—ὧν: Attic attraction, cf. i. 1.—ἀπὸ προσώπου: for a similar phrase cf. Deut. xi. 23, xii, 29, 30, etc., and frequently in LXX, Hebrew מִפְּנֵי.—ἕως τῶν ἡμ. Δ.: to be connected with the first part of the verse, "which also our fathers brought in . . . unto the days of David" (inclusively), see Wendt, in loco, i.e., "et mansit tabernaculum usque ad tempora Davidis" (Blass). Rendall takes the words as closely joined to ὧν ἐξῶσεν, but the clause ὧν ἐξῶσεν . . . ἡμῶν is rather subordinate.

Ver. 46. ὃς εὗρε χάριν, cf. Luke i. 30, Hebraistic, cf. Gen. vi. 8; it may be tacitly implied that had the temple been so important as the Jew maintained, God would have allowed the man who found favour before him to build it; on the phrase ἐνώπ. K. or Θεοῦ see above on iv. 10.—ᾐτήσατο εὑρειν, i.e., σκήνωμα, cf. iii. 3; ἠρώτα λαβεῖν, and instances in Wetstein, "asked to find," not only "desired," LXX, 2 Sam. vii. 2 ff., 1 Chron. xxii. 7, Ps. lxxxi. 5.—σκήνωμα: perhaps used by David (as in the Psalm quoted) in his humility (Meyer); used of the temple in 1 Esdras i. 50. David of course desired to build not a σκηνή, which already existed.—τῷ Θεῷ Ἰακώβ, see critical notes.

Ver. 47. Σολομῶν, see above on iii. 11.—δὲ: "But" or "And"—δὲ, adversative as in A. and R.V., cf. 2 Chron. vi. 7-9, where Solomon is represented as claiming God's promise that he should build the house—a favour denied to his father David.

(Appendix, 92) think that although θεῳ is a very ancient correction of οικῳ the latter can hardly be genuine and that there is apparently a primitive error, and with this judgment Wendt agrees. Hort suggests κυριῳ, and concludes that τωοικω may have come from τωκ̅ω̅ (so too Wendt), and refers to LXX, Ps. cxxxi. 5; but we have still to ask if the expression "Lord of Jacob" ever occurred, whilst no doubt "God of Jacob," "House of Jacob" are familiar expressions. In LXX, Ps. cxxxi. 3, we have σκηνωμα οικου, and a similar expression may have been the orig. reading here; again, in Ps. xxiv. 6, Heb., we have "Jacob" = "the God of Jacob" (see LXX), and it has been suggested that some such abbreviation or mode of speech lies at the bottom of the difficulty here. Blass holds that οικῳ comes from the next verse "corrupte" (orig. a gloss on σκηνωμα).

smallness of any building made by hands) was not so confined—the previous words must not be misunderstood by Stephen's hearers. Solomon's οἶκος might have given the idea of greater permanency, but still Isaiah had taught, lxvi. 1, 2, and even the builder of the temple, Solomon himself, had acknowledged that God was not confined to any single place of worship, 1 King viii. 27, 2 Chron. vi. 18 (Hackett), cf. also David's prayer, 1 Chron. xxix. 10-19.—ἐν χειροποιήτοις ναοῖς κατοικεῖ—omit ναοῖς, probably an exegetical addition, cf. xvii. 24, where the word is found. The omission makes the contrast with οἶκος still more emphatic. "But Solomon . . . a house, howbeit the Most High dwelleth not in houses made with hands" (R.V.). For χειροποίητος and ἀχειρ. see Westcott on Heb. ix. 11, 24. Both words occur in Mark xiv. 58, in the charge of the false witness against our Lord. In the LXX χειροποίητος is used several times of idols made with hands, and occasionally found in classical Greek. Weiss compares as a parallel with its use here Isa. xvi. 12 (see R.V.), but the meaning is doubtful.—ὁ ὕψιστος, emphatic—Solomon's building a house must not be misunderstood—see too ver. 49. ὁ ὕψ., xvi. 17, used here absolutely (cf. Luke i. 32, 35, 76, vi. 35, without the article), so often in LXX, 2 Sam. xxii. 14, Ps. xvii. 13, and often in Psalms, Isa. xiv. 14, Ecclus. xii. 6, etc. R.V. writes "Most High," instead of A.V. "most High," thus making the proper name of God more emphatic, cf. Winer-Schmiedel, p. 172—so in classical Greek Ζεὺς ὕψιστος; ὁ ὕψιστος θεός in Greek inscriptions of Asia Minor; for the Hebrew equivalents, see Grimm-Thayer, sub v. St. Stephen's words apparently impressed at least one of his hearers, for the same thought is reproduced in the words of St. Paul at Athens, where he asserts the same truth, and makes St. Stephen's words as it were his text to emphasise the real power and worship of God: "atque similiter hic Judæi atque illic Græci castigantur" (Blass), cf. the teaching of our Lord in John iv. 21 (and see Plumptre's note on this passage in Acts).—καθὼς ὁ προφ., Isa. lxvi. 1, 2 (LXX). same truth in the dedicatory prayer of his temple, St. Stephen appeals to the great Messianic prophet. It is not, as some have thought, the worthlessness of the temple, but rather its relative value upon which Stephen insists. Those who take the former view of the words must suppose that St. Stephen had forgotten that Solomon had given utterance to the same thought at the moment when he was consecrating the temple (so Wendt, Felten, McGiffert, in loco). Weiss sees in the question another proof of the thought running through the whole address, that God's presence, with the blessings which He confers and the revelations which He imparts, is not confined to the temple: cf. the use of the same quotation as here against the Jews, Epist. Barn., xvi., 2, after the destruction of the temple.

Ver. 51. σκληροτράχηλοι καὶ ἀπερίτμητοι τῇ καρδίᾳ, cf. Exod. xxxiii. 3, 5, xxxiv. 9, Deut. ix. 6, Baruch ii. 30, etc., Ecclus. xvi. 11 (cf. Cicero, Verr., iii., 95, "tantis cervicibus est"). Both adjectives had been used to describe the sins of Israel in former days. On this reading see above and Wendt, critical note, p. 190, cf. Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 116. For the expression ἀπερ., cf. Deut. x. 16, Jer. iv. 4, and ἀπερ. τὰ ὦτα, Jer. vi. 10. In the N.T. cf. Rom. ii. 25, 29 (which sounds like another echo of St. Stephen's teaching), cf. also Epist. Baru., ix. (Jer. iv. 4). Similar expressions occur in Philo and the Rabbis, and also 1 Macc. i. 48, ii. 46, and see further Deissmann, Bibelstudien, pp. 150, 151. Many writers have maintained that St. Stephen's sharp and abrupt declaration marks the increasing impatience of his hearers at this point, as if the speaker felt that the murmurs of his audience would not allow him much more speech. But on the other hand St. Stephen's whole speech led up to this point, and his words were not so much an interruption, but a continuance and a summary of what had gone before. No doubt the speech was left unfinished: "cujus cursus ad Iesum tendebat" (Blass); since in His rejection the obstinacy of the people which had marked and marred their history had reached its climax; and the indignant words of St. Stephen bring to mind the indignation of a greater than he against the hyprocrisy and wilfulness of the nation—"the wrath of the Lamb" against the Pharisees and the oppressors (Briggs, Messiah of the Apostles, p. 68).—ἀεὶ: "summa tractationis — semper quotiescumque vocamini" Bengel.—ἀντιπίπτετε, cf. Num. xxvii. 14, of Israel striving against God, and also in Polyb. and Plut.

Ver. 52. τίνα τῶν προφ.—ἀσυνδέτως, to mark the vehemence of the speech, as above, verse 51: cf. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16 for the general statement, and for individual cases, Jeremiah, Amos, and probably Isaiah, the prophet just quoted. We may compare the words of our Lord, Matt. v. 12, Luke xiii. 34, and also Luke xi. 49, Matt. xxiii. 29-37 where the same words ἐδίωξαν and ἀπέκτειναν are used of the treatment of the prophets.—καὶ ἀπέκ.: "they even slew"—perhaps the force of καί (Wendt), "they slew them also" (Rendall).—ἐλεύσεως: only here in the N.T., not in LXX or Apocrypha, or in classical writers, but found in Acta Thomæ 28, and in Iren., i., 10, in plural, of the first and second advent of Christ (see also Dion. Hal., iii., 59).—τοῦ δικαίου, see Acts iii. 14 and note. It has been suggested that it is used here and elsewhere of our Lord from His own employment of the same word in Matt. xxiii. 29, where He speaks of the tombs τῶν δικαίων whom the fathers had slain whilst the children adorned their sepulchres. But it is more probable that the word was applied to our Lord from the LXX use of it, cf. Isa. liii. 11. Even those Jews who rejected the idea of an atoning Messiah acknowledged that His personal righteousness was His real claim to the Messianic dignity, Weber, Jüdische Theologie, p. 362; Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, p. 185, second edition. We cannot forget that one of those present who heard St. Stephen's burning words was himself to see the Just One and to carry on the martyr's work, cf. xxii. 14, ἰδεῖν τὸν δίκαιον κ.τ.λ.—νῦν ἐγένεσθε: "of whom ye have now become," R.V., the spirit of their fathers was still alive, and they had acted as their fathers had done; ὑμεῖς again emphatic.

Ver. 53. οἵτινες, quippe qui ("ye who," R.V.), as often in Acts and Epistles not simply for identification, but when as here the conduct of the persons already mentioned is further enlarged upon (Alford), cf. viii. 15, ix. 35, x. 41, 47, and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 235, but see also Blass, Grammatik, p. 169.—εἰς διαταγὰς ἀγγέλων: "as it was ordained by angels," R.V. εἰς: at the appointment of, cf. its use in Matt. xii. 41, or better εἰς as in ver. 21 = received the law as ordinances of angels (νόμον being regarded as an aggregate of single acts and so with plural "ordinances"), so Rendall, who takes εἰς = ὡς, and Page, cf. Heb. xi. 8, i.e., it was no human ordinance. But see on the other hand Wendt's note, p. 192, where he points out that the law was not received as commands given by angels but by God. This was undoubtedly the case, but St. Stephen was here probably referring to the current tradition in Philo and Josephus, and LXX, Deut. xxxiii. 2. ἐκ δεξιῶν αὐτοῦ ἄγγελοι μετ' αὐτοῦ, cf. Ps. lxvii. 17; Philo, De Somn., p. 642 Mang., so Jos., Ant., xv., 5, 3, and also Book of Jubilees, chap. i. (see Wetstein and Lightfoot (J. B.) on Gal. iii. 19). Others again take εἰς = ἐν, "accepistis legem ab angelis promulgatam" = διατασσόντων ἀγγέλων, so Blass. Certainly it does not seem possible to take διαταγή = διάταξις = agmen dispositum (cf. Judith i. 4, viii. 36), and to render "præsentibus angelorum ordinibus," so that here also εἰς = ἐν (Meyer and others). Lightfoot (J.) takes the "angels" as = Moses and the Prophets; Surenhusius as = the elders of the people, whilst St. Chrysostom sees a reference to the angel of the burning bush. It must not be thought that St. Stephen is here depreciating the Law. From a Christian standpoint it might of course be urged that as Christ was superior to the angels, so the introduction of angels showed the inferiority of the Law to the Gospel (cf. Heb. ii. 2, Gal. iii. 19), but St. Stephen's point is that although the Law had been given with such notable sanctions, yet his hearers had not kept it, and that therefore they, not he, were the real law-breakers.—οὐκ ἐφύλαξατε: "cum omnibus phylacteriis vestris," Bengel. Note the rhetorical power of the words cf. ver. 25 (Page).

Ver. 54. No charge could have been more hateful to such an audience, cf. our Lord's words, John vii. 19; see Schürer, Jewish People, vol ii., div. ii., p. 90 ff., E.T. Schürer twice quotes St. Paul's words, pp. 96, 124, ζῆλον Θεοῦ ἔχουσιν ἀλλ' οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν; no words could better characterise the entire tendency of the Judaism of the period.—διεπρίοντο, cf. v. 33.—ἔβρυχον: not elsewhere in N.T., in LXX, Job xvi. 10 (9), Ps. xxxiv. (v.) 16, xxxvi. (vii.) 12, cf. cxi. (xii.) 10; Lam. ii. 16, cf. Plutarch, Pericles, 33 (without ὀδόντας, intransitive). The noun βρύχη is found in the same sense, Ap. Rh., ii., 83, of brute passion, not the despair so often associated with the cognate noun; cf. Matt. viii. 12, xiii. 42, etc.

[1] υπαρχων δε πληρης Π. Α., Flor. represents ὁ δε υπαρχων (or ων) ἐν πνευματι αγιῳ; possibly assim. to Apoc. i. 10, iv. 2, as it has been thoughtfully suggested that to be "in the spirit" would account for his vision, whereas the expression in T.R. would not seem to account for it.

[2] Ιησουν; D, Flor., Gig. add τον Κυριον, so Hilg.

[3] For του θεου Par., Wern. read virtutis Dei; Const. Apost. της δυναμεως, "recte ut videtur" Blass, so in β; cf. Matt. xxvi. 64, Luke xxii. 69.

Ver. 55. ἀτενίσας, cf. i. 10, εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, cf. John xvii. 1, "ubi enim est oculus, ibi est cor et amor". In the power of the Holy Ghost, with which Stephen is represented as being full, as in life so in death, he saw δόξαν Θεοῦ, in which He had appeared to Abraham, cf. ver. 2, πλήρης, "crescente furore hostium, in Stephano crescit robur spiritus, omnisque fructus Spiritus," Bengel.—Ἰησοῦν ἑστῶτα: elsewhere He is represented as sitting, ii. 34. If St. Luke had placed this saying in the mouth of St. Stephen in imitation of the words of Jesus, Matt. xxi. 64, Mark xvi. 19, Luke xxii. 69, he would, without doubt, have described Him as sitting, cf. also the expression "Son of Man," only here outside the Gospels, and never in the Epistles (Rev. i. 13, a doubtful instance), a noteworthy indication of the primitive date and truthfulness of the expression and the report. See especially Wendt's note on p. 194 (1888). Standing, as if to succour and to receive His servant, ἵνα δείξῃ τὴν ἀντίληψιν τὴν εἰς αὐτόν (Oecum., and so Chrys.); "quasi obvium Stephano," Bengel, so Zöckler, and see Alford's note and Collect for St. Stephen's day. St. Augustine represents Christ as standing: "ut Stephano stanti, patienti, et reo, ipse quoque stans, quasi patiens et reus compatiatur". Alford supposes reference in the vision to that of Zech. iii. 1.—ἐκ δεξιῶν: as the place of honour, cf. 1 Kings ii. 19, Matt. xx. 21. The Sanhedrin would recall the words "the Son of Man," as they had been spoken by One Who was Himself the Son of Man, and in Whom, as in His follower, they had seen only a blasphemer. On the expression "Son of Man" cf. Charles, Book of Enoch, Appendix B, p. 312 ff., and Witness of the Epistles, p. 286 (1892).

Ver. 57. κράξαντες: so as to silence him.—συνέσχον τὰ ὦτα αὐτῶν: in order that the words which they regarded as so impious should not be heard, cf. Matt. xxvi. 65. Blass compares the phrase LXX, Isa. lii. 15, καὶ συνέξουσι βασιλεῖς τὸ στόμα αὐτῶν.—ὥρμησαν . . . ἐπ᾽ αὐτόν, cf. 2 Macc. x. 16, and in several places in 2 Macc. the verb is found with the same construction (although not quite in the same sense).

Ver. 58. ἔξω τῆς πόλεως: according to the law, Lev. xxiv. 14, so in Luke iv. 29, our Lord is cast out of Nazareth to be stoned.—ἐλιθοβόλουν: as guilty of blasphemy. St. Stephen's closing remarks were in the eyes of his judges a justification of the charge; imperf. as in ver. 59, see note below. The judicial forms were evidently observed, at least to some extent (Weiss attributes the introduction of the witnesses to a reviser), and whilst the scene was a tumultuous one, it was quite possible that it was not wholly bereft of judicial appearances.—μάρτυρες: whose part it was to throw the first stone, cf. Deut. xvii. 7 (John viii. 7).—ἀπέθεντο τὰ ἱμάτια αὐτῶν: to perform their cruel task with greater ease and freedom, cf. xxii. 20.—νεανίου: only used in Acts, where it occurs three or four times, xx. 9, xxiii. 17 (18), several times in LXX. It has been thought (Wendt) that the term could not have been used of Saul if he had been married, or if he was at this time a widower, but if νεανίας might be used to denote any man of an age between twenty-four and forty, like Latin adulescens and the Hebrew נַעַר, Gen. xli. 12 (Grimm-Thayer), Saul might be so described. Josephus applies the term to Agrippa I. when he was at least forty. Jos., Ant., xviii., 6, 7. See further on xxvi. 10.—Σαύλου: "If the Acts are the composition of a second-century writer to whom Paul was only a name, then the introduction of this silent figure in such a scene is a masterpiece of dramatic invention" (Page, Acts, Introd., xxxi.); for the name see below on xiii. 9, and also on its genuineness, Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., ii., 49, as against Krenkel. Of Saul's earlier life we gather something from his own personal notices, see notes on xxii. 3, xxiii. 6, xxiv. 14, xxvi. 4, and cf. ix. 13. He was a Hebrew sprung from Hebrews, Phil. iii. 5; he was a Roman citizen, and not only so, but a Tarsian, a citizen of no mean city; cf. for the two citizenships, xxi. 39 (ix. 11) and xxii. 27, "Citizenship," Hastings' B.D.; Zahn, u. s., p. 48; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 30. Zahn, u. s., pp. 35, 49, maintains that Saul's family had only recently settled in Tarsus (but see Ramsay, u. s.), and defends the tradition that his parents had come there from Gischala, their son being born to them in Tarsus. On Saul's family and means see notes on xxiii. 16 and xxiv. 26. But whatever his Roman and Tarsian citizenship may have contributed to his mental development, St. Paul's own words clearly lead us to attach the highest and most significant influence to the Jewish side of his nature and character. Paul's Pharisaism was the result not only of his training under Gamaliel, but also of the inheritance which he claimed from his father and his ancestors (xxiii. 6, Φαρισαίων not Φαρισαίου, cf. Gal. i. 14). His early years were passed away from Jerusalem, xxvi. 4 (the force of τε (R.V.) and the expression ἐν τῷ ἔθνει μου, Zahn, u. s., p. 48), but his home-training could not have been neglected (cf. 2 Tim. i. 3), and when he went up to the Holy City at an early stage to study under Gamaliel (xxii. 3, ἀνατεθραμμένος, on its force see Sabatier L'Apôtre Paul, p. 30) he "lived a Pharisee," and nothing else than his well-known zeal is needed to account for his selection to his dreadful and solemn office at St. Stephen's martyrdom. As a Pharisee he had been "a separated one," and had borne the name with pride, not suspecting that a day was at hand when he would speak of himself as ἀφωρισμένος in a far higher and fuller sense, Rom. i. 1, Gal. i. 15 (Zahn, u. s., p. 48); as a Pharisee he was "separated from all filthiness of heathenism" around (Nivdal), but he was to learn that the Christian life was that of the true "Chasid," and that in contrast to all Pharisaic legalism and externalism there was a cleansing ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, a perfecting holiness in the fear of God—God Who chooseth before all temples the upright heart and pure (Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 231). On the question whether St. Paul ever saw our Lord in the flesh, see Keim, Geschichte Jesu, i., 35, 36, and references, and for the views of more recent writers, Witness of the Epistles (Longmans), chaps. i. and ii.

Ver. 59. καὶ ἐλιθ. τὸν Σ. ἐπικ.: imperf., as in ver. 58, "quia res morte demum [60] perficitur," Blass. ἐπικ., present participle, denoting, it would seem, the continuous appeal of the martyr to his Lord. Zeller, Overbeck and Baur throw doubt upon the historical truth of the narrative on account of the manner in which the Sanhedrists' action is divided between an utter absence of formal proceedings and a punctilious observance of correct formalities; but on the other hand Wendt, note, p. 195 (1888), points out with much force that an excited and tumultuous crowd, even in the midst of a high-handed and illegal act, might observe some legal forms, and the description given by St. Luke, so far from proceeding from one who through ignorance was unable to distinguish between a legal execution and a massacre, impresses us rather with a sense of truthfulness from the very fact that no attempt is made to draw such a distinction of nicely balanced justice, less or more. The real difficulty lies in the relations which the scene presupposes between the Roman Government and the Sanhedrim. No doubt at this period the latter did not possess the power to inflict capital punishment (Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 187, E.T.), as is evident from the trial of our Lord. But it may well be that at the time of Stephen's murder Roman authority was somewhat relaxed in Judæa. Pilate had just been suspended from his functions, or was on the point of being so, and he may well have been tired of refusing the madness and violence of the Jews, as Renan supposes, or at all events he may well have refrained, owing to his bad odour with them, from calling them to account for their illegal action in the case before us (see McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 91). It is of course possible that the stoning took place with the connivance of the Jewish authorities, as Weizsäcker allows, or that there was an interval longer than Acts supposes between the trial of Stephen and his actual execution, during which the sanction of the Romans was obtained. In the absence of exact dates it is difficult to see why the events before us should not have been transacted during the interregnum between the departure of Pontius Pilate, to answer before Tiberius for his misgovernment, and the arrival of Marcellus, the next Procurator. If this was so, we have an exact historical parallel in the illegal murder of James the Just, who was tried before the high priest, and stoned to death, since Ananias thought that he had a good opportunity for his violence when Festus was dead, and Albinus was still upon his road (Jos., Ant., xx., 9, 1). But if this suggestion of an interregnum is not free from difficulties, we may further take into consideration the fact that the same Roman officer, Vitellius, prefect of Syria, who had caused Pilate to be sent to Rome in disgrace, was anxious at the same time to receive Jewish support, and determined to effect his object by every means in his power. Josephus, Ant., xviii., 4, 2-5, tells us that Vitellius sent a friend of his own, Marcellus, to manage the affairs of Judæa, and that, not content with this, he went up to Jerusalem himself to conciliate the Jews by open regard for their religion, as well as by the remission of taxation. It is therefore not difficult to conceive that both the murder of Stephen and the persecution which followed were connived at by the Roman government; see, in addition to the above references, Rendall's Acts, Introd., p. 19 ff.; Farrar, St. Paul, i., p. 648 ff., and note, p. 649. But this solution of the difficulty places the date of Saul's conversion somewhat late—A.D. 37—and is entirely at variance with the earlier chronology adopted not only by Harnack (so too by McGiffert), but here by Ramsay, St. Paul, 376, 377, who places St. Stephen's martyrdom in A.D. 33 at the latest. In the account of the death of Stephen, Wendt, following Weiss, Sorof, Clemen, Hilgenfeld, regards vii. 58b, viii. 1a, 3, as evidently additions of the redactor, although he declines to follow Weiss and Hilgenfeld in passing the same judgment on ver. 55 (and 56, according to H.), and on the last words of Stephen in ver. 59b. The second ἐλιθοβόλουν in 59b, which Hilgenfeld assigns to his redactor, and Wendt now refers to the action of the witnesses, as distinct from that of the whole crowd, is repeated with dramatic effect, heightened by the present participle, ἐπικ., "ruthless violence on the one side, answered by continuous appeals to heaven on the other"; see Rendall's note, in loco.—ἐπικ.: "calling upon the Lord," R.V. ("calling upon God," A.V.), the former seems undoubtedly to be rightly suggested by the words of the prayer which follow—on the force of the word see above, ii. 21.—Κύριε Ἰησοῦ, δέξαι τὸ πνεῦμά μου: a direct prayer to our Lord, cf. for its significance and reality, Zahn, "Die Anbetung Jesu" (Skizzen aus dem Leben der alten Kirche, pp. 9, 288), Liddon, Our Lord's Divinity, lect. vii.; cf. Luke xxiii. 46. (Weiss can only see an imitation of Luke, and an interpolation here, because the kneeling, and also another word follow before the surrender of the spirit; but see on the other hand the remarks of Wendt, note, p. 196.)

Ver. 60. θεὶς δὲ τὰ γόνατα: a phrase not used in classical writers, but Blass compares Ovid, Fasti, ii., 438; five times in St. Luke's writings, Luke xxii. 41, Acts ix. 40, xx. 36, xxi. 5; only once elsewhere in N.T., Mark xv. 19. The attitude of kneeling in prayer would no doubt commend itself to the early believers from the example of their Lord. Standing would seem to have been the more common attitude among the Jews, but cf. instances in the O.T. of kneeling in prayer, LXX, 1 Kings viii. 54, Ezra ix. 5, Dan. vi. 10, and also the expression used twice by St. Paul, κάμπτειν τὰ γόνατα, 1 Chron. xxix. 20, 1 Esdras viii. 73, Isa. xlv. 23, etc., Ephes. iii. 14, and Phil. ii. 10 (Rom. xi. 4, xiv. 11). See Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 42.—φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, cf. Luke xxiii. 46. The last final effort of the strong love which showed itself also in the martyr's bended knees (see Wendt, in loco). Eusebius, H. E., v., 2, tells us how the martyrs of Vienne and Lyons took up St. Stephen's words in their own prayer for their persecutors (cf. the famous instance of the last words of Sir Thomas More before his judges, and Dante, Purgatorio, xv., 106 ff., on the dying Stephen): μὴ στήσῃς αὐτοῖς τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ταύτην: the negative expression best corresponds to the positive ἀφιέναι τὴν ἁμαρτίαν (Wendt), cf. 1 Macc. xiii. 38, 39, xv. 5, 8, where the contrast marked between ἱστάναι and ἀφιέναι seems to favour this explanation. Blass takes it as marking a contrast like that between ἱστάναι and ἀναιρεῖν, cf. Heb. x. 9. Weiss lays stress upon ταύτην, and regards the prayer as asking that their present sin might not be weighed out to them in an equivalent punishment, cf. Grotius on the Hebrew שָׁקַל, 1 Kings xx. 39, whilst De Wette (so Felten) takes it as simply "reckon it not," i.e., "weigh it not," cf. Zech. xi. 12. Schöttgen sees a reference to the Rabbinical notion "si quis bonum aut malum opus facit, hoc sequitur eum, et stat juxta eum in mundo futuro," Rev. xiv. 13, and cf. a similar view quoted by Farrar, St. Paul, i., 167. Rendall regards it as a judicial term, as if Stephen appealed to Christ as Judge not to impute their sin to the murderers in condemnation (Rom. x. 3). The words of St. Stephen again recall the words of his Master, Luke xxiii. 34, words which (Eusebius, H. E., cf. ii., 20) also formed the dying prayer of James, "the Lord's brother". In James as in Stephen we may see how the true Christian character, whilst expressing itself in righteous indignation against hypocrisy and wrong, never failed to exhibit as its counterpart the meekness and gentleness of Christ.—ἐκοιμήθη (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 18), a picture-word of rest and calmness which stands in dramatic contrast to the rage and violence of the scene. The word is used of death both in LXX and in classical Greek, cf., e.g., Isa. xiv. 8, 18, xliii. 17, 1 Kings xi. 43, 2 Macc. xii. 45, etc.; Homer, Il., xi., 241; Soph., Elect., 509. Blass well says of this word, "sed nullo loco æque mirandum," and describes the reference in Homer, κοιμήσατο χάλκεον ὕπνον, as "et simile et dissimile": Christians sleep in death, but no "brazen sleep"; they sleep ἐν Χριστῷ; simple words which formed the epitaph on many a Christian grave—in Him, Who is Himself "the Resurrection and the Life". Page notes the cadence of the word expressing rest and repose, cf. Farrar, St. Paul, i., 167, note, and ἀκωλύτως, xxviii. 31.

St. Stephen's Speech.—Many and varied explanations have been given of the drift and purpose of St. Stephen's address. But the various explanations need not be mutually exclusive, and St. Stephen, like a wise scribe instructed unto the kingdom, might well bring out of his treasury things new and old. It is often said, e.g., that the address is no reply to the charges alleged, that it would be more intelligible how the charges were framed from a perversion of the speech, than how the speech could be framed out of the charges; whilst, on the other hand, it is possible to see from the opening to the closing words an implicit repudiation of the charges of blasphemy against God and contempt of the law. The speech opens with a declaration of the divine majesty of Jehovah; it closes with a reference to the divine sanction of the law, and with the condemnation of those who had not kept it. This implicit repudiation by Stephen of the charges brought against him is also contained in St. Chrysostom's view of the purpose of the martyr, viz., that he designed to show that the covenant and promises were before the law, and sacrifice and the law before the temple. This view, which was adopted by Grotius and Calvin, is in some degree retained by Wendt (so also Felten), who sums up the chief aim of the speech as a demonstration that the presence of God is not confined to the holy place, the temple, but that long before the temple was built, and before the people had settled in the promised land, God had given to the fathers a share in the proofs of this revelation, and that too in strange countries (although there is no reason to suppose that Stephen went so far as to contend that Jew and Gentile were on a precisely equal footing). But Wendt is conscious that this view does not account for the whole of the speech, and that it does not explain the prominence given in it to the obstinacy of Israel against the revelation of God vouchsafed to Moses, with which the counter accusation against Stephen is so closely connected (see Spitta's severe criticism, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 111, 112, and Weizsäcker's evident failure to maintain the position that the climax of the whole address is to be found in the declaration about Solomon's temple, which he is obliged to explain as a later thought belonging to a later time, Apostolic Age, i., pp. 68-71, E.T.). Thus in his last edition, p. 151 (1899), he points out that in section vv. 35-43, as also in vv. 25 and 27, the obstinacy of the people against Moses, sent to be their deliverer, is evidently compared with their obstinacy in rejecting Jesus as the Messiah, and in vv. 51-53 the murder of Jesus is condemned as a fresh proof of the opposition of the people to God's revelation to them: here is a point of view which in Wendt's judgment evidently had a share in the composition of the address. Wendt urges his view against the older one of Meyer and to some extent at all events that of Baur, Zeller and Overbeck, that the central point of the speech is to be found in ver. 51, to which the whole preceding sketch of the history of the people led up: however great had been the benefits bestowed by God upon His people, on their part there had been from the beginning nothing in return but a corresponding thanklessness and resistance to this purpose. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, pp. 87, 88, also recognises that the theme of the address is to be found in vv. 51-53, but he also admits the double purpose of St. Stephen, viz., not only to show (as Meyer and others) that at all stages of their history Israel had been stiffnecked and disobedient, but also (as Wendt) to draw a parallel between their conduct and the treatment of Jesus by those whom he is addressing.

This leads us to a consideration of the view of Spitta as to the main purpose of St. Stephen's speech. Whatever may be thought of its merits, it gives a unity to the speech which is wanting in many earlier and more recent expositions of it, as Hilgenfeld recognises, although he himself holds a different view, and one essentially similar to that of Baur. According to Spitta, in vv. 2-16 we have an introduction to the chief section of the address which begins with ver. 17, καθὼς δὲ ἤγγιζεν ὁ χρόνος τῆς ἐπαγ. Moses, ver. 20, was the person through whom God would save His people, and lead them to His true service in the promised land, vv. 7, 35, 38, 44. If we ask why Moses occupies this important place in the speech, the answer is found in ver. 37, which forms the central point of the description of Moses, and divides it into two parts (a verse in which Clemen and Hilgenfeld can only see an interpolation of a redactor, and in which Weiss finds something suspicious, see Zöckler's note, in loco). In the first part, 17-36, we are told how Moses by divine and miraculous guidance grows up to be the deliverer of Israel. But when he would commence his work of deliverance his brethren will not understand his aim and reject him, 23-28. In the wilderness he receives a fresh commission from God to undertake the delivery of the people, 29-34. But this Moses (οὗτος) who was thus repulsed God had sent to be a ruler and deliverer—this man was he who led these people forth—and it was this Moses who said to the children: "A prophet" etc., v. 37. Why is this prophecy introduced except to support the inference that as Moses, a type of the Messiah, was thus repulsed, and afterwards raised to be a ruler and deliverer, so must, according to Moses' own words, the Messiah of Israel be first rejected by His people? In the next division, vv. 38-50, the same parallel is again instituted between Moses and the Messiah. The former had delivered a law which consisted of "living oracles," but instead of receiving it, Israel had given themselves up to the worship of idols, 35-43; instead of establishing a worship well-pleasing to God, those who came after Moses, not content with the tabernacle, which was not confined to one place, and which represented the heavenly archetype, had built a temple which called forth the cutting words of the prophet, 47-50. In his explanation of these last verses there lies at least one weakness of Spitta's explanation, for he does not seem in his disapproval of the temple to allow that it had even a relative value, and that Solomon was well aware that God did not dwell only in temples made with hands. But Spitta's main point is to trace again a connection with the verse which forms his centre, ver. 37 (Deut. xviii. 15). As Moses in vain communicated a spiritual law and a corresponding worship to a people whose heart turned after idols and the service of a temple, so the Messiah must also experience that the carnal mind of the people would oppose His revelation of the divine will in relation to a rightful service. Thus the whole speech becomes a proof of the Messiahship of Jesus as against those who appealed to the authority of Moses, and saw in Jesus a twofold cause of offence: (1) that He was rejected by His people and crucified; (2) that He had treated with impiety that which they held most sacred—the law and the temple.

In all this Spitta sees no direct answer to the false witnesses; but the speech, he maintains, is much rather an answer to the two causes of offence which must ἔκραξε φωνῇ μεγάλῃ,[1] Κύριε, μὴ στήσῃς αὐτοῖς τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ταύτην. καὶ τοῦτο εἰπὼν ἐκοιμήθη.[2] Σαῦλος δὲ ἦν συνευδοκῶν τῇ ἀναιρέσει αὐτοῦ.

[1] D, Vulg., Gig. (not Flor.) add λεγων, so Blass in β, and Hilg.; prob. assim. to more usual λεγων after κραζειν where the words are given.

[2] εκοιμηθη, Par., Wern., Vulg. add in Domino, but not Blass.

have been discussed in every synagogue, and which the infant Church must have been obliged to face from the first, especially as it took its stand upon the proof that Jesus was the Christ. Stephen in his disputations, vi. 9, must have often faced opponents who thus sought to invalidate the Messianic claims of Jesus; what more natural than that he should now repeat before the whole assembly the proofs which he had before given in the synagogue, where no one could resist the spirit and the wisdom with which he spake? In this way Spitta maintains that the charges in vv. 52, 53 occupy their proper place; the Jews had rejected the prophets—Moses and his successors—finally they rejected the Messiah, whom the prophets had foretold (Apostelgeschichte, p. 105 ff.). Whatever strictures we may be inclined to pass upon Spitta (see, e.g., Wendt in new edition, 1899, pp. 150, 151), it is not unlikely that he has at all events grasped what others have failed to see, viz., that in the nature of the case, Stephen in his ἀπολογία, or counter-accusation—whichever it was—could not have been unmindful of the Prophet like unto Moses, whom Moses had foretold: his dying prayer revealed the Name, not uttered in the speech, which was enshrined in his inmost heart; Jesus was the Christ—He came οὐ καταλῦσαι ἀλλὰ πληρῶσαι, whether that fulfilment was made by a spiritual temple or a spiritual law. In thus keeping the thought of Jesus of Nazareth prominent throughout the speech, whilst not actually uttering His Name, in thus comparing Moses and Christ, Stephen was answering the charges made against him. "This Nazarene" (so it was said in the charge made against Stephen) "would destroy this place and change the customs," etc.—the prophet Moses had given the people living oracles, not a law which should stifle the spirit in the letter; the prophet Isaiah had spoken of a presence of God far transcending that which filled any earthly temple; and if these prophets had pointed on to the Messiah, and if the Nazarene were indeed the Christ thus foretold, what wonder that He should reveal a commandment unto life, and a worship of the Father in spirit and in truth? Nor must it be forgotten that if Stephen was interrupted before his speech was concluded, he may well have intended to drive home more closely the manifest fulfilment in Christ of the deliverance dimly foreshadowed in the work of Moses and in the freedom from Egyptian bondage. This was the true parallel between Moses and the Messiah on which the Rabbis were wont to dwell. Thus the Messiah, in comparison with Moses, was the second, but in comparison with all others the great, deliverer; as Moses led Israel out of Egypt, so would the Messiah accomplish the final deliverance, and restore Israel to their own land (Weber, Jüdische Theologie, pp. 359, 364 (1897)). It is to be observed that Spitta warmly supports the historical character of the speech, which he ascribes without interpolations to his source A, although in vv. 55-60 he refers some "insertions" to B. His criticism as against the tendency critics, especially Overbeck, is well worth consulting (pp. 110-123), and he quotes with approval the judgment of Gfrörer—"I consider this speech unreservedly as the oldest monument of Gospel history". So too Clemen, pp. 97, 288, allows that the speech is essentially derived, with the exception of ver. 37, as also the whole chapter with the exception of ver. 60, from an old written source, H.H., Historia Hellenistarum; and amongst more recent writers, McGiffert holds that whilst many maintain that the author of the Acts composed the speech and put it into the mouth of Stephen, its contents are against such a supposition, and that Luke undoubtedly got the substance of the discourse from an early source, and reproduced it with approximate accuracy (p. 89 and note). So Weiss refers the speech to his Jewish-Christian source, and refuses to admit that with its profound knowledge of the O.T. it could have been composed by the author of the book. The attempt of Feine (so also Holtzmann and Jüngst) to split up the speech into two distinct parts is based upon the idea that in one part an answer is made to the charge that Stephen had spoken against God, and that the other part contains an answer to the charge that he had spoken against the temple. The first part is contained in vii. 2-21, 29-34, 44-50, and the second part in vii. 22-28, 35-43, 51-53. The latter sections are taken from Feine's Jerusalem source; they are then added to those which belong to a new source, and finally combined by the canonical Luke. Hilgenfeld may well ask how it is possible to break up in this manner the narrative part of the speech relating to Moses, so as to regard vv. 22-28 as a section alien from what precedes and what follows! (see especially Hilgenfeld's criticism on Feine, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., p. 396 (1895) and Knabenbauer, p. 120); on the truthful record of the speech see Lightfoot's striking remarks "Acts," B.D.², i., p. 33. Whatever may be said as to the various difficulties which the speech contains, two things are apparent: (1) that these difficulties do not touch the main drift of the argument; (2) that the fact of their presence, where their removal was easy, bears witness to the accuracy of the report.

CHAPTER VIII.—Ver. 1. Σαῦλος δὲ κ.τ.λ., R.V. joins these words to the conclusion of the previous chapter, and thus brings them into a close and fitting connection with vii. 58. So too Wendt, Blass, Nösgen, Zöckler.—ἦν συνευδοκῶν: for this characteristic Lucan use of the imperfect of the substantive verb with a participle, see chap. i. 10. The formula here indicates the lasting and enduring nature of Saul's "consent". The verb συνευδοκέω is peculiar to St. Luke and St. Paul, and is used by the former in his Gospel as well as in Acts, cf. Luke xi. 48, Acts xxii. 20 (by St. Paul himself with reference to his share in the murder of St. Stephen), Rom. i. 32, 1 Cor. vii. 12, 13. The word is also found in 1 Macc. i. 57 (iv. 28), 2 Macc. xi. 24, 35, signifying entire approval; it is also twice used by St. Clement, Cor., xxxv., 6; xliv., 3: "consent" does not express the force of the word—"was approving of his death" (Rendall).—ἀναιρέσει: used only here in N.T. (on St. Luke's favourite word ἀναιρέω, see Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 22); both verb and noun were frequent in medical language (Hobart, Zahn), see below on ix. 29, but the noun in LXX, Num. xi. 15, Judith xv. 4, 2 Macc. v. 13, and in classical Greek, e.g., Xen., Hell., vi., 3, 5.—ἐγένετο δὲ: another characteristic formula in St. Luke, Friedrich, u. s., p. 13; here introduces a new section of the history.—ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ: R.V. "on that day" (A.V. "at that time"), cf. ii. 41; the persecution broke out at once, "on that very day" (so Wendt, Rendall, Hort, Hackett, Felten, Zöckler, Holtzmann), the signal for it being given by the tumultuous stoning of the first martyr (but see on the other hand Alford, in loco). Weiss draws attention to the emphatic position of ἐκείνῃ before τῇ ἡμέρᾳ.—ἐπὶ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τὴν ἐν Ἱ.: hitherto as, e.g., v. 11, the Church has been thought of as one, because limited in fact to the one city Jerusalem, but here we have a hint that soon there would be new Ecclesiæ in the one Ecclesia, as it spread throughout the Holy Land (Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 53-56, 227, and Ramsay, St. Paul, etc., pp. 41, 127, 377).—πάντες τε: "ridiculum est hoc mathematica ratione accipere" (Blass)—it is evident from ver. 3 that there were some left for Saul to persecute. In ix. 26 we have mention of a company of disciples in Jerusalem, but there is no reason to suppose (Schneckenburger, Zeller, Overbeck) that Luke has made a mistake in the passage before us, for there is nothing in the text against the supposition that some at least of those who had fled returned again later.—διεσπάρησαν: only in St. Luke in N.T., here and in ver. 4, and in xi. 19. This use of the word is quite classical, and frequent in LXX, e.g., Gen. ix. 19, Lev. xxvi. 33, 1 Macc. xi. 47. Feine remarks that even Holtzmann allows that the spread of Christianity throughout Judæa and Samaria may be regarded as historical.—χώρας: here rendered "regions": Blass takes the word as almost = κώμας, and see also Plummer on Luke xxi. 21, ἐν ταῖς χώραις "in the country," R.V. The word is characteristic of St. Luke, being used in his Gospel nine times, and in Acts eight; it is used thrice by St. Matthew and by St. John, four times by St. Mark, but elsewhere in N.T. only once, James v. 4.

χώρας τῆς Ἰουδαίας καὶ Σαμαρείας, πλὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων.[1] 2. συνεκόμισαν δὲ τὸν Στέφανον ἄνδρες εὐλαβεῖς, καὶ ἐποιήσαντο

[1] Σαμαρειας ABCHP, so W.H. alt. App., p. 160, Blass, Weiss, Hilg.; Σαμαριας ℵDE, so Tisch., W.H., see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 45. After διωγμος D, Flor., Sah. και θλιψις, assim. to Matt. xiii. 21, 2 Thess. i. 4, so Hilg. The same addition occurs in Western text in xiii. 50. After αποστολων D[1], Flor., Gig., Prov., Sah., Aug. add οι εμειναν εν Ιερ., retained by Blass in β, so Belser, Beiträge, p. 49, and Hilg.

It is found frequently in LXX and in 1, 2, 3 Macc.—τῆς Ἰουδαίας καὶ Σαμαρείας: thus the historian makes another step in the fulfilment of the Lord's command, i. 8, and see also Ramsay, St. Paul, etc., p. 41. St. Chrysostom remarks ὅτι οἰκονομίας ὁ διωγμὸς ἦν, since the persecution became the means of spreading the Gospel, and thus early the blood of the martyrs became the seed of the Church.—πλὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων—πλήν: characteristic of St. Luke, sometimes as an adverb, sometimes as a preposition with genitive as here and in xv. 28, xxvii. 22; elsewhere it is only found once as a preposition with genitive, in Mark xii. 32, although very frequent in LXX. The word occurs at least thirteen times in the Gospel, four times in Acts, in St. Matthew five times, in St. Mark once, and in John viii. 10; see Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, pp. 16, 91. This mention of the Apostles seems unlikely to Schneckenburger, Schleiermacher, and others, but, as Wendt points out, it is quite consistent with the greater steadfastness of men who felt themselves to be πρωταγωνισταί, as Œcumenius calls them, in that which concerned their Lord. Their position too may well have been more secure than that of the Hellenists, who were identified with Stephen, as they were held in favour by the people, v. 13, and as regular attendants at the temple services would not have been exposed to the same charges as those directed against the proto-martyr. There was, too, a tradition (very old and well attested according to Harnack, Chronologie, i., 243) to the effect that the Apostles were commanded by Christ not to depart from Jerusalem for twelve years, so that none should say that he had not heard the message, Euseb., H. E., v., 18, 14; nor is there anything inconsistent with this tradition in the visit of St. Peter and St. John to Samaria, since this and other journeys are simply missionary excursions, from which the Apostles always returned to Jerusalem (Harnack). The passage in Clem. Alex., Strom., vi., 5, 43, limited the Apostles' preaching for the time specified not to Jerusalem, but to Israel.—Σαμαρείας: our Lord had recognised the barrier between the Samaritan and the Jew, Matt. x. 5; but now in obedience to His command (i. 8) both Samaritan and Jew were admitted to the Church, for although the Apostles had not originated this preaching they very plainly endorsed it, ver. 14 ff. (cf. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 54). Possibly the very fact that Philip and others were flying from the persecution of the Jewish hierarchy would have secured their welcome in the Samaritan towns.

Ver. 2. Spitta connects ver. 2 with xi. 19-21, and all the intermediate section, viii. 5-xi. 19; forms part of his source B (so also Sorof, Clemen, who joins his H.H., viii. 1 to xi. 19; but on the other hand see Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., p. 501 (1895), and Jüngst, Apostelgeschichte, p. 79). According to Spitta the whole narrative of Philip's ministry in viii. ought not to be connected so closely with the death of Stephen, but should fall after ix. 31. The only reason for its earlier insertion is the desire to connect the second deacon with the first (but Hilgenfeld, u. s., pp. 413, 414 (1895), as against both Spitta and Clemen, regards the account of Philip and that of Stephen as inseparable). Spitta strongly maintains that Philip the Apostle, and not the deacon, is meant; and if this be so, he would no doubt help us to answer the objection that in viii. 14-17, and indeed in the whole section 9-24 we have an addition of the sub-Apostolic age inserted to show that the Apostles alone could bestow the Holy Spirit. But it cannot be said that Spitta's attempt at the identification of Philip in viii. with the Apostle is in any way convincing, see, e.g., Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 212; Hilgenfeld, u. s., p. 416 (note), and Jüngst, u. s., p. 81. Feine's objection to viii. 14-17 leads him, whilst he admits that the meeting with Simon Magus is historical, to regard the conversion of the sorcerer as doubtful, because the whole passage presupposes κοπετὸν μέγαν ἐπ' αὐτῷ. 3. Σαῦλος δὲ ἐλυμαίνετο τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, κατὰ τοὺς οἴκους εἰσπορευόμενος, σύρων τε ἄνδρας καὶ γυναῖκας

(vv. 18-24) that the laying on of the Apostles' hands bestowed the Spirit; so Clemen refers the whole representation in its present form of the communication of the Spirit, not through Baptism, but through the laying on of the Apostles' hands, to his Redactor Antijudaicus (cf. xix. 6), and to the same hand he attributes the πλὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων, ver. 1, and cf. ver. 25, introduced for the purpose of showing that the Apostles Peter and John sanctioned the Samaritan mission from the central home of the Christian Church.—συνεκόμισαν: in its primary sense the verb means to carry or bring together, of harvest; to gather in, to house it; so also in LXX, Job v. 26; in a secondary sense, to help in burying; so Soph., Ajax, 1048; Plut., Sull., 38. The meaning is not "carried to his burial," as in A.V., but rather as R.V., "buried," for, although the Greek is properly "joined in carrying," the word includes the whole ceremony of burial—it is used only here in the N.T., and in LXX only in l. c.—εὐλαβεῖς: only found in St. Luke in N.T., and used by him four times, once in Luke ii. 25, and in Acts ii. 5, xxii. 12 (εὐσεβής, T.R.). The primary thought underlying the word is that of one who handles carefully and cautiously, and so it bears the meaning of cautious, circumspect. Although εὐλάβεια and εὐλαβεῖσθαι are both used in the sense of caution and reverence towards the gods in classical Greek, the adjective is never expressly so used. But Plato connects it closely with δίκαιος (cf. Luke ii. 25), Polit. 311 A and 311 B (so εὐσεβῶς and εὐλαβῶς are used together by Demosthenes). In the LXX all three words are found to express reverent fear of, or piety towards, God; εὐλαβεῖσθαι, frequently, εὐλάβεια in Prov. xxviii. 14, where σκληρὸς τὴν καρδίαν in the second part of the verse seems to point to the religious character of the εὐλαβ., whilst εὐλαβής is found in Micah vii. 2 as a rendering of חָסִיד (cf. Psalms of Solomon, p. 36, Ryle and James' edition); cf. also Ecclus. xi. 17 (but see for both passages, Hatch and Redpath); in Lev. xv. 31 we find the word εὐλαβεῖς ποιήσετε τοὺς υἱοὺς Ἰ. ἀπὸ τῶν ἀκαθαρσιῶν αὐτῶν, נָזַר hi. The adverb εὐλαβῶς is found once, 2 Macc. vi. 11. St. Luke uses the word chiefly at all events of O.T. piety. In Luke ii. 45 it is used of Simeon, in Acts ii. 5 of the Jews who came up to worship at the feasts in Jerusalem, and in xxii. 12, although Ananias was a Christian, yet the qualifying words εὐλ. κατὰ τὸν νόμον point again to a devout observance of the Jewish law. Trench, N. T. Synonyms, i., pp. 38, 198 ff.; Westcott, Hebrews, on v. 7; Grimm-Thayer, sub v., and sub v. δειλία.—ἄνδρες εὐλ.: much discussion has arisen as to whether they were Jews or Christians. They may have been Christians who like the Apostles themselves were still Jews, attending the temple services and hours of prayer, some of whom were doubtless left in the city. But these would have been described more probably as ἀδελφοί or μαθηταί (so Felten, Page, Hackett). Or they may have been devout Jews like Nicodemus, or Joseph of Arimathea, who would show their respect for Stephen, as Nicodemus and Joseph for Jesus (so Holtzmann, Zöckler). Wetstein (so too Renan and Blass) explains of Gentile proselytes, men like Cornelius, who rendered the last offices to Stephen out of natural respect for the dead, and who stood outside the jurisdiction of the Sanhedrim, so that the funeral rites need not have been performed in secret. But St. Luke as a rule uses other words to denote Gentile proselytes, and the Sanhedrim would probably not have interfered with the burial, not only on account of the known Jewish care for the dead, but also because devout Jews would not have been obnoxious in their eyes to the charges brought against Stephen, vi. 14 (so Nösgen). The word might therefore include both devout Jews and Jewish Christians who joined together in burying Stephen.—κοπετὸν μέγαν, from κόπτω, κόπτομαι, cf. planctus from plango, to beat the breast or head in lamentation. Not used elsewhere in N.T., but frequent in LXX; cf., e.g., Gen. l. 10, 1 Macc. ii. 70, iv. 39, ix. 20, xiii. 26, for the same allocation as here, and for ποιῆσαι κοπετόν, Jer. vi. 26, Mic. i. 8, and cf. also Zech. xii. 10. In classical Greek κομμός is found, but see Plut., Fab., 17, and Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 74, for reference to the comic poet Eupolis (cf. also Blass), and Grimm-Thayer, sub v. For the Jewish customs of mourning cf. Matt. ix. 23, Hamburger, Real-Encyclo-

παρεδίδου εἰς φυλακήν. 4. οἱ μὲν οὖν διασπαρέντες διῆλθον, εὐαγγελιζόμενοι τὸν λόγον.[1]

[1] διηλθον; for this word Gig., Par., Wern. seem to have read επορευοντο, ibant. After λογον Par., Wern. and other Latin authorities add "circa (per) civitates et castella Judææ," κατα τας πολεις και κωμας της Ι., Blass in β, evidently for the sake of clearness, as also in previous επορ., cf. Wendt. After λογον E, Vulg., Par², Wern. add του θεου, again addition apparently for clearness (if not omission). Blass rejects in β; where ὁ λόγος is used in Acts in this sense we almost always have this addition or του Κυριου.

pädie des Judentums, i., 7, 996, "Trauer"; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i., p. 616, and Sketches of Jewish Social Life, p. 172 ff. If the mourners included Jews as well as Jewish Christians, it may well have been that the lamentation was not only a token of sorrow and respect, but also in the nature of a protest on the part of the more moderate section of the Pharisees (see also Trench's remarks, u. s., p. 198). According to the tradition accepted by St. Augustine, it is said that both Gamaliel and Nicodemus took part in the burial of Stephen, and were afterwards laid in the same grave (Felten, Apostelgeschichte, p. 167, and Plumptre in loco).

Ver. 3. ἐλυμαίνετο: deponent verb, used in classical Greek of personal outrage (λύμη), of scourging and torturing, of outraging the dead, of the ruin and devastation caused by an army (Wetstein). In the LXX it is found several times, cf. especially Ps. lxxix. (lxxx.) 13, of a wild boar ravaging a vineyard, and cf. also Ecclus. xxviii. 23. As the word is used only by St. Luke it is possible that it may have been suggested by its frequent employment in medical language, where it is employed not only of injury by wrong treatment, but also of the ravages of disease, Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 211, 212. R.V. renders "laid waste," A.V. (so Tyndale) "made havoc of," but the revisers have rendered πορθέω by the latter, cf. Acts ix. 21, Gal. i. 3. St. Paul's description of himself as ὑβριστής, 1 Tim. i. 13, may well refer to the infliction of personal insults and injuries, as expressed here by λυμαίνομαι (cf. Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, xi., 5).—τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, i.e., the Church just mentioned at Jerusalem—Saul's further persecution, even to Damascus, probably came later (Hort, Ecclesia, p. 53).—κατὰ τοὺς οἴκους εἰσπορ.: the expression may denote "entering into every house," R. and A.V., or perhaps, more specifically, the houses known as places of Christian assembly, the ἐκκλησίαι κατ' οἶκον, see on ii. 46. In any case the words, as also those which follow, show the thoroughness and relentlessness of Saul's persecuting zeal.—σύρων: haling, i.e., hauling, dragging (schlappend), cf. James ii. 6. The word is used by St. Luke three times in Acts (only twice elsewhere in N.T.), and he alone uses κατασύρω, Luke xii. 58, in the same sense as the single verb (where St. Matthew has παραδῷ). For its employment in the Comic Poets see Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 76, and also Arrian, Epict., i. 29, 22, and other instances in Wetstein; cf. LXX, 2 Sam. xvii. 13, 4 Macc. vi. 1, ἔσυραν ἐπὶ τὰ βασανιστήρια τὸν 'Ελ.—γυναῖκας: repeated also in ix. 2, and xxii. 4, as indicating the relentless nature of the persecution. Some of the devout and ministering women may well have been included, Luke viii. 2, 3, Acts i. 14.

Ver. 4. οἱ μὲν οὖν: marking a general statement, δὲ in following verse, introducing a particular instance (so Rendall, Appendix on μὲν οὖν, Acts, p. 162, and see also p. 64).—διῆλθον: the word is constantly used of missionary journeys in Acts, cf. v. 40, xi. 19, ix. 32 (Luke ix. 6), cf. xiii. 6, note.—εὐαγγελιζόμενοι: it is a suggestive fact that this word is only used once in the other Gospels (Matt. xi. 5 by our Lord), but no less than ten times in St. Luke's Gospel, fifteen in Acts, and chiefly elsewhere by St. Paul; truly "a missionary word," see ver. 12. Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 79, speaks of its introduction into the N.T. with "such a novel force as to be felt like a new word". It is used several times in LXX, and is also found in Psalms of Solomon, xi., 2 (cf. Isa. xl. 9, lii. 7, and Nah. i. 15). On its construction see Simcox, u. s., p. 79, and Vogel, p. 24.

Ver. 5. Φίλιππος δὲ: the Evangelist, cf. xxi. 8, and note on vi. 5.—εἰς πόλιν: if we insert the article (see above on critical notes), the expression means "the city of Samaria," i.e., the capital of the district (so Weiss, Wendt, Weiss, Codex D, p. 68, expresses surprise at this rejection by Blass, as the reading is not more superfluous than countless additions in D; the words already lay in the following εν τω ακουειν αυτους. Chase refers to Syriac with considerable probability.

Zöckler, see Blass, in loco), or Sebaste, so called by Herod the Great in honour of Augustus, Σεβαστή (Jos., Ant., xv., 7, 3; 8, 5; Strabo, xvi., p. 860), see Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. 1, p. 123 ff., E.T., and O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 93.—ἐκήρυσσεν: the revisers distinguish between this verb and εὐαγγελ. in ver. 4, the latter being rendered "preaching," or more fully, preaching the glad tidings, and the former "proclaimed" (see also Page's note on the word, p. 131), but it is doubtful if we can retain this full force of the word always, e.g., Luke iv. 44, where R.V. translates κηρύσσων, "preaching".—αὐτοῖς, i.e., the people in the city mentioned, see Blass, Grammatik, p. 162, and cf. xvi. 10, xx. 2.

Ver. 6. προσεῖχον . . . τοῖς λεγ., cf. xvi. 14, 1 Tim. i. 4, Tit. i. 14, 2 Pet. i. 9, see note on v. 35, used in classical Greek sometimes with νοῦν, and sometimes without as here; frequent in LXX, cf. with this passage, Wisdom viii. 12, 1 Macc. vii. 12.—ὁμοθυμαδόν, see above on i. 14.

Ver. 7. πολλῶν γὰρ κ.τ.λ.: if we accept reading in R.V. (see critical notes above), we must suppose that St. Luke passes in thought from the possessed to the unclean spirits by which they were possessed, and so introduces the verb ἐξήρχοντο (as if the unclean spirits were themselves the subject), whereas we should have expected that ἐθεραπεύθησαν would have followed after the first πολλοί, as after the second, in the second clause of the verse. Blass conjectures that ἃ should be read before βοῶντα, which thus enables him, while retaining ἐξήρχοντο, to make πολλοί in each clause of the verse the subject of ἐθεραπ. One of the most striking phenomena in the demonised was that they lost at least temporarily their own self-consciousness, and became identified with the demon or demons, and this may account for St. Luke's way of writing, as if he also identified the two in thought, Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i., 479, 647, ff. As a physician St. Luke must have often come into contact with those who had unclean spirits, and he would naturally have studied closely the nature of their disease. It is also to be noted that πολλοί with the genitive, τῶν ἐχόντων (not πολλοὶ ἔχοντες), shows that not all the possessed were healed, and if so, it is an indication of the truthfulness of the narrative. Moreover, St. Luke not only shows himself acquainted with the characteristics of demoniacal possession, cf. his description in Luke viii. 27, ix. 38, 39, but he constantly, as in the passage before us, distinguishes it from disease itself, and that more frequently than the other Evangelists. Hobart draws special attention to Luke vi. 17, viii. 4, xiii. 32, which have no parallels in the other Gospels, and Acts xix. 12. To which we may add Luke iv. 40, Acts v. 16 (Wendt); see further on xix. 12.—βοῶντα, cf. Mark i. 26, Luke iv. 33.—παραλελυμένοι: St. Luke alone of the Evangelists uses the participle of παρα- ἐθεραπεύθησαν.[1] 8. καὶ ἐγένετο χαρὰ μεγάλη[2] ἐν τῇ πόλει ἐκείνῃ. 9. Ἀνὴρ δέ τις ὀνόματι Σίμων προϋπῆρχεν[3] ἐν τῇ πόλει μαγεύων καὶ

[2] χαρα μεγαλη DEHP, Vulgclem., Syr. Harcl., Arm., Chrys.; πολλη χαρα ℵABC 47, 61, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; χαρα τε μεγαλη εγενετο, so Gig., Par., Syr. Pesh., Blass in β, and Hilg. χαρα often joined with μεγ. elsewhere in N.T.; cf. Luke ii. 10, xxiv. 52, Acts xv. 3.

[3] προϋπηρχεν . . . εξιστων, D reads προϋπαρχων . . . εξιστανεν; Par., Vulg., Iren. also read προυπαρχων, so Hilg. Σαμαρειας, see on ver. 1. μεγαν, "delevi," so Blass on the authority of some codices of Iren. see comment. below.

λύειν, instead of παραλυτικός, the more popular word; and here again his usage is exactly what we should expect from a medical man acquainted with technical terms (Hobart, Zahn, Salmon), cf. ix. 33 and Luke v. 18, 24 (παραλυτικῷ, W.H. margin). Dr. Plummer, St. Luke, Introd., lxv., points out that Aristotle, a physician's son, has also this use of παραλελυμένος (Eth. Nic., i., 13, 15), but he adds that its use in St. Luke may have come from the LXX, as in Heb. xii. 12, where we have the word in a quotation from Isa. xxxv. 3 (cf. also Ecclesiast. xxv. 23). It may be added that the participle is also found in 3 Macc. ii. 22, καὶ τοῖς μέλεσι παραλελυμένον, and cf. 1 Macc. ix. 15, where it is said of Alcimus, καὶ παρελύθη. But the most remarkable feature in St. Luke's employment of the word is surely this, that in parallel passages in which St. Matthew and St. Mark have παραλυτικός he has παραλελυμένος, cf. Luke v. 18, Matt. ix. 2, Mark ii. 3; in Luke v. 24 this same distinction is also found in the Revisers' text (but see W.H. above), when this verse is compared with Matt. ix. 6 and Mark ii. 10.

Ver. 8. This detail, and indeed the whole narrative, may have been derived by St. Luke from the information of St. Philip himself, cf. xxi. 8, xxiv. 27, or from St. Paul as he travelled through Samaria, xv. 3.

Ver. 9. Σίμων: very few of the most advanced critics now dismiss Simon as an unhistorical character, or deny that the account before us contains at least some historical data; see McGiffert's note, Apostolic Age, p. 100. Hilgenfeld and Lipsius may be reckoned amongst those who once refused to admit that Simon Magus was an historical personage, but who afterwards retracted their opinion. But it still remains almost unaccountable that so many critics should have more or less endorsed, or developed, the theory first advocated by Baur that the Simon Magus of the Clementine Homilies is none other than the Apostle Paul. It is sufficient to refer for an exposition of the absurdity of this identification to Dr. Salmon "Clementine Literature" (Dict. of Christ. Biog., iii., pp. 575, 576; see also Ritschl's note, Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, p. 228 (second edition)). This ingenuity outdid itself in asking us to see in Simon's request to buy the power of conferring the Holy Ghost a travesty of the rejection of Paul's apostolic claims by the older Apostles, in spite of the gift of money which he had collected for the poor Saints in Jerusalem (Overbeck). No wonder that Spitta should describe such an explanation as "a perfect absurdity" (Apostelgeschichte, p. 149). Before we can believe that the author of the Acts would make any use of the pseudo-Clementine literature in his account of Simon, we must account for the extraordinary fact that an author who so prominently represents his hero as triumphing over the powers of magic, xiii. 6-12, xix. 11-19, should have recourse to a tradition in which this same hero is identified with a magician (see Spitta, u. s., p. 151; Salmon, "The Simon of Modern Criticism," Dict. of Christian Biog., iv., p. 687; Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 212, and Wendt's note, p. 201). In Acts xxi. 8 we read that St. Luke spent several days in the house of Philip the Evangelist, and if we bear in mind that this same Philip is so prominent in chap. viii., there is nothing impossible in the belief that St. Luke should have received his narrative from St. Philip's lips, and included it in his history as an early and remarkable instance of the triumph of the Gospel—we need not search for any more occult reason on the part of the historian (see Salmon, u. s., p. 688). Simon then is an historical personage, and it is not too much to say that to all the stories which have gathered round his name the narrative of

10. ᾧ προσεῖχον πάντες[1] ἀπὸ μικροῦ ἕως μεγάλου, λέγοντες, Οὗτός

[1] παντες ℵABCDE 61, Vulg., many other verss., Chrys., so all edd.; om. HP, Aethpp., Iren.; Blass brackets: "nec opus".

Acts always stands in a relation of priority—the two facts mentioned in Acts, that Simon was a magician, and that he came into personal antagonism with St. Peter, always recur elsewhere—but Acts tells us nothing of the details of Simon's heretical preaching, and it draws the veil entirely over his subsequent history. But "the hero of the romance of heresy" comes into prominence under the name of Simon in Justin Martyr, Apol., i., 26, Irenæus, i., 23 (who speaks of Simon the Samaritan, from whom all heresies had their being), and in the Clementine literature. But there is good reason for thinking that St. Irenæus, whilst he gives us a fuller account, is still giving us an account dependent on Justin, and there is every reason to believe that the Clementine writers also followed the same authority; see further, Salmon, "Simon Magus," u. s., iv., p. 681 ff., and for a summary of the legends which gathered round the name of the Samaritan magician Plumptre's note, in loco, may be consulted. To the vexed question as to the identification of the Simon of Justin with the Simon of the Acts Dr. Salmon returns a decided negative answer, u. s., p. 683, and certainly the Simon described by Justin seems to note rather the inheritor and teacher of a Gnostic system already developed than to have been in his own person the father of Gnosticism. Simon, however, was no uncommon name, e.g., Josephus, Ant., xx., 7, 2, speaks of a Simon of Cyprus, whom there is no valid reason to identify with the Simon of the Acts (although famous critical authorities may be quoted in favour of such an identification). On the mistake made by Justin with reference to the statue on the Tiberine island with the words Semoni Sanco Deo Fidio inscribed (cf. the account of the marble fragment, apparently the base of a statue, dug up in 1574, marked with a similar inscription, in Lanciani's Pagan and Christian Rome) in referring it to Simon Magus, Apol., i., 26, 56, Tertullian, Apol., c. xiii., and Irenæus, i., 23, whilst in reality it referred to a Sabine god, Semo Sancus, the Sabine Hercules, see further, Salmon, u. s., p. 682, Rendall, Acts, p. 220. (Van Manen, followed by Feine, claims to discover two representations of Simon in Acts—one as an ordinary magician, viii. 9, 11, the other as a supposed incarnation of the deity, ver. 10—so too Jüngst, who refers the words from μαγεύων to Σαμαρίας to his Redactor; but on the other hand Hilgenfeld and Spitta see no contradiction, and regard the narrative as a complete whole.)—μαγεύων: only here in N.T., not found in LXX (but cf. μάγος in Dan. i. 20, ii. 2), though used in classical Greek. The word μάγος was used frequently by Herodotus of the priests and wise men in Persia who interpreted dreams, and hence the word came to denote any enchanter or wizard, and in a bad sense, a juggler, a quack like γόης (see instances in Wetstein). Here (cf. xiii. 6) it is used of the evil exercise of magic and sorcery by Simon, who practised the charms and incantations so extensively employed at the time in the East by quacks claiming supernatural powers (Baur, Paulus, i., p. 107; Neander, Geschichte der Pflanzung, cf. i., 84, 85 (fifth edit.); Wendt, Apostelgeschichte, p. 202; Blass, in loco; Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 19, and see below on xiii. 6.—ἐξιστῶν, from ἐξιστάω (ἐξίστημι); so ἐξιστάνων, W. H. from ἐξιστάνω (hellenistic), see Blass, Grammatik, pp. 48, 49, transitive in present, future, first aorist active, cf. Luke xxiv. 22—so ἐξεστακέναι, ver. 11, perfect active, hellenistic form, also transitive; see Blass, u. s. (also Winer-Schmiedel, p. 118, and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.) (in 3 Macc. i. 25 ἐξιστάνειν also occurs).—ἵσταμαι, intransitive, ver. 13, Blass, u. s., p. 49—the revisers have consistently rendered the verb by the same English word in the three verses 9, 11, 13, thus giving point and force to the narrative, see on ver. 13.—λέγων κ.τ.λ., cf. v. 36 Blass, Grammatik, p. 174, regards μέγαν as an interpolation, and it is not found in the similar phrase in v. 36 (so too Winer-Schmiedel, p. 243), cf. Gal. ii. 6, and vi. 3, and the use of the Latin aliquis, Cicero, Att., iii., 15, so too vii. 3, etc. It may be that Simon set himselt up for a Messiah (see Ritschl's note, p. 228, Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, second edition), or a Prophet, Jos.,

Ant., xviii., 4, 1, but ver. 14 points to a definite title, and it is likely enough that the people would repeat what Simon had told them of himself. His later followers went further and made him say, "Ego sum sermo Dei, ego sum speciosus, ego paraclitus, ego omnipotens, ego omnia Dei" Jerome, Commentar. in Matt., c. xx., 24 (Neander, Geschichte der Pflanzung, cf. i., 85, note).—ἑαυτὸν: contrast Philip's attitude; he preached Christ, not himself (cf. Rev. ii. 20).

Ver. 10. ἡ δύναμις τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ μεγάλη: in R.V. the power of God which is called (καλουμένη) Great, see above, critical notes. T.R. may have omitted the word because it appeared unsuitable to the context; but it could not have been used in a depreciatory sense by the Samaritans, as if to intimate that the person claimed was the so-called "Great," since they also gave heed to Simon. On the other hand it has been argued that the title "Great" is meaningless in this relation, for every divine power might be described by the same epithet (so Wendt, in loco, and Blass: "mirum maxime ἡ καλ. quasi δύναμις Θ. μικρά quoque esse possit". This difficulty leads Blass in his notes to introduce the solution proposed by Klostermann, Probleme im Aposteltexte, pp. 15-20 (1883), and approved by Wendt, Zöckler, Spitta, and recently by Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., ii. 420; see also Salmon's remarks in Hermathena, xxi., p. 232), viz., that μεγάλη is not a translation of the attribute "great" רַב, but rather a transcription of the Samaritan word מגלי or מגלא meaning qui revelat (cf. Hebrew גָּלָה, Chaldean גְּלָא גְּלָה, to reveal). The explanation would then be that in contrast to the hidden essence of the Godhead, Simon was known as its revealing power. Nestle however (see Knabenbauer in loco) objects on the ground that καλουμένη is not read at all in many MSS. But apart from Klostermann's explanation the revised text might fairly mean that amongst the "powers" of God (cf. the N.T. use of the word δυνάμεις in Rom. viii. 38, 1 Peter iii. 22, and cf. Book of Enoch lxi. 10) Simon was emphatically the one which is called great, i.e., the one prominently great or divine. The same title was assigned to him in later accounts, cf. Irenæus, i., 23 (Clem. Hom., ii., 22; Clem. Recog., i., 72; ii., 7; Tertullian, De Præscr., xlvi.; Origen, c. Celsum, v.). But whatever the claims made by Simon himself, or attributed to him by his followers, we need not read them into the words before us. The expression might mean nothing more than that Simon called himself a great (or revealing) angel of God, since by the Samaritans the angels were regarded as δυνάμεις, powers of God (cf. Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i., 402, note 4, and De Wette, Apostelgeschichte, p. 122, fourth edition). Such an explanation is far more probable than the attribution to the Samaritans of later Gnostic and philosophical beliefs, while it is a complete answer to Overbeck, who argues that as the patristic literature about Simon presupposes the emanation theories of the Gnostics so the expression in the verse before us must be explained in the same way, and that thus we have a direct proof that the narrative is influenced by the Simon legend. We may however readily admit that Simon's teaching may have been a starting-point for the later Gnostic developments, and so far from ver. 10 demanding a Gnostic system as a background, we may rather see in it a glimpse of the genesis of the beliefs which afterwards figure so prominently in the Gnostic schools (Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, in loco, and p. 186, and see McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 99, and "Gnosticism," Dict. of Christ. Biog., ii., 680). On the close connection between the Samaritans and Egypt and the widespread study of sorcery amongst the Egyptian Samaritans see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, pp. 18, 19. In Hadrian's letter to Servianus we find the Samaritans in Egypt described, like the Jews and Christians there, as all astrologers, sooth-sayers and quacks (Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 230 E.T.).: no doubt an exaggeration, as Deissmann says, but still a proof that amongst these Egyptian Samaritans magic and its kindred arts were widely known. In a note on p. 19 Deissmann gives an interesting parallel to Acts viii. 10, ἐπικαλοῦμαί σε τὴν μεγίστην δύναμιν τὴν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ (ἄλλοι· τὴν ἐν τῇ ἄρκτῳ) ὑπὸ Κυρίου Θεοῦ τεταγμένην (Pap. Par. Bibl. nat., 1275 ff.; Wessely, i., 76) (and he also compares Gospel of Peter, ver. 19, ἡ δύναμίς μου (2)). The expression according to him will thus have passed from its use amongst the Samaritans into the Zauber-litteratur of Egypt.

Ver. 11. ἱκανῷ χρόνῳ: dative for accusative, cf. xiii. 20, and perhaps Luke viii. 29, Rom. xvi. 25—the usage is not classical, Blass, Grammatik, p. 118, but see also Winer-Moulton, xxxi. 9 a. St. Luke alone uses ἱκανός with χρόνος, both in his Gospel and in Acts (Vogel, Klostermann).—μαγείαις: only here in N.T., not found in LXX or Apocryphal books, but used in Theophrastus and Plutarch, also in Josephus. It is found in a striking passage in St. Ignatius (Ephes., xix., 3) in reference to the shining forth of the star at the Incarnation, ὅθεν ἐλύετο πᾶσα μαγεία καὶ πᾶς δεσμός, and it is also mentioned, Didache, v., 1, amongst the things comprised under "the way of death," and so in ii. 1 we read οὐ μαγεύσεις οὐ φαρμακεύσεις.—ἐξεστακέναι, see above on ver. 9.

Ver. 12. εὐαγγελ. περὶ: only here with περί, cf. Rom. i. 3 (Jos., Ant., xv., 7, 2). Amongst the Samaritans Philip would have found a soil already prepared for his teaching, cf. John iv. 25, and a doctrine of the Messiah, in whom the Samaritans saw not only a political but a religious renewer, and one in whom the promise of Deut. xviii. 15 would be fulfilled (Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i., 402, 403; Westcott, Introduction to the Study of the Gospels, pp. 162, 163).—ἄνδρες τε καὶ γυναῖκες, cf. v. 14: "etiam mulieres quae a superstitionibus difficilius abstrahuntur," Wetstein, cf. John iv. 35 ff.

Ver. 13. καὶ αὐτὸς: characteristic of St. Luke, see Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 37.—βαπτισθεὶς—ἐβαπτίσθη ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐφωτίσθη (St. Cyril).—ἦν προσκαρτερῶν: on ἦν with a participle as characteristic of St. Luke see on i. 10, and Friedrich, u. s., p. 12; on προσκαρτ. see on i. 14. Here with dative of the person (cf. x. 7); the whole expression shows how assiduously Simon attached himself to Philip.—θεωρῶν: the faith of Simon rested on the outward miracles and signs, a faith which ended in amazement, ἐξίστατο—but it was no permanent abiding faith, just as the amazement which he had himself inspired in others gave way before a higher and more convincing belief. The expression δυνάμεις μεγάλας may have been purposely chosen; hitherto men had seen in Simon, and he himself had claimed to be, ἡ δύν. ἡ μεγάλη (Weiss).—ἐξίστατο: "Simon qui alios obstupefaciebat, jam ipse obstupescit," Wetstein. ἐξίσταμαι, intransitive, Blass, Grammatik, p. 49. Irenæus speaks of him as one who pretended faith, i. 23 (so too St. Cyril, St. Chrysostom, St. Jerome, St. Ambrose): he may have believed in the Messianic dignity of Christ, and in His Death and Resurrection, constrained by the miracles which Philip wrought in attestation of his preaching, but it was a belief about the facts, and not a belief in Him whom the facts made known, a belief in the power of the new faith, but not an acceptance of its holiness, ver. 18 (see further, Rendall's note in loco, and on the Baptism of Simon, "Baptism," in Hastings' B.D.).

Ver. 14. ἡ Σαμ.: here the district; Weiss traces the revising hand of St. Luke (but see on the other hand Wendt, in loco). There is nothing surprising in the fact that the preaching of the Gospel in the town should be regarded by the Apostles at Jerusalem as a proof that the good news had penetrated throughout the district, or that the people of the town should themselves have spread the Gospel amongst their countrymen (cf. John iv. 28).—δέδεκται τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θ.: the phrase is characteristic of St. Luke, as it is used by him, Luke viii. 13, Acts xi. 1, xvii. 11, but not by the other Evangelists—it is found once in St. Paul, 1 Thess. i. 6 (cf. ii. 13 and James i. 21). In the mention of John here, as in iii. 4, Weiss can only see the hand of a reviser, since the beloved disciple is mentioned with Peter in a way for which, as Weiss alleges, no reason can be assigned, iii. 4, 11, iv. 13; but nothing was more likely than that Peter and John should be associated together here as previously in the Gospels, see Plumptre's note on Acts iii. 1.

Ver. 15. οἵτινες: on this form of the relative see Rendall, in loco; Blass however regards it as simply = οἵ, Grammatik, p. 169, cf. xii. 10.—καταβάντες, cf. xxiv. 1 (Luke ii. 42), xi. 2, xxi. 12, 15. Wendt defends the historical character of this journey to Samaria as against Zeller and Overbeck.—προσηύξαντο περὶ: here only with περί; the verb is characteristic of St. Luke, and he alone has the construction used in this verse, cf. Luke vi. 28, W.H. The exact phrase is found in St. Paul's Epistles four or five times (and once in Hebrews), but often in LXX, and cf. Baruch i., 11, 13; 2 Macc. i. 6, xv. 14. The laying on of hands, as in vi. 7 and xiii. 3, is here preceded by prayer, see Hooker, Eccles. Pol., v., chap. lxvi., 1-4.—ὅπως λάβωσι Πν. Ἅγιον: the words express the chief and highest object of the Apostles' visit: it was not only to ascertain the genuineness of the conversions, or to form a connecting link between the Church of Samaria and that of Jerusalem, although such objects might not have been excluded in dealing with an entirely new and strange state of things —the recognition of the Samaritans in a common faith. It has been argued with great force that the expression Holy Spirit is not meant here in its dogmatic Pauline sense; Luke only means to include in it the ecstatic gifts of speaking with tongues and prophecy. This view is held to be supported by ἰδών in ver. 18, intimating that outward manifestations which meet the eye must have shown themselves, and by the fact that the same verb, ἐπέπεσε, is used in cases where the results which follow plainly show that the reception of the Holy Ghost meant a manifestation of the outward marvellous signs such as marked the day of Pentecost, x. 44, 46, xi. 15 (cf. xix. 6). In the case of these Samaritans no such signs from heaven had followed their baptism, and the Apostles prayed for a conspicuous divine sanction on the reception of the new converts (Wendt, Zöckler, Holtzmann, and see also Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 54, 55). But even supposing that the reception of the Holy Ghost could be thus limited, the gift of tongues was no mere magical power, but the direct result of a super natural Presence and of a special grace—of that Presence speaking with tongues, prophesyings, and various gifts, 1 Cor. xiv. 1, 14, 37, were no doubt the outward manifestations, but they could not have been manifested apart from that Presence, and they were outward visible signs oı an inward spiritual grace. In a book so marked by the working of the Holy Spirit that it has received the name of the "Gospel of the Spirit" it is difficult to believe that St. Luke can mean to limit the expression λαμβάνειν here and in the following verse to anything less than a bestowal of that divine indwelling of the spirit which makes the Christian the temple of God, and which St. Paul speaks of in the very same terms as a permanent possession, Gal. iii. 2, Rom. viii. 15 (Gore, Church and the Ministry, p. 258). St. Paul's language, 1 Cor. xii. 30, makes it plain that the advent of the Holy Spirit was not of necessity attested by any peculiar manifestations, nor were these manifestations essential accompaniments of it: "Do all speak with tongues?" he asks, "Are all prophets?" See further on ver. 17.

Ver. 16. ἐπιπεπτωκός: the verb is characteristic of St. Luke, and used by him both in his Gospel and in Acts of the occurrence of extraordinary conditions, e.g., the sudden influence of the Spirit, cf. Luke i. 12, Acts x. 44, xi. 15, xix. 17, cf. Rev. xi. 11 (Acts x. 10 cannot be supported, and in xiii. 11 read ἔπεσεν). Similar usage in LXX, Exod. xv. 16, 1 Sam. xxvi. 12, Ps. liv. 4, Judith ii. 28, xi. 11, etc. Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 41

For the word as used by St. Luke in another sense also characteristic of him, see below on xx. 37, and Plummer on xv. 20. On the formula of baptism see above p. 91, and "Baptism," B.D.², p. 352, and Hastings' B.D.—ὑπῆρχον here perhaps = "made a beginning," took the first step (Lumby).

Ver. 17. There cannot be any reason to doubt the validity of St. Philip's baptism, and it is therefore evident that the laying on of hands (cf. xix. 6) is here distinct from baptism, and also from the appointment to any Church office (as in vi. 6, xiii. 3), or the bestowal of any special power of healing as in the person of Ananias, ix. 12, 17, although gifts of healing might no doubt accompany it. But both here and in xix. 6 (cf. Heb. vi. 2) it follows closely upon baptism, and is performed by Apostles, to whom alone the function belongs, although it is reasonable to suppose that the prophets and teachers who were associated with them in their Apostolic office, and who could lay on hands in Acts xiii. 1-3, could do so in other cases also for the reception of the Holy Ghost (Gore, Church and the Ministry, p. 258). The question why St. Philip did not himself "lay hands" upon his converts has been variously discussed, but the narrative of Acts supplies the answer, inasmuch as in the only two parallel cases, viz., the verse before us and xix. 6, the higher officers alone exercise this power, and also justifies the usual custom of the Church in so limiting its exercise ("Confirmation," Dict. of Christian Antiq. (Smith & Cheetham), i., p. 425; B.D.¹, iii., App.; and Hooker, Eccles. Pol., v., ch. lxvi. 5, and passage cited; Jerome, Advers. Lucif., c. 4, and St. Cyprian, Epis. 73, ad Jubaianum (reference to the passage before us)). Undoubtedly there are cases of baptism, Acts iii. 41, xvi. 15, 33, where no reference is made to the subsequent performance of this rite, but in these cases it must be remembered that the baptiser was an Apostle, and that when this was the case its observance might fairly be assumed. For the special case of Cornelius see below on x. 44, see further "Confirmation," B.D.², i., 640. Weizsäcker contrasts this account in viii., v. 16, which he describes as this crude conception of the communication of the Spirit solely by the imposition of the Apostles' hands (Apostolic Age, ii., 254 and 299, E.T.), and which represents baptism as being thus completed, with the account of baptism given us by St. Paul in 1 Cor. i. 14-17. But in the first place we should remember that Acts does not describe baptism as being completed by the laying on of hands; the baptism was not invalid, the Samaritan converts became by its administration members of the Church; and the laying on of hands was not so much a completion of baptism as an addition to it. And, in the next place, Heb. vi. 2 certainly indicates that this addition must have been known at a very early period (see Westcott, in loco). It may also be borne in mind that 2 Cor. i. 21 is interpreted of confirmation by many of the Fathers (cf. too Westcott's interpretation of 1 John ii. 20, 27), and that St. Paul is writing a letter and not describing a ritual.—ἐλάμβανον: Dr. Hort, who holds that the reception of the Holy Spirit is here explained as in x. 44 by reference to the manifestation of the gift of tongues, etc., points out that the verb is not ἔλαβον, but imperfect ἐλάμβανον, and he therefore renders it "showed a succession of signs of the Spirit" (see also above). But this interpretation need not conflict with the belief in the gift of the Spirit as a permanent possession, and it is well to remember that ἐπετίθεσαν (ἐπετίθουν) is also imperfect. Both verbs may therefore simply indicate the continuous administration of the laying on of hands by the Apostles, and the continuous supernatural result (not necessarily external manifestation) which followed upon this action; cf. ἐβαπτίζοντο in ver. 12, imperfect, and so in xviii. 8.

Ver. 18. θεασάμενος: the word would seem to point on (so ἰδών, see critical notes) to some outward manifestation of the inward grace of the Spirit, so Weiss, Wendt, Zöckler; so Felten, although he does not of course limit the reception of the Holy Spirit to such outward evidences of His Presence. The word may further give us an insight into Simon's character and belief—the gift of the Spirit was valuable to him in its external manifestation, in so far, that is, as it presented itself to ocular demonstration as a higher power than his own magic.—διὰ τῆς ἐπιθ. τῶν χ. τῶν ἀποστ., see above on ver. 17, cf. διά, "the laying on of hands" was the instrument by which the Holy Ghost was given in this instance: "Church," Hastings' B.D., i., 426.—προσήνεγκεν αὐτοῖς χρήματα: Simon was right in so far as he regarded the gift of the Spirit as an ἐξουσία to be bestowed, but entirely wrong in supposing that such a power could be obtained without an inward disposition of the heart, as anything might be bought for gold in external commerce. So De Wette, Apostelgeschichte, p. 124 (fourth edition), and he adds: "This is the fundamental error in 'Simony,' which is closely connected with unbelief in the power and meaning of the Spirit, and with materialism" (see also Alford in loco). (See further on "Simony," Luckock, Footprints of the Apostles as traced by St. Luke, i., 208.) Probably Simon, after the manner of the time, cf. xix. 19, may already have purchased secrets from other masters of the magical arts, and thought that a similar purchase could now be effected.

Ver. 19. ἵνα ᾧ ἐὰν ἐπιθῶ: "that on whomsoever I lay my hands," i.e., quite apart from any profession of faith or test of character; no words could more plainly show how completely Simon mistook the essential source and meaning of the power which he coveted.

Ver. 20. τὸ ἀργύριόν σου κ.τ.λ.: the words are no curse or imprecation, as is evident from ver. 22, but rather a vehement expression of horror on the part of St. Peter, an expression which would warn Simon that he was on the way to destruction. Rendall considers that the real form of the prayer is not that Simon may perish, but that as he is already on the way to destruction, so the silver may perish which is dragging him down, to the intent that Simon himself may repent and be forgiven: so Page, "thy money perish, even as thou art now perishing," cf. Œcumenius, in loco (and to the same effect St. Chrys.): οὐκ ἔστι ταῦτα ἀρωμένου ἀλλὰ παιδεύοντος, ὡς ἂν τις εἴποι· τὸ ἀργύριον σου συναπόλοιτό σοι μετὰ τῆς προαιρέσεως. But see also on the optative of wishing, Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 79, where he speaks of Mark xi. 14 and Acts viii. 20 as peculiar, being imprecations of evil, and cf. also Blass, Grammatik, p. 215.—εἴη εἰς ἀπώλειαν: a frequent construction, "go to destruction and remain there," see Felten, Wendt, Page, and cf. ver. 23, εἰς χολὴν . . . ὄντα. The noun occurs no less than five times in St. Peter's Second Epistle, cf. also 1 Peter i. 7. εἰς ἀπώλ. occurs five times elsewhere, Rom. ix. 22, 1 Tim. vi. 9, Heb. x. 39, Rev. xvii. 8, 11, and it is frequent in LXX; cf. 1 Chron. xxi. 17, Isa. xiv. 23, liv. 16, Dan. iii. 29, and ii. 5, Theod., etc.; 1 Macc. iii. 42, Bel and the Dragon, ver. 29, and several times in Ecclus.—τὴν δωρεὰν: and so, not to be bought, cf. Matt. x. 8, and our Lord's own words in Samaria, John iv. 10, εἰ ᾔδεις τὴν δωρεὰν τοῦ Θεοῦ κ.τ.λ.—ὅτι . . . ἐνόμισας διὰ χ. κτᾶσθαι: "because thou hast thought to obtain," to acquire, gain possession of, κτᾶσθαι, deponent verb, so in classical Greek, not passive as in A.V., see Matt. x. 9, and elsewhere twice in St. Luke's Gospel, xviii. 12, xxi. 19, and three times in Acts, i. 18, viii. 20, xxii. 28, and once in St. Paul, 1 Thess. iv. 4, frequent in LXX, and in same sense as here of acquiring by money.—ἐνόμ.: it was not a mere error of judgment, but a sinful intention, which had come from a heart not right before God, ver. 21; cf. Matt. xv. 19.

Ver. 21. μερὶς οὐδὲ κλῆρος, cf. Deut. xii. 2, xiv. 27, 29, xviii. 1, Isa. lvii. 6, and instances in Wetstein, see on i. 17.—λόγῳ τούτῳ: both A. and R.V. "in this matter," i.e., in the power of communicating the Holy Spirit, but Grotius, Neander, Hackett, Blass, Rendall and others refer it to the Gospel, i.e., the word of God which the Apostles preached, and in the blessings of which the Apostles had a share. λόγος is frequently used in classical Greek of that de quo agitur (see instances in Wendt). Grimm, sub v., compares the use of the noun in classical Greek, like ῥῆμα, the thing spoken of, the subject or matter of the λόγος, Herod., i., 21, etc.—ἡ γὰρ καρδία . . . εὐθεῖα, cf. LXX, Ps. vii. 10, x. 3, xxxv. 10, lxxii. 1, lxxvii. 37, etc., where the adjective is used, as often in classical Greek, of moral uprightness (cf. εὐθύτης in LXX, and Psalms of Solomon, ii., 15, ἐν εὐθύτητι καρδίας), so also in Acts xiii. 10, where the word is used by St. Paul on a similar occasion in rebuking Elymas; only found once in the Epistles, where it is again used by St. Peter, 2 Pet. ii. 15.

Ver. 22. κακίας: not used elsewhere by St. Luke, but it significantly meets us twice in St. Peter, cf. 1 Pet. ii. 1, 16.—ἀφεθ.: if we read above, Κυρίου, the meaning will be the Lord Jesus, in whose name the Apostles had been baptising, ver. 16, and ἀφεθ. may also point to the word of the Lord Jesus in Matt. xii. 31 (so Alford, Plumptre).—εἰ ἄρα, Mark xi. 13 (Acts xvii. 27). R. and A.V. both render "if perhaps," but R.V. "if perhaps . . . shall be forgiven thee"; A.V. "if perhaps . . . may be forgiven thee". St. Peter does not throw doubt on forgiveness after sincere repentance, but the doubt is expressed, because Simon so long as he was what he was (see the probable reading of the next verse and the connecting γάρ) could not repent, and therefore could not be forgiven, cf. Gen. xviii. 3. "If now I have found favour in thine eyes," εἰ ἄρα (אִם־נָא), which I hope rather than venture to assume; see also Simcox, Language of N. T. Greek, pp. 180, 181, and compare Winer-Moulton, xli., 4 c., and liii., 8 a; and Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 62 (1893).—ἐπίνοια: only here in N.T.; cf. Jer. xx. 10, Wisdom vi. 16, etc., 2 Macc. xii. 45, 4 Macc. xvii. 2, and often in classical Greek.

Ver. 23. εἰς γὰρ χολὴν: The passages in LXX generally referred to as containing somewhat similar phraseology are Deut. xxix. 18, xxxii. 32, Lam. iii. 15. But the word χολή is found in LXX several times, and not always as the equivalent of the same Hebrew. In Deut. xxix. 18, xxxii. 32, Ps. lxix. 21, Jer. viii. 14, ix. 15, Lam. iii. 19, it is used to translate רֹאשׁ (רוֹשׁ, Deut. xxxii. 32), a poisonous plant of intense bitterness and of quick growth (coupled with wormwood, cf. Deut. xxix. 18, Lam. iii 19, Jer. ix. 15). In Job xvi. 14 (where, however, AS[2] read ζωήν for χολήν) it is used to translate מְרֵרָה, bile, gall in xx. 14 of the same book it is the equivalent of מְרֹרָה in the sense of the gall of vipers, i.e., the poison of vipers, which the ancients supposed to lie in the gall. In Prov. v. 4 and Lam. iii. 15 it is the rendering of לַעֲנָה.

At end of verse D adds ος πολλα κλαιων ου διελιμπανεν, so Syr. H. mg. without ος—so Blass in β, but και for ος; Hilg. follows D; see Belser, Beiträge, p. 4, who refers to xx. 27, xvii. 13, for διαλιμπανειν, διαλειπειν, constr. with participle as here, instances which he regards as beyond doubt Lucan; cf. Luke vii. 45, where διαλειπω, used only by Luke, is found with a similar constr., διαλιμπανω only found elsewhere in Tobit x. 7 (but S al.), but also in Galen, cf. Grimm, sub v., and L. and S. But in spite of the Lucan phraseology it seems difficult to suppose that Luke would himself have struck out the words, unless, indeed, he had gained further information about Simon which led him to conclude that the repentance was not sincere. Such an omission could scarcely be made for the sake of brevity. Weiss, Codex D, p. 68, evidently regards the words as added by a later hand, not as omitted by Luke himself; see also Wendt, edit. 1899, p. 177, note.

wormwood; and in the former passage we have πικρότερον χολῆς. If we take the most usual signification of χολή in the LXX, viz., that of the gall plant (see R.V., margin, in loco, gall, or a gall root), the thought of bitterness would naturally be associated with it (in the passage which presents the closest parallel to the verse before us, Deut. xxix. 18, ἐν χολῇ καὶ πικρίᾳ, πικρία is a translation of the Hebrew word for wormwood); ἐν χολῇ πικρίας might therefore denote the intefnse malignity which filled the heart o Simon. (On the word χολή in its sense here, and in Matt. xxvii. 34, see Meyer-Weiss, Matth., p. 546.) The preposition εἰς is generally taken as = ἐν in this passage; but Rendall suggests that here, as is sometimes elsewhere, it = ὡς, and he therefore renders: "I see that thou art as gall of bitterness," denoting the evil function which Simon would fulfil in the Church if he continued what he was. Westcott's note on Heb. xii. 15 should also be consulted.—σύνδεσμον ἀδικίας: R.V. translates "thou art . . . in the bond of iniquity". But if the passage means that Simon "will become . . . a bond of iniquity," R.V., margin, or that he is now as a bond of iniquity (Rendall), the expression denotes, not that Simon is bound, but that he binds others in iniquity. Blass refers to Isa. lviii. 6, where a similar phrase occurs, σύνδ. ἀδικ., and explains: "improbitate quasi vinctus es"; so Grimm, while pointing out that the phrase in Isa. lviii. 6 is used in a different sense from here, explains "vinculum improbitatis, i.e., quod ab improbitate nectitur ad constringendos animos". Others again take the expression to denote a bundle, fasciculus (Wetstein) (cf. Hdian., iv., 12, 11), Simon being regarded "quasi ex improbitate concretum," cf. especially Cicero, in Pison., ix., 21; but such a rendering is rejected by Grimm, as no examples can be adduced of this tropical use of the noun, and by Wendt, on the ground that ἀδικία is not in the plural, but in the singular. Combinations with ἀδικία are characteristic of St. Luke; cf. Luke xiii. 27, xvi. 8, 9, xviii. 6; cf. Act i. 18; the word only occurs once elsewhere in the Gospels, John vii. 18; Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 23.

Ver. 24. Δεήθητε: the verse is often taken (as by Meyer and others) as a further proof of the hollowness of Simon's belief, and his ignorance of the way of true repentance—he will not pray for himself, and he only asks for deliverance from fear of the penalty and not from hatred of the sin (so Bengel). But on the other hand Wendt, in criticising Meyer, objects to this further condemnation of Simon as not expressed in the text. So far as the petition for the Apostles' prayers is concerned, it is of course possible that it may have been prompted by the belief that such prayers would be more efficacious than his own (so Blass, Wendt, see also conclusion of the story in D); he does not ask them to pray instead of himself but ὑπέρ, on his behalf.—ἐπέλθῃ: not used by the other Evangelists, but three times in St. Luke's Gospel and four times in Acts, with ἐπί and accusative both in Gospel (i. 35, cf. xxi. 35) and Acts.

Ver. 25. οἱ μὲν οὖν: the μὲν οὖν and δέ in ver. 26 may connect the return of the party to Jerusalem and the following instructions to Philip for his journey, and so enable us to gather for a certainty that Philip returned to Jerusalem with the Apostles, and received there his further directions from the Lord; see Rendall's Appendix on μὲν οὖν, Acts, p. 164, but cf. on the other hand, Belser, Beiträge, pp. 51, 52. On the frequent and characteristic use of μὲν οὖν in Luke, see above on i. 6, etc.—ὑπέστρεψαν: if we read the imperfect, we have the two verbs in the verse in the same tense, and the sense would be that the Apostles did not return at once to Jerusalem, but started on their return (imperfect), and preached to the Samaritan villages on the way (as Belser also allows)—the τε closely unites the two verbs (Weiss). The verb is characteristic of St. Luke: in his Gospel twenty-one or twenty-two times; in Acts, eleven or twelve times; in the other Evangelists, only once, Mark xv. 40, and this doubtful; only three times in rest of N.T. (Lekebusch, Friedrich).

Ver. 26. ἄγγελος: on the frequency of angelic appearances, another characteristic of St. Luke, see Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, pp. 45 and 52 (so Zeller, Acts, ii., 224, E.T.), cf. Luke ii. 9 and Acts xii. 7, Luke i. 38 and Acts x. 7, Luke xxiv. 4 and Acts i. 10, x. 30. There can be no doubt, as Wendt points out, that St. Luke means that the communication was made to Philip by an angel, and that therefore all attempts to explain his words as meaning that Philip felt a sudden inward impulse, or that he had a vision in a dream, are unsatisfactory.—ἀνάστηθι, as Wendt remarks, does not support the latter supposition, cf. v. 17, and its frequent use in Acts and in O.T. see below.—δὲ may be taken as above, see ver. 25, or as simply marking the return of the narrative from the chief Apostles to the history of Philip. As in vv. 29, 39, πνεῦμα and not ἄγγελος occurs; the alteration has been attributed to a reviser, but even Spitta, Apostelgeschichte, p. 153, can find no reason for this, and sees in the use of πνεῦμα and ἄγγελος here nothing more strange than their close collocation Matt. iv. 1, 11.—ἀνάστηθι καὶ πορεύου, words often similarly joined together in LXX.—κατὰ μεσημβρίαν: towards the south, i.e., he was to proceed "with his face to the south," cf. xxvii. 12 (Page).—ἐπὶ τὴν ὁδὸν (not πρός), on, i.e., along the road (not "unto," A.V.). R.V. margin renders κατὰ μεσ. "at noon"; so Rendall, cf. xxii. 6, as we have κατά not πρός; so Nestle, Studien und Kritiken, p. 335 (1892) (see Felten's note, Apostelgeschichte, p. 177; but as he points out, the heat of the day at twelve o'clock would not be a likely time for travelling, see also Belser, Beiträge, p. 52, as against Nestle). Wendt, edition 1899, p. 177, gives in his adhesion to Nestle's view on the ground that in LXX, cf. Gen. xviii. 1, etc., the word μεσημβρ. is always so used, and because the time of the day for the meeting was an important factor, whilst there would be no need to mention the direction, when the town was definitely named (see also O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 88).—αὕτη ἐστὶν ἔρημος: opinion is still divided as to whether the adjective is to be referred to the town or the road. Amongst recent writers, Wendt, edition 1899, p. 178; Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., ii., 438 (1899); Belser, Rendall, O. Holtzmann, u. s., p. 88, Knabenbauer (so too Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 79; Conder in B.D.[2] "Gaza," and Grimm-Thayer) may be added to the large number who see a reference to the route (in Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 71, E.T., it is stated that this view is the more probable). But, on the other hand, some of the older commentators (Calvin, Grotius, etc.) take the former view, and they have recently received a strong supporter in Prof. G. A. Smith, Historical Geog. of the Holy Land, pp. 186-188. O. Holtzmann, although referring αὕτη to ὁδός, points out that both Strabo, xvi., 2, 30, and the Anonymous Geographical Fragment (Geogr. Græc. Minores, Hudson, iv., p. 39) designate Gaza as ἔρημος. Dr.

For αυτης D reads αυτου, but Blass rejects, so Hilg.—suggested as due from retrans. of Latin, or unpointed Syriac. εις om. in D¹, εν in D².

Smith strengthens these references, not only by Jos., Ant., xiv., 4, 4, and Diodorus Siculus, xix., 80, but by maintaining that the New Gaza mentioned in the Anonymous Fragment was on the coast, and that if so, it lay off the road to Egypt, which still passed by the desert Gaza; the latter place need not have been absolutely deserted in Philip's time; its site and the vicinity of the great road would soon attract people back, but it was not unlikely that the name Ἔρημος might still stick to it (see also ver. 36 below). If we take the adjective as referring to the road, its exact force is still doubtful; does it refer to one route, specially lonely, as distinguished from others, or to the ordinary aspect of a route leading through waste places, or to the fact that at the hour mentioned, noon-day (see above), it would be deserted? Wendt confesses himself unable to decide, and perhaps he goes as far as one can expect to go in adding that at least this characterisation of the route so far prepares us for the sequel, in that it explains the fact that the eunuch would read aloud, and that Philip could converse with him uninterruptedly. Hackett and others regard the words before us as a parenthetical remark by St. Luke himself to acquaint the reader with the region of this memorable occurrence, and αὕτη is used in a somewhat similar explanatory way in 2 Chron. v. 2, LXX, but this does not enable us to decide as to whether the explanation is St. Luke's or the angel's. Hilgenfeld and Schmiedel dismiss the words as an explanatory gloss. The argument sometimes drawn for the late date of Acts by referring ἔρημος to the supposed demolition of Gaza in A.D. 66 cannot be maintained, since this destruction so called was evidently very partial, see G. A. Smith, u. s., and so Schürer, u. s.

Ver. 27. καὶ ἀναστὰς ἐπορεύθη: immediate and implicit obedience.—καὶ ἰδού, see on i. 11; cf. Hort, Ecclesia, p. 179, on the force of the phrase; used characteristically by St. Luke of sudden and as it were providential interpositions, i. 10, x. 17, xii. 7, and see note on xvi. 1.—εὐνοῦχος: the word can be taken literally, for there is no contradiction involved in Deut. xxiii. 1, as he would be simply "a proselyte of the gate" (Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 54). The instances sometimes referred to as showing that the exclusion of eunuchs from the congregation of the Lord was relaxed in the later period of Jewish history can scarcely hold good, since Isa. lvi. 3 refers to the Messianic future in which even the heathen and the eunuchs should share, and in Jer. xxxviii. 7, xxxix. 15 nothing is said which could lead us to describe Ebed Melech, another Ethiopian eunuch, as a Jew in the full sense. On the position and influence of eunuchs in the East, both in ancient and modern times, see "Eunuch," B.D.², and Hastings' B.D. St. Luke's mention that he was a eunuch is quite in accordance with the "universalism" of the Acts; gradually the barriers of a narrow Judaism were broken down, first in the case of the Samaritans, and now in the case of the eunuch. Eusebius, H. E., ii., 1, speaks of him as πρῶτος ἐξ ἐθνῶν, who was converted to Christ, and even as a "proselyte of the gate" he might be so described, for the gulf which lay between a born Gentile and a genuine descendant of Abraham could never be bridged over (Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 326, E.T.). Moreover, in the case of the Ethiopian eunuch, descended from the accursed race of Ham, this separation from Israel must have been intensified to the utmost (cf. Amos ix. 7). No doubt St. Luke may also have desired to instance the way in which thus early the Gospel spread to a land far distant from the place of its birth (McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 100).—δυνάστης: noun in apposition to ἀνὴρ Αἰθ., only used by St. Luke here and in his Gospel, i. 52, and once again by St. Paul, 1 Tim. vi. 15. In LXX frequent (used of God, Ecclus. xlvi. 5, 2 Macc. xv. 3, 23, etc.; so too of Zeus by Soph.), for its meaning here cf. Gen. l. 4, Latin, aulicus.—Κανδάκης: not a personal name, but said to be a name often given to queens of Ethiopia (cf. Pharaoh, and later Ptolemy, in Egypt), Pliny, N. H., vi., 35, 7. In the time of Eusebius, H. E., ii., 1, Ethiopia is said to be still ruled by queens, Strabo, xvii., I., 54; Bion of Soli, Ethiopica (Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc., iv., p. 351). According to Brugsch the spelling would be Kanta-ki: cf. "Candace," B.D.², and "Ethiopia," Hastings' B.D.—γάζης: a Persian word found both in Greek and Latin (cf. Cicero, De Off., ii., 22; Virg., Æn., i., 119; and see Wetstein, in loco). In LXX, Ezra vi. 1 (Esth. iv. 7), treasures; v. 17, vii. 20, treasury; vii. 21, treasurers; cf. also Isa. xxxix. 2, and γαζοφυλάκιον in LXX, and in N.T., Luke xxi. 1, Mark xii. 41 (2), 43, John viii. 20. "Observat Lucas, et locum, ubi præfectus Gazæ Philippo factus est obviam, Gazam fuisse vocatum" Wetstein; see also on the nomen et omen Felten and Plumptre, and compare on the word Jerome, Epist., cviii., 11. If the second ὃς is retained (R.V.) it emphasises the fact that the eunuch was already a proselyte Weiss).—προσκυνήσ ων: proves not that (he was a Jew, but that he was not a heathen (Hackett). The proselytes, as well as foreign Jews, came to Jerusalem to worship. We cannot say whether he had gone up to one of the feasts; St. Chrysostom places it to his credit that he had gone up at an unusual time.

Ver. 28. ἅρματος: the chariot was regarded as a mark of high rank: very frequent word in LXX, but in N.T. only here, and in Rev. ix. 9, cf. xviii. 13. "Chariot," Hastings' B.D., properly in classics a war-chariot, but here for ἁρμάμαξα, a covered chariot (Blass), Herod., vii., 41.—ἀνεγίνωσκεν: evidently aloud, according to Eastern usage; there is no need to suppose that some slave was reading to him (Olshausen, Nösgen, Blass). As the following citation proves, he was reading from the LXX, and the widespread knowledge of this translation in Egypt would make it probable a priori (Wendt), cf. Professor Margoliouth, "Ethiopian Eunuch," Hastings' B.D. It may be that the eunuch had bought the roll in Jerusalem "a pearl of great price," and that he was reading it for the first time; ver. 34 is not quite consistent with the supposition that he had heard in Jerusalem rumours of the Apostles' preaching, and of their reference of the prophecies to Jesus of Nazareth: Philip is represented as preaching to him Jesus, and that too as good news. "The eunuch came to worship—great was also his studiousness—observe again his piety, but though he did not understand he read, and after reading, examines," Chrys., Hom., xix., and Jerome, Epist., liii., 5. See also Corn. à Lapide, in loco, on the diligence and devotion of the eunuch.

Ver. 29. τὸ πνεῦμα εἶπεν: nothing inconsistent with the previous statement that an angel had spoken to him, as Weiss supposes by referring the angel visit to a reviser. There was no reason why the angel should accompany Philip, or reappear to him, whilst the inward guidance of the Spirit would be always present, as our Lord had promised.—κολλήθητι, cf. v. 13, in Acts five times, and in each case of joining or attaching oneself closely to a person, of social or religious communion with a person, twice in Luke's Gospel, cf. xv. 15 for its sense here, and elsewhere only once in the Evangelists, Matt. xix. 5, and that in a quotation, Gen. ii. 24, cf. its use three times in St. Paul, Rom. xii. 9, 1 Cor. vi. 16, 17. In classical Greek similar usage, and cf. LXX, Ruth ii. 8, Ecclus. ii. 3, xix. 2, 1 Macc. iii. 2, vi. 21, etc. Hebrew דָּבַק, see Wetstein on x. 28.

Ver. 30. προσδραμὼν δὲ: rightly taken to indicate the eagerness with which Philip obeyed.—Ἆρά γε—the γε strengthens the ἆρα, dost thou really understand? num igitur? ἆρα without γε is only found elsewhere in Luke xviii. 8, and in Gal. ii. 17 (W.H., and also Lightfoot, Galatians, l.c.), see Blass, in Julian's well-known saying with reference to the Christian writings, and the famous retort, are quoted by Alford, Plumptre, Page, Meyer-Wendt, in loco.

Ver. 31. γὰρ; "elegans particula hoc sensu quid quaeris?" implies, Why do you ask? for how should I be able? (cf. Matt. xxvii. 23, Mark xv. 14, Luke xxiii. 22); see Simcox, Language of N. T. Greek, p. 172; Grimm-Thayer, sub v., I.—ἂν δυναίμην: optative with ἂν; occurs only in Luke, both in his Gospel and Acts, expressing what would happen on the fulfilment of some supposed condition: see, for a full list of passages, Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 80; Simcox, u. s., p. 112: twice in direct questions, here and in xvii. 18, but only in this passage is the condition expressed, cf. also Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., pp. 33 and 66 (1893).—ὁδηγήσῃ, see critical notes, and Blass, Grammatik, p. 210; if we read future indicative it will be an instance of a future supposition thus expressed with more probability, Burton, u. s., pp. 104, 105, 109, and see also Simcox, note on the passage, u. s., p. 112. Burton compares Luke xix. 40 (W.H.), see also Viteau, u. s., pp. 4, 111, 226, whilst Blass maintains that there is no one certain example of this usage of ἐάν with future indicative. The word used here (" insignis modestia eunuchi," Calvin) is used also by our Lord Himself for the Holy Spirit's leading and guidance, John xvi. 13, and also in the LXX, as in the Psalms, of divine guidance.—παρεκάλεσέν: "he besought," R.V. ("desired" A.V.), the word is rightly taken to denote both the humility and the earnestness of the eunuch (Bengel): a verb frequent both in St. Luke and St. Paul, six or seven times in Gospel, twenty-two or twenty-three times in Acts.—τε: note the closing connecting particle, showing the necessary result of the question (Weiss).

Ver. 32. περιοχὴ τῆς γραφῆς "the contents of the passage of Scripture" i.e., the one particular passage, Isa. liii. 7, 8 (so Meyer-Wendt, Holtzmann, Hackett), cf. i. 16, and 1 Pet. ii. 6: περιέχει ἐν τῇ γραφῇ and ταύτης in ver. 35 below; περιοχή has been taken to mean a section, as in Cicero, Epist. ad Att., xiii., 25 (so in Codex A, before the Gospel of St. Mark, its περιοχαί, i.e., sectiones, are prefixed), but in Cicero also Meyer-Wendt take the word to mean the contents of a passage, cf. notes, edit. 1888 and 1899; see also Felten and Plumptre, in loco. St. Chrysostom apparently takes γραφή here as = αἱ γραφαί, "totum corpus scripturae sacræ," see Blass, in loco, but if so, the plural would be used as always; see above references and Lightfoot on Gal., iii., 22. The fact that the eunuch was reading Isaiah is mentioned by St. Chrysostom as another indication of character, since he had in hand the prophet who is more sublime than all others, Hom., xix.

Ver. 33. ἐν τῇ ταπεινώσει κ.τ.λ., cf. Isa. liii. 7, 8, "in his humiliation his judgment was taken away" (LXX), so A. and R.V., generally taken to mean by his humbling himself his judgment was cancelled, cf. Phil. ii. 6, 7, so Wendt in seventh and eighth editions: cf. Grimm-Thayer, sub v., κρίσις, the punishment appointed for him was taken away, i.e., ended, and so sub v., αἴρω = to cause to cease, Col. ii. 14. But the words "in his humiliation" etc., may also fairly mean that in the violence and injustice done to him his judgment, i.e., the fair trial due to him, was withheld, and thus they conform more closely to the Hebrew "by oppression and by (unjust) judgment he was taken away," so Hitzig, Ewald, Cheyne and R.V. So to the same effect Delitzsch takes the words to mean that hostile oppression and judicial persecution befel him, and out of them he was removed by death (cf. R.V. margin). (The words have been taken to mean that by oppression and judgment he was hurried off and punished, raptus est ad supplicium.)—τὴν (δὲ) γενεὰν αὐτοῦ τίς διηγήσεται; (LXX), "his generation who shall declare?" R.V., the words may mean "who shall declare the wickedness of the generation in which he lived?" (see Grimm-Thayer, sub v., γενεά)—their wickedness, i.e., in their treatment of him; so De Wette (and Meyer in early editions), and to the same effect, Lumby, Rendall, cf. our Lord's own words, Matt. xii. 39-42, etc. In Meyer-Wendt (seventh and eighth edition) the words are taken to mean "who can fitly declare the number of those who share his life?" i.e., his posterity, his disciples, so Felten (but see on the other hand, Delitzsch, in loco). The Hebrew seems to mean, as in R.V. text, "and as for his generation who among them considered that he was cut off out of the land of the living? for the transgression of my people" etc., see Cheyne, in loco; Briggs, Messianic Prophecy, p. 358, and Delitzsch, Jesaia, pp. 523, 524, fourth edition (see also Page's note, and Wendt, edition 1899). The references by the Fathers (cf. Bede and Wordsworth) to the eternal generation of the Son, and the mystery of His Incarnation, do not seem to find support in the Hebrew or in the Greek rendering. On the oldest Jewish interpretations of Isaiah liii., see Dalman's Der leidende und der sterbende Messias, pp. 21-23, 27-35, 89, 91; and see also in connection with the passage before us, Athanasius, Four Discourses against the Arians, i., 13, 54, and Dr. Robertson's note; see also above on St. Peter's Discourses in chap. iii., and below on xxvi. 23.—αἴρεται ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς: "is taken," i.e., with violence (here = Hebrew (נִגְזַר), cf. use of αἴρω, LXX, Acts xxii. 22, xxi. 36, Matt. xxiv. 39, Luke xxiii. 18, John xix. 15.

Ver. 34. ἀποκ., see above iii. 12, v. 8. It has been sometimes supposed that the eunuch was acquainted with the tradition that Isaiah had been sawn asunder by Manasseh — Felten, see Wetstein on Heb. xi. 37.

Ver. 35. ἀνοίξας τὸ στ. αὐτοῦ: the phrase is used to introduce some weighty and important utterance, cf. x. 34, xviii. 14, and Luke i. 64, so too Matt. v. 2, 2 Cor. vi. 11, also frequent in LXX; "aperire os in Scriptura est ordiri longum sermonem de re gravi et seria. Significat ergo Lucas coepisse Philippum pleno ore disserere de Christo," Calvin, cf. Hebrew phrase פָּתַח אֶת־פִּיו, in various senses.—ἀρξάμενος, see on i. 22, cf. Luke xxiv. 27.—ταύτης, see above on ver. 32.—εὐηγγελίσατο: used with an accusative both of the person addressed, as in vv. 25, 40, and of the message delivered, cf. Luke viii. 1, Acts v. 42, viii. 4, 12, etc., but when the two are combined the person is always expressed by the dative, cf. Luke i. 19, ii. 10 (Acts xvii. 18), Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 79. From the sequel it is evident that Philip not only preached the glad tidings of the fulfilment of the prophecies in Jesus as the ideal and divine Sufferer, but that he also pointed out to the eunuch the door of admission into the Church of Jesus; cf. Jerome, Epist., liii., 5.

Ver. 36. ἰδοὺ ὕδωρ: "intus fides, foris aqua præsto erat" Bengel. According τὸν Ἰησοῦν. 36. ὡς δὲ ἐπορεύοντο κατὰ τὴν ὁδόν, ἦλθον ἐπί τι ὕδωρ· καί φησιν ὁ εὐνοῦχος, Ἰδοὺ ὕδωρ· τί κωλύει με βαπτισθῆναι; 37.[1] εἶπε δὲ ὁ Φίλιππος, Εἰ πιστεύεις ἐξ ὅλης τῆς καρδίας, ἔξεστιν. ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ εἶπε, Πιστεύω τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ εἶναι τὸν Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν. 38. καὶ ἐκέλευσε στῆναι τὸ ἅρμα· καὶ κατέβησαν ἀμφότεροι εἰς τὸ ὕδωρ, ὅ τε Φίλιππος καὶ ὁ εὐνοῦχος· καὶ ἐβάπτισεν to Jerome (Epist., ciii.) and Eusebius (περὶ τόπων), the site of the baptism was placed at Bethsura (Bethzur, Josh. xv. 28, 2 Chron. xi. 17, Neh. iii. 16, etc.), about twenty miles from Jerusalem, and two from Hebron. Robinson (Biblical Researches, ii., 749) thinks that the place is more probably to be found on the road between Eleutheropolis (Beit-Jibrin) and Gaza, whilst Professor G. A. Smith (see above on ver. 26) considers that the fact that Philip was found immediately after at Azotus suggests that the meeting and baptism took place, not where tradition has placed them, among the hills of Judæa, but on the Philistine plain (Hist. Geog. of the Holy Land, pp. 186, 240). But as he finds it impossible to apply the epithet "desert" to any route from Jerusalem to Gaza, whether that by Beit-Jibrin, or the longer one by Hebron, he does not hesitate to apply the epithet to Gaza itself, and as the meeting (according to his view) took place in its neighbourhood, the town would naturally be mentioned. Gaza and Azotus, ver. 40, are the only two Philistine towns named in the N. T.—τί κωλύει με βαπτισθῆναι; "mark the eager desire, mark the exact knowledge . . . see again his modesty; he does not say Baptise me, neither does he hold his peace, but he utters somewhat betwixt strong desire and reverent fear" Chrys., Hom., xix.

Ver. 38. εἰς τὸ ὕδωρ: even if the words are rendered "unto the water" (Plumptre), the context ἀνέβησαν ἐκ indicates that the baptism was by immersion, and there can be no doubt that this was the custom in the early Church. St. Paul's symbolic language in Rom. vi. 4, Col. ii. 12, certainly seems to presuppose that such was the case, as also such types as the Flood, the passage of the Red Sea, the dipping of Naaman in Jordan. But the Didaché is fairly quoted to show that at an early period immersion could not have been regarded as essential, cf. vii. 3. See also "Teaching of the Apostles," iv., 807, in Dict. of Christ. Biog. (Smith & Wace), "Apostellehre" in Real-Encyclopädie für protestant. Theol. und Kirche (Hauck), p. 712; "Baptism" in B.D.². "Mutavit Æthiops pellem suam" is the comment of Bede, "id est sorde peccatorum abluta, de lavacro Jesu dealbatus ascendit."

Ver. 39. Πνεῦμα Κ. ἥρπασε: although the expression is simply Πνεῦμα Κ. the reference is evidently to the same divine power as in ver. 29, and cannot be explained as meaning an inward impulse of the Evangelist, or as denoting a hurricane or storm of wind (as even Nösgen and Stier supposed). The article is omitted before Πνεῦμα Κ. in Luke iv. 18, so also in LXX, Isa. lxi. 1, and we αὐτόν. 39. ὅτε δὲ ἀνέβησαν ἐκ τοῦ ὕδατος, Πνεῦμα Κυρίου ἥρπασε τὸν Φίλιππον [1]· καὶ οὐκ εἶδεν αὐτὸν οὐκέτι εὐνοῦχος, ἐπορεύετο γὰρ

[1] Πνευμα Κ. ηρπασε τον Φ.; instead of this A², Par., Wern., Syr. H. mg., Jer., Aug. read πνευμα αγιον επεπεσεν επι τον ευνουχον, αγγελος δε Κ. ηρπασεν τον Φ. Wendt regards as interpolation partly according to ver. 26 and partly according to ver. 44. Hilg. retains and Belser, p. 51, defends as Lucan. It is fitting that in Scripture the Holy Ghost is not represented as given after Philip's Baptism, because his work was to be completed by the advent of Peter and John; but in the case before us no Apostle was present, and so the Holy Spirit came down miraculously after Philip had baptised the eunuch. So, too, Hilgenfeld leans towards the reading l. c., and regards it as just possible that the ordinary text is a set-off against the contradiction involved with viii. 15-18, in accordance with which the Holy Spirit was only bestowed through the laying on of the hands of the Apostles. Blass rejects, and follows T.R. (see below). After Φιλιππον Par., Syr. H. mg. (no other authorities) add "ab eo"; so Hilg., and so Blass in β, απ' αυτου, which seems somewhat strange in the case of the latter writer.

cannot therefore conclude anything from its omission here. ἥρπασε, abripuit, the disappearance, as the context shows, was regarded as supernatural, cf. LXX, 1 Kings xviii. 12, 2 Kings ii. 16 (Ezek. iii. 14, Hebrew only רוח). Thus Hilgenfeld recognises not only a likeness here to the O.T. passages quoted, but that a miraculous transference of Philip to another place is implied. No doubt, as Hilgenfeld points out, πνεῦμα may mean wind, John iii. 8, but this by no means justifies exclusion of all reference here to the Holy Spirit. No doubt we may see with Blass a likeness in the language of the narrative to the O.T. passages just cited, and St. Luke's informants may have been the daughters of Philip, who were themselves προφήτιδες (see Blass, in loco); but there is no reason why he should not have heard the narrative from St. Philip himself, and the rendering πνεῦμα by ventus is not satisfactory, although Blass fully recognises that Philip departed by the same divine impulse as that by which he had come. Holtzmann endorses the reference to the O.T. passages above, but specially draws attention to the parallel which he supposes in Bel and the Dragon, ver. 34 ff. But this passage should be contrasted rather than compared with the simple narrative of the text, so free from any fantastic embellishment, while plainly implying a supernatural element: cf. for the verb ἁρπάζω, 1 Thess. iv. 17, 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4 (a reference to which as explaining Philip's withdrawal is not to the point, since the narrative cannot imply that Philip was ἐκτὸς τοῦ σώματος), Rev. xii. 5, used of a snatching or taking up due to divine agency, cf. Wisdom iv. 11, where it is said of Enoch ἡρπάγη. Both in classical Greek and in the LXX the word implies forcible or sudden seizure (John vi. 15).—καὶ οὐκ εἶδεν . . . ἐπορεύετο γὰρ κ.τ.λ. If these two clauses are closely connected as by R.V., they do not simply state that the eunuch went on his own way (Rendall), (in contrast with Philip who went his way), rejoicing in the good news which he had heard, and in the baptism which he had received; and R.V. punctuation surely need not prevent the disappearance of Philip from being viewed as mysterious, even if the words καὶ οὐκ εἶδον αὐτὸν οὐκέτι do not imply this. Moreover αὐτοῦ may rather emphasise the fact that the eunuch went his way, which he would not have done had he seen Philip, but would perhaps have followed him who had thus enlightened his path (so Weiss, in loco, reading αὐτοῦ τὴν ὁδόν—αὐτοῦ emphatic: see also St. Chrysostom's comment in loco).—χαίρων: "the fruit of the Spirit is . . . joy," Gal. v. 22 (the word at the end of a clause is characteristic of Luke; Luke xv. 5, xix. 6, see Vogel, p. 45). Eusebius describes the eunuch, to whom he gives the name of Indich, as the first preacher to his countrymen of the tidings of great joy, and on the possible reception in the earliest Christian times of the Gospel message in the island of Meroë at least, see "Ethiopian Church," Dict. of Christ. Biog., ii., 234 (Smith & Wace). In the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch men have seen the first fulfilment of the ancient prophecy, Ps. lxviii. 31 (Luckock, Footprints of the Apostles as traced by St Luke, i., 219, and C. and H., p. 66).

Ver. 40. εὑρέθη εἰς Ἄ.: constructio prægnans = was borne to and found at,

cf. xxi. 13; or, as εἰς means more than ἐν, implying that he had come into the city and was staying there, cf. Esth. i. 5; marg. Hebrew "found," A.V., εὑρίσκω, מָצָא, is very often found in the LXX in similar phrases, e.g., 1 Chron. xxix. 17, 2 Chron. xxxi. 1, 1 Sam. xiii. 15, etc. The word may imply, however, much more than the fact that Philip was present at Azotus, and Alford sees in it a probable reference to 2 Kings ii. 17 (cf. passages in O.T. above), where the same word is used, εὑρέθη. Blass takes it to mean "vento quasi ibi dejectus," but see above on ver. 39.—Ἄζωτον, אַשְׁדּוֹד: only mentioned here in N.T., but in LXX Ashdod, Josh. xi. 22, xiii. 3, xv. 46, 1 Sam. v. 5, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, Neh. iv. 7, xiii. 20, Jer. xx. 20, xlvii. 5, Amos i. 8, Zeph. ii. 4, Zech. ix. 6; Azotus in 1 Macc. v. 18, x. 84; Herod., ii., 157: Herod. speaks of the siege of the twenty-nine years under Psammetichus as the longest in history (ζ = σδ, as in Ὠρομάζης, Ahuramazda, Blass, in loco). An old Philistine town, and one of the five chief cities—it might be regarded as the half-way station on the great road between Gaza and Joppa. Schürer holds that the population was Jewish to a considerable extent, as we find that Vespasian was obliged to place a garrison there (Jos., B. J., iv., 3, 2); it is now a mere village of no importance, and still bearing the name Esdûd. Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., pp. 62, 67 ff., E.T.; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. of the Holy Land, pp. 192, 193; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 1, 124, "Ashdod," B.D.², "Azotus," and also Col. Conder sub v., Hastings' B.D.—διερχόμενος εὐηγγελ., see above on ver. 4 and also xiii. 6, and cf. Luke ix. 6 for a similar combination of the two verbs.—τὰς πόλεις πάσας: from their position between Azotus and Cæsarea, Lydda and Joppa may well have been included, cf. ix. 32, 36, in which we may see something of the effects of St. Philip's preaching, "hic quoque, uti in urbe Samariæ, Apostolis auditores præparavit," Bengel. — Καισαρείαν (mentioned no less than fifteen times in Acts): its full name was Καισαρεία Σεβαστή, so named by Herod the Great in honour of Augustus (Jos., Ant., xvi., 5, 1); sometimes also παράλιος or ἡ ἐπὶ θαλάττῃ (Jos., B. J., iii., 9, 1; vii., 1, 3); it was also called "Straton's Tower" (cf. K. ἡ Στράτωνος, Apost. Const., vi., 12), although it was virtually a fresh site. Schürer derives this latter name from Straton, the name of one or more of the last kings of Sidon, who towards the end of the Persian period were probably in possession of the strip of coast upon which the tower was built (Schürer, u. s., div. ii., vol. i., p. 84 ff.). Herod's lavish expenditure and enlargement gave it such importance that it came to be called Caput Judææ, Tacitus, Hist., ii., 79, i.e., of the Roman Province, for it never could be called truly Judæan. For its magnificence, see Jos., Ant., xv., 9; B. J., i., 21, cf. Ant., xvi., 5. It was a seaport suited to his taste, which Herod wanted, and in Cæsarea he found it—"Joppa, Jerusalem's port, was Jewish, national, patriotic; Cæsarea, Herodian, Roman in obedience, Greek in culture". The buildings were magnificent — a temple with its two statues of Augustus and of Rome, a theatre, an amphitheatre; but above all, the haven was the chief work of art, Sebastos Limen, so large and important that the name of the city was even dwarfed beside it (see especially Dr. G. A. Smith, u. s., p. 140). Here the Roman procurators had their abode, both before and after Agrippa's reign; here, too, was the chief garrison of the troops of the province. The population was chiefly heathen, but with a considerable mixture of Jews, and so both Gentile and Jew had equal rights, while each claimed exclusive powers. In the time of Felix things came to such a pass that bloodshed ensued, and Felix exasperated the Jews by leaving the sole direction of the town in the hands of the heathen party. It was this which in the first place provoked the great rising of the Jews, A.D. 66 (Jos., Ant., xx., 8, 7, 9; B. J., ii., 13, 7; 14, 4, 5). The war broke out, and, according to Josephus, all the Jewish inhabitants, twenty thousand in number, were massacred in an hour. Here the famous Rabbi Akiba met a martyr's death, here Eusebius of Cæsarea and Procopius were born, and hither Origen fled. See Schürer, u. s.; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, ii., 1, 123; G. A. Smith, u. s., pp. 138, 143 ff., B. D.[2]; Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation, pp. 21, 23, 156, 199, 251, 265, etc. Among the Jews Cæsarea was called by the same name by which we know it, but sometimes from its fortifications, Migdal Shur, or after its harbour, Migdal Shina, or after both, and once by its ancient name, "Straton's Tower" (cf. also Strabo, xvi., p. 758), but as the seat of the Roman power, and for its preponderating heathen population, it was specially hated; and so it was designated "the daughter of Edom," although the district, so rich and fertile, was still called "the land of life". Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, pp. 24, 72, 202, and Hamburger, u.s. Cæsarea is mentioned in the verse before us not because of its political and commercial importance, but because it became the after home of Philip, xxi. 8. But it also might be named here as marking a further and interesting stage in the progress of the Gospel (see also below on chap. x.). We cannot say whether at the time of the narrative in chap. x. Philip had already settled and worked in Cæsarea.

CHAPTER IX.—Ver. 1. Ὁ δὲ Σαῦλος: takes up and continues the narrative from viii. 3; the resumptive use of δέ.—ἔτι: "Sic in summo fervore peccandi ereptus et conversus est" Bengel.—ἐμπνέων: only here in N.T., not "breathing out," A.V., but rather "breathing of," lit., "in" (R.V. simply "breathing"), cf. LXX, Josh. x. 40; πᾶν ἐμπνέον ζωῆς (cf. Ps. xvii. 15)—threatening and murdering were as it were the atmosphere which he breathed, and in and by which he lived, cf. Stobæus, Flor., 85, 19, ὀδμῆς ἐμπνέοντα, L. and S. and Blass, in loco (cf. also Aristoph., Eq., 437, οὗτος ἤδη κακίας καὶ συκοφαντίας πνεῖ, and Winer-Moulton, xxx., 9).—τῷ ἀρχιερεῖ: probably Joseph Caiaphas, who continues thus to persecute the Church, see on iv. 6 (v. 17); he held office until 36 A.D., see Zöckler's note, in loco, and "Caiaphas," B.D.[2], and Hastings' B.D. "Saul as a Pharisee makes request of a Sadducee!" says Felten.

Ver. 2. ᾐτήσατο, see on iii. 2, with παρά, in iii. 3, we have the imperfect, but "inest in aoristo quod etiam accepit," Blass; on the use of the verb in N.T., see also Blass, Gram., p. 182, and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.—ἐπιστολὰς, cf. xxii. 5, xxvi. 12; on the jurisdiction of the Sanhedrim, see above on iv. 5; Weber, Jüdische Theol., p. 141 (1897); O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, pp. 174, 175; and Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 185, E.T.: only within the limits of Judæa had the Sanhedrim any direct authority, although its orders were regarded as binding over every Jewish community. But the extent to which this obligation prevailed depended on the disposition of the Jewish communities towards the Sanhedrim.—Δαμασκὸν: "In the history of religion," writes Dr. G. A. Smith, "Damascus was the stage of two great crises. She was the scene of the conversion of the first Apostle of Christianity to the Gentiles; she was the first Christian city to be taken by Islam. It was fit that Paul's conversion, with his first sense of a mission to the Gentiles, should not take place till his journey had brought him to Jewish soil." If Damascus was not the oldest, it may at all events be called the most enduring city in the world. According to Josephus, Ant., i., 6, 4, it was founded by Uz, the grandson of Shem, whilst a Moslem tradition makes Eliezer its founder, and Abraham its king (see also Jos., Ant., i., 7, 2). Here, too, was the traditional scene of the murder of Abel (Shakespeare, 1 King Henry VI., i., 3). Damascus was situated some seventy miles from the seaboard (about six or eight days' journey from Jerusalem), to the east of Anti-Lebanon in a great plain, watered by the river Abana with her seven streams, to which the city owes her beauty and her charm. Travellers of every age and of every nationality have celebrated the gardens and orchards, the running waters and the fountains of Damascus, and as the Arab passes from the burning desert to its cooling streams and rich verdure, it is not surprising that he hails it as an earthly paradise. From a commercial point of view Damascus has been called the meeting-place and mart of the nations, and whilst the armies of the ancient world passed through her streets, she was also the great avenue of communication for the wealth of north and south, east and west (cf. the significant passage, Ezek. xxvii. 16, 18, and Amos iii. 12, R.V., from which it seems that the city was known at an early date for her own manufactures, although the passing trade of the caravans would be its chief source of income). For its political position at the period of Acts, see below on ver. 24, and for its history in the O.T., its after struggles, and its present position as still the chief city of Syria, see G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 641 ff.; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 2, p. 220, B.D.[2]; and Hastings' B.D., Conybeare and Howson (smaller edition, p. 67 ff.); Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 96, E.T.—πρὸς τὰς συναγωγάς, cf. vi. 9, as at Jerusalem—the number of Jews dwelling in Damascus was so numerous that in a tumult under Nero ten thousand were put to death, Jos., B. J., vii., 8, 7; ii., 20, 2; as at Jerusalem, the Christians of Damascus may not as yet have formally separated from their Jewish brethren; cf. the description of Ananias in xxii. 12; but as communication between Damascus and the capital was very frequent, refugees from Jerusalem would no doubt have fled to Damascus, and it is difficult to believe that the views advocated by Stephen had in him their sole representative. There is no reason to question with Overbeck the existence in Damascus of a community of believers in the claims of Jesus at this early date; but whilst those Christians who devoutly observed the law would not have aroused hostility hitherto, Saul came armed with a commission against all who called on the name of Christ, and so probably his object was not only to bring back the refugees to Jerusalem, but also to stir up the synagogue at Damascus against their own fellow-worshippers who acknowledged that Jesus was the Christ.—ἐάν τινας εὕρῃ: the phrase does not mean that the existence of Christians was doubtful, but whether Saul would succeed in finding them out (Weiss).—ὄντες τῆς ὁδοῦ: the genitive with εἶναι or γίγνεσθαι, very common in N.T. (as in classical Greek); may be explained as the genitive of the class to which a man belongs, or as the genitive of the property in which any one participates, expessed by the genitive singular of an abstract noun, and also, as here, of a concrete noun, Winer-Moulton, xxx., 5, c. (and Winer-Schmiedel, pp. 269, 270). "The Way," R.V., all E.V., "this way," except Wycliff, who has "of this life," apparently reading vitæ instead of viæ in the Vulgate; see Humphry on the R.V., in loco. (In xviii. 25 we have τὴν ὁδὸν τοῦ K. of the instruction given to Apollos, cf. the common metaphorical use of the word in LXX.) In the text (as in xix. 9, xxii. 4, xxiv. 14, 22) the noun is used absolutely, and this use is peculiar to St. Luke (cf. ὁ λόγος, sc., τοῦ θ., x. 44, xiv. 25, etc., and τὸ ὄνομα, v. 41). The term may have originated amongst the Jews who saw in the Christians those who adopted a special way or mode of life, or a special form of their own national belief, but if so, the Christians would see in it nomen et omen—in Christ they had found the Way, the Truth, the Life, John xiv. 6 (so Holtzmann points out the parallel in St. John, and thus accounts for the article τῆς ὁδοῦ—there is only one way of salvation, viz., Christ). Chrysostom (so Theophylact) thinks that the believers were probably so called because of their taking the direct way that leads to heaven (Hom., xix.): see also Dean Plumptre's interesting note. The expression seems to point to the early date of Acts. As it is used thus, absolutely, and with no explanation in the context, Hilgenfeld sees in chap. ix. the commencement of a third source C (see Introd., p. 29).—γυναῖκας, see above on viii. 3. Although no doubt the women referred to were Jewesses, yet it is of interest to note the remark of Josephus, B. J., ii., 20, 2, viz., that the women of Damascus were addicted to the Jewish religion. Their mention also indicates the violence of Saul. "quod nullum sexus respectum habuit,

Ver. 3. ἐν δὲ τῷ πορεύεσθαι, ἐγένετο: on the frequency of the infinitive as here, and of ἐγένετο in St. Luke, see Friedrich, Das Lucasevangelium, p. 13, but whilst St. Luke, even more than the other Evangelists, connects his narratives by more or less Hebraistic formulæ, so he often tones down the Hebraism by changes of order or other modifications, cf. Luke i. 8, 9, v. 17, vi. 1, Acts iv. 5, and ix. 3, etc., see especially Simcox, Writers of the N. T., p. 19, cf. also Blass, Gram., pp. 232, 234.—ἐγγίζειν τῇ Δ.: for a recent description of the three roads which lead from Jerusalem to Damascus, see Luckock, Footprints of the Apostles as traced by St. Luke, i., pp. 223, 224. We may well believe that Saul in his haste and passion would choose the quickest and best frequented route which ran straight to Shechem, and after inclining to the east, by the shores of the lake of Galilee, leads straight to Damascus, with an entrance on the south; possibly he may have been stirred to "exceeding madness" by seeing in the Samaritan villages indications of the spread of the faith which it was his purpose to destroy (Plumptre, Expositor, p. 28 (1878)). Ramsay, Expositor, p. 199, note (1898), follows the old tradition as to the locality (following Sir C. Wilson). But, as he points out, this locality fixed at Kaukab (so Luckock, also u. s.), some ten or twelve miles from Damascus, was changed in modern times for a site nearer the city (so the Romanist commentator Felten, p. 185, laying stress on ἐγγίζειν); but the spot so chosen seems an impossible one from the fact that it is on the east side of the city, not on the south; see also "Damascus" Hastings' B.D., i., 548. Moreover the tradition for this site (one out of four selected at different times) does not appear to have existed for more than some two hundred years, and although we can well understand the action of the Christians in Damascus, who, on St. Paul's Day, walk in procession to this traditional site, and read the narrative of the Apostle's wonderful conversion, it seems that there is no adequate evidence in support of the spot selected. "It was a true instinct that led the Church to take the Conversion as the day of St. Paul. For other saints and martyrs their day of celebration was their dies natalis, the day on which they entered their real life, their day of martyrdom. But the dies natalis of St. Paul, the day on which his true life began, was the day of his Conversion," Ramsay, Expositor, p. 28 (1898).—ἐξαίφνης: the word is used by St. Luke twice in his Gospel and twice in the Acts—only once elsewhere, Mark xiii. 36. Hobart and Zahn claim it as a medical term, and it was no doubt frequent amongst medical writers, as in Hippocrates and Galen (Hobart, Medical Language of St. Luke, pp. 19, 20), but the word is also used in LXX several times in same sense as here.—περιήστραψεν: only twice in N.T.—not found at all in classical Greek, but see 4 Macc. iv. 10. The simple verb occurs in Luke xvii. 24, xxiv. 4. The word is used in St. Paul's own account of the event (xxii. 6), (and περιλάμψαν in his second account xxvi. 13); noun in classical Greek of flashing like lightning. In xxii. 6 the time is fixed "about noon," and in xxvi. 13 it is said that the light was "above the brightness of the sun," and shone round about those who journeyed with Paul. But St. Luke states the general fact, and St. Paul, as was natural, is more explicit in his own account. But St. Paul's mention of the time of day, when an Eastern sun was at its brightest, and of the exceeding glory of the light, evidently indicates that no natural phenomenon was implied.

Ver. 4. καὶ πεσὼν ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν, cf. xxii. 7, both expressions show the overwhelming impression made by the sudden bright light. In xxvi. 14 all fall to the ground, but there is no contradiction with ix. 7, see below on verse 7. Lewin, Farrar (so Hackett, and some early interpreters) have held that Saul and some at least of his companions were mounted, since Saul was the emissary of the high priest, and the journey would occupy some days. On the other hand Felten (following Corn. à Lapide) holds that the text makes no suggestion of this, and that the expression "they led him by the hand" and the command "rise and enter into the city" are against it; but the near neighbourhood of Damascus might easily account for the fact that his companions led Saul by the hand for the remaining distance, which could not have been long, although the immediate proximity of the traditional site cannot be maintained (see above on ver. 3). As the strict Jews, like the Pharisees, seldom used horses, Felten may be right in conjecturing that Saul rode upon an ass or a mule (p. 186, note).—ἤκουσε φωνὴν λέγουσαν: in St. Paul's own account we have ἤκουσα φωνῆς λεγούσης, xxii. 7, and ἤκουσα φωνὴν λέγ., as here, in xxvi. 14. It would seem therefore that the distinction between ἀκούειν with (1) accusative, and (2) genitive; (1) to hear and understand, (2) to hear, merely, cannot be pressed (so Alford, in loco, and Simcox, Language of N. T., p. 90, and Weiss on xxii. 7; but see on the other hand Rendall on ix., ver. 7). Thus in the passage before us it has been usual to explain ἀκούειν with φωνήν, ver. 4, as indicating that Saul not only heard but understood the voice, cf. xxii. 14, whilst ἀκούειν with φωνῆς, ver. 7, has been taken to show that his comrades heard, but did not understand (so Weiss, in loco, and also on xxii. 9). But there is (1) no contradiction with xxii. 9, for there it is said of Paul's companions: τὴν δὲ φωνὴν οὐκ ἤκουσαν τοῦ λαλοῦντός μοι—they heard the utterance, ix. 7, xxii. 7, but did not hear definitely, or understand who it was that spoke, μηδένα δὲ θεωροῦντες. But (2) on comparing the passages together, it appears that in ix. 4 and 7 a distinction is drawn between the contents of the utterance and the mere sound of the voice, a distinction drawn by the accusative and genitive; in xxii. 7 the same distinction is really maintained, and by the same cases, since in xxii. 7 Paul, in speaking of himself, says that he heard a voice, i.e., was conscious of a voice speaking to him (genitive, φωνῆς), (Simcox, u. s., p. 85), whilst in ver. 9 (accusative φωνήν) the contents of the utterance are referred to, cf. ver. 14 in the same chapter; in xxvi. 14 the accusative is rightly used for the contents of the utterance which are given there more fully than elsewhere.—Σαούλ, Σαούλ: in each of the three narratives of the Conversion it is significant that the Hebrew form is thus given, and it is also found in the address of Ananias, probably himself a Hebrew, ver. 17, to the new convert. On the emphatic and solemn repetition of the name cf. Gen. xxii. 11, and in the N.T., Luke x. 41, xxii. 31, Matt. xxiii. 37, and on the frequency of this repetition of a name as characteristic of Luke in Gospel and Acts see Friedrich, pp. 75, 76, cf. Luke viii. 24, x. 41, xxii. 31, cf. xxiii. 21 (see also Deissmann's note Bibelstudien, p. 184, on the introduction of the Hebrew name).—τί με διώκεις; cf. vii. 52, and 1 Cor. xv. 9, Gal. i. 13. "Saul's first lesson was the mystical union between Christ and His Church" cf. Matt. x. 40, xxv. 40, 45, John x. 16, etc. No wonder that Felten sees "an ineffable pathos" in the words; Wendt quotes St. Augustine: "caput pro membris clamabat," cf. also Corn. à Lapide: "corpus enim mysticum Christi est ecclesia, membra sunt fideles".

Ver. 5. Τίς εἶ, Κύριε; the title is here used in reverent and awestruck response to the question of a speaker, in whose voice, accompanied as it was by the supernatural light, Saul recognised a divine utterance—it is therefore more than a mere word of respect, as in xvi. 30, xxv. 26; it indicates, as St. Chrysostum noted, a purpose to follow the voice, whether it was that of an angel or of God Himself (Felten), "Jam parat se ad obediendum, qui prius insaniebat ad persequendum," Augustine.—Ἐγὼ . . . σὺ: both pronouns are emphatic, and contrasted: Ἰησοῦς, cf. xx. 8, and note. For rest of verse see critical notes.

Ver. 6. For this verse see critical notes and also xxii. 10. Ἀνάστηθι: verb characteristic of St. Luke, see on v. 7. Here, if we compare xxvi. 16 (xiv. 10), it is evidently used in a literal sense.—καὶ λαληθήσεταί σοι, see note on xxvi. 15.

Ver. 7. οἱ συνοδεύοντες: probably riding in company with him; not found in classical Greek, but used in the same sense as here in Plutarch—not elsewhere in N. T; but see Wisdom vi. 23, and Tobit v. 16 S (AB al.), so according to S[1] in Zech. viii. 21 (ABS[3] al.), cf. also Symm. in Gen. xxxiii. 12.—εἱστήκεισαν ἐννεοί. The form ἐννεός is incorrect, see critical notes: in LXX, cf. Prov. xvii. 28, Isa. lvi. 10, Epist. of Jer. 41 (Symm. in Hos. ix. 7); see critical notes. It is frivolous to find a contradiction here with xxvi. 14. No stress is laid upon εἱστήκ., which may be used like εἶναι, and even if there is, it does not preclude a previous falling. We have merely to suppose that the sight and sound had affected Saul's companions in a less degree than Saul, and that they rose from the ground before him, to make the narratives quite consistent (see Felten, p. 193, Hackett, in loco; B.D.[1], iv., "Paul" p. 733). Or it is quite possible, as Weiss points out on xxvi. 14, that here the narrative emphasises the impression made by the hearing of the voice, and in xxvi. 14 the immediate result produced by the light, and that the narrator is quite unconscious of any contradiction in his recital (see notes below on xxii., xxvi.).—μηδένα δὲ θεωροῦντες: there is no contradiction between this statement and xxii. 9, where it is said that they saw the light—here it is not denied that they saw a light, but only that they saw no person. Holtzmann apparently forgets this, and says that whilst in xxix. 9 they see the light, in ix. 7 they see nothing; but the pronoun is not neuter, but masculine; μηδένα (see critical notes and reading in β). The inference is that Saul saw Jesus, but although this is not stated in so many words here, it is also to be inferred from the words of Ananias in ver. 17, and xxii. 14, and from St. Paul's own statement in 1 Cor. xv. 8, and ix. 1. St. Chrysostom refers ἀκούοντες μὲν τῆς φ. to the words of Saul, but this is certainly not natural, for τῆς φ. evidently refers back to ἤκουσα φωνὴν in ver. 4.

Ver. 8. ἀνεῳγμένων; see critical notes. —οὐδένα ἔβλεπε: his eyes, which he had closed mechanically, as he fell overwhelmed with the dazzling brightness of the light, and of the appearance of Jesus, he now opens, but only to find that he saw nothing (οὐδέν) (see critical note)—he had become blind (so Weiss and Wendt, cf. xxii. 11). This blindness was the clearest proof that the appearances vouchsafed to him had been a reality (Felten), see also ver. 18.—χειραγωγοῦντες: the necessary result of his blindness, cf. Judg. xvi. 26 and Tob. xi. 16, but in each case the reading is varied (see H. and R.); in N.T. only in Acts, cf. xxii. 11 (and see xiii. 11); it is also found in the Apocryphal Gospel of Peter, x. (ver. 40 in Harnack's edition). "He who would strike others was himself struck, and the proud Pharisee became a deeply humbled penitent —a guide of the blind" he was himself to be guided by others (Felten).

Ver. 9. ἦν . . . μὴ βλέπων: on ἦν with participle, characteristic, see above on chap. i. 10. Wendt (in seventh edition, not in eighth), and so Felten, Alford, Hackett, distinguish between μή and οὐ with ἔφαγεν and ἔπιεν, and see especially Winer-Moulton, lv., 5. οὐ β. would have simply meant blind; μὴ β. is not seeing (not able to see)—said of one who had been, and might appear to be again, possessed of sight; the not eating and not drinking are related simply as matters of fact; see the whole section. Blass regards μή with participle as simply = οὐ, so in ver. 7 μηδένα with participle = οὐδένα, ut alias (see also Lumby's note).—οὐκ ἔφαγ. κ.τ.λ.: there is no reason why the words should not be taken literally, in spite of Wendt's objection as against Meyer in loco, as an expression of penitential sorrow and contrition for his perversity (so Weiss and Holtzmann, no less than Felten): "with what fervour must he then have prayed for 'more light'" (Felten). On Saul's blindness and its possibly lasting effects, see Plumptre, in loco, Felten, p. 196, and on the other hand Lightfoot on Gal. vi. 11, and Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, etc., pp. 38, 39.

Ver. 10. Ἀνανίας: nomen et omen, "Jehovah is gracious" (cf. xxii. 12). No doubt a Jewish Christian (he is supposed by some, as by St. Augustine, to have been the presbyter to whose care the Church at Damascus was committed). For more details and traditions concerning him, see Dr. James, "Ananias," Hastings' B.D., and Felten, in loco. The objections raised against the historical character of the meeting between Ananias and Saul, by Baur, Zeller, Overbeck, are considered by Wendt as quite insufficient. Weizsäcker regards the narrative of the blindness and its cure by Ananias as transparently symbolical, and adds that in any case it is suggestive that Paul, Gal. iv. 15, seems, at least in later days, to have had a severe ailment in his eyes (see however on this point ver. 9 above). But the weakness, if it existed, might have been caused by the previous blindness at Damascus, and this suggestion, if it is needed, has at all events more probability than the supposition that the narrative in the text was due to the fact that in after years Saul's eyes were affected! (so Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i., 72). Zeller indeed admits, Acts, i., 289, E.T., that the connection of Saul with Ananias, "irrespective of the visions and miracles," may have been historical, and he falls back upon Schneckenburger's theory that the author of Acts had a special aim in view in introducing a man so avowedly pious in the law (xxii. 12) to introduce Paul to Christianity. But Schneckenburger does not seem to deny the main fact of the meeting between the two men (Ueber den Zweck der Apostelgeschichte, pp. 168, 169), and St. Paul would scarcely have spoken as he did later (xxii. 12) before a Jewish crowd, in a speech delivered when the capital was full of pilgrims from all parts, and at a time when the constant communication between Damascus and Jerusalem would have exposed him to instant refutation, had his statements with regard to Ananias been incorrect. It is evident that the supernatural element in the narrative is what really lay at the root of Zeller's objections. —ὁ Κύριος, i.e., Jesus, as is evident from a comparison of vv. 13, 14, 17.—ἐν ὁράματι: critical objections have been raised by Baur and others against the double vision narrated here of Saul and Ananias, as against the double vision of Cornelius and St. Peter in x. 3 and xi., but see Lumby's note, in loco, and reference to Conybeare and Howson, quoted also by Felten. The idea of the older rationalists that Saul and Ananias had previously been friends, and that thus the coincidence of their visions may be accounted for, is justly regarded by Wendt as entirely arbitrary. The vision, as narrated by Luke, is evidently regarded as something objective, cf. vv. 10, 13.

Ver. 11. ἀναστὰς: the word as has been previously remarked is characteristic of Luke (cf. its use in O.T.), and does ἐγώ, Κύριε. 11. ὁ δὲ Κύριος πρὸς αὐτόν, Ἀναστὰς[1] πορεύθητι ἐπὶ τὴν ῥύμην τὴν καλουμένην Εὐθεῖαν, καὶ ζήτησον ἐν οἰκίᾳ Ἰούδα Σαῦλον ὀνόματι,[2] Ταρσέα. ἰδοὺ γὰρ προσεύχεται, 12.[3] καὶ εἶδεν ἐν ὁράματι ἄνδρα ὀνόματι Ἀνανίαν εἰσελθόντα καὶ ἐπιθέντα αὐτῷ χεῖρα,

[1] Αναστας ℵACEHLP, Vulg. (am. demid. tol.), so Tisch., W.H. marg., Weiss, Hilg. (cf. x. 13, 20); but αναστα in B and most verss., so Lach., W.H. text, Wendt.

[2] Before Ταρσεα Flor. and Par. have γενει, not an unusual word with adjectives of nationality.

[3] Blass in β, following Flor., omits the whole verse, Hilg. brackets; but there seems no reason for its insertion if not genuine, as it is not influenced by any parallel passage (cf. long discussion in Corssen, Der Cyprianische Text, p. 21 ff.). Wendt (edit. 1899) decides for its retention, but another and a further question arises as to the original reading if the verse is retained. εν οραματι om. ℵA 61, Vulg., Sah., Boh., Aeth., so Tisch. R.V., Wendt. The words may be an explanatory gloss. In BC 163, so Blass [W.H.] Weiss εν οραμ. follow ανδρα. Instead of χειρα the plural χειρας is found in ℵABCE, Vulg., Boh., Arm., so W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, but the art. τας is doubtful, probably to be omitted (Wendt) with ℵ*AC 61, so Tisch., Weiss; but retained by ℵcBE, R.V. [W.H.].

not in the least support the idea that the vision was a dream of the night, cf. viii. 26.—ἐπὶ τὴν ῥύμην τ. κ. Εὐθεῖαν: ῥύμη, cf. xii. 10, Matt. vi. 2. In Luke xiv. 21 it seems to be used in contrast to πλατεῖα, but in LXX at least in one passage it is used as its equivalent, Isa. xv. 3, cf. R.V., "broad places," רְחֹב. It is found also in Ecclus. ix. 7 (perhaps twice) and in Tobit xiii. 18, where in the previous ver., 17, we have πλατεῖαι, although it is very doubtful whether we can press a contrast here, and ῥύμη, ver. 18, might perhaps be taken as meaning a city-quarter, Latin vicus, see Speaker's Commentary, in loco. On the stages in the history of the word, and its occurrence in Attic Greek, e.g., in the comic writers Antiphanes (380 B.C.) and Philippides (323 B.C.), see Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, pp. 15, 16; Rutherford, New Phrynichus, p. 488. — Εὐθεῖαν: "the street called Straight" may be traced from the eastern to the western gate, and it still bears the name, Derb el-Mustakîm, Schneller, Apostelfahrten, pp. 254, 255, "Damascus," Hastings' B.D. The "house of Judas," also that of Ananias, are still pointed out, but considerable uncertainty attaches to the attempts at identification, see "Damascus," u. s., also Felten, in loco.—Ταρσέα: Tarsus was the capital of the Roman Province of Cilicia. Curtius has called it the Athens of Asia Minor, and Strabo emphasises its celebrity for the production of men famous in all branches of science and art. As a celebrated university town it may have ranked amongst its students not only St. Paul but his companion St. Luke, attracted it may be by the renown of its medical school; and if this be so, the acquaintance of the two men may date from their student days. To Tarsus, moreover, and to a country where Stoicism was cradled, St. Paul may have been indebted for his evident familiarity with the ideas and tenets of the Stoic philosophy. From Cyprus came Zeno and Persæus, from Soli, Chrysippus and Aratus, whilst Anazarba in Cilicia was the birthplace of the physician Dioscorides, contemporary of St. Luke as of St. Paul. It is indeed possible to enumerate at least six Stoic teachers whose home was Tarsus. See notes on St. Paul at Athens and at Ephesus, and see J. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., on Acts vi. 9; Curtius, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, ii., p. 538 ff.; Zahn, Einleitung i., pp. 37, 50; Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 303 ff.; Salmon, Introd., p. 317.—ἰδοὺ γὰρ προσεύχεται: "orantes videt Jesus" Bengel; present tense, continuous prayer, 1 Thess. v. 17.

Ver. 12. ἐν ὁράματι, see critical notes. —ἄνδρα Ἀ. ὀνόμ.: the words would certainly indicate, as Wendt points out (seventh edition, not eighth), that Saul was previously unacquainted with Ananias. Jesus communicates the contents of the vision, and speaks as it were from the standpoint of Saul (see Felten's note, p. 190).—ἐπιθέντα κ.τ.λ., see above on viii. 17.

ὅπως ἀναβλέψῃ. 13. ἀπεκρίθη δὲ ὁ Ἀνανίας, Κύριε, ἀκήκοα[1] ἀπὸ πολλῶν περὶ τοῦ ἀνδρὸς τούτου, ὅσα κακὰ ἐποίησε τοῖς ἁγίοις σου ἐν Ἱερουσαλήμ· 14. καὶ ὧδε ἔχει ἐξουσίαν παρὰ τῶν ἀρχιερέων, δῆσαι πάντας τοὺς ἐπικαλουμένους τὸ ὄνομά σου. 15. Εἶπε δὲ πρὸς αὐτὸν ὁ Κύριος, Πορεύου, ὅτι σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς μοι ἐστὶν οὗτος, τοῦ βαστάσαι τὸ ὄνομά μου ἐνώπιον[2] ἐθνῶν καὶ βασιλέων, υἱῶν τε Ἰσραήλ.

[1] ακηκοα HLP, Chrys.; ηκουσα ℵABCE, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.

[2] εθνων, but art. των prefixed in BC*, so Lach., R.V. (W.H.), Weiss, Wendt (probably); but των apparently does not suit the context.

Ver. 13. Ananias naturally hesitates to go to a man who had undoubtedly inflicted harm upon the Christians, and had come to Damascus with the same intent. But there is nothing inconsistent in the fact that Ananias should not be acquainted with Saul personally, whilst he knew of his persecuting zeal.—τοῖς ἁγίοις σου: used here for the first time as a name for the Christians; cf. vv. 32, 41, xxvi. 10. Every Israelite was ἅγιος by the mere fact of his membership in the holy Ecclesia of Israel, and Ananias, himself a Jew, does not hesitate to employ the same term of the members of the Christian Ecclesia (see Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 56, 57, and Grimm, sub v., 2). Its use has therefore a deep significance: "Christus habet sanctos, ut suos: ergo est Deus," says Bengel. The force of the words can be more fully appreciated in connection with the significance of the phrase in ver. 14, τοῖς ἐπικ. τὸ ὄνομά σου. In xxvi. 10 it is noticeable that the word occurs on St. Paul's own lips as he stood before Agrippa "in the bitterness of his self-accusation for his acts of persecution, probably in intentional repetition of Ananias's language respecting those same acts of his. It was a phrase that was likely to burn itself into his memory on that occasion." And so we find St. Paul addressing at least six of his Epistles to those who were "called to be Saints," indicating that every Christian as such had this high calling. If Christians individually had realised it, the prophetic vision of the Psalms of Solomon (xvii. 36) would have been fulfilled in the early Church of Christ: ὅτι πάντες ἅγιοι, καὶ βασιλεὺς αὐτῶν Χριστὸς Κύριος (see Ryle and James' edition, p. 141).—ἐν Ἱερ. belongs to ἐποίησε, and so points back to viii. 3, and to Saul as the soul of the persecution which broke out in Jerusalem, cf. Paul's own language before Agrippa, xxvi. 10.

Ver. 14. ὧδε hic et huc (Blass), ver. 21.—τοὺς ἐπικ. τὸ ὄνομά σου—note the repeated pronoun and compare 1 Cor. i. 2s where ἐπικ. is closely joined with ἅγιοι. and on the whole phrase see above ii. 21

Ver. 15. σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς, cf. St. Paul's own language in Gal. i. 15, genitive of quality; common Hebraistic mode of expression (cf. viii. 23) = ἐκλεκτόν, see Blass, Gram., p. 96; cf. Luke xvi. 8, xviii. 6, etc. For σκεῦος similarly used see Jer. xxii. 28, Hosea viii. 8, and Schöttgen, Horæ Hebraicæ, in loco; and in N.T. Rom. ix. 22, 23, 1 Thess. iv. 4. Grimm and Blass both compare σκ. de homine in Polyb., xiii., 5, 7; xv., 25, 1. Vas electionis; the words are written over what is said to be St. Paul's tomb in the church dedicated to him near the city of Rome.—τοῦ βαστάσαι, genitive of purpose; verb as used here continues the metaphor of σκεῦος; may mean simply to bear, to carry, or it may denote to bear as a burden; cf. 2 Kings xviii. 14, Ecclus. vi. 25; cf. Luke xiv. 27, Acts xv. 10, Rom. xv. 1, etc.—ἐθνῶν καὶ βασιλέων — ἐθν., placed first because Saul's special mission is thus indicated. —βασιλ., cf. xxvi. 12, 2 Tim. i. 16; also before the governors of Cyprus, Achaia, Judæa.—υἱῶν τε Ἰ., see critical notes above, again the closely connecting τε, all three nouns being comprehended under the one article τῶν—the Apostle's work was to include, not to exclude, his brethren according to the flesh, whilst mission to the Gentiles is always emphasised; cf. xxii. 15 and 21, xxvi. 17; cf. Rom. i. 13, 14.

Ver. 16. ἐγὼ γὰρ: he is a chosen vessel unto me, and therefore ὑποδ. Wendt disagrees with Meyer, who finds the showing in the experiences of the sufferings (so Hackett and Felten), and

16. ἐγὼ γὰρ ὑποδείξω αὐτῷ, ὅσα δεῖ αὐτὸν ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματός μου παθεῖν.

17.[1] Ἀπῆλθε δὲ Ἀνανίας καὶ εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν, καὶ ἐπιθεὶς ἐπ' αὐτὸν τὰς χεῖρας εἶπε, Σαοὺλ ἀδελφέ, ὁ Κύριος ἀπέσταλκέ με, Ἰησοῦς ὁ ὀφθείς σοι ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ ᾗ ἤρχου, ὅπως ἀναβλέψῃς καὶ πλησθῇς Πνεύματος Ἁγίου. 18. καὶ εὐθέως ἀπέπεσον ἀπὸ τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν αὐτοῦ ὡσεὶ λεπίδες, ἀνέβλεψέ τε παραχρῆμα,[2] καὶ ἀναστὰς ἐβαπτίσθη, καὶ λαβὼν τροφὴν ἐνίσχυσεν.[3] 19. Ἐγένετο δὲ ὁ Σαῦλος μετὰ τῶν ἐν

[1] Blass, following Flor., reconstructs (so very simil. Hilg.) τοτε εγερθεις (as if the vision came in sleep; cf. Corssen, G. G. A., p. 437 (1896), who thinks that the expression is an interpolation and compares β text in xvi. 9 ff., p. 436, u. s.) Αν. απηλθεν και εισ. εις την οικ.; so again Flor. has επεθηκε αυτῳ την χειρα εν τῳ ονομ. Ι. Χ. λεγων.

[2] παραχρημα om. ℵABCHP, Vulg., Boh., Syr. Pesh., Arm., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. ℵC[2] 40, Boh. read δε instead of τε.

[3] ενισχυσεν, so Tisch., Blass, Weiss, Hilg.; ενισχυθη BC*, so W.H., Wendt (probably). ὁ Σαυλος om. ℵABCE 13, 61, Vulg., many vers., so Tisch., W.H., R.V.; beginning, perhaps, of a Church lectionary. Flor. reads "dies autem plurimos et in civitate. D cum discentibus transegit," perhaps some influence of xvi. 12, xiv. 28, xxv. 14. Blass suspects Δαμασκῳ and brackets in β. Blass places St. Paul's visit to Arabia before this period, a visit which St. Luke omits.

refers the word with De Wette, Overbeck, to a revelation or to some directing counsel of Christ, cf. xiii. 2, xvi. 6, 9, xx. 20, so too Blass—cf. 2 Cor. xi. 25-28. Either interpretation seems better than that of Weiss, who refers the γάρ back to πορεύου, as if Christ were assuring Ananias that Saul would not inflict suffering upon others, but I will show him how much he (αὐτόν, with emphasis) must suffer, etc., cf. also Bengel's comment.

Ver. 17. ἐπιθεὶς ἐπ' ἀ. τὰς χ.: not as bestowing the Holy Ghost (for see context), but as recovering from his blindness, cf. Mark xvi. 18. Σαούλ, see on ver. 4, perhaps too the word used by Jesus would reassure Saul.—ἀδελφέ: as a Christian brother, and not merely as a brother in nationality, ii. 29, xxii. 1, xxviii. 17—for the word see further, Kennedy, p. 95, and see on i. 15.—ὁ Κ. . . . Ἰησοῦς: the words must have further reassured Saul—the title by which he had himself addressed Jesus is more than justified.

Ver. 18. καὶ εὐθέως: as the immediate result of the laying on of hands the recovery of sight is given, but the baptism follows for the reception of the Holy Ghost, cf. xxii. 13 ff.—ἀπέπεσον . . . ὡσεὶ λ.: the words cannot be taken as merely figurative with Weiss or Zöckler, or with Blass as merely indicating the speediness of the cure—some scaly substance had formed over the eyes, probably as the result of the dazzling brightness which had struck upon them, cf. Tobit iii. 17, xi. 13, and ii. 10 (cf. vi. 8), λευκώματα = white films (see H. and R., sub v., λεύκωμα). St. Chrysostom's comment is also to be noted: καὶ ἵνα μὴ νομίσῃ φαντασίαν τις εἶναι τὴν πήρωσιν, διὰ τοῦτο αἱ λεπίδες. Here, as elsewhere, we may see traces of St. Luke's accuracy as a physician. Both ἀποπίπτειν and λεπίς are used only by St. Luke in N.T. (λεπίς, although found six times in LXX, does not occur in the sense before us), and both words are found conjoined in medical writers, the former for the falling off of scales from the cuticle and particles from the diseased parts of the body or bones, etc., and λεπίς as the regular medical term for the particles or scaly substances thrown off from the body (see instances in Hobart, p. 39, and Felten, in loco), and cf. also Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., ii., p. 436 (1899).—ἀναστὰς, see above on viii. 26; the word may here be taken literally (although not necessarily so), as of Saul rising from a sitting or reclining position (so Weiss).—ἐβαπτίσθη: no doubt by Ananias—there was no reception into the Church without this.—λαβὼν τροφὴν, see on ver. 9.—ἐνίσχυσεν: here used intransitively (1 Macc. vii. 25, 3 Macc. ii. 32), if we adopt reading of T.R. which is Δαμασκῷ μαθητῶν ἡμέρας τινάς· 20.[1] καὶ εὐθέως ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς ἐκήρυσσε τὸν Χριστόν,[2] ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ. 21. ἐξίσταντο δὲ πάντες οἱ ἀκούοντες καὶ ἔλεγον, Οὐχ οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ πορθήσας ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ τοὺς ἐπικαλουμένους τὸ ὄνομα τοῦτο, καὶ ὧδε εἰς τοῦτο ἐληλύθει ἵνα δεδεμένους αὐτοὺς ἀγάγῃ ἐπὶ τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς; 22. Σαῦλος δὲ μᾶλλον ἐνεδυναμοῦτο, καὶ συνέχυνε[3] τοὺς Ἰουδαίους τοὺς κατοικοῦντας ἐν Δαμασκῷ, συμβιβάζων ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Χριστός.

[1] Flor., Par., Wern. read και εισελθων εις τας συναγωγας των Ι., cf. xiii. 5, xiv. 1, xix. 8, so Hilg. The phrase "synagogue of the Jews" usually implies contrast between Jews and Gentiles, which is hardly the case here, but the writer might wish to emphasise the boldness of Saul: Flor., Iren. read μετα πασης παρρησιας, so Hilg. ο Χριστος after εστι 68, Flor., Iren[lat.] (Iren[gk.] after Θεου), retained by Blass and by Hilg., perhaps from ver. 22 (cf. John xx. 31).

[2] Χριστον HLP, Chrys.; Ιησουν ℵABCE 61, Iren., Vulg., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt; Hilg. has τον κυριον Ιησουν with Flor.; ουτος in ver. 22 seems to demand a preceding Ιησουν.

[3] συνεχυνε AB³HLP, so Blass; συνεχυννε ℵB*C, Tisch., W.H., App., p. 172, and see also Winer-Schmiedel, p. 111; Hilg. has συνεχεεν. τους Ιουδ., but τους om. by ℵ*B, so W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass. At end of verse Flor., Gig., Par. add εις ον ευδοκησεν ο Θεος—retained by Blass and Hilg.

retained by Weiss. We have the verb, in the N.T. peculiar to St. Luke, used in the transitive sense (cf. Luke xxii. 43 and 44, W. H., App., 67, and Plummer, in loco), and in this sense its use outside the LXX is confined to Hippocrates and St. Luke, Hobart, p. 80 (cf. 2 Sam. xxii. 40, Ecclus. l. 4); but cf. Psalms of Solomon, xvi. 12. The reading here to which Wendt apparently inclines is ἐνισχύθη (see critical notes), as this would be in accordance with the transitive use of the verb in Luke xxii. 43, and other instances.

Ver. 19. ἡμέρας τινάς: used here apparently, as in x. 48, xvi. 12, xxiv. 24, etc., of a short period; see note on ver. 23, and cf. critical notes, Blass in β, and see ver. 23.

Ver. 20. ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς—publicly in the Jewish Assemblies: οὐκ ᾐσχύνετο (Chrys.).—ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ: only here in Acts. As the preaching was in the synagogue the term would be used in its Messianic sense (cf. John i. 49), according to the early Messianic interpretation of Psalm ii. 7; cf. xiii. 33 and St. Paul's reference to the Psalm in another address to Jews, in the Pisidian Antioch. For the use of the term as applied to the Messiah by the Jews see further Book of Enoch, cv., 2, and Dr. Charles' note.

Ver. 21. πορθήσας: same word used by St. Paul of himself in Gal. i. 13, 23; nowhere else in N.T., but see 4 Macc. iv. 23, xi. 4; used often in classical Greek. Blass draws attention to the coincidence between this passage and the use of the word in Gal., and adds: "ut a Paulo hoc ipsum verbum scriptorem accepisse dicas". Wendt (1899) dismisses the point of connection in the use of the word by the two authors Luke and Paul as accidental. He bases his objection, p. 35, upon the view that St. Paul's Epistles and Acts are independent of each other; but this would not prevent St. Luke from receiving the narrative of the events at Damascus from the lips of Paul himself.—τοὺς ἐπικ., see above on ver. 14.—ἐληλύθει, pluperfect: "inest indicatio voluntatis mulctæ," Blass, cf. also Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 44, and Blass, Gramm., p. 197. On the jurisdiction of the Sanhedrim and their commissions to their officers see iv. 5, and Lewin, St. Paul, i., 52 (smaller edition). For ἵνα followed by the conjunctive after a past tense in preference to the optative cf. v. 26, xxv. 26, in Winer-Moulton, xli. b. 1 a.

Ver. 22. ἐνεδυναμοῦτο: only used here by St. Luke, and elsewhere only by St. Paul (five or six times), and always of religious and spiritual strength; used also three times in the LXX; twice with reference to the power of the Spirit, Judg. vi. 34, 1 Chron. xii. 18; in Psalm li. 7, perhaps the simple verb δυναμόω.—συνέχυνε: "confounded," so A. and R.V., or rather, "continued to confound," imperfect active, cf. ii. 6, "were confounded," passive, see also xix. 32, xxi. 31 (critical notes above): from συγχύννω (συγχύνω), nowhere used except in Acts, as above (see Moulton and Geden). συγχύννω: not found in classical Greek nor in LXX, a later form of συγχέω, συγχέω T. W. H. (cf. ἐκχύννομαι from ἐκχέω, three times in Acts, also two or three times in Luke's Gospel; in Matthew twice, in Mark once, also Rom. v. 5, Jude ver. 11; not found in LXX, but see Theod., 2 Sam. xiv. 14); in Acts, xxi. 27. συνέχεον from συγχέω (but see in loco), Moulton and Geden. According to the best MS., Tisch., W.H., read the double ν, but elsewhere we have only one ν, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 132, Blass, Gram., p. 41.—συμβιβάζων: only used by St. Luke and St. Paul, cf. xvi. 10, xix. 33, see especially for this last passage, Grimm-Thayer, sub v., cf. 1 Cor. ii. 16. In the LXX the word is used in the sense of teaching, instructing, Exod. iv. 12, 15, xviii. 16, Isa. xl. 13, etc., this usage is purely Biblical (in Attic Greek rather προσβ. in this sense): lit., (1) to bring together; (2) then like συμβάλλω, to put together, to compare, to examine closely; (3) so to deduce, to prove; thus here the word may well imply that Saul compared Messianic passages of the O.T. with the events of the life of Jesus of Nazareth, and hence deduced the proof that He was the Christ, cf. παρατιθέμενος in xvii. 3. So Theophylact explains διδάσκων καὶ ἑρμηνεύων out of the Scriptures which the Jews themselves knew.

Ver. 23. ἡμέρας ἱκανάς: whether the period thus described was meant to cover the definite period in Gal. i. 16, i.e., as including St. Paul's visit to Arabia, it is difficult to decide. Lightfoot holds that ἱκανός in St. Luke's language is connected rather with largeness than with smallness, Luke vii. 12, Acts xx. 37, and that the Hebrew phrase ימים which St. Luke is copying admits of almost any extension of time (Galatians, p. 89, note). Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, v., 2, pointed out in the Hebrew of 1 Kings ii. 38, 39, an instance of the use of the phrase "many days" = a period of three years (so Lewin, Felten). It is therefore possible that St. Luke might employ an indefinite, vague expression, an expression which at all events is characteristic of him. On the other hand, Wendt (1899), whilst seeing here a longer period than in ver. 19, compares ver. 43, xviii. 18, xxvii. 7, and decides that the phrase cannot denote time measured by years (so Blass). A reason for St. Luke's indefiniteness may perhaps be that St. Paul's visit to Arabia was not within the scope and purpose of his narrative; or Belser, Beiträge (p. 55), and others may be right in maintaining that the visit may lie between vv. 22 and 23, and that, as such intervals are not wanting in Luke's Gospel, it is not strange that they should occur in Acts, but that it does not at all follow that the historian was unacquainted with St. Luke's Arabian journey, as Wendt maintains: "sed aliquid omittere non est idem atque illud negare" Knabenbauer, in loco. But if we take the expression, ver. 19, certain days to indicate the first visit to Damascus, and the expression, ver. 23, many days to indicate a second visit, the visit to Arabia, Gal. i. 19, may lie between these two (Knabenbauer), and if we accept the reading Ἰησοῦν in ver. 20, it may be that Saul first preached that Jesus was the Son of God, and then after his first retirement in Arabia he was prepared to prove on his return to Damascus that He was also the Christ, ver. 22 (see Mr. Barnard's article, Expositor, April, 1899).

Ver. 24. ἐπιβουλή: "plot"; N.T. only used in Acts; in three other passages, xx. 3, 19, xxiii. 30. It is used in the same sense in LXX, Esth. ii. 22 (for other instances of the word see H. and R.), and frequently in classical Greek.—παρετήρουν: if we follow R.V., see critical notes, we have the middle for the active, cf. Luke xiv. 1, vi. 7, Gal. iv. 10. There is no contradiction involved with 2 Cor. xi. 32. The ethnarch acted as the instrument of the Jews, at their instigation, or they acted by his permission, or possibly as the Jews were the actual originators of the persecution of Saul, St. Luke for brevity speaks of them as carrying it out, cf. ii. 23, xxviii. 27. See to this effect, Blass, Zöckler, Felten, Wendt.—τε: if we add καὶ R.V., see critical notes, the two words τε καὶ signify that they not only laid wait for him, but also watched the city gates day and night, to secure the success of their design; "and they watched the gates also," R.V. In 2 Cor. xi. 32, according to Paul's own statement, the ethnarch under Aretas the king guarded the walls to prevent his escape. But this seems strange, as Damascus was part of the Roman province of Syria. The difficulty is met by a large number of modern writers by the assumption that Caligula, whose reign began in 37 A.D., gave Damascus to Aretas, to whose predecessors it had belonged (Jos., Ant., xiii., 5, 2). On the accession of Caligula a great change of policy occurred—Antipas, the old foe of Aretas, who was indignant with him for the divorce of his daughter, was shortly after deposed, and his kingdom was added to that of Herod Agrippa, who had already received from the emperor the tetrarchy of Philip and Lysanias (Jos., Ant., xviii., 6, 10). But this latter grant was one of the first acts of Caligula's reign, and there is nothing improbable in the supposition that the new ruler should also bestow some gift of territory on the great foe of the Herodian house, who apparently reigned until 40 A.D. Added to this there is the fact that we have no coins of Damascus with the imperial superscription from 34-62 A.D. In 62-63 the image of Nero begins, but there are no coins marked with that of Caligula or Claudius. The latter emperor died in 54 A.D., and in a few years Damascus must have passed again into Roman hands, if the above theory is correct. Certainly this theory is more feasible than that which supposes that Aretas had actually seized Damascus himself in 37 A.D., when upon the death of Tiberius (who had supported Antipas), Vitellius, the governor of Syria, had withdrawn his troops and the expedition which the emperor had despatched against Aretas. But whether this forcible taking possession of the city is placed before, during, or after the expedition of Vitellius, we should expect that it would have met with energetic punishment at the hands of the governor of Syria, but of this there is no mention or trace (P. Ewald). McGiffert, who favours an earlier chronology, and dates Paul's conversion in 31 or 32 A.D., contends that the flight from Damascus may have occurred as well in the year 35, i.e., in the reign of Tiberius, as in 38, when no change had taken place in the status of Damascus; the city was subject to Rome, but Aretas may have had control over it, just as Herod had control over Jerusalem. There is at all events no ground for supposing that the term ethnarch denotes that Aretas was only head of the Arabian colony in Damascus (so O. Holtzmann, following Keim, Nösgen, etc.), or that he was only a chance visitor who exercised his authority to the detriment of Paul (Anger); any such suggestion utterly fails to account for the fact that he is represented as guarding Damascus. It has been suggested that the wife of Aretas may well have been a proselyte, but the fact that the Jews of Damascus were both numerous and powerful is quite sufficient to explain the attitude of the governor, Jos., B. J., ii., 20, 2; vii., 8, 7. See "Aretas" in Hastings' B.D., and B.D.². McGiffert, Apostolic Age, pp. 164, 165; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 619, 620; O. Holtzmann, *Neutest. See further on the title ἐθνάρχης Schürer, Studien und Kritiken, 1899 (1), which he explains by the conditions of the Nabatean kingdom, in which tribes not cities were concerned—the head of such a tribe being actually so called in more than one inscription.

Instead of τε, ℵABCEFa 61, Vulg., Or., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Hilg. read δε και—Alford supposes that το in παρετηρουντο became mistaken for τε, and then δε και was struck out, no other copula being wanted.

[2] οι μαθηται, after these words ℵABCFa 61, Vulg. (am. fu. demid. tol.), Or. read αυτου, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Zöckler, Holtzmann; perhaps omitted because in vv. 19 and 26 μαθηται is used absolutely. σπυριδι—but in ℵC σφυρ., so W.H. (but not Weiss, who follows AB, etc.), although with σπ. as alternative, App., pp. 155, 156, and Winer-Schmiedel, pp. 59, 60; see also Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 157, and Neue Bibelstudien, p. 13.

Ver. 25. οἱ μαθηταὶ—if we add αὐτοῦ, see critical notes, the words would apparently refer to Jews converted by Saul, so Chrysostom: "but his disciples" R.V. Alford, who reads αὐτοῦ, supposes that we have here an unusual government of

χαλάσαντες ἐν σπυρίδι. 26. Παραγενόμενος δὲ ὁ Σαῦλος εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ, ἐπειρᾶτο[1] κολλᾶσθαι τοῖς μαθηταῖς| καὶ πάντες ἐφοβοῦντο αὐτόν, μὴ πιστεύοντες ὅτι ἐστὶ μαθητής· 27. Βαρνάβας δὲ ἐπιλαβόμενος αὐτόν, ἤγαγε πρὸς τοὺς ἀποστόλους, καὶ διηγήσατο αὐτοῖς πῶς ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ εἶδε τὸν Κύριον, καὶ ὅτι ἐλάλησεν αὐτῷ, καὶ

the genitive by λαβόντες, and compares Luke viii. 54 and classical instances, see in loco.—διὰ τοῦ τείχους: "through the wall," R.V., cf. 2 Cor. xi. 33, where we read διὰ θυρίδος . . . διὰ τοῦ τείχους, perhaps a window in the external face of the wall opening into the house on the inside, rather than simply a window of a house overhanging the wall; cf. Josh. ii. 16, 1 Sam. xix. 12. Blass takes it of a window made "in ipso muro scil. ad tormenta mittenda," but there is no need for this explantion; see Hackett's note on his own observations at Damascus of two or three windows built in the wall as above.—χαλάσαντες ἐν σπυρίδι: "lowering him," R.V., not expressed in A.V.; on spelling of σπυρ. see critical note. In 2 Cor. xi. 33 Paul uses the word σαργάνη, a basket of wickerwork, σπυρ. a basket larger than the κόφινος, the small handbasket of the Jew, Juv., iii., 14; vi., 541, probably a provision basket of considerable size, used as by the Paeonians for fishing, Herod., v., 16. σαργάνη too is used of a fish basket by Timokles, Ληθ., i., see further, "Basket," Hastings' B.D., and Plummer on Luke ix. 17. Neither word is met with in the LXX or Apocrypha. For the naturalness of the incident according to the present customs of the country see Hackett, in loco. The traditional spot of its occurrence is still shown, but we can only say of it as of the "house of Judas," see above on ver. ii. Wendt, p. 35 (1899), thinks that here we have a coincidence with the account in 2 Cor., which cannot be accounted for except by the acquaintance of the author of Acts with the Epistle.

Ver. 26. παραγενόμενος: on its frequency in St. Luke's Gospel and Acts see v. 21; apparently presupposes that Saul betook himself immediately to Jerusalem, so that the stay in Arabia cannot be inserted here (Weiss. in loco), a stay which Weiss holds was unknown to the author of Acts, see his note on ver. 19. παραγ. is found four times in Acts with εἰς, c. acc. loci, elsewhere only in Matt. ii. 1 (cf. John viii. 2).—ἐπειρᾶτο: the verb πειράομαι only found once in N.T., viz., xxvi. 21, and the true reading here is ἐπείραζε, which is used in a similar sense in xvi. 7, xxiv. 6, only in the active in this sense = Attic πειρῶμαι, according to Blass, in loco, and Gram., 56, 221; "he assayed," R.V. = to essay, attempt, try, Deut. iv. 34, 2 Macc. ii. 23.—κολλᾶσθαι, cf. v. 13, x. 28, and also Matt. xix. 5, Luke xv. 5, 1 Cor. vi. 16—evidently means that he sought to join himself to them intimately.—καὶ πάντες ἐφοβ. αὐτόν—καὶ "and," R.V., not "but," A.V.; it is not adversative, but simply introduces the unfavourable result of Saul's endeavour. This does not necessarily require that the conversion should have been recent, as Weiss maintains. If three years had elapsed, Gal. i. 16, during a portion of which at all events Saul had been in retirement, the Christians in Jerusalem might very naturally still feel apprehensive when their former persecutor was thus for the first time since his conversion actually present amongst them, and the memory of his former fierce hatred could not have been effaced. If it seems unlikely that this should have been their attitude had they known of Saul's profession of faith at Damascus, there are critics who would have expressed great surprise if the Apostle had been received with open arms, and without any credentials: "credo si contrarium exstaret, hoc rursus mirarentur" (Blass).

Ver. 27. Βαρνάβας, cf. iv. 36. Saul and Barnabas may have been previously acquainted, see J. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., and note on iv. 36. St. Chrysostom, Hom., xxi. (so Theophylact and Oecumenius), sees here a proof of the kindly nature of Barnabas, so truly called "Son of Consolation". For an appreciative notice of the goodness and generosity of Barnabas, from a very different standpoint, see Renan, Apostles, p. 191 E.T.—ἐπιλ., cf. xxiii. 19; so as to disarm fear: on the force of this characteristic word of St. Luke see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 245, Friedrich, p. 27, and below xvii. 19; generally constructed with genitive, but here αὐτὸν is probably governed by ἤγαγε; cf. xvi. 19, and xviii. 17, where also the accusative is found in cases of a finite transitive verb following the participle, ἐπιλ. Blass, Gram., p. 100, note 2, refers αὐτόν to ἤγαγε, and understands αὐτοῦ with ἐπιλ.—πρὸς τοὺς ἀποστόλους, cf. Gal. i. 19; there is no contradiction, although St. Paul's own narrative confines Saul's introduction to Peter and James: "though most of the Apostles were absent, yet the two real leaders were present" (Ramsay), and this was the point which St. Luke would emphasise. Wendt (1899) rejects the narrative of Acts as indistinct when compared with Gal. i., but see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 91, and Drummond, Galatians, p. 67; see below on ver. 30 also.—διηγήσατο, exposuit, i.e., Barnabas (but Beza and Meyer make Saul the subject, although unlikely from construction and context); verb twice in Luke's Gospel, viii. 39, ix. 10, and three times in Acts, viii. 33 (quotation), xii. 17; cf. Heb. xi. 32, and Mark v. 16, ix. 9; and nowhere else in N.T.; frequent in LXX to recount, narrate, declare, cf. 1 Macc. v. 25, viii. 2, x. 15, xi. 5, and several times in Ecclesiasticus. Similarly used in classical Greek; Grimm compares figurative use of German durchführen.—πῶς εἶδε Κ.: while it is not said in any part of the three accounts of the Conversion that Saul saw Jesus, it is distinctly asserted here in a statement which Barnabas may well have received from Saul himself, and also in the two expressions of Ananias, cf. ver. 17, xxii. 14; cf. also the Apostle's own words, 1 Cor. ix. 1, xv. 8.—ἐπαῤῥησιάσατο, cf. the verb with the expression μετὰ παρρησίας λαλεῖν, see above on iv. 13, and of the preaching of the other Apostles and of the Church, cf. xxviii. 31 (of Paul). Verb only used by Luke and Paul, and always of speaking boldly the truths of the Gospel; so seven times in Acts, and also in 1 Thess. ii. 2, Ephes. vi. 20.

Ver. 28. ἦν . . . εἰσπ.: for characteristic construction see i. 10, etc. εἰς καὶ ἐκπ., cf. i. 21. Hebraistic formula to express the daily confidential intercourse with the Apostles; cf. 1 Sam. xviii. 13, 2 Chron. xxiii. 7 (1 Macc. xiii. 49, xv. 14, 25, for somewhat similar expressions, but see H. and R.).—ἐν: if we read εἰς, see critical note. Weiss connects closely with ἐκπ. and takes it to signify that Saul was not only associated with the Apostles privately, but openly in the town, so Wendt and Holtzmann, privatim and publice. Page connects ἦν εἰς together, and thinks εἰς probably due to the intervention of the verbs expressing motion. Zöckler compares xxvi. 20, and takes εἰς as referring to Jerusalem and its neighbourhood (but see critical notes).

Ver. 29. συνεζήτει, cf. vi. 9.—πρὸς τοὺς Ἑλλην., of whom Saul himself was one; see critical notes. Saul's visit was a short one (Gal. i. 18), and although we must not limit his opportunities of disputation to the two Sabbaths with Blass (note the two imperfects), yet it is evident that the Hellenists were at once enraged against the deserter from their ranks. There is no contradiction with xxii. 17, as Zeller and Overbeck maintained—it is rather a mark of truth that Luke gives the outward impulse, and Paul the inner ground (Hackett, Lightfoot, Lumby); but see on the other hand Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 62, against the identification of xxii. 17 with Paul's first visit; according to Ramsay, xxii. 17, 18 refer to the close of the Apostle's second visit. Wendt (1899) still identifies xxii. 18 with the passage before us, ix. 29; in seventh edition he speaks more fully of the fulfilment of the negative prophecy in xxii. 18, by the positive fact here narrated.—ἐπεχείρουν: only used by St. Luke; St. Luke i. 1, Acts xix. 13; it is used in same sense in classical Greek; and it also occurs in Esther ix. 25, 1 Esd. i. 28, 2 Macc. ii. 29, vii. 19, ix. 2, etc., and 3 Macc. vii. 5, where it occurs as here with ἀνελεῖν (see also below), and for other instances cf. Hatch and Redpath. The word was frequently employed in medical language, sometimes in its literal sense "to apply the hand to," but generally as in N.T. Both Hippocrates and Galen use the verb as St. Luke does, with γράφειν—ἐπειχείρησαν γράφειν. Hobart, pp. 87 and 210, points out that Galen also employs the verb with ἀνελεῖν, as here. It is true that the word is also used in the same sense by Josephus, c. Apion, ii., with συγγράφειν, but the medical use of the term is so striking in Hippocrates that its use here is noted by J. Weiss, Evangelium des Lukas, p. i., as a probable reminiscence by the writer, and still more positively so by Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., ii., p. 384 (1899).

Ver. 30. ἐπιγνόντες: the preposition may signify here as elsewhere accurate and certain knowledge or information—a favourite word with St. Luke, in the Gospel seven times, in Acts thirteen times; it was also a favourite word with St. Paul, cf., e.g., 1 Cor. xiii. 12, 2 Cor. vi. 9; frequent in LXX, or it may simply mean to find out, to ascertain (Grimm); see Blass in loco on its force in LXX. 5.—οἱ ἀδελφοὶ: the expression seems expressly used to imply that the disciples at Jerusalem recognised Saul as a brother. Wendt (1899) rejects all the narrative in Acts as unhistorical, and compares with the statement here Gal. i. 22; but there mention is only made of the "Churches of Judæa," whilst the inference that Paul could scarcely fail to have been known to the members of the Church in Jerusalem seems quite justifiable, Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 86.—κατήγαγον, i.e., brought him down to the sea coast, ad mare deduxerunt, word used only by Luke and Paul; but by St. Luke only as a nautical expression, cf. xxvii. 3, xxviii. 12 (xxi. 3), and Luke v. 11; so in classical writers.—εἰς K. as in viii. 40 (not Cæsarea Philippi which is always so called); if he found Philip there (xxi. 8), the friend and the accuser of the proto-martyr would meet face to face as brethren (Plumptre).—ἐξαπέστειλαν: the word might mean by sea or by land, but the former is supported amongst recent commentators by Blass, so too Page (cf. Lightfoot on Gal. i. 21, p. 85), Knabenbauer, p. 174. But if so, there is no contradiction with Gal. i. 21, where Paul speaks of coming into the regions of Syria and Cilicia, as if he went to the latter through the former. The expressions in Galatians have sometimes been explained on the supposition that the two countries, Syria and Cilicia, are named there as elsewhere in that order, Acts xv. 23, 41, as a kind of general geographical expression (Felten), the most important country being mentioned first, so Lightfoot, Nösgen, Conybeare and Howson; or that as Paul would remain at Syrian ports on the way to Cilicia, he might fairly speak as he does, or that he went first to Tarsus, and thence made missionary excursions into Syria. If neither of these or similar explanations are satisfactory, we can scarcely conclude with Blass that Gal. i. 21 is accounted for "inverso per incuriam ordine". Ramsay has lately argued with much force that here as elsewhere Paul thinks and speaks of the Roman divisions of the empire (cf. Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., i., p. 124 (1897)), and that here the two great divisions, Syria and Cilicia, of the Roman province are spoken of; and he accordingly reads, with the original text of ℵ, τὰ κλίματα τῆς Σ. καὶ Κ., the article used once, and thus embracing the two parts of the one province (sometimes three parts are enumerated, Phœnicia being distinguished from Syria). There is apparently no example of the expression Prov. Syria et Cilicia, but Ramsay points to the analogy of Bithynia-Pontus; see Expositor, p. 29 ff., 1898, and "Cilicia" and "Bithynia" (Ramsay) in Hastings' B.D. Ramsay therefore concludes that Gal. i. 21 simply implies that Paul spent the following period of his life in various parts of the province Syria-Cilicia.—Ταρσόν, see above, ver. 11; on the years of quiet work at Tarsus and in its neighbourhood, see Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 46, 47, and below on xi. 25.

[1] αι εκκλησιαι; but sing. η εκκλη. ℵABC, Vulg., Syr. Pesh., Sah., Boh., Arm., Aeth., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Wendt, Weiss, Hilg.; see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 128.

[2] και Γαλιλαιας, Blass brackets in β because om. by Chrys., Cassiod., perhaps because nothing has been said of the Church in Galilee, but it obviously must have existed there, though never actually mentioned in Acts (see Plumptre's note, in loco), see also below.

Ver. 31. αἱ ἐκκλησίαι—if we read the singular ἡ ἐκκλ. with the great MS. the word shows us that the Church, though manifestly assuming a wider range, is still one: Hort, Ecclesia, p. 55, thinks that here the term in the singular corresponds by the three modern representative districts named, viz., Judæa, Galilee, Samaria, to the ancient Ecclesia, which had its home in the whole land of Israel; but however this may be, the term is used here markedly of the unified Church, and in accordance with St. Paul's own later usage of the word; see especially Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 126, 127, and also p. 124.—καθ' ὅλης: the genitive in this sense is peculiar to St. Luke, and always with the adjective ὅλος; Luke iv. 14, xxiii. 5, Acts ix. 42, x. 37, the phrase, although not the best classically, seeming to "sound right," because καθόλου, only in Acts iv. 18 in N.T., had come into common use since Aristotle (Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 148; Vogel, p. 45).—οὖν connects with the preceding narrative; so Bengel, Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Zöckler; the Church had rest because the persecutors had become converted; but see also Rendall, Appendix, on μὲν οὖν, p. 164, and Hackett, Felten. —οἰκοδομούμεναι: "being edified," R.V. (see critical notes) (not "and were edified," A.V.)—as an accompaniment of the peace from persecutors. The term may refer primarily to the organisation of the Church as a visible institution, but would also indicate the spiritual edification which is so often expressed by the word in St. Paul's Epistles, where both the verb and its cognate noun are so frequent; cf. xx. 32, and note. The fact that the verb is employed only once in the Gospels, Matt. xvi. 18, of the Church, as here in a non-literal sense, as compared with its constant use by St. Paul as above, is a striking indication of the early date of the Synoptic Gospels or their source (see Page, in loco). For the metaphorical use of the word in the O.T. of good fortune and prosperity, cf. LXX, Ps. xxvii. (xxviii.) 5, Jer. xii. 16, xl. (xxxiii.) 7, xxxviii. (xxxi.) 4, xlix. (xlii.) 10. (Hilgenfeld refers the whole section ix. 32-42 to the same source A from which his "author to Theophilus" derived the founding, and the first incidents in the history, of the early Church, i. 15-iv. 42, although the "author to Theophilus" may have added the words καὶ τῇ παρακ. . . . ἐπληθύνοντο. But if we desire a good illustration of the labyrinth (as Hilgenfeld calls it) through which we have to tread, if we would see our way to any coherent meaning in ix. 31-xii. 25, it is sufficient to note the analysis of the sources of the modern critics given us by Hilgenfeld himself, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., pp. 481, 482; 1895.)—οἰκοδ.: may refer to the inward spiritual growth, ἐπληθ. to the outward growth in numbers; a growth attributed not to human agency but to the power of the Holy Ghost. παράκλησις only here in Acts of the Holy Ghost. Hort renders "and walking by the fear of the Lord and by the invocation [παρακ.] of the Holy Spirit [probably invoking His guidance as Paraclete to the Ecclesia] was multiplied" (Ecclesia, p. 55), and it is not strange that the working of the Παράκλητος should be so described; while others connect the word with the divine counsel or exhortation of the prophets in opening hearts and minds; others again attach παρακ. to ἐπληθ. as expressing increase of spiritual strength and comfort (see Blass, Rendall, Felten, and cf. Col. i. 11, 1 Pet. i. 2). On the verb and its frequency in Acts see p. 73.

Vv. 32-35. Healing of Aeneas.—Ver. 32. ἐγένετο δὲ Π. διερχ.: on the formula and its frequency in Luke see Friedrich, p. 13, and above on p. 124. We have here a note of what may fairly be taken as a specimen of many similar missionary journeys, or rather journeys of progress and inspection, mentioned here perhaps more in detail because of the development which followed upon it, cf. with chap. x. New congregations had been formed, and just as Peter and John had gone down to Samaria to the Christians converted by Philip, so it became necessary that the congregations which had grown up in many towns (viii. 14, 25, 40) should be visited and kept in touch with the centre at Jerusalem (see Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 41, 42; Felten and Plumptre, in loco).—διερχ. διὰ πάντων, see note on xiii. 6, and for the construction Luke ix. 6, xi. 24.—κατελθεῖν, i.e., probably from Jerusalem, cf. viii. 5, Luke iv. 31 devenire, cf. Plummer's note on Luke iv. 31. On the frequent use of διέρχομαι and κατέρχομαι in Luke, see Friedrich, p. 7.—διὰ πάντων, sc., ἁγίων, so Meyer-Wendt, Weiss, Bengel, Alford, Hackett, De Wette, Holtzmann; cf. for similar construction 2 Cor. i. 16, and cf. Acts xx. 25, Rom. xv. 28, or it may mean "through all parts," R.V., so Belser, Beiträge, p. 58 (see critical notes). Hort seems to take it of the whole land (Ecclesia, p. 56).—ἁγίους, see on ver. 13.—Λύδδαν, Hebrew לד, Lod, perpetuated in the modern Ludd; on the word see critical notes, cf. 1 Chron. viii. 2, Ezra ii. 23, Neh. vii. 37, xi. 35, 1 Macc. xi. 34; "a village not less than a city" Jos., Ant., xx., 6, 2; three hours from Joppa in the plain of Sharon: its frontier position often involved it in battle, and rendered it a subject of treaty between Jews and Syrians, and Jews and Romans. At this period not only Jerusalem but Joppa and Lydda were centres of Jewish national feeling, and were singled out by Cestius Gallus as the centres of the national revolt. On its importance as a place of refuge and a seat of learning after the destruction of Jerusalem, see Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 5, p. 721; Edersheim, History of the Jewish People, pp. 155, 215, 479, 512, and also Jewish Social Life, pp. 75-78; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. of the Holy Land, pp. 141, 160 (and his interesting remarks on the connection of St. George of England with Lydda); Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 159, E.T. As the place lay on the route from Azotus to Cæsarea the planting or at any rate the strengthening of its Christianity may be referred to Philip the Evangelist, viii. 40. But on the other hand the close proximity to Jerusalem, within an easy day's journey, may induce us to believe that Lydda had its congregation of "saints" almost from the first, Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 75. On the curious Talmudical notices with reference to our Lord and the Virgin Mother, e.g., that He was condemned at Lydda, see Edersheim, u. s., p. 76. Such passages perhaps indicate a close connection between Lydda and the founding of Christianity.

Ver. 33. Αἰνέαν: the name in this form is found in Thuc., Xen., Pindar. and is not to be identified with that of the Trojan Αἰνείας, although in a fragment of Sophocles we have for the sake of the verse Αἰνέας instead of Αἰνείας; see Wendt, seventh edition, and Wetstein, in loco. The name is also used of a Jew, Jos., Ant., xiv., 10, 22. Probably a Hellenistic Jew; but although he is not expressly named a disciple (as in the case of Tabitha), yet as Peter visited him, and he knew the name of Jesus Christ, he may have become a Christian (so Blass); the fact that Peter went to the "saints" may imply this; but see Alford's note, and so too Hilgenfeld.—ἐξ ἐτῶν ὀκτώ: characteristic of Luke as a medical man; in the cases of disease which he alone mentions, St. Luke frequently gives their duration, e.g., xiii. 11, Acts iii. 2, iv. 22, xiv. 8, see Hobart, p. 40, Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., ii., p. 427.—κραββάτῳ, see above on v. 15, and spelling.—παραλελυμένος, see above on viii. 7, and cf. also Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., ii., p. 436 (1899).

Ver. 34. ἰᾶταί σε Ἰ.: perhaps a paronomasia, iv. 30 (see Page, in loco); present tense, indicating that the healing was immediately effected, Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 9; Blass, Gram., p. 183; verb much more frequent in St. Luke than in the other N.T. writers; in Gospel eleven times, in Acts three times, κραββάτῳ, ὃς ἦν παραλελυμένος. 34. καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ ὁ Πέτρος, Αἰνέα, ἰᾶταί σε Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χριστός· ἀνάστηθι καὶ στρῶσον σεαυτῷ. καὶ εὐθέως ἀνέστη· 35. καὶ εἶδον αὐτὸν πάντες οἱ κατοικοῦντες Λύδδαν καὶ τὸν Σάρωνα,[1] οἵτινες ἐπέστρεψαν ἐπὶ τὸν Κύριον.

36. Ἐν Ἰόππῃ δέ τις ἦν μαθήτρια ὀνόματι Ταβιθά,[2] ἣ διερμηνευομένη λέγεται Δορκάς· αὕτη ἦν πλήρης ἀγαθῶν ἔργων καὶ ἐλεημοσυνῶν and one quotation; in St. Matthew three times, and same quotation; in St. John twice, and same quotation; in St. Mark only once; in Epistles three times, but perhaps only figuratively; so in Deut. xxx. 3, of the diseases of the soul. The term is used by St. Luke in a passage where a similar statement is made by St. Matthew and St. Mark, in which they employ another verb, less precise, σώζειν, διασώζειν, and not so strictly medical, cf. Matt. xiv. 36, Mark vi. 56, Luke vi. 19, Hobart, p. 9. ἴασις: the cognate noun, only in St. Luke, Luke xiii. 32, Acts iv. 32, and see further also Hobart, pp. 23, 24. Both noun and verb are also frequent in LXX, and cf. Plummer on Luke v. 19, who points out that ἰᾶσθαι in its active significance is peculiar to St. Luke, except in the quotations from LXX (Matt. xiii. 15, John xii. 40, both figurative), and in John iv. 47.—στρῶσον σεαυτῷ, cf. xxii. 12, where, as here, the context must be supplied. The aorist denotes performance without delay—now and at once make thy bed for thyself—an act which hitherto others have done for thee.—καὶ εὐθ. ἀνέστη corresponds to ἀνάστηθι and indicates the completeness of the healing.

[1] Λυδδαν: but in ℵAB, so Tisch., W.H., Blass, Weiss, Λυδδα; see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 93, Blass, Gram., pp. 25, 31 (so for ver. 25). Σαρωνα ℵABCE, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Blass, Hilg., but with varying accent; Blass, Gram., p. 31. ℵ has Σαρρωνα.

Ver. 35. τὸν Σάρωνα, on accentuation see critical notes: "at Lydda and in Sharon," R.V. In Sharon, because it was not a town as Lydda, but rather a level tract, the maritime plain between Carmel and Joppa, so called in Hebrew (with article), meaning "the Level"; in Greek, the Forest, δρυμός, LXX, because it was once covered by a great oak forest; full of quiet but rich beauty; cf. 1 Chron. xxvii. 29, Isa. xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 2, xxxvii. 24, lxv. 10, celebrated for its pasturage, Cant. ii. 1. "The masculine article doth show that it is not named of a city, and so doth the LXX article in Isa. 33, 9," J. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. There is no ground for supposing that it meant a village in the neighbourhood, as no place bearing the name Saron can be satisfactorily cited, but cf. Nösgen, in loco; see G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. of the Holy Land, pp. 52, 147, 148; Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 74; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 6, p. 897.—πάντες: the expression may be taken to mean that a general conversion of the inhabitants followed. Rendall renders "and all that dwelt, etc., who had turned to the Lord, saw Him," i.e., attested the reality of the miracle, Acts, pp. 72 and 232. But it might fairly be urged that many would see the man besides those who had become Christians. It helps us to understand the passage if we remember with Nösgen (so Bengel) that the expression ἐπὶ τὸν Κ. applies not to God the Father, but to Jesus Christ, so that we learn that a conversion of the Jewish population at Lydda to the claims of Jesus as the Messiah was the result of the miracle (see also Hackett's useful note). On the use of οἵτινες see Alford's note on vii. 53, quoted by Page (Winer-Schmiedel, p. 235). For the phrase ἐπισ. ἐπὶ τὸν Κ. cf. xiv. 15.

Vv. 36-43. Tabitha raised from the dead.—Ver. 36. Ἰόππῃ, on the spelling, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 56; and below on ver. 43.—μαθήτρια: only here in N.T.: the word occurs in the Apocryphal Gospel of Peter: Mary Magdalene is described as μ. τοῦ Κυρίου: it is also used by Diod., ii., 52; Diog. Laert., iv., 2; viii., 2. The form μαθητρίς is found in Philo.—Ταβιθά, see critical notes. טְבִיתָא, Aramaic, = צְבִי, Hebrew: (1) splendour, beauty; (2) Greek Δορκάς, specially prized by the Orientals for its elegance, Cant. ii. 9,—so called from the large bright eyes of the animal (δέρκομαι). The name was found as a feminine name amongst both Greek and Jews, see instances in Wetstein (e.g., Jos., B. J., iv., 3, 5), Plumptre, Wendt, seventh edition, sub v., and more recently Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 17. This Greek equivalent (found several times in LXX) may not have been actually borne by Tabitha as a name, for St. Luke may only mean to interpret the Aramaic word for his Gentile readers; but she may have been known by both names. Like Æneas, she may have been an Hellenist. There is nothing to indicate that she should be called a deaconess, nor can we tell from the narrative what was the state of this true Sister of Charity, whether she was a widow, whether married or unmarried (Weiss); see further, "Dorcas," Hastings' B.D., and Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 78. On the phrase here see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 232.—ἐλεημοσυνῶν in singular, iii. 2; in plural x. 2, as here; "species post genus ut, 41," Blass, but by the former term also ἀγαθ. ἔργων works of charity may be more especially intended; see Weber, Jüdische Theol., p. 284 (1897); cf. Ecclus. xx. 16, τὰ ἀγαθά μου (and xviii. 15; Tobit xii. 13); "Dorcas" and "Almsgiving," Hastings' B.D.—ὧν, see on i. 1.

Ver. 37. ἐγέν. δὲ: on the frequency of the formula in Luke see above p. 124, and Plummer, St. Luke, p. 45, on the use of ἐγένετο. — ἀσθενήσασαν: aorist, marking the time when she fell sick (Weiss).—λούσαντες: after the manner of the Jews as well as of the Greeks, cf. instances in Wetstein and Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 2, 162, "Beerdigung". Outside Jerusalem three days might elapse between the death and burial, but in Jerusalem no corpse lay over night, see Hamburger, u. s., p. 161; in the case of Ananias and Sapphira we may note the accuracy of this distinction.—ἔθηκαν: burial did not take place until the danger of an apparent death was considered past; in uncertain cases a delay as above might be allowed, or for other special reasons, and children were forbidden to hasten the burial of their parents, Hamburger, u. s., p. 161; and further for burial and mourning customs, Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 168, and History of the Jewish Nation, p. 311.—ἐν ὑπερῴῳ: the body was usually laid in an upper chamber when burial was delayed; see Hackett's note and also on ver. 39, and Alford on the article.

Ver. 38. Λύδδης, on the form see above on ver. 35; nine miles from Joppa. —παρακαλοῦντες; the only passage in which the oratio recta follows if we read μὴ ὀκνήσῃς, see critical notes; this also best represents the urgency of the message (cf. John xi. 3), as in R.V.—μὴ ὀκν.: "fides non tollit civilitatem verborum," Bengel. Verb only here in N.T., cf. LXX, Num. xxii. 16, of Balak to Balaam, a phrase almost identically similar.—διελθεῖν, cf. Luke ii. 15, and ver. 32 above, and below xi. 19. Like other compounds of ἔρχομαι very frequent in Luke, as compared with other writers (Friedrich, p. 7).—ἕως αὐτῶν: use of ἕως locally, common in St. Luke (Friedrich, p. 20); ἕως with genitive of the person as here, cf. Luke iv. 42, 1 Macc. iii. 26; not so used in classical writers (Plummer).

Ver. 39. It is not said that they sent for St. Peter to work a miracle, but his near presence at Lydda would naturally make them turn to him in a time of sorrow.

ἱμάτια[1] ὅσα ἐποίει μετ' αὐτῶν οὖσα ἡ Δορκάς. 40. ἐκβαλὼν δὲ ἔξω πάντας ὁ Πέτρος, θεὶς τὰ γόνατα προσηύξατο· καὶ ἐπιστρέψας πρὸς τὸ σῶμα, εἶπε, Ταβιθά,[2] ἀνάστηθι. ἡ δὲ ἤνοιξε τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς

[1] After ιματια Par., Ps.-Aug. add διηγουντο αυτῳ, accepted by Blass. Belser supports, pp. 58, 59, as being clearer, and showing that the widows not only pointed to the garments with them in proof of the charity of Dorcas, but also showed how much good work she had down besides.

[2] After αναστηθι Syr. Harcl., Sah., Gig., Par., Cypr., Ps.-Aug., Cassiod. add "in nomine domini nostri Jesu Christi". Cypr. and Cassiod. omit "domini nostri". Blass accepts this latter form, Hilg. the former. Belser, u. s., thinks that the words might easily be omitted on revision by an author who was not afraid of any obscurity arising after ver. 34

—παραγενόμενον: a characteristic Lucan expression (Weiss), see above v. 21.—τὸ ὑπερ.: here the article would naturally be used on referring to the chamber, cf. ver. 37, in which the body lay.—αἱ χῆραι: they may have been the poor of the Church, vi. 1, whom Dorcas had befriended, or those who had been associated with her in good works (see also Plumptre's suggestive note). In connection with St. Luke's marked sympathy with women, we may note that the word χήρα is used by him no less than nine times in his Gospel, three in Acts.—κλαίουσαι, cf. Luke vii. 13, viii. 52, Hamburger, u. s. (ver. 37).—ἐπιδεικ.: only here in middle voice, perhaps as pointing to the garments which they were themselves wearing (so Blass, Wendt, Felten, Grimm-Thayer), which Dorcas had given them.—χιτῶνας: "coats," close-fitting undergarments; the word was used in classical Greek of men and women, more perhaps like a dressing-gown or cassock; "Coat," "Dress," Hastings' B.D.—ἱμάτια, the long flowing outer robes.—ὅσα: "all which," i.e., so many (Blass, Page, Hackett, Knabenbauer); see reading in β (Blass), critical notes.—ἐποίει: imperfect as denoting her customary mode of action.

Ver. 40. ἐκβαλὼν δὲ ἔξω πάντας: nothing could be more natural than this action of St. Peter as a reminiscence of his Master's action, when He was about to perform a similar miracle, cf. Matt. ix. 25, Mark v. 40 (cf. 2 Kings iv. 33, and vv. 4, 5 in same chapter), but in Luke viii. 54 it is noteworthy that the similar words are omitted by W.H. and the revisers, see above. In St. Matthew the multitude ὁ ὄχλος is put out, but in St. Mark (and St. Luke), whilst all are described as put out (the same verb), Peter, James and John, with the parents, are allowed to be present at the miracle. Weiss points out the reminiscence of Mark v. 40, but this we might expect if St. Mark's Gospel comes to us through St. Peter. St. Chrysostom marks the action of St. Peter as showing how entirely free he was from any attempt at display.—θεὶς τὰ γόνατα, see note on vii. 60, "hoc Dominus ipse non fecerat" Blass. St. Peter had been present on each of the three occasions recorded in the Gospels when his Master had raised the dead, but he does not venture at once to speak the word of power, but like Elijah or Elisha kneels down in prayer (see Rendall's note).—Τ. ἀνάστηθι, cf. Mark v. 41. Here again we note the close agreement with St. Mark's narrative—the words to the damsel are not given at all by St. Matthew ix. 25, and by St. Luke in Greek, viii. 54, not in Aramaic as by Mark. On the absurdity of identifying the Ταβιθά here with the Ταλιθά of Mark v. 41 see Nösgen and Zöckler, in loco. It may suffice to note with Lumby that in each case an interpretation of the word used is given.—ἀνεκάθισε: not found in LXX, and used only by St. Luke in this passage and in his Gospel, vii. 15 (but B has ἐκάθισεν, which W.H. reads only in margin), in both cases of a person restored to life and sitting up. In this intransitive sense it is almost entirely confined to medical writers, to describe patients sitting up in bed. It occurs in Plato, Phædo, 60 B, but in the middle voice, and with the words ἐπὶ τὴν κλίνην expressed: in Xen., Cyr., v., 7, it is also used, but in a different sense (to sit down again), cf. Hobart, pp. 11, 40, 41, who also notices that the circumstantial details of the gradual recovery of Tabitha are quite in the style of medical description. τὸ σῶμα, Luke xvii. 37, the word is quite αὐτῆς· καὶ ἰδοῦσα τὸν Πέτρον, ἀνεκάθισε. 41. δοὺς δὲ αὐτῇ χεῖρα, ἀνέστησεν αὐτήν· φωνήσας δὲ τοὺς ἁγίους καὶ τὰς χήρας, παρέστησεν αὐτὴν ζῶσαν. 42. γνωστὸν δὲ ἐγένετο καθ᾽ ὅλης τῆς Ἰόππης,[1] 43. καὶ πολλοὶ ἐπίστευσαν ἐπὶ τὸν Κύριον· ἐγένετο δὲ ἡμέρας ἱκανὰς μεῖναι αὐτὸν[2] ἐν Ἰόππῃ παρά τινι Σίμωνι βυρσεῖ.

[1] της Ιοππης, on spelling see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 56. Art. om. by W.H. after BC[1], but retained here by Weiss.

[2] αυτον om. ℵ[1]B, so Tisch., W.H. (Weiss); and there are various other readings but none possessing such strong support.

classical for a dead body, so too in LXX, cf. Deut. xxi. 23, 1 Kings xiii. 24, 1 Macc. xi. 4, 2 Macc. ix. 29. Everything, as Wendt admits (1888), points to the fact that no apparent death, or a raising by natural means, is thought of by the narrator. Holtzmann and Pfleiderer can only find a parallel here with xx. 9-12, but none can read the two narratives without seeing their independence, except in the main fact that both narrate a similar miracle.—ἤνοιξε τοὺς ὀφθ.: to this there is nothing corresponding in the details given by the Gospel narratives, as Blass points out.

Ver. 41. δοὺς δὲ αὐτῇ χ.: here for help to her to rise, after she had been restored to life, but in the Gospels Christ takes the damsel by the hand before she is restored, Mark v. 41, Luke viii. 54. Thus, while retaining a close resemblance, as we might surely expect, to our Lord's action in St. Mark's narrative, there is yet sufficient independence of detail to show that one description is not a slavish imitation of the other.—τὰς χήρας: Rendall sees in the words reference to an organised body, 1 Tim. v. 11-16, engaged in the service of the Church, but the context only points to the widows who had been previously mentioned, species post genus, as in ver. 36 (Blass).

Ver. 42. καθ᾽ ὅλης, see above on ver. 31.

Ver. 43. ἐγένετο δὲ, see on ver. 37, Plummer, St. Luke, p. 45, on the use of ἐγένετο. The phrase also marks (as often in Luke) a transition to the following narrative (Nösgen).—ἡμέρας ἱκανὰς, see on viii. 11, and xxvii. 7. Kennedy speaks of the adjective as used in the vernacular sense of "long," "many," Aristoph., Pax., 354.—βυρσεῖ, in classics βυρσοδέψης: it is difficult to suppose that the common estimate of the work of a tanner amongst the Jews as unclean, on account of their constant contact with dead animals, has here no significance. At least the mention of the trade seems to show that St. Peter was already in a state of mind which would fit him for the further revelation of the next chapter, and for the instructions to go and baptise the Gentile Cornelius. On the detestation in which this trade was held by the Jews, see Wetstein, in loco; Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 158; cf. Mishna, Khethuboth, vii., 10. It does not in any way militate against the historical character of the narrative, as Overbeck maintains, to admit that the description is meant to introduce the "universalism" of the following incident. Both Chrysostom and Theophylact (so too Erasmus) dwell upon this incident in St. Peter's life as illustrating his unassuming conduct. —Ἰόππῃ, see on ver. 36. Heb. יָפוֹ, "beauty," Jaffa; see for references Josh. xix. 46, 2 Chron. ii. 16, Jonah i. 3, Ezra iii. 7; the port of Jerusalem from the days of Solomon (from which it was distant some thirty-five miles), situated on a hill so high that people affirmed, as Strabo mentions, that the capital was visible from its summit. It was comparatively (Schürer) the best harbour on the coast of Palestine (although Josephus, B. J., iii., 9, correctly describes it as dangerous), and in this lay its chief importance. The Maccabees were well aware of this, and it is of Simon that the historian writes: "With all his glory he took Joppa for an haven, and made an entrance to the isles of the sea" 1 Macc. xiv. 5 (about 144 B.C.). The Judaising of the city was the natural result of the Maccabean occupation, although the Syrians twice retook Joppa, and twice Hyrcanus regained it for the Jews. Taken by Pompey B.C. 63, restored to the Jews by Cæsar 47, Jos., Ant., xiv., 4, 4; B. J., i., 7, 7, and Ant., xiv., 10, 6, and at length added to the kingdom of Herod the Great, Ant., xv., 7, 3; B. J., i., 20, 3, Joppa remained Jewish, imbued with all the fanatic patriotism of the mother-city, and in the fierce revolt of 66 A.D. Joppa still remained alone in her undivided allegiance to Judaism, and against Joppa the first assault of Cestius Gallus was directed. On the Joppa which St. Peter entered, Acts x., and its contrast to the neighbouring Cæsarea, see viii. 40 and G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 136 ff.; see also Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 79 ff. E.T.; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 4, 601; B.D.[2], "Joppa".

CHAPTER X. Baptism of Cornelius and his friends.—Ver. 1. ἀνήρ τις: on the expression see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 202.—ἐν Κ., see viii. 40.

Ver. 2. ἑκατοντάρχης: form general in N.T., and so in later Greek, although χιλίαρχος is always retained in N.T., and ἑκατόνταρχος is also found, Matt. viii. 5, 8 (W.H.), Luke vii. 2, Acts xxii. 25 (W.H.); so πατριάρχης, πολιτάρχης, ἐθνάρχης, see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 82, and note on forms employed in Josephus and LXX; W.H., Appendix, p. 163; Blass, Gram., pp. 28, 68; and Grimm-Thayer, sub v., for various authorities.—ἐκ σπείρης τῆς Ἰ.: the word σπεῖρα here = cohors, although used in the N.T. in a more general way as of the band which arrested Jesus, and so also of Jewish troops in Judith xiv. 11, 2 Macc. viii. 23, xii. 20, 22. Each legion was subdivided into ten cohorts, but besides the legionary cohorts there were auxiliary cohorts, and Josephus mentions that five of these cohorts were stationed at Cæsarea at the time of the death of Herod Agrippa, composed to a great extent at all events of the inhabitants of Cæsarea and Sebaste, Ant., xix., 9, 2; xx., 8, 7. There were in the provinces Italic cohorts composed of volunteer Roman citizens born in Italy, and in answer to the strictures of Schürer, who contends that there was no Italic cohort in Cæsarea at this time, Blass, in loco, asks why one of the five cohorts mentioned by Josephus may not have been composed of Roman citizens who had made their home at Cæsarea or Sebaste, a cohort known by the name mentioned. But Ramsay has given great interest to the subject by his account of a recently discovered inscription at Carnuntum—the epitaph of a young Roman soldier, a subordinate officer in the second Italic cohort, who died at Carnuntum while engaged on detached service from the Syrian army. He sees reason to infer that there was an Italic cohort stationed in Syria in A.D. 69, and although the new discovery does not prove anything with certainty for the period in Acts x., say 40-44 A.D., yet it becomes in every way probable that at that date, when Cornelius is described as in x. 1, an Italic cohort recruited from the east was stationed in the province Syria. But even if it could be shown that no Italic cohort was stationed at Cæsarea from A.D. 6-41, or again from 41-44 in the reign of Herod, it by no means follows that a centurion belonging to the cohort may not have been on duty there. He may have been so, even if his cohort was on duty elsewhere, and it would be a bold thing to deny such a possibility when the whole subject of detached service is so obscure; Ramsay, Expositor, September, 1896, also Expositor, December, 1896 (Schürer's reply), and January, 1897 (Ramsay); Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 53 ff. E.T.; Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? pp. 260-269; O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 108; and Wendt, in loco, (1899).—εὐσεβὴς καὶ φ. τὸν Θεὸν: the adjective is only used here and in ver. 7 (xxii. 12), and once again in 2 Peter ii. 9 in the N.T. In the LXX it is found four times in Isaiah, thrice as an equivalent of צַדִּיק, xxiv. 16, xxvi. 7 (2), righteous, upright, cf. also Prov. xii. 12, once as an equivalent of נָדִיב, liberal, generous, see on viii. 2 above; frequent in Ecclus. and Macc., see also Trench, N.T. Synonyms, i., p. 196. Taken by itself the word might denote goodness such as might characterise a Gentile, cf. xvii. 23, and its classical use (like the Latin pietas); but construed with φ. τὸν Θεόν it certainly seems to indicate that Cornelius was "a God-fearing proselyte" (not to be identified it would seem with "proselytes of the gate," although the confusion is common (Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 316 E.T.)). In Acts this class of proselyte is always so described (or σεβόμενοι τὸν Θ.) "they that fear God," i.e., the God of the Jews, cf. x. 22, 35, xiii. 16, 26, etc. All the incidents of the story seem to point to the fact that Cornelius had come into relations with the synagogue, and had learned the name and the fear of the God of Israel, cf. x. 2, 22, 25, without accepting circumcision, see especially Ramsay, Expositor, p. 200 (1896), where he corrects his former remarks in St. Paul, p. 43; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, "Fremder," i., 3, p. 382; Hort, Ecclesia, p. 58; O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, pp. 184, 185; Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i., 103 E.T.; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 101, note, and for a further explanation of the distinction between the σεβόμενοι and the "proselytes of the gate" cf. Muirhead Times of Christ (T. & T. Clark), pp. 105, 106.—σὺν παντὶ τῷ οἴκῳ αὐτοῦ: the centurions of the N.T. are always favourably represented, cf. Matt. viii. 5, Luke vii. 9, xxiii. 47, Acts xxvii. 3. οἶκος here includes not only the family but the whole household, cf. vii. 10, xi. 14, xvi. 31, xviii. 8, etc.; Luke i. 27, x. 5, xix. 9, thus the soldier "who waited on him continually" is also called εὐσεβής. οἶκος (cf. πᾶς ὁ οἶκ. ὅλος ὁ οἶκ.), favourite word with St. Luke in the sense of "family" (Lekebusch, Friedrich) as compared with the other Evangelists, but often found in St. Paul (cf. Hebrews), so also LXX, Gen. vii. 1, xlvii. 12. St. Peter uses the word so in xi, 14, and in 1 Peter ii. 18 we have οἰκέτης. St. Chrysostom well says: "Let us take heed as many of us as neglect those of our own house" (Hom., xxii.). Cf. too Calvin, in loco.—ποιῶν ἐλεημ. τῷ λαῷ, see note on ix. 36; the word occurs frequently in Ecclus. and Tobit, and its occurrence here and elsewhere in Acts illustrates the Jewish use of the term; but although it is true to say that it does not occur in Acts in any Christian precept, St. Paul applies the word to the collection made from the Christian Churches for his nation at Jerusalem, xxiv. 17, a collection to which he attached so much importance as the true outcome of Christian love and brotherhood, see l.c. How highly almsgiving was estimated amongst the Jews we may see from the passages referred to in Hastings' B.D. and B.D.[2]; Uhlhorn's Christian Charity in the Ancient Church, p. 52 ff. E.T.; but it should be remembered that both in Ecclus. and Tobit there are passages in which both almsgiving and fasting are also closely connected with prayer, Ecclus. vii. 10, Tob. xii. 8.—τῷ λ., i.e., Israel, as always in Luke, see above on iv. 25. Both this and his continuous prayer to God, ver. 30, characterise him as half a Jew (Weiss).—διὰ παντός: Luke xxiv. 53, and three times in Acts (once in a quotation, ii. 25), but only used once in Matthew and Mark, and not at all by St. John; on St. Luke's predilection for πᾶς and its compounds see Friedrich, pp. 5, 6. The description of the centurion no doubt reminds us of the description of another centurion in Luke vii. 5 (so Weiss), but we are not obliged to conclude that the centurion here is merely pictured after the prototype there; but the likeness may possibly point to the same source for both narratives, as in some respects the language in the two cases is verbally alike, see Feine.—δεόμενος: "preces et liberalitas commendantur hic; accedit jejunium, ver. 30"; so Bengel, and he adds, "Benefici faciunt, quod Deus vult: precantes iidem quod volunt, Deus facit".

Ver. 3. εἶδεν: there is no ground for explaining away the force of the words by assuming that Cornelius had formerly a longing to see Peter. — φανερῶς: "openly," R.V.; manifeste, Vulgate. The words plainly are meant to exclude any illusion of the senses, not in a trance as in ver. 10, cf. xxii. 17; only here in Luke's writings, cf. 2 Macc. iii. 28.—ὡσεὶ

[2] ουτος λαλησει . . . δει ποιειν, whole clause om. ℵABCELP 13, 61, Vulg. (am. fu. tol.), Syr., P. and H., etc., so W.H., R.V., Hilg., retained by Blass in β on the authority of Vulgcl., Par.[2], and a few min., evidently case of insertion, cf. ix. 6, xi. 14.

(περί): the ὡσεί, as Blass points out, intimates the same as περί—the dative which is read here by Chrysostom (omit περί) is sometimes confused with the accusative in the sense of duration of time, see Blass on ver. 30, and viii. 11 (for the accusative see John iv. 52, Rev. iii. 3), and Gram., p. 93. Cornelius observed without doubt the Jewish hours of prayer, and the vision is represented as following upon, or whilst he was engaged in, prayer, and in answer to it.

Ver. 4. Κορνήλιε, cf. ix. 10 (1 Sam. iii.). Of Cornelius the words of the Evangelical Prophet were true, xliii. 1, "Fear not, for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine".—ἀτενίσας, see above on i. 10.—ἔμφοβος: four times in St. Luke, twice in Gospel, twice in Acts, and always with second aorist participle of γίγνομαι as here, only once elsewhere in N.T., Rev. xi. 13 (with ἐγένοντο); cf. Ecclus. xix. 24 (21), of the fear of God; and in 1 Macc. xiii. 2 both ἔντρομος and ἔμφοβος are apparently found together, cf. Acts vii. 32 and xvi. 29, but in classical Greek the word is used properly actively, formidolosus.—τί ἐστι, Κύριε; the words, similar to those used by Paul at his conversion, reveal the humility and the attentive attitude and readiness of Cornelius.—αἱ προσ., cf. ii. 22, with article: of regular prayers.—ἀνέβησαν: tanquam sacrificia, cf. Ps. cxli. 2, Phil. iv. 18, Heb. xiii. 15, and for the word, 2 Kings iii. 20, Job xx. 6, Ezek. viii. 11, 1 Macc. v. 31.—εἰς μνημόσυνον: in Lev. ii. 2, 9, 16, v. 12, vi. 15, Num. v. 26 (cf. Ecclus. xxxviii. 11, xlv. 16), the word is used as a translation of the Hebrew אַזְכָּרָה, "a name given to that portion of the vegetable oblation which was burnt with frankincense upon the altar, the sweet savour of which ascending to heaven was supposed to commend the person sacrificing to the remembrance and favour of God," a remembrance offering. The words at all events express the thought that the prayers and alms of Cornelius had gained the favourable regard of God, and that they would be remembered, and are remembered accordingly (see notes by Wendt, Felten and Holtzmann), the alms being regarded by zeugma as ascending like the prayers. With this passage cf. Tob. xii. 12, 15, and Mr. Ball's note in Speaker's Commentary, i., p. 231. "O quam multa in terram cadunt, non ascendunt" Bengel, and cf. Hamlet, Act iii., Sc. 3: "My words fly up," etc.: see Book of Enoch, xlix., 3, for a striking parallel to the thought of raising prayers as a memorial to God, Charles' edition, pp. 70, 284.

Ver. 5. μετάπεμψαι: middle, his messengers were to perform his wishes; only in Acts in N.T., where it occurs nine times, but found twice in LXX and in Maccabees; so too mostly in the middle in classical writers, although the active is also found in same sense.—Σίμωνά (τινα), see critical notes; as unknown to Cornelius, marked out by his surname as the one of the many who were called Simon.

Ver. 6. ξενίζεται, see ver. 33.—παρὰ θάλασσαν: perhaps to secure water for the purpose of his trade, perhaps because it seems that a tanner was not allowed to carry on his business unless outside the walls of a town, see on ix. 43, at a distance of fifty cubits, see Wendt, in loco; Hackett, p. 135.

Ver. 7. οἰκετῶν: one related to the οἶκος, a milder and a narrower term than δοῦλος, which would simply denote ownership; more closely associated with the family than other servants, οἰκέτας τε καὶ δούλους, cf. Rom. xiv. 4, 1 Pet. ii. 18.—εὐσεβῆ: not of itself showing that the soldier had entered into any relationship with the Jews, but in connection with ver. 2 it can scarcely imply less than in the case of Cornelius; of each it might be said, as of St. Paul in his service of Christ, δουλεύων τῷ Κ. μετὰ πάσης ταπεινοφροσύνης (xx. 19), and both master and servant were about to become οἰκέται of a nobler household: οἰκεῖοι τοῦ Θεοῦ and συμπολῖται τῶν ἁγίων; see xi. 14. —προσκαρτερούντων, see above on chap. i. 14. A good reference is given by Wendt to Dem., 1386, 6, θεραπαίνας τὰς Νεαίρᾳ τότε προσκαρτερούσας (so too Polyb., xxiv., 5, 3); but see on the other hand Blass, in loco. Kuinoel supposes that they acted as house-sentries, but there is no need to limit the service to that; cf. viii. 13, and LXX, Susannah, ver. 6.

Ver. 8. ἐξηγησάμενος ἅπαντα: only in Luke in N.T., except once in John i. 18, cf. Luke xxiv. 35, Acts xv. 12, 14, xxi. 19, and in LXX, Judg. vii. 13, 1 Chron. xvi. 24, 2 Kings viii. 5, etc. The word plainly suggests the mutual confidence existing between Cornelius and his household (ἅπαντα, as if nothing were forgotten in the communication), Weiss.

Ver. 9. ὁδοι.: the distance was thirty miles; only here in N.T., not LXX; but ὁδοιπορία is found in N.T. and LXX; ὁδοιπόρος in LXX and Ecclus., but not in N.T.: all three words are found in classical Greek. It is perhaps to be noted that the word here used was also much employed in medical language (Hobart).—δῶμα: sometimes taken here to mean a room on the roof, or an upper room, but the idea of prayer under the free canopy of heaven is better fitting to the vision; see Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 121; = flat roof in N.T. and LXX; in modern Greek = terrace.—περὶ ὥραν ἕκτην: about twelve o'clock, midday; see G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 138-142.

Ver. 10. πρόσπεινος: only here, not found in LXX or classical Greek, probably intensive force in πρός, see Grimm-Thayer, sub v., although not in R.V.—ἤθελε γεύσασθαι: there is no mention of any long period of previous fasting, as if that would account for the vision; Peter was about to partake of his ordinary meal.—ἐπέπεσεν, see critical notes. —ἔκστασις: represented in such a way as to distinguish it from the ὅραμα of Cornelius in ver. 3; a trance, an ecstasy in which a person passes out of himself, always in connection with "visions," in what may be called its technical use; sometimes it is used as expressing simple astonishment, cf. Acts iii. 10, etc.; for a good account of the word and its various significations in N.T. and LXX, see Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, pp. 121, 122; on the distinction between ἔκσ. and ὅρ. see Alford, note, in loco.

Ver. 11. θεωρεῖ: "beholdeth," historic present, giving vividness.—ὡς ὀθόν. μεγ. Both words, ὀθόνη and ἀρχή (in this sense), are peculiar to St. Luke in N.T.—the phrase ἀρχαὶ ὀθόνης is medical, so that the expression here rendered ends or corners of a sheet is really technical medical phraseology, see Hobart, p. 218, Plummer, Introd. to St. Luke, lxv., Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 436. ἀρχαί is also used καθιέμενον ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς· 12. ἐν ᾧ ὑπῆρχε πάντα τὰ τετράποδα τῆς γῆς καὶ τὰ θηρία[1] καὶ τὰ ἑρπετὰ καὶ τὰ πετεινὰ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ. 13. καὶ ἐγένετο φωνὴ πρὸς αὐτόν, Ἀναστάς,[2] Πέτρε, θῦσον καὶ φάγε. 14. ὁ δὲ Πέτρος εἶπε,[3] Μηδαμῶς, Κύριε· ὅτι οὐδέποτε ἔφαγον πᾶν κοινὸν ἢ ἀκάθαρτον. 15. καὶ φωνὴ πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου πρὸς αὐτόν, Ἃ[4] ὁ Θεὸς ἐκαθάρισε, σὺ μὴ κοίνου. 16. τοῦτο δὲ ἐγένετο ἐπὶ τρίς· καὶ πάλιν[5] ἀνελήφθη τὸ σκεῦος εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν.

[1] According to ℵAB 61 the words τα θηρια and the articles before ερπετα and πετεινα are to be omitted, and της γης to be inserted after ερπετα according to ℵABCE, etc.; see R.V., W.H., Wendt, Weiss.

[2] For αναστας Π.: Aug. has Πετρε παν ὃ εν τῳ σκευει βλεπεις, see β text (Blass).

[3] For μηδαμως . . . ακαθαρτον Aug. has Κυριε κοινου και ακαθαρτου ουχ αψομαι (see β).

[4] For ἃ ὁ Θ. . . . κοινου Aug. has ὃ εγω ηγιασα ακαθαρτον μη λεγε (see β). These three readings are preferred by Belser, p. 59, as clearer, and more characteristic in Peter's answer. εκ δευτερου om. Gig., Aug., Apost., Const. Blass brackets, and cf. xi. 9.

[5] παλιν, cf. xi. 10; but ευθυς is supported by ℵABCE 61, Vulg., Boh., Syr. Harcl. mg., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. In β Blass omits, for which there is some authority, but evidence for ευθυς strongest; Hilg. reads παλιν.

in LXX, Exod. xxxvi. 24 (xxxix. 17), ὀθόνη not at all in LXX, but both words are found in classical writers in senses approaching their meaning here; but here as elsewhere in St. Luke it is the combination which arrests attention, for ἀρχή and ἀρχαί are found again and again in medical language with ὀθόνη or ὀθόνιον.—τέσσαρσιν ἀρχαῖς: "by four corners," R.V. No article; there might have been many ends or corners. It is doubtful how far we can therefore press the imagery as referring to the four regions of the world, or that men would come from the north, south, etc., to share the kingdom.

Ver. 12. τετράποδα κ.τ.λ.: fish are not mentioned, perhaps because the vessel was not represented as containing water (so Blass, Weiss, Wendt), although fish also were divided into clean and unclean, Lev. xi. 9, Deut. xiv. 9.

Ver. 13. ἀναστάς, see above on v. 17: he may have been, as St. Chrysostom says, on his knees.—θῦσον: the beasts are represented as living—not here in a sacrificial sense, cf. Luke xv. 23.

Ver. 14. Μηδαμῶς: absit (LXX for חָלִילָה), 1 Sam. xx. 2, xxii. 15 (Weiss).—Κύριε: Weiss refers to i. 24, and takes it as meaning Jehovah, but others refer the expression here to Christ; the next verse shows us that there was still the same element of self-will in the Apostle which had misled the Peter of the Gospels.—οὐδέποτε . . . πᾶν: the words of strong negation, characteristic of the vehement and impulsive Peter—Hebraistic, cf. Exod. xx. 10, Judg. xiii. 4, and in N.T., Matt. xxiv. 22, Luke i. 37, Rom. iii. 12, 1 Cor. i. 29; Simcox, Language of the N. T., pp. 72, 73, and Blass, Gram., p. 174.—κοινὸν = βέβηλος; 1 Macc. i. 62, opposed to ἅγιος, Lev. x. 10, cf. Ezek. xxii. 26, often used in N.T. for unclean, cf. Mark vii. 2.—ἀκάθαρτος, Lev. xx. 25, of clean and unclean animals; κοινός in 1 Macc. above is used, as ver. 63 shows, for defilement from meats.

Ver. 15. The last word of ver. 14 carries us back to the thought of the teaching of his Master, which St. Peter had evidently not yet realised, cf. Mark vii. 19. Mark alone draws the inference, "this He said, making all meats clean," which, compared with this verse, makes another link of interest between St. Mark and St. Peter.—ἐκ δευτ. . . . ἐπὶ τρίς (only here and in xi. 10, in classics εἰς τρίς), to emphasise the command, cf. Gen. xli. 32, "ad confirmationem valuit" Calvin.—ἐκαθάρισε, declarative: "de coelo enim nil nisi purum demittitur" Bengel.—κοίνου: "make not thou common," R.V., "as though man by his harsh verdict actually created unclean-

Those who favour omission contend that τρεις comes from xi. 11, δυο from ver. 7. But Weiss maintains that δυο is quite correct, as in ver. 7, the soldier is regarded as a guard for the two servants who convey the message: this was overlooked, and δυο was either allowed to drop out, or was changed into τρεις, cf. xi. 11. It is possible that if τρεις was original it fell out after ανδρες (-ΔΡΕϹΤΡΕΙϹ).

Ver. 16. πάλιν: if we read εὐθύς, see critical notes, we have St. Mark's characteristic word (used by St. Luke only here in Acts, and once in Luke vi. 49), a suggestive fact in a section of the book in which the pen or the language of St. Peter may fairly be traced.

Ver. 17. διηπόρει: "was much perplexed," R.V., cf. ii. 12, v. 24; see Page's note, Acts, p. 145.—τί ἂν εἴη: on the optative in indirect questions used by St. Luke only, with or without ἂν, see Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 112; Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, pp. 80, 133.—διερωτήσαντες: only here in N.T., not in LXX, but in classical Greek for asking constantly or continually; preposition intensifies. Here it may imply that they had asked through the town for the house of Cornelius (Weiss).—πυλῶνα, cf. xii. 13 (and Blass, in loco). R.V. renders not "porch," as in Matt. xxvi. 71, but "gate," as if it were θύρα. The πυλών was properly the passage which led from the street through the front part of the house to the inner court. This was closed next the street by a heavy folding gate with a small wicket kept by a porter (see Alford on Matt., u. s., and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.).

Ver. 18. φωνήσαντες: "having called out some one of the servants" (Blass, Alford, Kuinoel), but = "called" simply, R.V.; "vocantes portæ curatorem," Wetstein.

Ver. 19. ἐνθυμουμένου: compound verb best, see critical notes: "pondered on the vision," Rendall; διενθ. verb = to weigh in the mind, only here, not found in LXX or elsewhere, except in ecclesiastical writers.—ἄνδρες τρεῖς, so A. and R.V., see critical notes.

Ver. 20. μηδὲν διακ.: "nothing doubting," i.e., without hesitation as to its lawfulness, cf. Matt. xxi. 21, Rom. xiv. 23, Mark xi. 23, James i. 6; the verb is not so used in classical Greek. See Mayor's note on James i. 6, apparently confined in this sense to N.T. and later Christian writings. For the active voice see xi. 12, xv. 9. If we read a stop after διακ. and διότι or ὅτι immediately following, we may translate, "nothing doubting; for I have sent them," R.V.; but if no punctuation (so Rendall, Weiss) translate, "nothing doubting that I have sent them," i.e., the fact that I have sent them. In either case ἐγώ emphatic. Nothing had been spoken to him of his journey, but in the path of unhesitating obedience he was led to the meaning of the revelation (cf. John xiii. 7).

ζητεῖτε[1]· τίς ἡ αἰτία δι' ἣν πάρεστε; 22. οἱ δὲ εἶπον, Κορνήλιος ἑκατοντάρχης, ἀνὴρ δίκαιος καὶ φοβούμενος τὸν Θεόν, μαρτυρούμενός τε ὑπὸ ὅλου τοῦ ἔθνους τῶν Ἰουδαίων, ἐχρηματίσθη ὑπὸ ἀγγέλου ἁγίου, μεταπέμψασθαί σε εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀκοῦσαι ῥήματα παρὰ σοῦ. 23. εἰσκαλεσάμενος[2] οὖν αὐτοὺς ἐξένισε. Τῇ δὲ ἐπαύριον ὁ Πέτρος ἐξῆλθε σὺν αὐτοῖς, καί τινες τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν ἀπὸ τῆς[3] Ἰόππης συνῆλθον αὐτῷ. 24. καὶ τῇ ἐπαύριον εἰσῆλθον[4] εἰς τὴν Καισάρειαν· ὁ δὲ Κορνήλιος ἦν προσδοκῶν αὐτούς, συγκαλεσάμενος

[1] After ζητειτε D, Syr. Harcl. add τι θελετε; (ἢ) κ.τ.λ. looks like an anticipatory gloss of τις ἡ αιτια.

[2] For εισκαλεσαμενος D, Par. read εισαγαγων, a fairly common word (six times in Acts), but εισκ. "απ. λεγ." in N.T.

[3] The art. before Ι. should be omitted, on the evidence of ℵABCDEHLP; Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.

[4] εισηλθον—but BD 47, 61, Vulg., Syr. Harcl. text, Aeth. εισηλθεν, so W.H., R.V., marg., Weiss, Hilg.—but plural AEHLP (εισηλθαν in ℵC), and several vers., Chrys., Tisch., Blass. Alford thinks sing. a corrn. to suit εξηλθεν above; but, on the other hand, as the sing. lies between several plurals, transcriptural prob. seems to favour it. Καισαρειαν, see on viii. 40. D, Syr. Harcl. Par.[1] add περιεμενεν at the end of verse retained by Blass and Hilg., see Weiss, Codex D, p. 68, on its possible force here.

Ver. 22. δίκαιος: "sensu Judaico" (Blass), cf. Luke i. 6, ii. 25, xxiii. 50.—μαρτ., see on vi. 3. τε closely joins it, as confirming the judgment. On construction with ὑπό in inscriptions, Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 95.—ἔθνους τῶν Ἰ.: ἔθνος in the mouth of Gentiles, cf. Luke vii. 5 and see above on iv. 25.—ἐχρηματίσθη: "was warned of God," R.V., Matt. ii. 12, 22, Luke ii. 26, cf. Heb. viii. 5, xi. 7, and Jos., Ant., iii., 8, 8; see Westcott, Hebrews, p. 217. For use of the active in LXX, see Jer. xxxiii. (xxvi.) 2, cf. also xi. 26.—ἁγίου: only here with ἀγγέλου, expressing the reverence of these pious men (Weiss).

Ver. 23. εἰσκ.: only used here in N.T., so μετακ. in ver. 32; both verbs are also frequent in medical writers, as Hobart urges, but both are found in classical Greek, and the latter three times in LXX, although the former not at all.—ἐξένισε, recepit hospitio, Vulgate, cf. Heb. xiii. 2, and Westcott, l.c.; verb used six times in Acts in this sense, but nowhere else in N.T.; cf. Ecclus. xxix. 25. In this Christian hospitality to Gentile strangers Peter had taken another step towards understanding what the will of the Lord was.—τινες τῶν ἀδελφῶν = xi. 12.

Ver. 24. On the route see Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 27; and on this and the following verse in β text as specially supporting his theory, see Blass, Philology of the Gospels, pp. 116 ff. and 127.—ἦν προσδοκῶν: characteristic Lucan construction, see above i. 10; cf. Luke i. 21. προσδ., favourite with St. Luke; six times in Gospel, five in Acts, elsewhere in Gospels only twice in Matthew.—συγκ., i.e., on the day on which he expected the advent of Peter and the returning messengers as to a feast; they were probably also fearers of the true God, and of a like mind with Cornelius.—ἀναγκαίους, necessarios cf. Jos., Ant., vii., 14, 4; xi., 6, 4; xiii., 7, 2, etc., and instances in Wetstein.

Ver. 25. ὡς δὲ ἐγέν. (τοῦ) εἰσ.: for τοῦ see critical notes; "and when it came to pass that Peter entered," R.V., i.e., into the house, see Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 139. It may be regarded as an extension of τοῦ beyond its usual sphere, see Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., for instances in LXX, pp. 166, 170 (1893). Simcox regards the sense as much the same as in the common (and specially Lucan), ἐγένετο τὸν Π. εἰσελθεῖν.—προσεκύνησεν (cf. xiv. 15): expressive of lowliest humiliation, but not of necessity involving divine worship, cf. LXX, Gen. xxiii. 7, 12, etc. Weiss thinks that as the verb is used here absolutely, as in viii. 27, the act was τοὺς συγγενεῖς αὐτοῦ καὶ τοὺς ἀναγκαίους φίλους. 25.[1] Ὡς δὲ ἐγένετο εἰσελθεῖν τὸν Πέτρον, συναντήσας αὐτῷ ὁ Κορνήλιος, πεσὼν ἐπὶ τοὺς πόδας προσεκύνησεν. 26. ὁ δὲ Πέτρος αὐτὸν ἤγειρε λέγων, Ἀνάστηθι[2]· κἀγὼ αὐτὸς ἄνθρωπός εἰμι. 27. καὶ συνομιλῶν αὐτῷ, εἰσῆλθε, καὶ εὑρίσκει συνεληλυθότας πολλούς, ἔφη τε πρὸς αὐτούς, 28. Ὑμεῖς[3] ἐπίστασθε ὡς ἀθέμιτόν ἐστιν ἀνδρὶ Ἰουδαίῳ κολλᾶσθαι ἢ προσέρχεσθαι ἀλλοφύλῳ· καὶ ἐμοὶ ὁ Θεὸς ἔδειξε μηδένα κοινὸν ἢ ἀκάθαρτον λέγειν ἄνθρωπον· 29. διὸ καὶ ἀναντιῤῥήτως[4] ἦλθον μετα-

[1] For the whole verse D, Syr. Harcl., Gig. read προσεγγιζοντος δε του Π. (εις την Κ.) προδραμων εις των δουλων διεσαφησεν παραγεγονεναι αυτον. D, Syr. Harcl. read also ο δε Κ. εκπηδησας και συναντησας αυτῳ. Hilg. reads as above and Belser strongly supports β text, p. 60; so Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 63, who calls these details "as lifelike as anything we could wish," but see also Corssen, G. G. A., p. 437, Weiss, Codex D, p. 68, and Wendt, in loco, edit. 1899, where he refers the expansion in Western text to a misunderstanding of εισελθειν in α text. After εγεν. ℵABCELP, Tisch, Weiss., W.H. read του.

[2] D, Syr. Harcl., Par., Wern. read τι ποιεις; (cf. Acts xiv. 15); whilst D omits αναστηθι, the others read it after ποιεις. Par.[2], Wern. add τον Θεον προσκυνει, cf. Apoc. xix. 10, xxii. 9, so after ειμι DE, Gig., Par., Wern. add ως και συ.

[3] After υμεις D, Aug. insert βελτιον, so Hilg. (cf. compar. in iv. 16, β).

[4] αναντιρρητως, so Tisch., Blass, Weiss; but αναντιρητως BD, 61, W.H., Hilg.

one of worship towards one regarded after the vision as a divine being; but on the other hand the language of the vision by no means involved such a belief on the part of Cornelius (see ver. 5), and as a worshipper of the one true God he would not be likely to pay such divine worship.

Ver. 26. The conduct of Christ may be contrasted with that of His Apostles, so Blass: "illi (Petro) autem is honor recusandus erat, cf. Apoc., 19, 10; 22, 8; quem nunquam recusavit Jesus, Luc., 4, 8; 8, 41" (see Hackett's note and Knabenbauer in loco).

Ver. 27. καὶ συνομιλῶν αὐτῷ: "and as he talked with him," R.V.; only here in N.T., not in LXX (but συνόμιλος, Symm. Job xix. 19), cf. xx. 11 for similar use of the simple verb ὁμιλέω, which is also used in a similar sense in LXX and in Josephus (so too in Xen.), and also in modern Greek (Kennedy).—εἰσῆλθε, i.e., into the room, in distinction to ver. 25 of entrance into the house, or it may signify the completion of his entering in (so De Wette, Weiss).

Ver. 28. ἀθέμιτον: only once again in N.T., and significantly in 1 Pet. iv. 3, but cf. for a similar sense to its use here 2 Macc. vi. 5, vii. 1. On the extent to which this feeling was carried see Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, pp. 26-28; Taylor's Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, pp. 15, 26, 137 (second edition); Weber, Jüdische Theologie, p. 68; so too Jos., c. Apion, ii., 28, 29, 36; Juvenal, xiv., 103; Tacitus, Hist., v., 5.—κολλᾶσθαι, see on v. 13 and Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., in loco.—προσέρχεσθαι: objected to by Zeller and Overbeck, because we know of instances where Jews went without scruple into the houses of Gentiles (cf. Jos., Ant., xx., 2, 3); but here the whole context plainly shows what kind of intercourse was intended (see also Wetstein). Hilgenfeld too regards the notice as unhistorical, but an answer may be found to his objections in the references above and in Feine, pp. 202, 204, although his language seems inconsistent with that on p. 205.—ἀλλοφύλῳ: in the LXX and Apocrypha, so in Philo and Josephus as here; nowhere else in N.T. but here with a certain delicate touch, avoiding the use of the word "heathen"; in xi. 3 no such delicacy of feeling.—καὶ: not "but," A.V., but as in R.V., "and yet," i.e., in spite of all these prohibitions and usages.—ὁ Θ.: emphatic, preceding ἔδειξε (Weiss). How fully Peter afterwards lived and preached this truth his First Epistle shows, cf. 1 Pet. ii. 17.

Ver. 29. ἀναντιῤῥήτως: only here in N.T., but see xix. 36; on spelling see critical notes; used also by Polyb. "sanctum fidei silentium" (Calvin).—μεταπεμφθείς: only here in passive in N.T., see ver. 22.

πεμφθείς. πυνθάνομαι οὖν, τίνι λόγῳ μετεπέμψασθέ με; 30. Καὶ ὁ Κορνήλιος ἔφη, Ἀπὸ τετάρτης ἡμέρας[1] μέχρι ταύτης τῆς ὥρας ἤμην νηστεύων, καὶ τὴν ἐννάτην ὥραν προσευχόμενος ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ μου· καὶ ἰδού, ἀνὴρ ἔστη ἐνώπιόν μου ἐν ἐσθῆτι λαμπρᾷ, 31. καί φησι, Κορνήλιε, εἰσηκούσθη σου ἡ προσευχή, καὶ αἱ ἐλεημοσύναι σου ἐμνήσθησαν ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ· 32. πέμψον οὖν εἰς Ἰόππην, καὶ μετακάλεσαι Σίμωνα ὃς ἐπικαλεῖται Πέτρος· οὗτος ξενίζεται ἐν οἰκίᾳ Σίμωνος βυρσέως παρὰ θάλασσαν· ὃς[2] παραγενόμενος λαλήσει σοι. 33. ἐξαυτῆς οὖν ἔπεμψα πρὸς σέ· σύ τε καλῶς ἐποίησας παραγενόμενος.[3] νῦν οὖν πάντες ἡμεῖς ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ πάρεσμεν ἀκοῦσαι πάντα τὰ προστεταγμένα σοι ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ.[4]

[1] απο τ. ημερας; Blass emends: τεταρτην ημεραν ταυτην, a more usual construction, but β emendation has no support. τεταρτης—D reads της τριτης, due, perhaps, to diff. modes of calculation, so Hilg. For ταυτης της ωρας D reads της αρτι ωρας (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 11), so Hilg. νηστευων και om. ℵABC 61, Vulg., Boh., Arm., Aeth., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt(against Meyer). εννατην, on spelling see above. ωραν om. ℵABCD 40, 61, so Tisch., W.H., Blass, Hilg.

[2] ος παραγεν. . . . σοι om. ℵAB 3, 15, 18, 61, Vulg., Boh., Aethro., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; retained by Blass in β and by Hilg., following CDEHLP, Syr. P. and H., Sah., Gig. and Par.

[3] παραγενομενος, D inserts εν ταχει before (ix. 38), and so Hilg. Instead of ενωπιον του Θ. Blass (so Hilg.) reads σου ("verum puto"), so D, d, Vulg., Syr. Pesh., Sah., Aeth., Par.—here Western reading may be correct, as ενωπ. του Θ. is so common in N.T., and might easily creep in, but see also Weiss, Codex D, p. 69.

[4] Θεου DHLP, Par., Syr. Pesh., Sah., Chrys., so Hilg.; but Κυριου ℵABCE, Vulg., Boh., Syr. Harcl., Arm., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, and so too Blass.

Ver. 30. For readings see critical notes. "Four days ago, until this hour, I was keeping the ninth hour of prayer," R.V., this hour, i.e., the present hour, the hour of Peter's visit; four days ago reckoned from this present hour, lit., "from the fourth day," "quarto abhinc die". The four days according to the Jewish mode of reckoning would include the day of the vision and departure of the messengers, the day they reached Joppa, the day of their return with Peter, and the day of their reaching Cæsarea. Cornelius wishes to signify two things: (1) that the vision occurred, even to the hour, four days before Peter's arrival; (2) that this period of time when it occurred was the ninth hour.—ἐν ἐσθῆτι λαμπρᾷ, see on i. 11, "cur illum contemneremus et fugeremus cui angeli ministrant?" Wetstein.

Ver. 31. εἰσηκούσθη: perhaps "was heard" or "has been heard" is best (see Rendall and Hackett). ἡ προσ. may refer to his present prayer, as it is in the singular, but the burden of all his past prayers had doubtless been the same, cf. ver. 33 for God's guidance into truth.—ἐμνήσθησαν, cf. LXX, Ps. xix. 3, Ezek. xviii. 22, 24; Rev. xvi. 19.

Ver. 33. ἐξαυτῆς, sc., ὥρας: four times in Acts, otherwise only once in Mark vi. 25 and once in Phil. ii. 23, not in LXX; for instances in Polyb., Jos., see Wetstein, sub Mark l.c.—καλῶς ἐποίησας, cf. Phil. iv. 14, 2 Pet. i. 19, 3 John ver. 6, 1 Macc. xii. 18, 22. In some instances it may be described as a formula of expressing thanks, see Page's note.—ἀκοῦσαι: as in iv. 20, i.e., to obey.—ἐνώπ. τοῦ Θ.: this is the way we ought to attend to God's servants, Chrys., Hom., xxii.

Ver. 34. ἀνοίξας κ.τ.λ.: a solemn formula, cf. viii. 35, xviii. 14, Matt. v. 2, xiii. 35; Hort, Judaistic Christ., p. 57.—ἐπ' ἀληθ.: used in Luke's Gospel three times, iv. 25, xx. 21, xxii. 59, and in Acts twice, iv. 27, x. 34, elsewhere only twice in N.T., Mark xii. 14, 32; the customary ἐν ἀληθείᾳ is altogether wanting in Luke.—καταλαμβ.: three times in Acts, not found in Luke's Gospel; here = mente comprehendo, cf. Eph. iii. 15, similar sense; so in Plato, Polybius, and Philo.—προσωπολήπτης, see Mayor on James

34. Ἀνοίξας δὲ Πέτρος τὸ στόμα εἶπεν, Ἐπ᾽ ἀληθείας καταλαμβάνομαι, ὅτι οὐκ ἔστι προσωπολήπτης ὁ Θεός, 35. ἀλλ᾽ ἐν παντὶ ἔθνει ὁ φοβούμενος αὐτὸν καὶ ἐργαζόμενος δικαιοσύνην δεκτὸς αὐτῷ ἐστι. 36. τὸν λόγον ὃν[1] ἀπέστειλε τοῖς υἱοῖς Ἰσραήλ, εὐαγγελιζόμενος εἰρήνην διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, (οὗτός ἐστι πάντων Κύριος,) 37. ὑμεῖς οἴδατε τὸ γενόμενον ῥῆμα καθ᾽ ὅλης τῆς Ἰουδαίας, ἀρξάμενον[2] ἀπὸ

[1] ον ℵ*CDEHLP, Syr. Chrys., Weiss; but wanting in ℵ^{a}AB 61, W.H., R.V. marg. Blass rejects Κυριος: the word which God sent, this (word) applies to, appertains to, all men. But it has been not unfairly said that almost as good result follows by omitting ον on good authority, as by omitting K. on no authority. Blass parallels for his explanation xxvii. 23, Luke iv. 7, but it may be questioned whether these are quite exact. See also below. Clemen (p. 108) regards the whole verse as marg. note of his R. Antijud., which crept into the text by mistake with 37^{a}.

[2] αρξαμενον LP 31, 61, and so Weiss, Wendt; αρξαμενος ℵABCDEH 40, so Lach., Tisch., W.H., R.V., see below. Blass regards αρξ. . . . Γαλ. as interpolated after Luke xxiii. 5, and brackets in β. See also Wendt, note edit. 1899. Clemen, p. 108, refers the whole of 37^{b} to his R. Antijud.; cf. i. 22. After αρξ. DA, Par., Vulg., Iren. add γαρ, so Hilg.; Blass rejects.

ii. 1, πρόσωπον-λαμβάνειν. The actual word is not found in LXX (or in classical Greek), but for the thought of God as no respecter of persons see Deut. x. 17, Lev. xix. 15, Mal. ii. 9, etc., etc., and Luke xx. 21, Gal. ii. 16 (so too προσωποληψία in N.T. three times). The expression πρόσ. λαμβ. is Hebraistic, not necessarily in a bad sense, and in the O.T. more often in a good one, but in the N.T. always in a bad sense, since πρόσωπον acquired the meaning of what was simply external (through its secondary signification a mask) in contrast to a man's real intrinsic character, but the noun and adj. always imply favouritism: see Lightfoot on Gal. ii. 6 and Plummer on Luke xx. 21. Even the enemies acknowledged our Lord's God-likeness at least in this respect, Matt. xxii. 16, Mark xii. 14, Luke xx. 21.

Ver. 35. ἀλλ᾽ ἐν παντὶ ἔθνει κ.τ.λ. The words are taken by Ramsay to mean that Cornelius was regarded as a proselyte by Peter, and that only on that condition could he be admitted to the Christian Church, i.e., through Judaism; so apparently St. Paul, pp. 42, 43. On the other hand the general expression ἐργαζ. δικαι. inclines Weiss to refer all the words to the piety attainable by a heathen, who need not be a proselyte. Bengel's words should always be borne in mind: "non indifferentissimus religionum sed indifferentia nationum hic asseritur," see also below, and Knabenbauer, p. 193.—δεκτὸς: "acceptable to him," R.V., and this is best, because it better expresses the thought that fearing God and working righteousness place a man in a state preparatory for the salvation received through Christ, a reception no longer conditioned by nationality, but by the disposition of the heart. St. Peter does not speak of each and every religion, but of each and every nation, and ver. 43 plainly shows that he by no means loses sight of the higher blessedness of the man whose sin is forgiven through conscious belief in Christ; cf. the language of St. Paul, Rom. x. 9-14. δεκτὸς only in Luke and Paul in N.T., in LXX frequently, and once in the recently discovered Sayings of Jesus, No. 6, which agrees remarkably with St. Luke iv. 24.

Ver. 36. For readings see critical notes; translate: "the word he sent unto" R.V., cf. Ps. cvii. 20.—λόγον, cf. for use of the word as a divine message iv. 31, viii. 14, 25, xiii. 26, xiv. 3, xvi. 32; here it may mean the Gospel message sent to Israel as distinct from the τὸ ῥῆμα, i.e., the previous teaching of John the Baptist (see Rendall); but R.V. like A.V. regards ῥῆμα and Ἰ. τὸν ἀπὸ N. as in apposition to λόγον, but Rendall and Weiss place a full stop after Κύριος, and begin a new sentence with ὑμεῖς.—εὐαγγελ. εἰρήνην with the accusative as signifying the contents of the glad tidings, cf. v. 42.—οὗτός ἐστι πάντων K.: the parenthetical turn given to the words seem to express the way in which the speaker would guard against the thought that Jesus of Nazareth was simply on a level with those who were spoken of as ἀπόστολοι, as the ἀπέστειλε might perhaps suggest to his hearers (see Nösgen). The words are simply the natural expression of the divine power and authority already assigned by St. Peter to our Lord, cf. ii. 33, 36 (cf. Rom. x. 12); on their explanation by St. Athanasius and their place in the Arian controversy, see Four Discourses against the Arians, iv., 30, E.T. (Schaff and Wace edition). On Blass's "brilliant suggestion" to omit K., see Blass, in loco (he seems to think that κοινός is possible), and Page, Classical Review, p. 317, July, 1897.

Ver. 37. τὸ ῥῆμα: so far Peter has referred to a message which would be unknown to Cornelius, the message of peace through Christ, but he now turns to what Cornelius probably did know by report at all events; τὸ ῥ. not the λόγος of ver. 36, but only the "report".—καθ᾽ ὅλης τῆς Ἰ., i.e., all Palestine including Galilee, cf. ii. 9, xi. 1, 29, St. Luke i. 5 (iv. 44), vii. 17, xxiii. 5, see on ix. 31, 42 above.—ἀρξάμενον, see critical notes; cf. i. 22 and Luke xxiii. 5. If we read the accusative it agrees with ῥῆμα (see above); if the nominative, cf. for a similar construction Luke xxiv. 47, and see Blass, Gram., p. 81. The abruptness of the construction is quite in accordance with that elsewhere marked in St. Peter's speeches, cf. ii. 22-24, iii. 14 ff.

Ver. 38. Ἰησοῦν τὸν ἀπὸ Ν.: in apposition to ῥῆμα, the person in Whom all else was centred, and in Whom Peter had found and now preached "the Christ"; or may be treated as accusative after ἔχρισεν.—ὡς ἔχρ.: taken by St. Ambrose, St. Cyril of Jerusalem (so by Bede) to refer to the Incarnation, by St. Athanasius to the Baptism only. But the expression may also be connected with the entrance of our Lord upon His ministry at Nazareth, cf. Luke iv. 14; cf. in this passage the mention of Nazareth and Galilee.—εὐεργετῶν: our Lord was really εὐεργέτης, cf. Luke xxii. 25 (only in St. Luke); "far more truly used of Christ than of Ptolemy the king of Egypt," Cornelius à Lapide.—καταδυναστευομένους: only elsewhere in James ii. 6 in N.T., but cf. Wisdom ii. 10, xv. 14, Ecclus. xlviii. 12, Jos., Ant., xii., 2, 3. No doubt other diseases besides those of demoniacal possession are included, cf. especially Luke xiii. 11, 16; but a special emphasis on the former exactly corresponds to the prominence of a similar class of disease in Mark i. 23.—ὁ Θεὸς ἦν μετ᾽ αὐτοῦ, cf. vii. 9, John iii. 2, so also Luke i. 28, 66, and in LXX, Judg. vi. 16. We cannot see in the expression a "low" Christology; St. Peter had first to declare that Jesus was the Christ, and it is not likely that he would have entered upon a further exposition of His Person in his introductory discourse with a Gentile convert; but vv. 42 and 43 below, to say nothing of St. Peter's public addresses, certainly do not point to a humanitarian Christ.

Ver. 39. ἀνεῖλον, see above, p. 155.—κρεμάσαντες, p. 154.

Ver. 40. ἐν τῇ τ. ἡμ.: only alluded to here in Acts, but a positive testimony from St. Peter to the resurrection appearances on the third day, 1 Cor. xv. 4; the expression is specially emphasised by St. Luke in his Gospel, where it occurs some six times.—ἐμφανῆ γεν.: a phrase only found here and in Rom. x. 20, in a quotation from Isa. lxv. 1, "to be made manifest," R.V., viz., that He was the same Person as before His Passion, not "openly showed," A.V., which gives an idea not in accordance with the present context.

Ver. 41. οὐ παντὶ τῷ λαῷ, and therefore Cornelius could not have known the details fully. Theophylact well remarks, γενέσθαι, 41. οὐ παντὶ τῷ λαῷ, ἀλλὰ μάρτυσι τοῖς προκεχειροτονημένοις ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῖν, οἵτινες συνεφάγομεν καὶ συνεπίομεν[1] αὐτῷ, μετὰ τὸ ἀναστῆναι αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν· 42. καὶ παρήγγειλεν[2] ἡμῖν κηρύξαι τῷ λαῷ, καὶ διαμαρτύρασθαι, ὅτι αὐτός ἐστιν ὁ ὡρισμένος ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ κριτὴς ζώντων καὶ νεκρῶν. 43. τούτῳ πάντες οἱ προφῆται μαρτυροῦσιν, ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν λαβεῖν διὰ τοῦ ὀνόματος αὐτοῦ πάντα τὸν πιστεύοντα εἰς αὐτόν. 44. Ἔτι λαλοῦντος τοῦ Πέτρου τὰ ῥήματα ταῦτα, ἐπέπεσε[3] τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ Ἅγιον ἐπὶ πάντας

[1] After συνεπ. αυτῳ D, Par., Syr. H. (cf. Wern.) add και συνανεστραφημεν; D¹ has συστραφημεν, cf. Matt. xvii. 22; συστρεφομενων, W.H.; αναστρεφομενων in CD, etc. St. Luke himself never uses συστρεφω in this sense, nor αναστρεφω at all; but Hilg. συνεστραφημεν, and compares D xi. 28, and xvi. 39; see, however, note on xi. 28. After νεκρων D, Sah. (Wern.), Apost. Const. (Syr. H. mg.) (cf. E also) add ημερας τεσσαρακοντα, so Hilg., see Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 44; Ephrem's commentary implies such a reading of the old Syriac. Par. also adds και ανεβη εις τον ουρανον, see Harris, u. s., for addition in Ephrem.

[2] παρηγγειλε, D has ενετειλατο; but παραγγελλω is also a favourite word with Luke; an instance where D seems to be a reminiscence of i. 2. τῳ λαῳ om. Par., Blass brackets, see below. αυτος but ουτος BCDE, Syrr. P. and H., Sah., Boh., Lach., W.H., Hilg., Wendt, Weiss, R.V.; Tisch. and Meyer follow ℵAHP 61, Vulg., Aeth., Iren., Chrys., and read αυτος, see Wendt's note in 1899, and also former edit. in favour of ουτος.

[3] επεπεσε ℵBEHLP; all edd. επεσε AD.

"If even the disciples were incredulous, and needed touch and talk, what would have happened in the case of the many?"—προκεχειροτονημένοις, i.e., by God; only here, not used in LXX or Apocrypha; in classical Greek in same sense as here, see xiv. 23 for the simple verb. The preposition points back to the choice of the disciples with a view to bearing their testimony, i. 18, so that their witness was no chance, haphazard assertion.—συνεφάγ., cf. Luke xxiv. 41, 43 (John xxi. 13), see also Ignat., ad Smyrn., iii., 3 (Apost. Const., vi., 30, 5).—συνεπίομεν: it is surely a false method of criticism which cavils at this statement, because in St. Luke's Gospel nothing is said of drinking, only of eating (see Plummer, in loco). Bede comments: "here Peter mentions what is not in the Gospel, unless intimated when He says 'until I drink it new'" etc.

Ver. 42. παρήγγειλεν: charged us, see on i. 4.—διαμαρτύρ., see above on ii. 40, viii. 25.—ὁ ὡρισμένος, see ii. 23, cf. xvii. 31, in a strikingly similar statement by St. Paul at Athens. St. Peter and St. Paul are both at one in their witness to the Resurrection of the Christ on the third day, and also in their witness to His appointment as the future Judge of mankind. This startling claim made by St. Peter with reference to Jesus of Nazareth, with Whom he had lived on terms of closest human intimacy, and in Whose death he might well have seen the destruction of all his hopes, is a further evidence of the change which had passed over the Apostle, a change which could only be accounted for by the belief that this same Jesus was risen and declared to be the Son of God with power; cf. Enoch xli. 9, edition Charles; Witness of the Epistles, p. 403.—κριτὴς ζ. καὶ ν., cf. 1 Pet. iv. 5; the words point back to the universal lordship of Christ over Jew and Gentile alike, ver. 36, cf. Rom. xiv. 9.

Ver. 43. πάντα τὸν πιστεύοντα, cf. Rom. x. 11, whether Jew or Gentile; the phrase emphatic at the close of the verse, cf. Rom. iii. 22. There is no occasion to refer the words to a reviser in their Pauline meaning (Weiss); St. Peter in reality says nothing more than he had already said and implied, ii. 38, iii. 16, 26.

Ver. 44. ἔτι λ.: the Apostle is apparently interrupted (cf. xi. 15); but in this instance we can agree with Overbeck that the concluding phrase, in its relation to ver. 34 and its proof that God was no respecter of persons, gives to the whole speech a perfect completeness (so τοὺς ἀκούοντας τὸν λόγον. 45. καὶ ἐξέστησαν οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς πιστοὶ ὅσοι[1] συνῆλθον τῷ Πέτρῳ, ὅτι καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη ἡ δωρεὰ τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος ἐκκέχυται· 46. ἤκουον γὰρ αὐτῶν λαλούντων γλώσσαις,[2] καὶ μεγαλυνόντων τὸν Θεόν. 47. τότε ἀπεκρίθη ὁ Πέτρος, Μήτι τὸ ὕδωρ κωλῦσαι δύναταί τις τοῦ μὴ βαπτισθῆναι τούτους, οἵτινες τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ Ἅγιον ἔλαβον καθὼς[3] καὶ ἡμεῖς; 48. προσέταξέ τε αὐτοὺς[4] βαπτισθῆναι ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Κυρίου.[5] τότε ἠρώτησαν αὐτὸν ἐπιμεῖναι ἡμέρας τινάς.

[1] οσοι retained by Tisch., W.H. marg., Blass, Hilg., and even Weiss with ℵADEHLP; but Lach., W.H. text, Wendt follow B, d, Vulg.

[2] γλωσσαις, D[1] prefixes καιναις, d prævaricatis (= ποικιλαις, so Hilg.), Sah., aliis, see below.

[4] αυτους BDEHLP, Cyr.-Jer., Chrys., so W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.; αυτοις, Tisch. following ℵA 33.

Zöckler).—ἐπέπεσε, cf. x. 44, xi. 15, and for the frequency of the word in Acts and its use in Luke's Gospel, see Friedrich, p. 41. By this wonderful proof St. Peter and his Jewish brethren with him saw that, uncircumcised though they were, Cornelius and his household were no longer "common or unclean": "The Holy Ghost," said the Jews, "never fell upon a Gentile". Bengel comments, "Alias baptismus susceptus est ante adventum Spiritus Sancti . . . Liberum gratia habet ordinem".—ἀκούοντας, as in ver. 33.

Ver. 45. οἱ ἐκ π., see ver. 23, cf. Rom. iv. 12, and for the phrase as describing St. Paul's most bitter and narrow opponents, see Gal. ii. 12, Col. iv. 11, Tit. i. 10. The fact was thus fully testified, even by those who were not in sympathy with it.—καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη: "nam uno admisso jam nulli clausa est janua" Bengel. Cf. ii. 38, a gift which they thought did not appertain to the Gentiles; see on ver. 44, and Schöttgen, Hor. Heb., in loco.

Ver. 46. λαλούντων γλώσσαις, see on ii. 13; here no speaking in different languages is meant, but none the less the gift which manifested itself in jubilant ecstatic praise was a gift of the Spirit, and the event may well be called "the Gentile Pentecost"; see on xi. 15 and Plumptre, in loco; Wendt, edition 1899. The words of ver. 47 need not mean that this gift of tongues was manifested precisely as the Pentecostal gift.

Ver. 47. μήτι τὸ ὕ. . . . τοῦ μὴ βαπτισθῆναι, cf. xiv. 18: on construction, Burton, p. 159; so also in LXX and classical Greek, Blass, Gram., p. 230; Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 172 (1893).—οἵτινες, quippe qui, so Blass in this passage.—τὸ ὕδωρ: "the water" R.V., not simply "water" as A.V., as Bengel admirably says, "Non dicit: jam habent Spiritum, ergo aqua carere possunt". In baptism both the water and the Spirit were required, xi. 16. The greater had been bestowed; could the lesser be withheld? See the striking passage in Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 108, on the fact that Cornelius and his companions, even after they had first received the presence of the Holy Ghost, were nevertheless ordered to be baptised.

Ver. 48. προσέταξε, cf. St. Paul's rule, 1 Cor. i. 17. If Philip the Evangelist was at Cæsarea at the time, the baptism may have been intrusted to him.—ἐπιμεῖναι: diutius commorari, Blass, so manere amplius, Bengel, cf. xxi. 4, 10, xxviii. 12, 14, and xv. 34 β (Blass); only in Luke and Paul, frequent in Acts, not found in Luke's Gospel, cf. John viii. 7; only once in LXX, Exod. xii. 39, in classics as in text.—ἡμέρας τινάς, no doubt spent in further instruction in the faith: aurei dies, Bengel.

CHAPTER XI.—Ver. 1. For Western readings see critical notices.—κατὰ τὴν

XI. 1. ἬΚΟΥΣΑΝ δὲ οἱ ἀπόστολοι καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ οἱ ὄντες κατὰ τὴν Ἰουδαίαν, ὅτι καὶ τὰ ἔθνη ἐδέξαντο τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ. 2.[1] καὶ ὅτε ἀνέβη Πέτρος εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα, διεκρίνοντο πρὸς αὐτὸν οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, λέγοντες, 3. Ὅτι πρὸς ἄνδρας ἀκροβυστίαν ἔχοντας εἰσῆλθες,[2] καὶ συνέφαγες αὐτοῖς. 4. Ἀρξάμενος δὲ ὁ Πέτρος ἐξετίθετο

[1] The Western text is here considerably expanded. Blass, following D, Syr. Harcl., Par., Wern. (with differences in particulars), reads in β: ο μεν ουν Π. δια ικανου χρονου ηθελησεν πορευθηναι εις Ι. και προσφωνησας τους αδελφους και επιστηριξας (αυτους) εξηλθεν, πολυν τε χρονον ποιουμενος (επορευετο) δια των χωρων διδασκων αυτους. οτε δε κατηντησεν εις Ι. και απηγγειλεν αυτοις την χαριν του Θεου οι εκ περιτομης αδελφοι διεκρινοντο προς αυτον, λεγοντες· This, according to Belser, is an irrefutable proof that β gives us the original text of Luke, p. 63, and see also Blass, Phil. of the Gospels, p. 129, and cf. xxi. 16. It is true that in the first part of the addition all the words and clauses are Lucan (although if we read with D ος και κατηντησεν αυτοις instead of οτε δε κατην. εις Ι. we have no instance in Luke of καταντάω in construction with a dative). But Weiss, Codex D, takes a very opposite view from Belser (see also Wendt (1899)), p. 206, and it is, of course, quite possible that the additions were made on account of the apparent abrupt ending of the passage about Cornelius, and to show that Peter, too, did not break off his missionary work hurriedly, etc.

[2] εισηλθες και συνεφαγες; W.H., following BL, Syrr., Arm., has the 3rd person sing., but Weiss has the 2nd person sing., as in TR (so Tisch.).

Ἰ.: not simply in but throughout Judæa, "all about Judæa," Hort, Ecclesia, p. 57, cf. viii. 1.

Ver. 2. διεκρίνοντο, cf. Jude, ver. 9, with dative of the person (Polyb., ii., 22, 11). For similar construction as here see LXX, Ezek. xx. 35, 36, see Grimm-Thayer, sub v. Otherwise in x. 20.—οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, cf. Gal. ii. 12; we can scarcely confine the term here to those mentioned in x. 45 (although Dr. Hort takes this view as most probable), but how far there was a section of the Church at Jerusalem who could thus be described at this time it is difficult to say, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 44.

Ver. 3. ἀκροβυστίαν ἔχοντας: the expression intimates the bitterness of the opposition. Bengel curiously comments "benigne loquuntur". On ἀκροβ. see especially Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 111.—καὶ συνέφαγες αὐτοῖς: this was the real charge, the violation of the ceremonial law, cf. x. 28; see on the intolerant division between Pharisaical Jews and Gentiles, Weber, Jüdische Theol., pp. 59, 60; Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, pp. 26-28. There is therefore nothing in the statement to justify the objection raised by Zeller and others against the whole narrative of the baptism of Cornelius (so Wendt, edition 1888 and 1899). But if the complaint against Peter was based not upon the fact that he had baptised Cornelius but had eaten with him, then we can see a great difference between the narrative here and that of the Ethiopian eunuch in chap. viii. In the latter case there was no question of the obligations of the ceremonial law—the baptism was administered and Philip and the eunuch separated, but here the whole stress of the narrative lies in the fact referred to in ver. 3, so that if the eunuch and Cornelius both belonged to the class of "half-proselytes" their cases are not parallel. But even if they were, in other respects there would still remain a distinction between them. It was one thing for the Ethiopian to be received into the Church of Christ by the Hellenist Philip, but it was another thing—and a marked advance—when the principle asserted by Philip was ratified by the Apostles of the circumcision in the case of Cornelius. Wendt, edition 1899, pp. 181, 198, and Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 300.

Ver. 4. ἀρξ. δὲ ὁ Π. "But Peter began, and expounded the matter": ἀρξ. may be pleonastic, i. 4, cf. καθεξῆς, or may be used graphically, or because the reproaches of οἱ ἐκ περιτ. gave the first incentive to St. Peter's recital.—καθ. only in Luke, Gospel and Acts, see iii. 24.—ἐξετίθετο, xviii. 26, xxviii. 23, Jos., Ant., i., 12, 2, so also in Polyb., x., 9, 3. Perhaps used here by St. Luke from its use by Dioscorides; familiar word to him also as a physician, see Vogel, p. 17.

αὐτοῖς καθεξῆς λέγων, 5. Ἐγὼ ἤμην ἐν πόλει Ἰόππῃ προσευχόμενος, καὶ εἶδον ἐν ἐκστάσει ὅραμα, καταβαῖνον σκεῦός τι ὡς ὀθόνην μεγάλην[1] τέσσαρσιν ἀρχαῖς καθιεμένην ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, καὶ ἦλθεν ἄχρις ἐμοῦ· 6. εἰς ἣν ἀτενίσας κατενόουν, καὶ εἶδον τὰ τετράποδα τῆς γῆς καὶ τὰ θηρία καὶ τὰ ἑρπετὰ καὶ τὰ πετεινὰ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ. 7. ἤκουσα δὲ φωνῆς λεγούσης μοι, Ἀναστάς, Πέτρε, θῦσον καὶ φάγε. 8. εἶπον δέ, Μηδαμῶς, Κύριε[2]· ὅτι πᾶν κοινὸν ἢ ἀκάθαρτον οὐδέποτε εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὸ στόμα μου. 9. ἀπεκρίθη δέ μοι φωνὴ ἐκ δευτέρου[3] ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, Ἃ ὁ Θεὸς ἐκαθάρισε, σὺ μὴ κοίνου. 10. τοῦτο δὲ ἐγένετο ἐπὶ τρίς, καὶ πάλιν ἀνεσπάσθη ἅπαντα εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν. 11. καὶ ἰδού, ἐξαυτῆς τρεῖς ἄνδρες ἐπέστησαν ἐπὶ τὴν οἰκίαν ἐν ᾗ ἤμην,[4] ἀπεσταλμένοι ἀπὸ Καισαρείας πρός με. 12. εἶπε δέ μοι τὸ Πνεῦμα συνελθεῖν αὐτοῖς, μηδὲν διακρινόμενον[5]· ἦλθον δὲ σὺν ἐμοὶ καὶ οἱ ἕξ

[1] μεγαλην, but λαμπραν in Syr. Harcl., Par.[1] has μεγαλην λαμπραν. Blass rejects (cf. x. 11).

[2] Orig. has κυριε συ οισθα οτι, Blass rejects.

[3] εκ δευτερου D omits, as also some Western authorities in x. 15, and Blass in β.

[4] ημην EHLP, Vulg., Syrr. (P. and H.), Boh., Sah., Aeth., Chrys., so Blass, W.H. marg.—assim. apparently to ver. 5. ημεν אABD 40, Tisch., W.H. text, R.V., Wendt, Weiss, Hilg.

[5] διακρινομενον HLP, Chrys. (cf. x. 20, Meyer, who suspects it here). διακριναντα א^c AB 13, 40, 61, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, R.V.; διακρινοντα א*E 15, 18*, 36. Blass rejects altogether, so Hilg., with D, Syr. H. (text and margin), Par.[1]. But cf. Acts xv. 9, where act. occurs in similar context.

Evidently St. Luke by the two accounts attaches great significance to this first reception, exceptional case as it was, of a Gentile proselyte like Cornelius into the Christian Church, but it was an isolated case, and moreover a case within Palestine, not beyond its borders, so that the great questions of a mission to the Gentiles of the heathen world, and of the conditions for their reception as Christians, were not matter for consideration as afterwards in chap. xv., see Wendt, edition 1899, p. 211; Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 58, 59; and see below on ver. 12.

Ver. 6. κατενόουν, cf. vii. 31, 32, Matt. vii. 3, Luke vi. 41, R.V., etc., the seeing is the result of the considering—"contemplabar singula, effectus comprehenditur aoristo" εἶδον.—θηρία: not specially mentioned in x. 12 (see critical notes), but there πάντα precedes τετράποδα.

Ver. 8. εἰσῆλθεν, cf. Matt. xv. 11, 17. Blass sees in the phrase "locutio hebraismum redolens," cf. viii. 35; on the other hand the Hebraistic πᾶν of x. 14 is omitted (Weiss).

Ver. 10. ἀνεσπάσθη: only found in Luke xiv. 5 in N.T., another touch of vividness as in vv. 5, 6. In LXX three times, and possibly once in Bel and the Dragon, ver. 42, of drawing up Daniel from the den (but reading may be the simple verb, see H. and R.).

Ver. 12. μηδὲν διακρινόμενον, cf. x. 20, but if we read (see critical notes) μ. διακρίναντα, "making no distinction," R.V.—οἱ ἓξ ἀδελφοὶ οὗτοι: who had been with Peter at Cæsarea, and had returned with him to Jerusalem, see x. 45. Hilgenfeld would regard them as constant companions of St. Peter on his Apostolic journeys. Differences such as these between the narrative here and that in x. 23 where the brethren are mentioned without their number constrain Feine to regard xi. 1-18 as derived like the earlier narrative in x. from one and the same source, not as added by a reviser (although he excludes vv. 1 and 18 in xi. from the original narrative). Spitta agrees with Feine in this view of xi. 2-17; a forger writing with a "tendency" would have smoothed away any apparent discrepancies, as Zöckler well points out. With regard to the whole Cornelius ἀδελφοὶ οὗτοι, καὶ εἰσήλθομεν εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ ἀνδρός, 13. ἀπήγγειλέ τε ἡμῖν πῶς εἶδε τὸν ἄγγελον ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ αὐτοῦ σταθέντα καὶ εἰπόντα αὐτῷ Ἀπόστειλον εἰς Ἰόππην ἄνδρας, καὶ μετάπεμψαι Σίμωνα τὸν ἐπικαλούμενον Πέτρον, 14. ὃς λαλήσει ῥήματα πρὸς σέ, ἐν οἷς σωθήσῃ σὺ καὶ πᾶς ὁ οἶκός σου· 15. ἐν δὲ τῷ ἄρξασθαί με λαλεῖν, ἐπέπεσε[1] τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ Ἅγιον ἐπ' αὐτούς, ὥσπερ καὶ ἐφ' ἡμᾶς ἐν ἀρχῇ. 16. ἐμνήσθην δὲ τοῦ ῥήματος Κυρίου, ὡς ἔλεγεν, "Ἰωάννης μὲν ἐβάπτισεν ὕδατι, ὑμεῖς δὲ βαπτισθήσεσθε ἐν Πνεύματι Ἁγίῳ." 17. εἰ οὖν τὴν ἴσην δωρεὰν ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ὁ Θεὸς ὡς καὶ ἡμῖν, πιστεύσασιν ἐπὶ τὸν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν, ἐγὼ δὲ τίς ἤμην δυνατὸς κωλῦσαι τὸν Θεόν[2]; 18. Ἀκούσαντες δὲ ταῦτα ἡσύχασαν, καὶ ἐδόξαζον[3] τὸν Θεόν, λέγοντες, Ἄραγε[4] καὶ τοῖς ἔθνεσιν ὁ Θεὸς τὴν μετάνοιαν ἔδωκεν εἰς ζωήν.

[1] επεπεσε, but D reads simple verb, which Blass rejects here, although he accepts it in x. 44 (AD). Hilg. has simple verb.

[2] ο Θεος om. D, Aug., so Hilg., but Blass retains. D, Syr. Harcl. mg., Par. Aug. (Hilg. follows D) add του μη δουναι αυτοις π. αγ., and D further adds τοις πιστευσασιν επ' αυτῳ and Syr. Harcl. πιστ. εις τον Κ. Ι. Χ. Blass omits these last two additions (with Aug.), but places πιστευσασιν επ' αυτῳ in brackets; additions apparently to explain of what the κωλ. τον Θ. consisted, described by Weiss as quite superfluous, see Codex D, p. 71, and note.

[3] εδοξαζον AEHLP, Arm., so Meyer; Blass (see force of imperf. in his comment.), Wendt, Weiss. εδοξασαν ℵBD^b, Vulg., Sah., Boh., Syr. P. and H., Aeth., so Gig., Par.; Tisch., W.H., Hilg. But aor. manifestly conformed to aor. ησυχασαν (so Weiss, Wendt).

[4] αραγε, but αρα only in ℵABD 40, 61, 65, 133; so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Blass, Wendt (against Meyer). D omits την before μετανοιαν.

episode, Spitta and Feine (so Weiss and Wendt), inasmuch as they regard St. Luke's narrative as containing at least a genuine historical kernel, and as marking a special exceptional case, and not a general rule as existing at such an early time, are much less radical than Weizsäcker, Holtzmann, and Clemen. For a good review of the relation of modern criticism to the narrative see Wendt (1899) on x. 1 and Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 226, 227 (second edition).

Ver. 13. σταθέντα—σταθείς: used only by St. Luke, in Gospel and Acts: Luke xviii. 11, 40, xix. 8, Acts ii. 14, v. 20, xi. 13, xvii. 22, xxv. 18, xxvii. 21, found therefore in all parts of Acts (Friedrich, Vogel).

Ver. 14. ἐν οἷς σωθ. σὺ καὶ πᾶς ὁ οἶκ. σου: words not found in x., but may be fairly taken as implied; the prayers of Cornelius we can scarcely doubt had been that he might see the salvation of God, and his household were devout like himself, cf. x. 2-6.

Ver. 15. ἄρξασθαι: somewhat more precisely stated than in x. 44. The speech has there no abruptness, but St. Peter may well have intended to say much more; if this was so, the notice here is quite natural, Winer-Moulton, lxv., 7 d.—ἐν ἀρχῇ, i.e., at the great Pentecost.

Ver. 16. Words not found in the Gospels, but in Acts i. 5, quoted here with the omission of οὐ μετὰ πολλὰς ταύτας ἡμέρας, showing that St. Peter regarded the baptism of the Holy Ghost received by Cornelius as equally decisive of the Spirit's presence as the bestowal upon himself and others at Pentecost.—ὡς ἔλεγεν: not merely pleonastic, cf. Luke xxii. 61; Winer-Moulton, lxv., 1 a, Wendt, Felten.

Ver. 17. πιστεύσασιν, see R.V., best to take participle as referring both to αὐτοῖς and to ἡμῖν; in each case the Holy Spirit was bestowed, and in each case as a result of the preceding belief, not as a result of circumcision, or of [1] επι Στεφανῳ ℵBHLP 61, Bas., Chrys, Theophl., best supported; επι Στεφανου perhaps a gloss since επι was taken temporally; απο του Στεφανου D, so Hilg. (but not Blass in β). Κυπρου, Par. reads Τυρου; Blass rejects.

[2] Ελληνιστας BD²EHLP 61, W.H., R.V. marg., so Sanday (cf. Shirley, Apostolic Age, pp. 27, 28; Wordsworth, and Hastings' B.D., art. "Christian," p. 384); Ελληνας ℵ³A (discounted by reading Ελληνας wrongly in ix. 27), D¹, Arm., Eus., Chrys., Tisch., Weiss, Blass, R.V. text. ℵ¹ ευαγγελιστας claimed as supporting Ελληνιστας, but see Sanday, u. infra. Lightfoot and a large number of recent writers (Page, Ramsay, Zöckler, Holtzmann, Felten, Rendall, G. A. Smith, McGiffert) accept Ελληνας (although, in some cases, admitting that MS. authority is adverse), because demanded as antithetical to the preceding Ιουδαιοι. It is urged that Ελληνιστ. are included under Ιουδ., but whilst in one sense this is so, it is also possible to draw a distinction between the two, Ιουδ. may be used as = Εβραιοι in vi. 1, or as in xiv. 1, xviii. 4 where evidently Jews and proselytes (not heathen) are distinguished, so that whilst as far as Antioch Jews only had been addressed, now the Cyprians and Cyrenians addressed Hellenists, God-fearers (like Cornelius), "Greeks who came into relations with the Jews," whilst not addressing as yet those who were entirely heathen. In view of the great importance and future position of the Church of Antioch, it is not unlikely that Luke should carefully note the elements of which it was originally composed. The real turning-point in the sphere of Peter and Paul is not yet, but in xiii. 46. See W.H., Select Readings, p. 94; Hort, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 59, 60; Ecclesia, p. 61; Sanday, Expositor, pp. 60-62, and Ramsay, p. 47 (1896).

Was I able to withstand God? Winer-Moulton, lxvi., 5.—ἐγὼ, emphatic, "merum organon," Bengel.

Ver. 18. ἡσύχασαν, cf. xxi. 14 and Luke xiv. 3, so in LXX, Neh. v. 8 (Job xxxii. 6, Hebrew different); also in a different sense in Luke xxiii. 56, 1 Thess. iv. 11, only in Luke and Paul in N.T.—ἐδόξαζον, see critical notes, imperfect of continuous action—the writer about to pass to other things thus depicts the state of things which he leaves, cf. viii. 3 (Blass).—Ἄραγε, see critical notes.

Ver. 19. οἱ μὲν οὖν, cf. viii. 4. μὲν οὖν introduces a general statement, whilst δέ (ver. 20) marks a particular instance. —ἐπὶ Σ.: "about Stephen" A. and R. V. (best); some render "against Stephen," and others "post Stephanum". See also critical note.

Ver. 20. ἄνδρες Κύπ. καὶ Κυρ., cf. iv. 36, xxi. 16; ii. 10, vi. 9.—Ἑλληνιστάς, see critical notes.—εὐαγγελιζόμενοι τὸν Κ. Ἰ.: on construction with accusative of the message, Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 79. We can scarcely take the phrase given here, instead of "preaching that Jesus was the Christ," as a proof that the word was preached not to Jews but to Gentiles.—Ἀντιόχειαν: on the Orontes, distinguished as Ἀ. ἡ πρός, or ἐπὶ Δάφνῃ, and bearing the title μητρόπολις. There appear to have been at least five places in Syria so called under the Seleucids. For the Arabs Damascus was the capital, but the Greeks wanted to be nearer the Mediterranean and Asia Minor. The city built in 500 B.C. by Seleucus Nicator I. became more and more beautiful, whilst all the trade of the Mediterranean was connected with it through its harbour Seleucia. All the varied elements of the life of the ancient world found a home there. From the first there were Jews amongst its inhabitants. But in such a mixed population, whilst art and literature could gain the praise of Cicero, vice as well as luxury made the city infamous as well as famous. Josephus calls it the third city of the empire, next to Rome and Alexandria, but Ausonius hesitates between Antioch and Alexandria, as to the rank they occupied in eminence and vice. The famous words of Juvenal: "in Tiberim defluxit Orontes," Sat., iii., 62, describe the influences which Antioch, with its worthless rabble of Greeks and parasites, with its quacks and impostors, its rivalries and debaucheries, exercised upon Rome. Gibbon speaks of the city in the days of Julian as a place where the lively licentiousness of the Greek was blended with the hereditary softness of the Syrian. Yet here was the μητρόπολις, not merely of Syria, but of the Gentile Christian Churches, and next to Jerusalem no city is more closely associated with the early history and spread of the Christian faith. See "Antioch" (G. A. Smith) in Hastings' B.D.; Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chaps. xxiii., xxiv.; Renan, Les Apôtres, chaps. xii., xiii. — ἐλάλουν: "used to speak," so Ramsay.

[3] Blass (cf. Hilg.) reconstructs according to D, Gig., Par., Syr. Harcl. mg.: ακουσας δε οτι Σαυλος εστιν εις Ταρσον εξηλθεν αναζητων αυτον και συντυχων παρεκαλεσεν ελθειν εις Α. οιτινες παραγενομενοι ενιαυτον ολον συνηχθησαν τῃ εκκ. κ. εδιδαξαν οχλον ικανον (D has ενι. ολ. συνεχυθησαν οχλ. ικ., omits και εδιδ.). It is difficult to see why this should have been shortened if original; perhaps added to definitely show why Barnabas went to Tarsus, and to mark that Saul was not brought to Tarsus but "besought to come". συνεχυθησαν, D (Par.[1]), evident mistake, Blass emends; see Weiss, Codex D, pp. 71, 72. Hilg. has συνεχυσαν.

Ver. 21. χεὶρ K., cf. iv. 28, 30, xiii. 11, Luke i. 66; frequent in O.T. τε closely connects the two clauses, showing that the result of "the hand of the Lord" was that a great number, etc. (Weiss).

Ver. 22. τῆς ἐκκ. τῆς ἐν Ἰ.: in contrast here to Antioch, in which the existence of an Ecclesia was not yet formally recognised; but cf. ver. 26, Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 59-61. — περὶ αὐτῶν: "concerning them" R.V., i.e., the persons who had believed and turned to the Lord. Meyer takes it of the preachers, Felten of both preachers and converts.

Ver. 23. τὴν χάριν: if we add τὴν, see critical notes, "the grace that was of God" Hort, Ecclesia, p. 60, so Alford.—παρεκάλει: a true son of encouragement, exhortation—see on iv. 36, imperfect because Barnabas remained at Antioch, and the result is indicated in ver. 24, προσετέθη. This mention of Barnabas and the part played by the primitive Church is referred by Clemen to his Redactor Antijudaicus, p. 109. If we read ἐν τῷ K. with R.V. margin we could render "to abide by the purpose of their heart in the Lord," so Hort, u. s., p. 60; Rendall; cf. 2 Tim. iii. 10; and Symmachus, Ps. x. 17 (Weiss). τῷ K., i.e., Christ; with this verse cf. xv. 32, where St. Luke similarly insists upon the due qualification of divine gifts; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 45.

Ver. 25. Luke gives no reason why Barnabas goes to seek Saul, but Barnabas who had already vouched for Saul's sincerity before the Church of Jerusalem, ix. 27, could scarcely be ignorant that the sphere of his friend's future work was to be the Gentile world. In ix. 30 Saul was sent away to Tarsus, and now Barnabas goes to Tarsus to seek him; each statement is the complement of the other, and a long period intervenes not marked by any critical event in Saul's history. So also Paul's own statement, Gal. i. 21, 22, marks the same period, and the two writers complete each other. Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 45, 46, on Luke's style and reading in D above.—ἀναζητῆσαι, cf. Luke ii. 44, 45, nowhere else in N.T., a word therefore not only common to, but peculiar to Luke's writings.—ἀνά: giving idea of thoroughness; it was not known at what precise spot Saul was prosecuting his work, so the word implies effort or thoroughness in the search; εὑρὼν implies the same uncertainty. In LXX, cf. Job iii. 4, x. 6, 2 Macc. xiii. 21. Calvin comments on the fresh proof of the "simplicitas" of Barnabas; he might have retained the chief place at Antioch, but he goes for Paul: "videmus ergo ut sui oblitus nihil aliud spectat, nisi ut emineat unus Christus".

[2] πρωτον ℵBD² 36, 163, so Tisch., W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt; πρωτως, see also Alford's note on its force; D, Gig., Par. read και τοτε πρωτον, so Hilg. Harnack regards the τοτε as secondary, and introduced by the Western reviser to mark that the disciples were then called Christians, which in Harnack's opinion was very improbable, see Sitzungsberichte d. Königl. preuss. Akad. d. Wissenschaften zu Berlin, xvii., p. 4, 1899. Χριστιαν. ℵ¹ has Χρηστιανοι, "recte," Blass (so 61), but there is no reason to suppose that this was the original, although it may well have been a corrupted form, cf. the testimony of Tert., Just. Mar., Lactant.; D has Χρειστ.

Ver. 26. ἐγένετο δὲ αὐτοὺς, see critical notes, if dative αὐτοῖς = accidit eis, see Plummer, St. Luke, p. 45, on the use of ἐγένετο.—ἐνιαυτὸν ὅλον: "even a whole year" R.V.—συναχθῆναι ἐν τῇ ἐκκλ.: "they were gathered together in the Church," so R.V. margin. Rendall holds that ἐν is fatal to the A.V. and R.V. text, and renders "they [i.e., Barnabas and Saul] were brought together in the Church," an intimate association of inestimable value. Hort adopts as "the least difficult explanation of this curious word" "were hospitably received in the Church," so Wendt, Weiss, Nösgen, cf. Matt. xxv. 35; Deut. xxii. 2, Josh. ii. 18, Judg. xix. 18, 2 Sam. xi. 27.—διδάξαι . . . χρηματίσαι: both infinitives depend upon ἐγένετο, "and that the disciples," etc., suggesting that the name "Christian" followed as result upon the widespread teaching of the Apostles amongst the Gentiles. If St. Luke, as Eusebius states, was himself a native of Antioch, it has been well noted that he might well record such a distinction for his city as the origin of the name "Christian".—χρηματίσαι: prim. to transact business (χρῆμα), passes into the meaning of taking a name from one's public business, so to receive a name, to be called, cf. Rom. vii. 3, so in Josephus and Philo, and instances in Grimm-Thayer. See also x. 22 for another shade of meaning, and so elsewhere in N.T.; and for its use to express a reply or information by a king or those in authority to inquiry, see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 118.—πρῶτον, see critical notes.—Χριστιανούς: in the N.T. the Christians always named themselves μαθηταί, ἀδελφοί, ἅγιοι, πιστοί, etc., but on no occasion "Christians," whilst the Jews not only refused to recognise that Jesus had any claim to be the Christ, but also called His followers Ναζωραῖοι (xxiv. 5), or spake of them as ἡ αἵρεσις αὕτη (xxviii. 22, cf. xxiv. 14). On the probably contemptuous use of the word in 1 Peter iv. 16 and Acts xxvi. 28 as not inconsistent with the above statements, see Wendt, edition 1899, in loco, and "Christian" in Hastings' B.D. But whilst it is difficult to find an origin for the title amongst Christians or amongst Jews, there is no difficulty in attributing it to the keen-witted populace of Antioch, already famous for their bestowal of nicknames, although perhaps the possibility that the name may have originated amongst the Latin-speaking official retinue of the legatus at Antioch should not be excluded (though there is no evidence whatever that it became at this early date an official name). But there is no need to suppose that the name was of Roman origin, although we may readily concede that the Latin termination -ianus was common enough at this period. There is ample proof of the use of the same termination not only in Latin but in Greek, even if we do not regard -ιανός with Wendt as a termination of a native "Asiatic type". The notice in Tacitus, Ann., xv., 44 (cf. Suetonius, Nero, 16), who was probably in Rome during Nero's persecution, A.D. 64, is very significant, for he not only intimates that the word was commonly and popularly known, but also that the title had been in vogue for some time: "quos vulgus Christianos appellabat," note the imperfect tense. Against the recent strictures of Weizsäcker and Schmiedel we may place the opinion of Spitta, and also of Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 158. How soon the title given in mockery became a name of honour we may gather from the Ignatian Epistles, cf. Rom., iii., 3; Magn., iv.; Ephes., xi., 2, and cf. Mart. Polyc., x. and xii., 1, 2. See further Lightfoot, Phil., p. 16; Lechler, Das Apostolische Zeitalter, p. 129 ff.; Smith, B.D.[2] "Christian," Conybeare and Howson, p. 100 (smaller edition), and Expositor, June, 1898.

Ver. 27. Antioch sends relief to Jerusalem.—ἐν ταύταις δὲ ταῖς ἡ., cf. i. 15, vi. 1. ταύταις emphatic, by its position and also by its significance, days full of importance for Barnabas and Saul, who were still at Antioch (Weiss).—προφῆται: the coming of the prophets gave an additional sanction to the work at Antioch. There is no reason in the uncertainty of the dates to suppose that they had been driven from Jerusalem by persecution. For the position of the Christian prophets in the N.T. cf. Acts xiii. 1, where Barnabas and Saul are spoken of as prophets and teachers; afterwards as Apostles, xiv. 4; xv. 32, where Judas and Silas are described as prophets, having been previously spoken of, ver. 22, as ἡγούμενοι amongst the brethren at Jerusalem (while Silas later bears the name of Apostle); cf., further, 1 Cor. xii. 28, xiv. 29-33, 39, Ephes. iv. 11, where in each case the Prophet is placed next to Apostles (although in 1 Cor. he may have been merely a member of a local community), perhaps because "he belonged to the same family as the great prophets of the Old Testament," for whilst foreknowledge of events was not necessarily implied by the word either in the O.T. or in the N.T., the case of Agabus, both here and in xxi. 10, 11, shows that predictiveness was by no means excluded. The Christian prophets, moreover, as we see them in Acts, combine the duty of "ministering to the Lord" with that of preaching the word; they are not only foretellers, but forthtellers of God's will, as in the case of a Samuel or an Elijah, Gore, Church and the Ministry, pp. 240, 261, 393, etc.; Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 160 ff.; and for Sub-Apostolic Age, p. 179 ff.; Bigg, Doctrine of the Twelve Apostles, p.

Ver. 28. Ἄγαβος: on derivation see W.H., ii., 313, from עגב "to love"; or from חגב "a locust," Ezra ii. 45, Neh. vii. 48, with rough breathing Ἅγ. W.H. follow Syriac and read the former as in T.R., so Weiss; Blass doubtful; Klostermann would connect it with Ἀγαυός, Probleme im Aposteltexte, p. 10. As a Jewish prophet he would naturally use the symbolic methods of a Jeremiah or an Ezekiel, see on xxi. 10, 11. On insertion in D see critical notes.—μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι: future infinitive only used in N.T. with μέλλειν in this one phrase, and only so in Acts, cf. xxiv. 15, xxvii. 10. In xxiii. 30 μέλλειν omitted (although in T.R.), and in xxiv. 25 ἔσεσθαι omitted (although in T.R.). Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 51, Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 120, and Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 158 (1893).—λιμὸν: masculine in Luke iv. 25, and so in common usage, but in Doric usage, as it is called, feminine, and so also in later Greek; feminine in Luke xv. 14 and here; see critical notes; Blass, Gram., p. 26.—ἐφ' ὅλην τὴν οἰκ.—the civilised world, i.e., the Roman Empire. Cf. xxiv. 5, and Luke ii. 1, see Plummer's note on Luke iv. 5 (and Hackett's attempt, in loco, to limit the expression), and Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 118. We have ample evidence as to a widespread dearth over various parts of the Roman Empire, to which Suetonius, Dion Cassius, Tacitus, and Eusebius all bear witness, in the reign of Claudius; and in no other reign do we find such varied allusions to periodical famines, "assiduae sterilitates," Suetonius, Claudius, xviii., cf. Dion Cassius, lx., 11; Tac., Ann., xii., 43, etc. These and other references are given by Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 170, E.T. (so also by O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 124), but instead of drawing from these varied references the inference that the author of Acts had ample justification for his statement as to the prevalence of famine over the Roman Empire, he takes him to task for speaking of a famine "over the whole world". See Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 48, 49, and also Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? pp. 251, 252, cf. vv. 29 and 30. At least there is no ground to suppose, with Clemen and others, that the writer of Acts was here dependent on Josephus for the mention of the famine which that historian confined to Judæa, but which the writer of Acts, or rather Clemen's Redactor Antijudaicus, magnified according to his usual custom.

Ver. 29. καθὼς ηὐπορεῖτό τις: only here in N.T., and the cognate noun in xix. 25, but in same sense in classical Greek; cf. Lev. xxv. 26, 28, 49, and Wisdom x. 10 (but see Hatch and Redpath on passages in Lev.). "According to his ability," so A. and R.V., i.e., as each man prospered, in proportion to his means. The expression intimates that the community of goods, at least in a communistic sense, could not have been the rule, cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 2, but a right view of "the community of goods" at Jerusalem invokes no contradiction with this statement, as Hilgenfeld apparently maintains, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., p. 506, 1895. On the good effect of this work of brotherly charity and fellowship, this practical exhibition of Christian union between Church and Church, between the Christians of the mother-city and those of the Jewish dispersion, see Hort, Ecclesia, p. 62; Ramsay, u. s., p. 52; Baumgarten (Alford, in loco).—εἰς διακονίαν: "for a ministry," R.V. margin, cf. Rom. xv. 31, 2 Cor. ix. 1, etc., Acta Thomæ, 56; "contributions for relief" Ramsay, see further below; on the construction and complexity of the sentence see especially Page's note, and Wendt.—ἀδελφοῖς: not merely as fellow-disciples, but as brethren in the One Lord.

Ver. 30. ὃ καὶ ἐποίησαν κ.τ.λ.: a question arises as to whether this took place during, or at a later date than, Herod's persecution in 44 A.D.—the year of his death. Bishop Lightfoot (with whom Dr. Sanday and Dr. Hort substantially agree) maintains that Barnabas and Saul went up to Jerusalem in the early months of 44, during Herod's persecution, deposited their διακονία with the elders, and returned without delay. If we ask why "elders" are mentioned, and not Apostles, the probability is suggested that the Apostles had fled from Jerusalem and were in hiding. Against this view Ramsay strongly protests, not only on account of the part assigned to the leading Apostles, but also because of the meaning which he attaches to the διακονία of Barnabas and Saul (see on xii. 25). The elders, not Apostles, are mentioned because the embassy was of a purely business kind, and it was not fit that the Apostles should serve tables. Moreover, Ramsay places the visit of Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem in 45, or preferably in 46, at the commencement of the great famine in Judæa—not in 44, but in 45. Still, as Dr. Sanday urges, the entire omission of any reference to the Apostles is strange (cf. Blass on xi. 30, xii. 17, who holds that the Apostles had fled), especially as elsewhere Apostles and elders are constantly bracketed together as a single body (xv. 2, 4, 6, 22, 23, xvi. 4, cf. xxi. 18). Nor does it follow that because James, presumably "the brother of the Lord," is mentioned as remaining in Jerusalem during the persecution (but see Lightfoot, Gal., p. 127, note), which his reputation for sanctity amongst his countrymen might have enabled him to do, that the other Apostles could have done so with equal safety. But Ramsay at all events relieves us from the difficulty involved in the entrance of Paul into Jerusalem at a time of persecution, and the more so in view of the previous plots against his life, a difficulty which is quite unsatisfactorily met by supposing that Paul did not enter the city at all for some unknown reasons, or more unsatisfactorily still by attributing to the author of Acts a mistake in asserting that any visit of Paul to Jerusalem was made at this time. On the chronological order involved in accordance with the two views mentioned, see Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 48 ff., 68, 69; Lightfoot, Gal., p. 124, note; and, as space forbids more, for the whole question Expositor for February and March, 1896; Lightfoot, Gal., p. 123 ff.; Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 61, and Ecclesia, p. 62; Wendt, p. 265 (1888) and p. 218 (1899).—τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους, see previous verse. It is also noticeable that St. Luke gives no account of the appointment of the elders; he takes it for granted. These Christian elders are therefore in all probability no new kind of officers, but a continuation in the Christian Church of the office of the זְקֵנִים, πρεσβύτεροι, to whom probably the government of the Synagogue was assigned—hence we may account for St. Luke's silence (Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 141; Hort, Ecclesia, p. 62; Lightfoot, Phil., pp. 191-193; "Bishop" (Gwatkin), Hastings' B.D.). In the Christian συναγωγή (James ii. 2) there would naturally be elders occupying a position of trust and authority. There is certainly no reason to regard them as the Seven under another name (so Zeller, Ritschl), although it is quite conceivable that if the Seven represented the Hellenists, the elders may have been already in existence as representing the Hebrew part of the Church. But there is need to guard against the exaggeration of the Jewish nature of the office in question. In the N.T. we find mention of elders, not merely so on account of age, not merely as administrative and disciplinary officers (Hatch, Bampton Lectures, pp. 58, 61), as in a Jewish synagogue, but as officers of the Christian Church with spiritual functions, cf. James v. 14, 1 Pet. v. 2, Acts xx. 17, Tit. i. 5, and also 1 Thess. v. 12-14, Heb. xiii. 7 (see Mayor, St. James, p. cxxviii; Gore, Church and the Ministry, pp. 253, 263, and note

[1] After εκκλησιας D, Syr. Harcl. mg., Par., Wern. add της εν τῃ Ἰουδαιᾳ—if the words were original it seems difficult to account for their omission; but see Belser's defence, p. 64, of this and β in vv. 3 and 5.

[2] After Ιουδαιοις D, Syr. H. mg., Par., so Hilg., add η επιχειρησις αυτου επι τους πιστους—this again may be an explanatory gloss, defining what pleased the Jews—but επιχ. and πιστ. are used by Luke in his writings.

K). At the same time there is nothing to surprise us in the fact that the administration of alms should be connected in loco with the office of elders. If they were representing the Apostles at the time in Jerusalem, it is what we should expect, since the organisation of almsgiving remained part of the Apostolic office, Gal. ii. 10, 2 Cor. viii., etc.; and if in a passage from Polycarp (quoted by Dr. Hatch) we find the two connected—the presbyterate and what looks like the administration of alms, Polycarp, Phil., vi., xi.—this again need not surprise us, since not only in the N.T., but from the passage referred to in Polycarp, it is evident that the elders, whilst they exercised judicial and administrative functions, exercised also spiritual gifts, and discharged the office of teachers, functions to which there was nothing analogous in the Jewish presbyters (see Gore, u. s., note K, and Gwatkin, u. s., p. 302). To turn back the sheep that are gone astray (ἐπιστρέφοντες τὰ ἀποπεπλανημένα) is one of the first commands laid by Polycarp in his Epistle upon the Christian Presbyters (vi., quoted by Hatch), and from this alone it would appear that a familiar title in the Jewish Church passed into the Church of Christ, gaining therein a new and spiritual power. See further on xx. 17, and for the use of the word in inscriptions, Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 153, and Neue Bibelstudien, p. 160.

CHAPTER XII. Persecution by Herod; St. Peter's deliverance.—Ver. 1. κατ' ἐκεῖνον τὸν καιρὸν: "about that time," or more precisely "at that time," Rendall, cf. Rom. ix. 9, so in Gen. xviii. 10, 2 Macc. iii. 5: in the early part of 44 A.D.—Ἡρώδης ὁ β., Herod Agrippa I.: only in this chapter in the N.T.: on his character and death, see below xii. 3, 23. Born in B.C. 10 and educated in his early life in Rome, he rose from a rash adventurer to good fortune and high position first through the friendship of Caligula and afterwards of Claudius. He united under his own sway the entire empire of his grandfather, Herod the Great, while his Pharisaic piety and also his attachment to the Roman supremacy found expression in the titles which he bore, βασιλεὺς μέγας φιλόκαισαρ εὐσεβὴς καὶ φιλορώμαιος. On the pathetic story told of him in connection with the Feast of Tabernacles (A.D. 41) see Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, ii., 1, p. 28, and the whole article; Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 150 ff., E.T.; Farrar, The Herods, p. 179 ff. (1898).—ἐπέβαλεν τὰς χεῖρας, Luke xx. 19, xxi. 12, and cf. Acts iv. 3, v. 18, xxi. 27, once in Matthew and Mark, in John twice; Friedrich, p. 39, cf. LXX, Gen. xxii. 12, 2 Sam. xviii. 12 (so in Polyb.), cf. for similar construction of the infinitive of the purpose xviii. 10, not in the sense of ἐπεχείρησε, conatus est, but to be rendered quite literally; cf. also the context, ver. 3.—κακῶσαι: five times in Acts, only once elsewhere in N.T., 1 Peter iii. 13, "to afflict," R.V., A.V. "vex," so Tyndale.—τῶν ἀπὸ τῆς ἐκ., for the phrase cf. vi. 9, xv. 5, Grimm-Thayer, sub v., ἀπό, ii., but see also Blass, Gram., p. 122 and in loco.

Ver. 2. ἀνεῖλε, characteristic word, see on v. 33.—Ἰάκωβον τὸν ἀ. Ἰ.: St. Chrysostom reminds us of our Lord's prophecy in Mark x. 38 ff. (Matt. xx. 23), distinguished thus from the James of i. 13. Possibly his prominent position, and his characteristic nature as a son of Thunder marked him out as an early victim.—μαχαίρᾳ: so in the case of John the Baptist. This mode of death was regarded as very disgraceful among the Jews (J. Lightfoot, Wetstein), and as in the Baptist's case so here, the mode of execution shows that the punishment was not for blasphemy, but that James was apprehended and killed by the political power. For the touching account of his martyrdom narrated by Clement of Alexandria, see Eus., H. E., ii., 9. Whatever St. Luke's reason for the brevity of the account, whether he knew no more, or whether he intended to write a third book giving an account of the other Apostles besides Peter and Paul, and so only mentioned here what concerned the following history (so Meyer, but see Wendt, p. 267 (1888)), his brief notice is at least in striking contrast (ἁπλῶς καὶ ὡς ἔτυχεν, Chrys.) with the details of later martyrologies.

Ver. 3. ἀρεστόν . . . τοῖς Ἰ.: exactly what we should expect from the character and policy of Herod in his zeal for the law, and from the success with which during his short reign he retained the favour of Jews and Romans alike. Holtzmann, p. 370, seems inclined to doubt the truth of this description of Herod, and lays stress upon the mention of the king's mild disposition in Josephus, Ant., xix., 7, 3. But Josephus also makes it quite plain how zealous Agrippa was, or pretended to be, for the laws and ordinances of Judaism, u. s. and xx., 7, 1, and see Schürer, u. s., and Feine, p. 226. Nor is it at all certain that Agrippa's reputed mildness and gentleness would have kept him from rejoicing in the persecution of the Christians, cf. the description of his delight in the bloody gladiatorial games, Jos., Ant., xix., 9, 5.—προσέθετο συλλ.: a Hebraism, cf. Luke xix. 11, xx. 11: LXX, Gen. iv. 2, viii. 12, xxv. 1, Exod. xiv. 13, etc., peculiar to St. Luke in N.T., Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 209 (1893).—αἱ ἡ. τῶν ἀζύμων, and therefore a large number of Jews would be in Jerusalem, and Herod would thus have a good opportunity of gaining wide popularity by his zeal for the law.

Ver. 4. ὃν καὶ πιάσας, iii. 7, really Doric form of πιέζω (cf. Luke vi. 38, nowhere else in N.T.), used in this sense also in LXX, and elsewhere in N.T., cf. Cant. ii. 15, Ecclus. xxiii. 21 (not A). Modern Greek πιάνω = seize, apprehend.—καὶ: "when he had taken him, indeed," so Rendall, as if a delay had taken place, before the arrest was actually made.—τέσσαρσι τετραδ.: the night was divided by the Romans—a practice here imitated by Herod—into four watches, and each watch of three hours was kept by four soldiers, quaternio, two probably guarding the prisoner within the cell, chained to him, and two outside. τετραδ., cf. Philo, in Flaccum, 13; Polyb., xv., 33, 7, and see for other instances, Wetstein.—μετὰ τὸ πάσχα, "after the Passover," R.V., i.e., after the whole festival was over: Herod either did not wish, or affected not to wish, to profane the Feast: "non judicant die festo" (Moed Katon., v., 2).—ἀναγαγεῖν: only here in this sense (in Luke xxii. 66, ἀπήγαγον, W. H.), probably means to lead the prisoner up, i.e., before the judgment tribunal (John xix. 13), to sentence him openly to death before the people.

Ver. 5. ὁ μὲν οὖν . . . προσευχὴ δὲ: both A. and R.V. regard προσ. δὲ in the same verse as the antithesis, but see Page's note, where the antithesis is found in ver. 6, ὅτε δέ. If we retain the former interpretation, ver. 5 may be regarded as a kind of parenthesis, the ὅτε δέ in ver. 6 forming a kind of antithesis to ver. 4.—ἐκτενής, see critical notes; if we read ἐκτενῶς = "earnestly," R.V. (Latin, intente), adverb is Hellenistic, used (by St. Luke xxii. 44, and) once elsewhere in 1 Peter i. 22 (cf. the adjective in 1 Peter iv. 8), so of prayer in Clem. Rom., Cor., xxxiv., 7. In LXX cf. the use of the word in Joel i. 14 (but see H. and R.), Jonah iii. 8, Judith iv. 12 (see H. and R.), 3 Macc. v. 9. The adjective is also found in 3 Macc. iii. 10 and v. 29. Their praying shows "non fuisse animis fractos," Calvin. The word passed into the services of the Church, and was often repeated by the deacon: δεηθῶμεν ἐκ. or ἐκτενέστερον.

[1] προαγειν DEHLP, Chrys., so Meyer, Blass, and Hilg.; προαγαγειν A 8, 15, 61, so Tisch., W.H., marg., Weiss; προσαγειν ℵ 5, 29; προσαγαγειν B 13, 57, so W.H. text, Wendt. Compounds in προ and προς often interchanged (see Weiss, p. 20).

[2] Western text, β, adds τῳ Πετρῳ after επεστη, for ελαμψεν reads επελαμψεν, adds απ' αυτου (the angel), and instead of τῳ οικ. reads τῳ τοπῳ εκεινῳ. παταξ., instead D, Gig. read νυξας, so Hilg., cf. John xix. 34.

[3] εξεπεσον, but -εσαν ℵABDE 61, Tisch., W.H., Blass, Hilg., Weiss, W.H., App., p. 171, and Kennedy, p. 169.

Ver. 6. τῇ νυκτὶ ἐκείνῃ: "that very night," i.e., the night before the trial.—κοιμώμενος, cf. 1 Peter v. 7 and Ps. cxxvii. 2: "for so He giveth His beloved sleep": "and there too it is beautiful that Paul sings hymns, whilst here Peter sleeps," Chrys., Hom., xxvi: cf. xvi. 25. τὸ πᾶν ῥίψας ἐπὶ τὸν Κύριον, Oecumenius (cf. Blass, in loco).—ἁλύσεσι δυσί, cf. xxi. 33; on the usual Roman custom see Jos., Ant., xviii., 6, 7, in the account of Herod's own imprisonment by Tiberius; cf. Pliny, Epist., x., 65; Seneca, Epist., i., 5, "eadem catena et custodiam (vinctum) et militem copulabat," perhaps most natural to suppose that Peter was bound on either hand to each of the soldiers, the two chains being used perhaps for greater security on account of the former escape.—φύλακες, i.e., the other two of the quaternion to make escape impossible.

Ver. 7. ἐπέστη: often as here with the notion of coming suddenly, in classical Greek it is often used of dreams, as in Homer; or of the coming of heavenly visitors, very frequent in Luke, and with the same force as here, Friedrich, pp. 7 and 87, and almost always in second aorist, see also Plummer on Luke ii. 9.—οἰκήματι: only here in N.T., used in Wisdom xiii. 15 (and perhaps in Tobit ii. 4), but not in same sense. Dem. and Thuc. use it for a prison: R.V. "the cell," lit., the chamber.—πατάξας δὲ τὴν πλευρὰν: to rouse him, an indication of the sound and quiet sleep which the prisoner slept in spite of the fateful morrow (so Weiss); cf. vii. 24, and ver. 23).

Ver. 8. περίζωσαι, but simple verb in R.V., W.H., Weiss, Wendt; bind thy tunic with a girdle: during the night the long flowing undergarment was loosened, but fastened up by day, so as not to impede the movements. Wetstein, Weiss, Page, and others contrast Hor., Sat., i., 2, 132. "Colligit sarcinulas nec festinat" (Wetstein), simple verb only twice elsewhere in N.T., and there also of St. Peter, cf. John xxi. 18.—σανδάλιά: Mark vi. 9, elsewhere ὑποδήματα. St. Peter still observed his Master's rule to be shod with sandals (Mark, u. s.), i.e., the shoes of the poor as distinguished from those of the more wealthy: dim. of σάνδαλον, a wooden sole. In LXX cf. Josh. ix. 5, Isa. xx. 2; in Judith x. 4, xvi. 9, of the sandals of the richer class.—περιβαλοῦ, only here in Acts; Luke xii. 27, xxiii. 11, often elsewhere in N.T., and in LXX.—τὸ ἱμάτιον: the outer garment worn over the χιτών, and laid aside at night with the sandals. Lumby compares Didache, i., 4. Mark the distinction between the aorist and present tense, περίζωσαι . . . ὑπόδ. . . . περιβ., but ἀκολούθει (cf. John ii. 16). "Præsens propter finem non indicatum" Blass; Simcox, Language of N. T., p. 114.

Ver. 9. ἐδόκει δὲ ὅραμα βλέπειν: even those who regard the narrative as unhistorical can scarcely say that the writer cannot understand how to distinguish between an actual fact and a vision; moreover, this same writer describes visions such as that of Peter, x. 10, and of Paul, xxii. 17, as ecstacies; once in xxvi. 19 Paul speaks of the appearance of Christ vouchsafed to him before Damascus as a vision, ὀπτασία, but this word is not confined to appearances which the narrators regard as visions, cf. Luke i. 22, xxiv. 23, cf. Beyschlag, Studien und Kritiken, p. 203, 1864; Witness of the Epistles (Longmans, 1892).

[1] ηνοιχθη EHLP, Chrys.; ηνοιγη A, so Tisch., W.H., Blass, Weiss, Hilg.; see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 103; Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 17.

[2] After εξελθοντες D, Par. add κατεβησαν τους επτα βαθμους και. Both Weiss (p. 110) and Corrsen (p. 441) (see too Harris, p. 63, Four Lectures, etc.) regard this as possibly original, so Wendt (p. 221, edit. 1899), whilst Belser (p. 65), Zahn (ii., 350), Salmon (pp. 600, 601), Zöckler incline still more strongly to its acceptance, and Blass and Hilg. retain. The addition has been referred to the mention of the seven steps in Ezek. xl. 22 (cf. 26, 31) as its source (so Chase), but, on the other hand, Zahn can see no explanation of the present passage in the seven or the eight (ver. 31) steps of Ezekiel. It is quite possible, he thinks, that the writer might introduce a detail of the kind into his first draft, but omit it afterwarde as unnecessary for distant readers. In xxi. 35, 40, the steps lead not into the street, but from Antonia into the Temple, and there is no connection between them and the definite seven steps here, which are evidently presupposed (note the article) to be well known to the reader.

Ver. 10. φυλακὴν: "ward," perhaps the best translation here with διελθόντες so often used of traversing a place. The first ward might be the place outside the cell where the other soldiers of the quaternion were on guard, and the second ward might refer to some other part of the prison or fortress Antonia (see Blass in loco) where sentinels were stationed. Weiss apparently takes the expression to refer to the two φύλακες, ver. 6, cf. 1 Chron. xxvi. 16.—σιδηρᾶν: specially noted since such a gate, when shut, would effectually bar their way; but it opened αὐτομάτη, only here in N.T. and in Mark iv. 28, cf. Lev. xxv. 5, 11, 2 Kings xix. 29, Wisdom xvii. 6, and in classical writers the striking parallel, Hom., Iliad, v., 749 (Wendt, Blass); Virgil, Æneid, vi., 81 (Wetstein).—φέρουσαν εἰς: only here in N.T., but quite usual in classical Greek. If the narrative means that immediately they were out of the prison they were in the street (so Weiss), evidently the prison was in the city, and εἰς τὴν π. would simply mean the open town, in contrast to the confined prison-house (so Weiss and Wendt, 1899). Blass decides for the tower of Antonia on account of D.—ἠνοίχθη, see critical notes.—ἐξελθόντες: for remarkable addition in D see critical notes.—εὐθέως: used several times in Acts, but εὐθύς only once, see x. 16.—ἀπέστη: when there were no further hindrances to the Apostle's flight, then the angel departed (Chrys.).

Ver. 11. γενόμενος ἐν ἑαυτῷ, cf. Luke xv. 17, and compare instances of similar phrases in Greek and Latin classical writers in Wetstein and Blass.—Κύριος, see critical notes, if without the article Nösgen (so Weiss) takes it of God, Jehovah. — ἐξαπέστειλε: a compound only found in Luke and Paul; four times in Luke's Gospel, six or seven times in Acts, and Gal. iv. 4, 6; very frequent in LXX, and used also in active voice by Polybius.—ἐξείλετο ἐκ χ.: close parallels in LXX, cf. Exod. iii. 8, 2 Sam. xxii. 1, Isa. xliii. 13, Baruch iv. 18, 21, etc.—ἐκ χειρὸς: Hebraism, cf. Luke i. 74. The expression is also classical, Blass, Gram., p. 127, for close parallel.—προσδοκία: only in Luke here and in Luke xxi. 26, cf. Gen. xlix. 10, but more allied to its sense here Ps. cxix. 116, Wisdom xvii. 13, Ecclus. xl. 2, and in 2 and 3 Macc. (see H. and R.), and Psalms of Solomon, Tit. xi.; frequently in classics. Hobart claims as a medical word, especially as the verb προσδοκᾷν is also so frequent in Luke; so too Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., p. 436; but see Plummer on Luke xxi. 36. Both verb and noun are also frequent in classical use.

Ver. 12. συνιδών, cf. xiv. 6; so several times in Apocrypha, so in classical writers, and also in Josephus. It may also include a consideration of the future (Bengel and Wetstein), but the aorist refers rather to a single act and not to a permanent state (so Alford).—Μαρίας: as no mention is made of Mark's father, she may well have been a widow, possessed of some wealth like Barnabas; see below.—Ἰωάννου τοῦ ἐπικ., i. 23; iv. 36; x. 5, 18, 32; xi. 13; and below, xiii. 9. As in the case of Paul, his Roman name is used most frequently, cf. xv. 39, 2 Tim. iv. 11, Philem. 24, although in xiii. 5, 13 he is spoken of as John. No reason to doubt the identity of this John Mark with the second Evangelist: the notice of Papias that Mark was the ἑρμηνευτής of Peter, Eusebius, H. E., iii., 39, is quite in accordance with the notice here of the Apostle's intimacy with the family of Mark, and with his mention in 1 Pet. v. 13. Blass comments on Μάρκου, "quasi digito monstratur auctor narrationis," and similarly Proleg., p. 11; Philology of the Gospels, pp. 192, 193. In Col. iv. 10 the A.V. calls him "sister's son to Barnabas," ὁ ἀνεψιός, but ἀνεψ. properly means "first cousin"; so R.V. the cousin of Barnabas (cf. LXX, Num. xxxvi. 11, Tob. vii. 2), Lightfoot on Col. iv. 10; see on xv. 39.—προσευχόμενοι, cf. James v. 16; "media nocte," Bengel; they betook them to prayer, "to that alliance which is indeed invincible," Chrys., Hom., 26. On ἦσαν with participle as characteristic of St. Luke, see i. 10. As in the former miraculous deliverance, v. 16, all attempts to get rid of the supernatural in St. Luke's narrative are unsuccessful. This is frankly admitted by Wendt, although he also maintains that we cannot discern the actual historical conditions owing to the mingling of legend and history. But he does not deny that St. Peter was liberated, and the same fact is admitted by Weizsäcker, see Wendt (1899), p. 219; and Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 230, and Wendt (1888), pp. 269, 270, for an account of the different attempts to explain the Apostle's liberation. In contrast to all such attempts the minute circumstantiality and the naturalness of the narrative speak for themselves, and we can hardly doubt (as Wendt is inclined to admit in some details) that John Mark has given us an account derived partly from St. Peter himself, cf. vv. 9, 11, and partly from his own knowledge, cf. the peculiarly artless and graphic touches in vv. 13, 14, which could scarcely have come from any one but an inmate of the house, as also the mention of the name of the servant; cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 385; Blass, Acta Apostolorum, p. 142; Belser, Theol. Quartalschrift, Heft ii. (1895), p. 257; Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 244.

Ver. 13. τὴν θ. τοῦ πυλῶνος: the door of the gateway, cf. x. 17. πυλών as in Matt. xxvi. 71, of the passage leading from the inner court to the street, so that strictly the door in the gateway opening upon this passage would be meant, cf. εἰσδ., ver. 14 (and προσῆλθε, ver. 13).—κρούσαντος: to knock at a door on the outside, cf. Luke xiii. 25, but elsewhere in Luke without τὴν θύραν, Luke xi. 9, 10, xii. 36 (Matt. vii. 7, Rev. iii. 20); so too in classical Greek, Xen., Symp., i., 11, see Rutherford, New Phrynichus, p. 266; in LXX, Judg. xix. 22, Cant. v. 2, Judith xiv. 14.—παιδίσκη, i.e., the portress, cf. John xviii. 17, see Rutherford, u. s., p. 312; Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek,

[1] Before ο αγγ. D (Pesh.) prefix τυχον, so Blass, Hilg. (as if only a possible solution, see Weiss, p. 72). (τυχον only occurs in N.T. in 1 Cor. xvi. 6, but in classical Greek adv.)

[2] D omits Π. with Par., but all edit. retain except Blass in β and Hilg.

[3] D reads εξανοιξαντες δε και ιδοντες αυτον εξεστ., a graphic touch perhaps orig., but if so, hardly corrected for brevity.

[4] For σιγαν D (Vulg., Gig., Par.) ινα σιγησωσιν, and D, Syr. H. mg., Par. εισηλθεν και—may be explanatory by reviser; Belser defends as orig., p. 65.

p. 40.—ὑπακοῦσαι, R.V., "to answer," cf. above, Xen., Symp., i., 11 (so in Plato, Phædo, 59 e, etc.).—Ῥόδη: a rose, cf. Dorcas and other names of the same class. The name occurs in myths and plays, see Blass's note.

Ver. 14. τῆς χαρᾶς: with article, the joy which she felt at the voice of Peter, cf. Luke xxiv. 41 for the same emphatic expression.—εἰσδ.: see above on ver. 10, only here in N.T., cf. 2 Macc. v. 26.

Ver. 15. Μαίνῃ: used as in a colloquial expression, not meaning literal insanity, see Page's note on xxvi. 24, so in 2 Kings ix. 11, ἐπίληπτος seems to be used.—διϊσχυρίζετο: only here and in Luke xxii. 59 (cf. xv. 2 β). In Luke, A.V. renders "confidently affirmed" as it should be here, and as it is in R.V.; found in classical Greek, and so also in Jos., Ant., ii., 6, 4, but not in LXX; cf. also its use in Acta Petri et Pauli Apocryph., 34, 39 (Lumby). Both ἰσχυρίζεσθαι and its compound here are used in medical language, and both in the same way as in this passage. If we compare the parallel passages, Matt. xxvi. 73, Mark xiv. 70, Luke xxii. 59, in Matthew we have εἶπον, in Mark ἔλεγον, but in Luke the strong word in the passage before us; Hobart, p. 77, and see also a similar change in parallel passages on p. 76.—Ὁ ἄγγελος αὐτοῦ ἐστιν, cf. Matt. xviii. 10, Heb. i. 14. According to Jewish ideas they would believe that Peter's guardian angel had assumed his form and voice, and stood before the door, see Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii., 748-755, especially 752; "Apocrypha" ("Speaker's Commentary") "Angelology," i., 171 ff.; Weber, Jüdische Theol., pp. 170, 171 (1897); "Angels," B.D., 1², Blass, Nösgen, J. Lightfoot, in loco. We may contrast the reserve of the canonical books of the Jews with the details of their later theology, "Engel," Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 2 and 3.

Ver. 16. ἐπέμενε, cf. John viii. 7, with a participle as here; only found elsewhere in N.T. in Luke and Paul; see on x. 48.—ἀνοίξ., another natural touch; those assembled went to the door themselves.

Ver. 17. κατασείσας . . . σιγᾶν: only in Acts xiii. 16, xix. 33, xxi. 40, prop. to shake down (as fruit from trees), thus to shake up and down (the hand), to beckon with the hand for silence, used with accusative, and later with dat. instrument. χειρί: so in classical Greek and Josephus, cf. Ovid, Met., i., 206; Æneid, xii., 692, and instances in Wetstein; not in LXX as parallel to this; on the phrase, and also on σιγᾶν, as characteristic of Luke, see further Friedrich, pp. 26, 79.—διηγήσατο, ix. 27, only in Luke and Mark (except Heb. xi. 32). — Ἀπαγγείλατε: "tell," R.V., characteristic of Luke, eleven times in his Gospel, thirteen or fourteen in Acts.—Ἰακώβῳ: "the Lord's brother," Gal. i. 19, ii. 9, 1 Cor. xv. 7 (from Mark vi. 3 it has been inferred that he was the eldest of those so called). This James may have become more prominent still since the murder of James the son of Zebedee. On his position in the Church at Jerusalem see below on xv. 13, and also on xi. 30. For arguments in favour of the identification of this James with James the son of Alphæus, see B.D., 1², p. 1512; Felten, Apostelgeschichte, p. 239; and, on the other hand, Mayor, Introd. to Epistle of ἀδελφοῖς ταῦτα. καὶ ἐξελθὼν ἐπορεύθη εἰς ἕτερον τόπον. 18. Γενομένης δὲ ἡμέρας, ἦν τάραχος οὐκ ὀλίγος [1] ἐν τοῖς στρατιώταις, τί ἄρα ὁ Πέτρος ἐγένετο. 19. Ἡρώδης δὲ ἐπιζητήσας αὐτὸν καὶ μὴ εὑρών, ἀνακρίνας τοὺς φύλακας, ἐκέλευσεν [2] ἀπαχθῆναι· καὶ κατελθὼν ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰουδαίας εἰς τὴν Καισάρειαν διέτριβεν.

[1] ουκ ολιγος om. D, Gig., Par., so Blass in β, and Hilg., may be "Western non-interpolation," and for ordinary reading cf. xx. 23. At end of verse β adds η πως εξηλθεν, cf. Par.[2] "aut quomodo exisset"; cf. Blass, p. ix., for defence, so Belser, p. 65.

[2] απαχθ., D[1] reads αποκτανθηναι, so Hilg., but Blass rejects—certainly looks like a gloss.

St. James; Zahn, Einleitung in das N. T., i., 72; Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 252 ff. and 364; Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 76, 77. In this mention of James, Feine points out that a knowledge as to who he was is evidently presupposed, and that therefore we have another indication that the "Jerusalem tradition" is the source of St. Luke's information here.—εἰς ἕτερον τόπον: all conjectures as to the place, whether it was Antioch, Rome, Cæsarea, are rendered more arbitrary by the fact that it is not even said that the place was outside Jerusalem (however probable this may have been); ἐξελθών need not mean that he went out of the city, but out of the house in which he had taken refuge, cf. ver. 9. For all that can be said in support of the view that he went to Rome, see Felten, u. s., pp. 240-244, Knabenbauer, p. 214. Harnack, Chronol., i., p. 243, apparently is prepared to regard the visit to Rome in the reign of Claudius, A.D. 42, as not impossible, although unprovable. But see the whole question treated from the opposite side by Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 233, 234 (second edition). The notice is so indefinite that we cannot build anything upon it, and we can scarcely go beyond Wendt's view that if Peter left Jerusalem at all, he may have undertaken some missionary journey, cf. 1 Cor. ix. 5.

Ver. 18. τάραχος (generally ταραχή): only in Acts xix. 23, although several times in LXX.—οὐκ ὀλίγος: only found in Acts, where it occurs eight times (litotes), cf. xix. 11, xx. 12, xxvii. 14, and for similar expressions Luke xv. 13 (Acts i. 5), vii. 6: see Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 52, and Page, in loco. The guards would answer for the escape of the prisoner by suffering a like penalty, cf. Cod. Just., ix., 4, 4. —τί ἄρα (cf. Luke i. 66), Peter has disappeared, what, then, has become of him? (Grimm, sub v. ἄρα (i.), and Winer-Moulton, liii. 8); it thus marks the perplexity of the soldier as to what had become of Peter.—ἐγέν.: Blass, quid Petro (ablat.) factum sit.

Ver. 19. μὴ for οὐ, as often with a participle. Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 188.—ἀνακρίνας, Acts iv. 9, xxiv. 8, xxviii. 18, Luke xxiii. 14, of a judicial investigation, cf. also 1 Cor. ix. 3 for this judicial use by St. Paul, see Grimm sub v.—ἀπαχθῆναι, "to be put to death," R.V., only here in this sense in N.T. absolutely; so Latin duci in Pliny, ad Traj., 96 (Page); Nestle, Philologia Sacra (1896), p. 53, cf. Gen. xxxix. 22, xl. 3, xlii. 16, LXX, use of the same verb of carrying off to prison.—κατελθών: Herod was wont to make his residence for the most part at Jerusalem, Jos., Ant., xix., 7, 3, and we are not told why he went down to Cæsarea on this occasion. Josephus, xix., 8, 2, tells us that the festival during which the king met his death was appointed in honour of the emperor's safety, and the conjecture has been made that the thanksgiving was for the return of Claudius from Britain (see Farrar, St. Paul, i., 315), but this must remain uncertain; he may have gone down to Cæsarea "propter Tyros," Blass, see also B.D., 1[2], p. 135.

Ver. 20. θυμομαχῶν: lit., "to fight desperately" Polyb., ix., 40, 4; xxvii., 8, 4, and it might be used not only of open warfare, but of any violent quarrel; here almost = ὀργίζεσθαι. There could be no question of actual warfare, as Phœnicia was part of the province of Syria, and Herod had no power to wage war against it. Probably the cause of this θυμομαχία lay in commercial interests. The word is not found in LXX, or elsewhere in N.T.—ὁμοθυμαδόν, i. 14.—πείσαντες, cf. Matt. xxviii. 14, possibly with bribes, as Blass and Wendt suggest.—τὸν ἐπὶ τοῦ

20. Ἦν δὲ ὁ Ἡρώδης θυμομαχῶν Τυρίοις καὶ Σιδωνίοις[1]· ὁμοθυμαδὸν δὲ παρῆσαν πρὸς αὐτόν, καὶ πείσαντες Βλάστον τὸν ἐπὶ τοῦ κοιτῶνος τοῦ βασιλέως, ᾐτοῦντο εἰρήνην, διὰ τὸ τρέφεσθαι αὐτῶν τὴν χώραν ἀπὸ τῆς βασιλικῆς. 21. Τακτῇ δὲ ἡμέρᾳ ὁ Ἡρώδης ἐνδυσάμενος ἐσθῆτα βασιλικήν, καὶ καθίσας ἐπὶ τοῦ βήματος, ἐδημηγόρει πρὸς αὐτούς· 22. ὁ δὲ δῆμος ἐπεφώνει, Θεοῦ φωνὴ καὶ οὐκ ἀνθρώπου. 23. παραχρῆμα δὲ ἐπάταξεν αὐτὸν ἄγγελος Κυρίου, ἀνθ᾽ ὧν οὐκ ἔδωκε τὴν δόξαν τῷ Θεῷ[2]· καὶ γενόμενος σκωληκόβρωτος, ἐξέψυξεν.

[1] ομοθ., D, Syr. H. mg. (Par. Vulg.), so Blass and Hilg. read οι δε ομοθ. εξ αμφοτερων των πολεων παρησαν., may be a gloss on ομοθ. meaning that the two cities made common cause, cf. τας χωρας for την χωραν in same verse (Western). D, Par.[2] (Wern.) add at end of ver. 21 καταλλαγεντος δε αυτου τοις Τ. και τοις Σ. D omits και τοις Σ. Syr. H. mg. has κατηλλαγη δε αυτοις. But this appears to introduce a fresh connection into the narrative, and to divert attention from the main point, viz., the speech. So Weiss, p. 73, thinks φωναι (β), for φωνη, ver. 22, is introduced to indicatet he contents of the speech.

[2] D reads καταβας απο του βηματος after Θεῳ και. After σκωλ. D adds ετι ζων και ουτως, so Blass and Hilg. Blass in β reads εγεν. for γενομ.; insertions avoid possible misunderstandings, see comment.

κοιτῶνος, "chamberlain," perhaps best. κοιτών will imply that he was over the king's bed-chamber. Exod. viii. 3, cf. 2 Sam. iv. 7, 2 Kings, vi. 12, 1 Esd. iii. 3 = Latin cubicularius. κοιτών, in Dio Cassius, lxi., 5, is used of the king's treasury, but the ordinary usage is as above. In Attic Greek δωμάτιον, not κοιτών.—τρέφεσθαι, i.e., with corn (cf. 1 Kings v. 9, Ezra iii. 7, Ezek. xxvii. 17; Jos., Ant., xiv., 10, 6), and see Blass, note in loco.

Ver. 21. τακτῇ: only here in N.T.; cf. Jos., Ant., xix., 8, 2 (cf. xviii., 6, 7), δευτέρᾳ δὲ τῶν θεωριῶν ἡμέρᾳ. It is quite true that Josephus says nothing directly of the Tyrians and Sidonians, but the audience was evidently granted to them on the second day of the public spectacle; cf. for the expression, Polyb., iii., 34, 9. The description of Josephus evidently implies some special occasion, and not the return of the ordinary Quinquennalia; see on ver. 19 and also below. Josephus does not menion Blastus, or those of Tyre and Sidon, but this is no reason against the narrative, as Krenkel maintains. Belser, much more reasonably, contends that Luke's narrative supplements and completes the statement of Josephus.—ἐνδ. ἐσθῆτα βασιλικήν, cf. Jos., Ant., xix., 8, 2, στολὴν ἐνδυσάμενος ἐξ ἀργυρίου πεποιημένην πᾶσαν.; on ἐσθ. see i. 10.—βήματος: Josephus speaks of the event happening in the theatre, and the βῆμα here = rather "the throne," R.V. (margin, "judgment-seat"), the royal seat in the theatre from which the king saw the games and made his harangues to the people (so of an orator's pulpit, Neh. viii. 4, 2 Macc. xiii. 26), see Blass and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.—ἐδημηγόρει: only here in N.T. In 4 Macc. v. 15 = contionari, frequent in classical Greek.—πρὸς αὐτούς, i.e., to the Tyrian and Sidonian representatives, but the word ἐδημ. might well be used of what was in any case an address, ad populum, cf. ver. 22.

Ver. 22. δῆμος: only in Acts, xvii. 5, xix. 30, 33, but in the same signification in classical Greek.—ἐπεφώνει: later Greek in this sense (cf. the flatterers in the description of Josephus, u. s., ἀνεβόων, that Herod was θεός, and so in the words εὐμενὴς εἴης). In N.T. only in Luke, cf. Luke xxiii. 21, Acts xxi. 34, xxii. 24; cf. 2 Macc. i. 23, 3 Macc. vii. 13, 1 Esd. ix. 47. The imperfect quite corresponds to the description of Josephus: ἄλλος ἄλλοθεν φωνῆς ἀνεβ. θ. φωνή; for instances of similar flattery see Wetstein, and cf. Josephus, u. s.

Ver. 23. παραχρῆμα, see above, p. 106.—ἐπάταξεν, cf. Exod. xi. 23, 2 Sam. xxiv. 17, 2 Kings xix. 35, 1 Chron. xxi. 15, Isa. xxxvii. 36, 1 Macc. vii. 41. See p. 188. On the confusion in the reading of Eusebius, H.E., ii., 10, where for the owl whom Josephus describes as appearing to Herod as ἄγγελος κακῶν we have the reading "the angel" of the Acts, the unseen minister of the divine will, see B.D. 1[2], p. 1345, and Eusebius, Schaff and Wace's

24. Ὁ δὲ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ ηὔξανε καὶ ἐπληθύνετο. 25. Βαρνάβας δὲ καὶ Σαῦλος[1] ὑπέστρεψαν ἐξ Ἱερουσαλήμ, πληρώσαντες τὴν διακονίαν, συμπαραλαβόντες καὶ Ἰωάννην τὸν ἐπικληθέντα Μάρκον.

[1] After Σαυλος Syr. H. mg., Par. add ο επικαλουμενος Παυλος. Par. also reads Παυλος in xiii. 1, 2. This seems a mere anticipation of xiii. 9. Blass in β follows Par. (p. ix.), and regards Παυλος as original. So Belser, pp. 65, 66, warmly defends, as showing that there is no need to see in xiii. 9 a sudden introd. of the name Paul, but that Luke, at least in the first draft of his work, had already spoken of him here as bearing a double name, like John Mark. υπεστρεψαν εξ Ι. A 13, 27, Syr. P. and H., Sah., Boh., Arm., Aeth., Chrys., so Tisch., Weiss, W.H. marg., R.V.; but ℵBHLP 61, Syr. H. mg., Aeth^ro.; W.H., Wendt, R.V. marg. read εις Ι., and DE 15, 180, Vulg., Chrys. read απο, so Blass in β, and so Hilg. Tisch. maintains that scribe began to write απο but turned it into εις. The latter prep. would not be understood if taken with υπεστρεψαν, as it would have no meaning, and so εξ and απο substituted. E, Syr. Pesh., Sah., and so Par. and Blass in β, added εις Αντιοχειαν (but see Weiss, Introd. to Apostelgeschichte, p. 37). But the reading εις Ι. can be fairly explained if the words are connected with πληρ. την διακ., so Wendt and W.H. (App., p. 94), and Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 232. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 64, holds that εις was a deliberate alteration of an editor who thus brought the text into conformity with xxii. 17 because the two passages referred to the same visit.

edition, in loco; see also Bengel's impressive note on this verse on the difference between human history and divine.—ἀνθ' ὧν = ἀντὶ τούτων ὅτι, cf. Luke i. 20, xix. 44, see also xii. 3; only once outside St. Luke's writings in N.T., 2 Thess. ii. 10; see Simcox, Language of N. T., p. 137; Plummer on Luke i. 20 and xii. 3; quite classical and several times in LXX.—ἔδωκε τὴν δ.: debitum honorem, cf. Isa. xlviii. 11, Rev. xix. 7; article elsewhere omitted (cf. Luke xvii. 18); a Hebrew phrase. How different the behaviour of St. Peter and of St. Paul, x. 26, xiv. 14. Josephus expressly says that the king did not rebuke the flatterers or reject their flattery.—καὶ γενόμ. σκ.: see below. St. Luke does not say that Herod died on the spot, but simply marks the commencement of the disease, παραχρῆμα; Josephus describes the death as occurring after five days. Wendt (1899 edition) admits that the kind of death described may well have been gradual, although in 1888 edition he held that the ἐξέψυξεν meant that he expired immediately; see also Zöckler and Hackett, as against Weiss. ἐξέψ., see on v. 5, 10.—σκωλ.: only here in N.T.; no contradiction with Josephus, but a more precise description of the fatal disease, cf. 2 Macc. ix. 5, 9, with which detailed and strange account the simple statement of the fact here stands in marked contrast. The word cannot be taken metaphorically, cf. Herod., iv., 205: and Jos., Ant., xvii., 6, 5, of the death of Herod the Great. Such a death was regarded as a punishment for pride; so in 2 Macc. and Herod., Farrar, St. Paul, i., 318. The term itself was one which we might expect from a medical man, and St. Luke may easily have learnt the exact nature of the disease during his two years residence in Cæsarea (Belser). See Hobart, pp. 42, 43, Knabenbauer in loco. The word was used of a disease of plants, but Luke, no less than his contemporary Dioscorides, may well have been acquainted with botanical terms (Vogel). To think with Baur and Holtzmann of the gnawing worm of the damned is quite opposed to the whole context. If we place the two narratives, the account given by Josephus and that given by St. Luke side by side, it is impossible not to see their general agreement, and none has admitted this more unreservedly than Schürer. On reasons for the silence of Josephus as to the death as a punishment of the king's impiety in contrast with the clear statement of St. Luke; and also on the whole narrative as against the strictures of Spitta, see Belser, Theologische Quartalschrift, p. 252 ff., 2e Heft, 1895; for a full examination; cf. also Nösgen to the same effect, Apostelgeschichte, p. 242, Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 417. Belser should also be consulted as against Krenkel, Josephus und Lucas, p. 203 ff. It should be noted that Krenkel does not affirm that Luke derived his material from Josephus in xii. 1-23, but only that he was influenced by the Jewish historian, and that with regard to the hapaxlegomenon, σκωληκόβρωτος, he can only affirm that Josephus affords us an analogous expression, B. J., vii., 8, 7.

Ver. 24. δὲ, marking the contrast, not only between the death of the persecutor and the growth of the Word, but also between the persecution and the vitality of the Church.—ηὔξανε καὶ ἐπληθ. imperfects, marking the continuous growth in spite of all obstacles; cf. Luke viii. 11, Matt. xiii. 32, 2 Cor. ix. 10.

[2] For ο τε D, Vulg. read εν οις, and before Κυρ. D omits ο—Blass, "recte," but there may have been some other Lucius from whom this one was distinguished. Σαυλος, Par. reads Παυλος, so in ver. 2, and Blass in β; see on xii. 25.

Ver. 25. ὑπέστρεψαν ἐξ Ἰ., see critical notes, and Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 63, 64, and note on xxii. 17, below.—πληρ. τὴν διακ.; if the visit extended over as long a period as Ramsay believes, viz., from the time when the failure of harvest in 46 turned scarcity into famine until the beginning of 47 (u. s., pp. 51, 63), no doubt the delegates could not have simply delivered a sum of money to the elders, but would have administered the relief (not money), and carried a personal message of cheer to the distressed (Ramsay, p. 49 ff., u. s.), and so have "fulfilled" their ministry. But the word διακονία does not of necessity involve this personal and continuous ministration, e.g., cf. Rom. xv. 31, where St. Paul uses the word of the money collection brought by him to Jerusalem for the poor, a passage in which the Western gloss is δωροφορία, cf. Rom. xv. 25, 2 Cor. viii. 4, ix. 1, 12, 13. Grimm writes that the word is used of those who succour need by either collecting or bestowing benefactions; see further, Expositor, March and July, 1896 (Ramsay), April, 1896 (Sanday), also Hort, Ecclesia, p. 206, and above on xi. 29. —Σαῦλος, see critical notes for Western addition. — συμπαραλαβόντες, cf. xv. 37, 38, of bringing as a companion in N.T., only once elsewhere in same sense, Gal. ii. i. (cf. 3 Macc. i. 1). This incidental notice of John Mark may well emphasise the fact that he was taken with Paul and Barnabas as a supernumerary, and to mark his secondary character as compared with them. In view of subsequent events, it would be important to make this clear by introducing him in a way which showed that he was not essential to the expedition, Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 71, 170, 177; cf. xv. 37, 40.

CHAPTERS XIII.-XIV. First Missionary Journey of St. Paul.—On the unity of xiii. and xiv. with the rest of the book see additional note at end of chap. xiv.—Ver. 1. κατὰ τὴν οὖσαν ἐκκ.: the word οὖσαν may well be used here, as the participle of εἰμί is often used in Acts to introduce some technical phrase, or some term marked out as having a technical force, cf. v. 17, xiv. 13, xxviii. 17, so that a new stage in the history of the Christians at Antioch is marked—no longer a mere congregation, but "the Church that was there" (Ramsay, Church in the R. E., p. 52). So also Weiss, in loco; οὖσαν stands in contrast to xi. 21-26: there was no longer a mere company of believers at Antioch, but a Church.—ἐν Ἀ.: Blass maintains that the order of words as compared with the mention of the Church in Jerusalem, xi. 22, emphasises the fact that Antioch is the starting-point of the succeeding missionary enterprise, and is named first, and so distinctively set before men's eyes.—προφῆται καὶ διδάσκαλοι, see above on xi. 27. From 1 Cor. xii. 28 it would seem that in Corinth at all events not all teachers were prophets, although in a sense all prophets were teachers, in so far as they edified the Church. The two gifts might be united in the same person as in Paul himself, Gal. ii. 2, 2 Cor. xii. 1 (Zöckler). In Ephes. iv. 11, as in 1 Cor. xii. 28, Apostles stand first in the Church, Prophets next, and after them Teachers. But whilst it is quite possible to regard the account of the gift of προφητεία in 1 Cor. xii.-xiv. as expressing "inspiration" rather than "official character," this does not detract from the pre-eminent honour and importance assigned to the prophets and teachers at Antioch. Their position is such and their powers are such in the description before us that they might fairly be described as "presbyters," whose official position was enhanced by the possession of a special gift, "the prophecy" of the New Testament, "presbyters' who like those in 1 Tim. v. 17 might also be described as κοπιῶντες ἐν διδασκαλίᾳ, Moberly, Ministerial Priest- hood, pp. 159, 160, 166, 208. See further on the relation of the prophets and teachers in the Didaché "Church," Hastings' B.D., i. 436, Bigg, Doctrine of the Twelve Apostles, p. 27; and on the relation of prophecy and teaching in the N.T., McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 528, Zöckler, in loco.—τε . . . καὶ: a difficulty arises as to the force of these particles. It is urged that two groups are thus represented, the first three names forming one group (prophets), and the last two another group (teachers), so Ramsay (p. 65), Weiss, Holtzmann, Zöckler, Harnack, Knabenbauer, and amongst older commentators Meyer and Alford; but on the other hand Wendt, so Nösgen, Felten, Hilgenfeld think that there is no such separation intended, as Paul himself later claims the prophetic gift (1 Cor. xiv. 6), to which Zöckler would reply that at this time Paul might well be described as a teacher, his prophetic gift being more developed at a later date. Amongst recent English writers both Hort and Gore regard the term "prophets and teachers" as applying to all the five (so Page).—Συμεὼν: nothing is known of him. Spitta would identify him with Simon of Cyrene, Matt. xxvii. 32, but the epithet Niger may have been given to distinguish him from others of the same name, and possibly from the Simon to whom Spitta refers.—Λούκιος ὁ Κ.: Zöckler describes as "quite absurd" the attempt to identify him with Luke of the Acts. The names are quite different, and the identification has been supported on the ground that Cyrene was a famous school of medicine. This Lucius may have been one of the men of Cyrene, xi. 20, who first preached the Gospel at Antioch. Others have proposed to identify him with the Lucius of Rom. xvi. 21.—Μαναὴν: of the three names, as distinct from Barnabas and Paul, Blass says ignoti reliqui, and we cannot say more than this. For although Mark is described as σύντροφος of Herod the Tetrarch (Antipas), the description is still very indefinite. A.V. "brought up with," R.V. "foster-brother," collactaneus, Vulgate. For an ingenious study on the name and the man see Plumptre, in loco, cf. also Wetstein and Zöckler. The name occurs in 1 Macc. i. 6, but the reading must apparently give place to συνέκτροφοι. It is also found in 2 Macc. ix. 29, and once in the N.T. in the present passage. Deissmann, from the evidence of the inscriptions, regards it as a court title, and quotes amongst other places an inscription in Delos of the first half of the second century B.C., where Heliodorus is described as σύντροφος τοῦ βασιλέως Σελεύκου Φιλοπάτορος. So Manaen also might be described as a confidential friend of Herod Antipas, Bibelstudien, pp. 173, 178-181.—Σαῦλος, placed last probably because the others were older members of the Church. The position certainly does not mark the list as unhistorical; if the account came from the Apostle himself, the lowest place was eminently characteristic of him.

Ver. 2. λειτουργούντων: "as they ministered to the Lord," A. and R. V., ministrantibus Domino, Vulgate. It would be difficult to find a more appropriate rendering. On the one hand the word is habitually used in the LXX of the service of the priests and Levites (cf. Heb. viii. 2, x. 11), although it has a wider meaning as, e.g., when used to describe the service of Samuel to God, 1 Sam. ii. 18, iii. 1, or of service to man, 1 Kings i. 4, 15, 2 Chron. xvii. 19, Ecclus. x. 25. So too in the N.T. it is used in the widest sense of those who aid others in their poverty, Rom. xv. 27 (cf. 2 Cor. ix. 12), Phil. ii. 25, 27, and also λειτουργία τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν, Phil. ii. 17, of the whole life of the Christian Society. But here the context, see on ver. 3 (cf. xiv. 23), seems to point to some special public religious service (Hort, Ecclesia, p. 63, but see also Ramsay's rendering of the words, and Zöckler, in loco). In this early period λειτουργία could of course not be applied to the Eucharist alone, and the Romanist commentator Felten only goes so far as to say that a reference to it cannot be excluded in the passage before us, and in this we may agree with him. At all events it seems somewhat arbitrary to explain Didaché, xv. 1, where we have a parallel phrase, of the service of public worship, whilst in the passage before us the words are explained of serving Christ whether by prayer or by instructing others concerning the way of salvation; so Grimm-Thayer. In each passage the verb should certainly be taken as referring to the ministry of public worship. In the N.T. the whole group of words, λειτουργέω, λειτουργία, λειτουργός, λειτουργικός, is found only in St. Luke, St. Paul, and Hebrews. See further on the classical and Biblical usage Westcott, Hebrews, additional note on viii. 2. Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 137, from pre-Christian papyri points out that λειτουργία and λειτουργέω were used by the Egyptians of the sacred service of the priests, and sometimes of a wider religious service. —αὐτῶν: not the whole Ecclesia, but the prophets and teachers: "prophetarum doctorumque qui quasi arctius sunt concilium," Blass.—νηστευόντων, cf. x. 30, xiv. 23, xxvii. 9, and in O.T. 1 Sam. vii. 5, 6, Dan. ix. 3, on the union of fasting and prayer. In Didaché, viii., 1, while the fasts of the "hypocrites" are condemned, fasting is enjoined on the fourth day of the week, and on Friday, i.e., the day of the Betrayal and the Crucifixion. But Didaché, vii., 4, lays it down that before baptism the baptiser and the candidate should fast. The conduct therefore of the prophets and teachers at Antioch before the solemn mission of Barnabas and Saul to their work is exactly what might have been expected, cf. Edersheim, Temple and its Services, p. 66.—εἶπε τὸ Π.: we may reasonably infer by one of the prophets; it may have been at a solemn meeting of the whole Ecclesia held expressly with reference to a project for carrying the Gospel to the heathen (Hort, Felten, Hackett). Felten sees in δή an indication of an answer to a special prayer. But it does not follow that the "liturgical" functions should be assigned to the whole Ecclesia. —'Αφορίσατε, cf. the same word used by St. Paul of himself, Rom. i. 1, Gal. i. 15, LXX, Lev. xx. 26, Numb. viii. 11. μοι. Such words and acts indicate the personality of the Holy Ghost, cf. δή emphatic, signifying the urgency of the command (cf. use of the word in classical Greek). A. and R.V. omit altogether in translation. In Luke ii. 15 both render it "now," in Matt. xiii. 23, R.V. "verily," Act xv. 36, "now," 1 Cor. vi. 20, A. and R.V. "therefore," to emphasise a demand as here. With this force the word is thus peculiar to Luke and Paul (in other passages, reading contested). The translation of the word may have been omitted here, since the rendering "now" would have been taken in a temporal sense which δή need not suggest.—ὃ for εἰς ὅ, cf. i. 21, Luke i. 25, xii. 46. Grimm-Thayer, Winer-Moulton, l., 7 b, so in Greek writers generally.—προσκέκλημαι, cf. ii. 39, xvi. 10. Grimm-Thayer, sub v. b. Winer-Moulton, xxxix. 3.

Ver. 3. τότε probably indicating a new and special act of fasting and prayer. But is the subject of the sentence the whole Ecclesia, or only the prophets and teachers mentioned before? Ramsay maintains that it cannot be the officials just mentioned, because they cannot be said to lay hands on two of themselves, so that he considers some awkward change of subject takes place, and that the simplest interpretation is that the Church as a whole held a meeting for this solemn purpose (cf. πάντες in D). But if the whole Church was present, it does not follow that they took part in every detail of the service, just as they may have been present in the public service of worship in ver. 2 (see above) without λειτουργ. τῷ K. equally with the prophets and teachers (cf. Felten and also Wendt). There is therefore no reason to assume that the laying on of hands was performed by the whole Church, or that St. Luke could have been ignorant that this function was one which belonged specifically to the officers of the Church. The change of subject is not more awkward than in vi. 6. Dr. Hort is evidently conscious of the difficulty, see especially Ecclesia, p. 64. No doubt, on the return of the two missionaries, they report their doings to the whole Church, xiv. 27, but this is no proof that the laying on of hands for their consecration to their mission was the act of the whole Church. That prophets and teachers should thus perform what is represented in Acts as an Apostolic function need not surprise us, see Gore, u. s., pp. 241, 260, 261. A further question arises as to whether this passage conflicts with the fact that St. Paul was already an Apostle, and that his Apostleship was based not upon his appointment by man, or upon human teaching, but upon a revelation from God, and upon the fact that he had seen the Lord. It is certainly remarkable that both Barnabas and Saul are called Apostles by St. Luke in connection with this first missionary journey, and that under no other circumstance does he apply the term to either, xiv. 4, 14, and it is possible that the title may have been given here in a limited sense with reference to their special mission; see Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 28, 64, 65. But at the same time we must remember that in the N.T. the term ἀπόστολος is never applied to any one who may not very well have satisfied the primary qualification of Apostleship, viz., to have seen the Lord, and to bear witness to His Resurrection, see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 95 ff. (as against the recent statements of McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 653): "We have no reason to suppose that this condition was ever waived, unless we throw forward the Teaching into the second century," Gwatkin, "Apostle," Hastings' B.D.: see further, Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 350, additional note on the Didaché. This we may accept, except in so far as it bears upon the Didaché, in which the Apostles (only mentioned in one passage, xi. 3-6) may be contrasted rather than compared with the Apostles of the N.T., inasmuch as they are represented as wandering missionaries, itinerating from place to place, in days of corruption and gross imposture, and inasmuch as the picture which the Didaché reveals is apparently characteristic of a corner of Church life rather than of the whole of it; Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 176; Bright, Some Aspects of Primitive Church Life, p. 34, and the strictures of Bigg, Doctrine of the Twelve Apostles, pp. 27, 40 ff. It may of course be urged that we know nothing of Barnabas and of the others, to whom Lightfoot and Gwatkin refer as to their special call from Christ, whilst in the case of St. Paul we have his own positive assertion. But even in his case the laying on of hands recognised, if it did not bestow, his Apostolic commission, and "the ceremony of Ordination when it was not the channel of the grace was its recognition," Gore, u. s., pp. 257-267, 383, 395, etc., and see especially the striking passage in Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, pp. 107, 108.

Ver. 4. μὲν οὖν answered by δέ in ver. 5, so Weiss and Rendall, Appendix on μὲν οὖν, p. 161. Page takes διελ. δέ in ver. 6 as the antithesis, see his note on ii. 41.—ἐκπεμφ., cf. ver. 2; only in N.T. in xvii. 10, cf. 2 Sam. xix. 31, where it denotes personal conduct. Mr. Rendall's note takes the verb here also of the personal presence of the Holy Spirit conducting the Apostles on their way.—κατῆλθον: "went down," R.V., of a journey from the interior to the coast, cf. xv. 30; Vulgate, abierunt, and so A.V. "departed," which fails to give the full force of the word.—Σελεύκειαν: the port of Antioch, built by the first Seleucus, about sixteen miles from the city on the Orontes; Seleucia ad mare and ἡ ἐν Πιερίᾳ to distinguish it from other places bearing the same name, see Wetstein for references to it. On its mention here and St. Luke's custom see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 70.—Κύπρον, cf. iv. 36. Although not expressly stated, we may well believe that the place was divinely intimated. But it was natural for more reasons than one that the missionaries should make for Cyprus. Barnabas was a Cypriote, and the nearness of Cyprus to Syria and its productive copper mines had attracted a large settlement of Jews, cf. also xi. 19, 20, and the Church at Antioch moreover owed its birth in part to the Cypriotes, xi. 20 (xxi. 16).

Ver. 5. Σαλαμῖνι: the nearest place to Seleucia on the eastern coast of Cyprus. A few hours' sail in favourable weather would bring the traveller to a harbour convenient and capacious. The Jewish colony must have been considerable since mention is made of synagogues.—κατήγγελλον: "they began to proclaim" . . . ἐν ταῖς συν., it was St. Paul's habitual custom to go to the synagogues first, cf. ix. 20, xiv. 1, etc.—Ἰωάννην: the marked silence about him previously seems to emphasise the fact that he was not selected by the Holy Ghost in the same solemn way as Barnabas and Saul.—

[1] υπηρετην, D, Par., Syr. Harcl. mg. read υπηρετουντα αυτοις (E reads εις διακονιαν). Weiss considers that this is in order to avoid describing Mark as υπηρετης.

[2] διελθοντες δε, D[1] reads και περιελθοντων αυτων, and so Blass and Hilg., and D[2] διελθοντων δε αυτων. περι may have been changed into δια, as the latter prep. may have been thought to mean that they went straight through, instead of going about the island; see also Weiss, Codex D, p. 73. ολην την νησον, so ℵABCDE 61, Vulg., several vers., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.—perhaps fell out, as in T.R., because the situation of Paphos was not known, and ολην seemed to contradict αχρι Π. (Wendt). D reads ονοματι καλουμενον; ῳ ονομα is common in Gospels but not elsewhere in Acts, ονοματι and καλου. are both common; cf. also Luke xix. 1. Βαριησοῦς BCE 13, Sah., Chrys., so W.H., Weiss; Βαριησοῦν AD[2]HLP, Syr. H. mg.; Βαριησοῦ ℵ 40, Vulg., Boh., Syr. H. text, Arm., Tisch.; Βαριησουα D, so Blass, Hilg. with ν or μ added (D[2])—other variations. E, Gig., Wer., Lucif. add ο μεθερμηνευεται Ετοιμας (see on ver. 8) according to Blass in β (E reading Ελυμας, Gig., Wer., Lucif. reading paratus = Ετοιμος). In ver. 8 almost all authorities read Ελυμας, but D, Lucif. have Ετοιμας (not Gig., Par.). This reading is defended by Klostermann, Prob. im Aposteltexte, p. 21, and adopted by Blass (although he is not satisfied with Klostermann's derivation) and also by Ramsay. Blass holds that this name Ετοιμας, whatever it is, must be interpretation of Βαριησους—not μαγος of it. It is possible that some desire may have been at work to avoid any connection between the name of the Magian and the name of Jesus, and thus the words ουτος γαρ μεθ. . . . αυτου in ver. 8, which are omitted by Blass without any authority, simply because of the reading in ver. 6 in E, etc., may have crept into ver. 6 as more appropriate. See also "Barjesus," Hastings' B.D. Weiss, Codex D, p. 74, points out that Ετοιμας may be an old corruption for Ελυμας, and this seems very probable. See further, Schmiedel, Enc. Bibl., i., 478 ff.

ὑπηρέτην, cf. Luke iv. 20, and many writers give it here a kind of official sense (although the word may be used of any kind of service), "velut ad baptizandum," cf. x. 48 (1 Cor. i. 14), Blass; so Alford, Felten, Overbeck, Weiss. But the word may express the fact that John Mark was able to set the Apostles more free for their work of evangelising.

Ver. 6. διελθόντες δὲ (ὅλην) τὴν ν.: "and they made a missionary progress through the whole island," Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 72 and 384, and "Words denoting Missionary Travel in Acts," Expositor, May, 1896; on ὅλην, see critical notes. Ramsay gives nine examples in Acts of this use of διέρχεσθαι or διελθεῖν with the accusative of the region traversed, the only other instance in the N.T. being 1 Cor. xvi. 5. In each of these ten cases the verb implies the process of going over a country as a missionary, and it is remarkable that in i.-xii. this construction of διέρχομαι never occurs, though there are cases in which the idea of a missionary tour requires expression. Ramsay therefore sees in the use of the word in the second part of the book a quasi technical term which the writer had caught from St. Paul himself, by whom alone it is also employed.—Πάφου: Nea Paphos—the chief town and the place of residence of the Roman governor—some little distance from the old Paphos (Παλαίπαφος, Strabo) celebrated for its Venus temple. The place still bears the name of Baffa, Renan, St. Paul, p. 14; O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 101; C. and H., smaller edition, p. 125.—μάγον, cf. viii. 9; "sorcerer," A. and R.V. margin, cf. Matt. ii. 1, but word used here as among the Greeks and Romans in a bad sense. Wycl. has "witch," and this in its masculine form "wizard" has been suggested as an appropriate rendering here. On the absurd attempt to show that the whole narrative is merely introduced as a parallel to St. Peter's encounter with Simon, chap. viii., see Nösgen, p. 427; Zöckler, in loco, and Salmon, Introduction, p. 310. The parallel really amounts to this, that both Peter and Paul encountered a person described under the same title, a magician—an encounter surely not improbable in the social circumstances of the time (see below)! For other views see Holtzmann, who still holds that the narrative is influenced by viii. 14 ff. The word is entirely omitted by Jüngst, p. 120, without any authority whatever. Elymas, according to the narrative, says Jüngst, was either a magician or a false prophet. But the proconsul is styled ἀνὴρ συνετός, and this could not have been consistent with his relation with a magician: Elymas was therefore a kind of Jewish confessor. But neither supposition does much to establish the wisdom of Sergius Paulus. —ψευδοπροφήτην like ψευδόμαντις in classical writers, here only in Acts; and Luke vi. 26, by St. Luke. But frequently used elsewhere in N.T., and in the LXX, and several times in Didaché, xi. On the "Triple beat," Magian, false prophet, Jew, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 415.—Βαριῃσοῦς, on the name see critical notes.

Ver. 7. ὃς ἦν σὺν τῷ ἀ., cf. iv. 13. Nothing was more in accordance with what we know of the personnel of the strange groups which often followed the Roman governors as comites, and it is quite possible that Sergius Paulus may have been keenly interested in the powers or assumed powers of the Magian, and in gaining a knowledge of the strange religions which dominated the East. If the Roman had been completely under the influence of the false prophet, it is difficult to believe that St. Luke would have described him as συνετός (a title in which Zöckler sees a distinction between Sergius Paulus and another Roman, Felix, over whom a Jewish Magian gained such influence, Jos., Ant., xx., 7, 2), although magicians of all kinds found a welcome in unexpected quarters in Roman society, even at the hands of otherwise discerning and clear-sighted personages, as the pages of Roman writers from Horace to Lucian testify. It was not the first time in the world's history that credulity and scepticism had gone hand in hand: Wetstein, in loco; Farrar, St. Paul, i., pp. 351, 352; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 74 ff.—ἐπεζήτησεν; perhaps means, as in classical Greek, "put questions to them". The typical Roman is again marked by the fact that he was thus desirous to hear what the travellers would say, and it is also indicated that he was not inclined to submit himself entirely to the Magian.—τῷ ἀνθυπάτῳ: "the proconsul," R.V., "deputy," A.V. In the reign of James I. the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was called "the deputy" (cf. Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, i., 2, 161). Under Augustus, B.C. 27, the Roman provinces had been divided into two classes: (1) imperial and (2) senatorial, the former being governed by proprætors or generals, and the latter by proconsuls. But as the first kind of government would often be required when a province was unruly, it frequently happened that the same province might be at one time classed under (1) and at another time under (2). Cyprus had been originally an imperial province, Strabo, xiv., but in 22 B.C. it had been transferred by Augustus to the Senate, and was accordingly, as Luke describes it, under a proconsul, Dio Cassius, liii., 12, liv., 4. Under Hadrian it appears to have been under a proprætor; under Severus it was again under a proconsul. At Soloi, a town on the north coast of Cyprus, an inscription was discovered by General Cesnola, Cyprus, 1877, p. 425 (cf. Hogarth, Devia Cypria, 1889, p. 114), dated ἐπὶ Παύλου (ἀνθ)υπάτου, and the probable identification with Sergius Paulus is accepted by Lightfoot, Zöckler, Ramsay, Knabenbauer, etc.; see especially amongst recent writers Zahn, Einleitung, ii., Excurs. ii., p. 632, for a similar view, and also for information as to date, and as to another and more recent inscription (1887), bearing upon the connnection of the Gens Sergia with Cyprus; see also McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 175, note, and Wendt, edition 1899.—συνετῷ: R.V., "a man of understanding," cf. Matt. xi. 25. A.V. and other E.V. translate "prudent," Vulgate, prudens, but see Genevan Version on Matt., u. s.; frequent in LXX in various significations: σύνεσις, practical discernment, intelligence, so συνετός, one who can "put things together" (συνιέναι): σοφία, the wisdom of culture (Grimm-Thayer); on "prudent," see Humphry, Commentary on R.V., p. 28.

Ver. 8. ἀνθίστατο: because he saw that his hope of gain was gone, cf. xvi. 19, xix. 27, and the hope of retaining influence with the proconsul; see reading in D, cf. 2 Tim. iii. 8, where St. Paul uses the same verb of the magicians withstanding Moses.—Ἐλύμας, see critical notes in answer to Klostermann, who finds in Ἐ. a translation of Bar-Jesus; Wendt points out (1899) that in this case οὕτω γὰρ μεθ. would follow immediately after Ἐ., but as οὕτω κ.τ.λ. follows immediately upon ὁ μάγος, Ἐ. can only be a translation of that word; see also MS. authority, so Blass in β, where he adds to βαριησοῦς the words ὁ μεθ. Ἑτοιμᾶς. In Ἐλύμας we have the Greek form either of Aramaic Alīmā, strong, or more probably of an Arab word 'alim, wise; we cannot arrive at any derivation closer than this, cf. "Bar-Jesus," Hastings' B.D., and for a similar explanation Zöckler, in loco; and Wendt (1899), Grimm-Thayer, sub v., Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 74, and so Blass, in loco, read Ἑτοιμᾶς, and render "Son of the Ready".—διαστρέψαι, Exod. v. 4, same construction with ἀπό; 1 Kings xviii. 17, 18, Matt. xvii. 17, Luke ix. 41, Phil. ii. 15; see also critical notes.

Ver. 9. Σαῦλος δέ, ὁ καὶ Παῦλος: since the days of St. Jerome (De Vir. Ill., chap. vi., cf. Aug., Confess., viii., 4, etc., cf. amongst moderns Bengel, Olshausen, Ewald, Meyer) it has been thought that there is some connection here emphasised by the writer between the name Sergius Paulus and the assumption of the name Paul by the Apostle at this juncture. (Wendt (1899) inclines to the view that the name Paul was first used in ver. 1. See in loco and critical notes.) So too Baur, Zeller, Hausrath, Overbeck, Hilgenfeld are of opinion that Luke intended some reference to the name of the proconsul, although they regard the narrative of his conversion as unhistorical. But Wendt rightly maintains (1899) that the simple ὁ καὶ without the addition of ἀπὸ τότε would not denote the accomplishment of a change of name at this juncture, and that if the change or rather addition of name had been now effected, the mention of it would naturally have followed after the mention of the conversion of the proconsul in ver. 13. The connection seemed so strained and artificial to many that they abandoned it, and regarded the collocation of the two names as a mere chance incident, whilst Zöckler (whose note should be consulted, Apostelgeschichte, in loco, second edition), who cannot thus get rid of the striking similarity in the names of the two men, thinks that the narrative of St. Luke is too condensed to enable us fully to solve the connection. But since it was customary for many Jews to bear two names, a Hebrew and a Gentile name, cf. Acts i. 23, xii. 25, xiii. 1, Col. iv. 11, Jos., Ant., xii., 9, 7, and frequent instances in Deissmann, Bibelstudien, pp. 182, 183, cf. Winer-Schmiedel, p. 149 note, it may well be that Luke wished to intimate that if not at this moment, yet during his first missionary journey, when the Apostle definitely entered upon his Gentile missionary labours, he employed not his Jewish but his Gentile name to mark his Apostleship to the Gentile world („Seit 13. 1. ist der jüdische Jünger Σαῦλος Weltapostel," Deissmann); by a marvellous stroke of historic brevity the author sets before us the past and the present in the formula ὁ καὶ Π.—a simple change in the order of a recurring pair of names: see Ramsay's striking remarks, St. Paul, p. 83 ff., with which however, mutatis mutandis, his more recent remarks, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 54, should be carefully compared. See also Deissmann, u. s., Nösgen, Wendt, Hackett, Felten, and Zöckler, in loco, and McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 176. This preference by St. Luke of the Gentile for the Hebrew name has its analogy in St. Paul's own use in his Epistles (and in his preference for Roman provincial names in his geographical references, cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2 Cor. viii. 1, ix. 2, Rom. xv. 26, Phil. iv. 15).

but other E.V. "deceit"; the idea of deceit, however, is more properly contained in δόλου R.V., "guile". ῥᾳδ., lit., ease in doing, so easiness, laziness, and hence fraud, wickedness, cf. πανουργία, frequently used, although not necessarily so, in a bad sense.—υἱὲ διαβόλου, John viii. 44, the expression may be used in marked and indignant contrast to the name "Son of Jesus," cf. iii. 25, iv. 36. But without any reference to ver. 6 the expression would describe him as the natural enemy of the messengers of God. On the phrase and its use here see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 163. Note the thrice παντὸς — πάσης — πάσης, "ter repetitur emphatice" Wetstein. — διαστρέφων, cf. LXX, Prov. x. 9, and Isa. lix. 8, Micah iii. 9.—τὰς ὁδοὺς . . . τὰς εὐθείας: similar expressions frequent in LXX, so of the ways of the Lord in contrast to the ways of men, Ezek. xxxiii. 17, Ecclesiast. xxxix. 24, Song of the Three Children, ver. 3.

Ver. 11. καὶ νῦν ἰδοὺ, cf. Hort, Ecclesia, p. 179.—μὴ βλέπων τὸν ἥλιον: emphasising the punishment, as it would imply that he should be stone-blind (Weiss).—ἄχρι καιροῦ: "until a season," R.V. margin, "until the time" (Rendall), i.e., the duly appointed time when it should please God to restore his sight, cf. Luke iv. 13, xxi. 24 (Acts xxiv. 25). The exact expression is only found here and in Luke iv. 13. Wendt (1899) asks if the ceasing of the punishment is conceived of as ceasing with the opposition in ver. 8. See his earlier edition, 1888, and the comment of Chrys., so Oecumenius: οὐκ ἄρα τιμωρία ἦν ἀλλ' ἴασις: so too Theophylact.—παραχρῆμα, see above on p. 106. — ἐπέπεσεν, see critical notes. If we retain T.R. with Weiss, the word may be called characteristic of St. Luke, see above on p. 216 its use as denoting an attack of disease is quite medical, Hobart, p. 44.—ἀχλὺς: only here in N.T., not in LXX. Galen in describing diseases of the eye mentions ἀχλύς amongst them. So Dioscorides uses the word of a cataract, and Hippocrates also employs it, Hobart, p. 44. The word is no doubt frequent in Homer, sometimes of one deprived of sight by divine power, and it also occurs in Polyb. and Josephus. But here it is used in conjunction with other words which may also be classed as medical, παραχ., σκότος, to say nothing of (ἐπ)έπεσεν.—σκότος: marks the final stage of blindness—the word is no doubt a common one, but it is used, as also some of its derivatives, by medical writers in a technical sense, and Dioscorides in one place connects σκοτώματα and ἀχλύς together.—περιάγων: only absolutely here in N.T., so sometimes in classical Greek, and sometimes with acc. loci, as also in N.T. (cf. Matt. iv. 23, ix. 35, etc.).—ἐζήτει, imperf., he sought but did not find.—χειραγωγούς: only here in N.T., not in LXX, cf. the verb in ix. 8, xxii. 11, and in LXX, Judg. xvi. 26 A, Tobit xi. 16 (but not A, B); used by Plutarch, etc.

Ver. 12. ἐπίστευσεν: "the blindness of Elymas opened the eyes of the proconsul" (Felten). If the verb is understood in its full sense, viz., that Sergius Paulus became a convert to the faith, ver. 48, ii. 44, iv. 4, xi. 21, baptism would be implied, viii. 12.—ἐκπλησσ., Matt. vii. 28, Mark i. 22, xi. 18, Luke iv. 32, ix. 43, etc., so in classical Greek with ἐπί. The verb is also found in Eccl. vii. 17 (16), Wisdom xiii. 4, 2 Macc. vii. 12, 4 Macc. viii. 4, xvii. 16. Bengel's comment is suggestive, "miraculo acuebatur attentio ad doctrinam": the conversion is not represented as the result of the miracle alone. The conversion of a Roman proconsul is regarded as absolutely incredible by Renan (so more recent critics). But if the narrative had been a mere fiction to magnify Paul's powers in converting such an important personage in his first encounter with the powers of heathenism, the forger would not have contented himself with the brief Σαῦλος ὁ καὶ Π. of ver. 9; see Zöckler's Apostelgeschichte, p. 245, second edition, on this and other objections against the narrative. See Introd. for the favourable light in which St. Luke describes the relations between the Roman government and Christianity.

Ver. 13. Ἀναχθέντες, "set sail," R.V. So in classical use, here in its technical nautical sense—so too, in opposite sense, κατάγεσθαι. In this sense thirteen times in Acts, and once in Luke's Gospel, viii. 22, but not in the other Gospels at all; it is only used once, in another sense, by St. Matthew among the Evangelists, cf. iv. 1. ἄγειν and its compounds with ἀνά, κατά, εἰς, are characteristic of Luke's writings, Friedrich, p. 7.—οἱ περὶ τὸν Π.: Paul now taking the first place as the leader of the company, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 84, the order henceforth is Paul and Barnabas, with two significant exceptions, xv. 12, 25, and xiv. 12, see in loco.—Ἰ. δὲ . . . ὑπέστρεψεν: Ramsay refers St. Mark's withdrawal to the above circumstances, inasmuch as he disapproved of St. Paul's change of place, which he regarded as an abandonment of the work. But the withdrawal on the part of Mark is still more difficult to understand, if we are to suppose that he withdrew because Paul and Barnabas made, as it were, a trip to Antioch for the recovery of the former; and xv. 38 seems to imply something different from this. Various reasons may have contributed to the desertion of Mark, perhaps the fact that his cousin Barnabas was no longer the leader, or Paul's preaching to the Gentiles may have been too liberal for him, or lack of courage to face the dangers of the mountain passes and missionary work inland, or affection for his home at Jerusalem and anxiety for the coming famine (he withdrew, says Holtzmann, "zu seinem Mutter"). See Deissmann's striking note, Bibelstudien, p. 185, on the fact that here, where John Mark leaves Paul for Jerusalem, he is simply "John," his Jewish name; in xv. 39 he goes with Barnabas to Cyprus, and on that occasion only he is described by his Gentile name "Mark" alone. On the "perils of rivers, and perils of robbers," see Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 23, and in connection with the above, pp. 62, 65, also C. and H. (smaller edition), p. 129, Hausrath, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, iii., 133.

Ver. 14. διελθόντες: in this journey northwards to Antioch the Apostles would probably follow the one definite route of commerce between Perga and that city; the natural and easy course would lead them to Adada, now Kara Bavlo, and the dedication there of a church to St. Paul may point to the belief that he had visited the place on his way to Antioch (Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 21, and Zöckler, in loco, who agrees here with Ramsay's view). Although disagreeing with C. and H. in bringing the Apostles to Adada, Ramsay fully agrees with them in emphasising the dangers of the journey across the Pisidian highlands, and in referring to his travels from Perga across Taurus to Antioch and back his perils of rivers, and perils of robbers, 2 Cor. xi. 26 (see too Wendt, in loco (1899), in agreement with Ramsay, whose instances of the dangers of the way, from the notices of the inscriptions, should be consulted, u. s.).—Ἀντιόχειαν τῆς Πισιδίας, see critical notes. If we adopt with R.V., etc., Ἀ. τὴν Πισιδίαν = an adjective, τὴν Πισιδικήν, "Pisidian Antioch," or, as it was also called, Antioch towards Pisidia, or on the side of Pisidia, to distinguish it from Antioch on the Maeander, or Carian Antioch. At this period Antioch did not belong to Pisidia at all (Strabo, pp. 557, 569, 577), but later the term Pisidia was widened, and so the expression "Antioch of Pisidia" came into vogue. Ptolemy, v., 4, 11, employs it and so some MSS. in the passage before us; see critical notes, and Ramsay, "Antioch in Pisidia," in Hastings' B.D., Church in the Roman Empire, p. 25, and Wendt (1899), in loco; see further on xvi. 6. On the death of Amyntas, B.C. 25, Antioch became part of the Roman province Galatia, and a little later, some time before 6 B.C., it was made a colonia by Augustus, with Latin rights, and as such it became an administrative and military centre in the protection of the province against the Pisidian robbers in their mountain fortresses, Ramsay, u. s. There can be no doubt that Paul would also find there a considerable Jewish population, as the Jews were trusty supporters of the Seleucid kings, and found a home in many of the cities which they founded.—ἀπὸ τῆς Πέργης: Ramsay supposes that the travellers hurried on from Perga (chief town of Pamphylia on the Cestrus, and an important place of commerce) to Antioch, without any evangelisation on their way, because in Perga the Apostle had been smitten with an attack of malarial fever, which obliged him to seek the higher ground of Antioch. In Gal. iv. 13 Ramsay finds a corroboration of this view, a passage in which Paul himself states that an illness occasioned his first preaching to the Churches of Galatia, i.e., of the Roman province Galatia. The suggestion has much to recommend it, see St. Paul, p. 92. McGiffert's remarks, however, should be consulted in support of the view that the illness overtook the Apostle at Antioch rather than at Perga, Apostolic Age, p. 177, and Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i., 275, E.T.—εἰς τὴν συναγωγὴν, "to the Jew first," was Paul's primary rule, and here amongst those φοβ. τὸν Θεόν he would find, perhaps, the best soil for his labours, cf. xvi. 14, and also xiii. 5, xiv. 1, xvi. 13, xvii. 2, 10, 17, xviii. 4, xix. 8. Against the doubts raised by the Tübingen School as to the historical character of the notice, see especially Wendt, 1888 and 1899 editions. It is inconceivable, as he says, that Paul, who could express himself as in Rom. i. 16, ix. 32, x. 16, xi. 30, should entirely disregard the Jews in his missionary efforts. The notice in xvi. 13, from a "We-source," of St. Paul's first Sabbath at Philippi enables us to form a correct judgment as to his probable course in other places.—τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῶν σαβ.; not necessarily the first Sabbath after their arrival; some time may have been spent previously in mission work before a critical event took place, Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 99, 100.—ἐκάθισαν: the word may mean that they sat down in the seat of the Rabbis, so J. Lightfoot, in loco, as intimating that they expected to be called upon to preach, or we may infer, ver. 15, that they were called upon on the present occasion because they were well known in the city as men who claimed to have a message to deliver, and the rulers of the synagogue could invite whom they would, Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 281; Lumby, p. 252, "on the Jewish Manner of reading the Scriptures".

Ver. 15. τὴν ἀνάγ. τοῦ ν. καὶ τῶν π.: the first and second lesson, Edersheim, u. s., p. 278, History of the Jewish Nation, p. 443; Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 79 ff., E.T., the first from the Pentateuch, and the second a paragraph from the Prophets, including the older historical books. As there is no evidence that the lectionary of the Prophets existed in the time of our Lord, it is precarious to attempt to fix the particular Sabbath for St. Paul's address. It is however significant that he uses two remarkable words from the LXX, Deut. i. 31: ἐτροφ. (see critical notes), in ver. 18, and from Isa. i. 2: ὕψωσεν in ver. 17, and that in the present table of Jewish lessons that from the Law for the forty-fourth Sabbath in the year is Deut. i.-iii. 22, while the corresponding lesson from the Prophets is Isa. i. 1-22; see Bengel on ver. 18, and Farrar, St. Paul, i., pp. 368, 369; Plumptre, in loco. But we cannot safely go beyond the view of Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 100, who points out that the present list of Jewish lessons is of decidedly later origin, but adds that "probably it was often determined by older custom and traditional ideas of suitable accompaniment".—ἀπέστειλαν: the words seem hardly consistent with Lumby's view that St. Paul was himself the Haphtarist.—οἱ ἀρχισυνάγωγοι; generally only one, Luke xiii. 14, but cf. Mark v. 22 (Weiss, in loco), and the passage before us; the office was specially concerned with the care of public worship, ἐν ὑμῖν παρακλήσεως[1] πρὸς τὸν λαὸν λέγετε. 16. ἀναστὰς δὲ Παῦλος, καὶ κατασείσας τῇ χειρὶ, εἶπεν, Ἄνδρες Ἰσραηλῖται, καὶ οἱ φοβούμενοι τὸν Θεόν, ἀκούσατε. 17. ὁ Θεὸς τοῦ λαοῦ τούτου Ἰσραὴλ ἐξελέξατο τοὺς πατέρας ἡμῶν· καὶ τὸν λαὸν ὕψωσεν ἐν τῇ παροικίᾳ ἐν γῇ Αἰγύπτῳ, καὶ μετὰ βραχίονος ὑψηλοῦ ἐξήγαγεν αὐτοὺς ἐξ αὐτῆς· and the name was given to those who conducted the assemblies for that purpose. They had to guard against anything unfitting taking place in the synagogue (Luke xiii. 14), and to appoint readers and preachers, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 65, E.T.; Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 281, and on the present passage, Jesus the Messiah, i., 434, and for the title in inscriptions, Grimm-Thayer, sub v.; see also below on xiv. 2.—ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί: courteous address, ii. 37, "Gentlemen, brethren" (Ramsay).

Ver. 16. κατασείσας, see above on xii. 17, and cf. xix. 33, xxi. 40 (xxvi. 1), "made a gesture with his hand," a gesture common to orators, "nam hoc gestu olim verba facturi pro contione silentium exigebant," and here a graphic touch quite characteristic of Acts. The speech which follows may well have remained in the memory, or possibly may have found a place in the manuscript diary of one of Paul's hearers (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 100), or St. Paul may himself have furnished St. Luke with an outline of it, for the main sections, as Ewald suggested, may have formed part of the Apostle's regular mode of addressing similar audiences; and if not St. Paul himself, yet one of those who are described as οἱ περὶ Παῦλον, ver. 13 (Zöckler), may have supplied the information. On the other hand it is maintained that the speech in its present form is a free composition of the author of Acts, since it is so similar to the early addresses of St. Peter, or to the defence made by St. Stephen, and that St. Luke wished to illustrate St. Paul's method of proclaiming the Messianic salvation to Jews. But considering the audience and the occasion, it is difficult to see how St. Paul could have avoided touching upon points similar to those which had claimed the attention of a St. Peter or a St. Stephen: "non poterat multum differre vel a Petri orationibus, vel a defensione Stephani . . . hæc igitur non magis in Paulum cadunt quam in quemvis novae salutis praeconem" (Blass), while at the same time it is quite possible to press this similarity too far and to ignore the points which are confessedly characteristic of St. Paul, cf., e.g., vv. 38, 39 (Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden der Apostelgeschichte, pp. 19-22; Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 244, 245; Lechler, Das Apostolische Zeitalter, p. 272; Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., i., p. 46 (1896)); see further, Farrar, St. Paul, i., p. 369, note, and Alford references for the several Pauline expressions, and the remarkable list of parallels drawn out recently by Ramsay between the speech at Pisidian Antioch and the thoughts and phrases of the Epistle to the Galatians, Expositor, December, 1898 (see below on pp. 295, 297); also Nösgen's list of Pauline expressions, Apostelgeschichte, p. 53, in this and in other speeches in Acts.—ἄνδρες Ἰ., cf. ii. 22, iii. 12, v. 35, a mode of address fitly chosen as in harmony with the references to the history of Israel which were to follow.—οἱ φ. Θεόν, cf. x. 2, xiii. 43, 50, xvi. 14, etc.

Ver. 17. τούτου: this points back to Ἰσρ.: an appeal to the national pride of the people in their theocratic privileges and names, cf. 2 Cor. xi. 22, Rom. ix. 6.—ἐξελ. so often in LXX of God's choice of Israel.—ὕψωσεν: "exalted," A. and R.V. Weiss and Wendt, with Bethge and Blass, restrict its meaning to increase in numbers, Gen. xlviii. 19, Acts vii. 17, so also Overbeck; whilst others refer it to the miraculous events connected with their sojourn as well as to their increase in numbers (so St. Chrysostom), others take it of the exaltation of the people under Joseph. But the word may certainly mean something more than numerical increase, and include increase in strength and power (so Hackett, Page). It is used once by St. Paul elsewhere, 2 Cor. xi. 7, in contrast with ταπεινόω, cf. its similar use in Luke i. 52. Rendall refers its use here to 2 Kings xxv. 27, "lifted up," i.e., at the end of a miserable state of bondage, a passage where the verb is closely joined with ἐξήγαγεν. In Isaiah i. 2 and xxiii.

Wendt cannot decide, although he considers ετροφ. as more fitting here, while he regards ετροπ. as the more original reading in LXX Deut. i. 31 (B*, Orig.). Tischendorf, however, regards ετροφ. as best attested in Deut. i. 31 and as best suited to the context both there and here. W.H., App., p. 94, maintain that τροπ. is the more obvious rendering of נָשָׂא, but that when the orig. meaning was forgotten, the context in Deut. i. 31 led to the change to τροφοφ. This corruption in LXX was doubtless widely current in the Apostolic age, and might have been followed here. W.H. conclude that there can be no reason to question a reading supported by ℵB 61, Vulg., and many good cursives, a reading which they regard as best authenticated in the LXX and as agreeing with the Heb., especially when it was liable to be changed by the influence of the common and corrupt text of the LXX. They add that both here and in Deut. either reading gives excellent sense.

[2] και om. B 61, Sah., W.H. text, Wendt—but Blass, Hilg. and Weiss retain. W.H. take ως in ver. 18 as "when," not "about".

[3] κατεκληροδοτησεν, but κατεκληρονομησεν ℵABCDEHLP 13, 61, Chrys., Tisch., W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. -δοτ- arose from missing active use of κληρονομ. Similar instances of confusion between the two verbs in LXX; cf. H. and R. αυτοις om. ℵBD* 13, 40, 61, Sah., Boh., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. For αυτων D, Syr. Harcl. read των αλλοφυλων, so Blass and Hilg.

[4] The words ως ετεσιν τετρ. κ. πεντ. are to be placed before και μετα ταυτα—so ℵABC, Vulg., Sah., Boh., Arm., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss. Wendt thinks with Meyer and Holtzmann that the transposition may have been made to meet a difficulty; see also Farrar, St. Paul, i., 370. D, Sah., Syr. Harcl. mg. omit μετα ταυτα altogether, so Blass and Hilg.

4 it is used of bringing up children.—παροικίᾳ, cf. vii. 6, and for the noun as here, LXX, 2 Esdras viii. 35, Wisdom xix. 10. Prologue of Ecclus., ver. 26, Ps. cxx. 5.—μετὰ βραχίονος ὑψ., cf. Exod. vi. 1, 6, Deut. v. 15, etc., Ps. cxxxvi. 12, Baruch ii. 11, etc. Hebraistic, cf. Luke i. 51, where we have ἐν as in Hebrew, but in LXX μετά as of the accompanying the arm of God, and not merely of his power as bringing the people out.

Ver. 18. ἐτροποφόρησεν, see critical notes. ἐτροπ., "suffered he their manners," so A. and R.V. ἐτροφ., "bare he them as a nursing father," R.V. margin. This latter rendering is supported by Bengel, Alford, Bethge, Nösgen, Hackett, Page, Farrar, Plumptre, etc., as more agreeable to the conciliatory drift of the Apostle's words, but see above, cf. 2 Macc. vii. 27.

Ver. 19. καθελὼν, cf. Deut. vii. 1. In LXX the stronger verb ἐξαίρειν is used, but καθαιρεῖν in LXX often means to destroy, Jer. xxiv. 6, Ps. xxvii. 5, and so in classical Greek. Weiss prefers the force of the verb as in Luke i. 52, to cast down, i.e., from their sovereignty.-κατεκληροδότησεν, see critical notes. If we adopt reading of R.V. W.H.: "he gave them their land for an inheritance".

Ver. 20. If we follow the best attested reading, see critical notes, we may connect the dative of time ἔτεσι, cf. viii. 11, closely with the preceding words as signifying the period within which an event is accomplished. The κληρονομία was already assured to the fathers as God's chosen, vii. 5, and the four hundred years of the people's sojourn in a strange land, Acts vii. 6, Gen. xv. 13, forty years in the wilderness, and some ten years for the actual conquest of the land made up the four hundred and fifty years (so Weiss, Felten, see Wendt, in loco). If reading in T.R. is accepted (strongly defended by Farrar, St. Paul, i., p. 370), although it is at variance with 1 Kings vi. 1, according to which Solomon began his Temple in the 480th (LXX 440th) year after the Exodus, we have merely to suppose that the Apostle followed the popular chronology adopted by Josephus, Ant., viii., 3, 1; x., 8, 5, especially when we remember that speaking in round numbers (ὡς) that chronology tallies very fairly with that of the Book of Judges. See Meyer-Wendt, Alford, and cf. also the almost similar reckoning in Wetstein, and Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden, pp. 30, 31. Another explanation is given by Rendall, in loco, where ἔτεσι is taken as marking not duration of time (which would require the accusative), but the limit of time within which, etc.

Ver. 21. κἀκεῖθεν: only here of time in N.T. as in later Greek. Weiss even here interprets the expression to mean that they asked for a king from him, i.e., Samuel, in his character as prophet.—ἔτη τεσσαράκοντα: not mentioned in O.T., but cf. Jos., Ant., vi., 14, 9. The period does not seem much too long for Saul's reign when we remember that Ishbosheth was forty years old at his father's death, when he was placed on the throne by Abner, 2 Sam. ii. 10.—Σαοὺλ κ.τ.λ., cf. Paul's description of himself in Phil. iii. 5.

Ver. 22. μεταστήσας, Luke xvi. 4: refers here to Saul's deposition from the throne, 1 Sam. xv. 16, cf. Dan. ii. 21, 1 Macc. viii. 13, not as Bethge thinks to his removal from the presence of God, cf. 2 Kings xvii. 23, nor to his death, 3 Macc. iii. 1, vi. 12. Saul therefore could not have been the bringer of the promised salvation.—εὗρον κ.τ.λ.: a combination of two passages, Ps. lxxxix. 20 and 1 Sam. xiii. 14, and freely referred to as a saying pronounced by God Himself, but the latter part was pronounced by Samuel in God's name.—τὸν τοῦ Ἰεσσαί, but in LXX τὸν δοῦλόν μου. ἄνδρα to mark the dignity (Bethge).—κατὰ τὴν καρδίαν, cf. Jer. iii. 15.—ὃς ποιήσει, cf. Isa. xliv. 28, Ps. xl. 8. The fact that these quotations are thus left in their present shape with no attempt to correct them justifies the belief that we have here St. Paul's own words. With the first part of the quotation cf. Clem. Rom., Cor., xviii., 1, a striking agreement; see on the one hand as against its dependence on Acts, Wendt, p. 41 (1899), and on the other hand, Bethge, in loco, and Introd., p. 37.

Ver. 23. κατ' ἐπαγγελίαν: phrase only found in Gal. iii. 29, 2 Tim. i. 1: the Messianic promises generally, or more specifically 2 Sam. vii. 12, Ps. cxxxii. 11, Isa. xi. 1, 10, Jer. xxiii. 5, 6, Zech. iii. 8. In the last prophecy the LXX read the verb ἄγω which is found in the verse before us, see critical notes.—Ἰησοῦν: emphatic at the end of the clause, as τούτου at the beginning of the verse.

Ver. 24. προκηρύξ. not in LXX or Apocrypha, but in classical Greek, cf. also Josephus, Ant., x., 5, 1, and also in Plut., Polyb.—πρὸ προσώπου τῆς εἰσόδου; "before the face of his entering in," R.V. margin, cf. Luke i. 76; here used temporally, really a Hebraistic pleonasm, cf. Mal. iii. 1, an expression used as still under the influence of that passage, Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 154, and also Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, p. 23.—εἰσόδου: the entry of Jesus upon His public Messianic ministry, a word which may also have been suggested by Mal. iii. 2, LXX.

Ver. 25. ἐπλήρου: "i.e., non multo ante finem vitæ," Blass, cf. vii. 23.—δρόμον: "Paulum sapit," cf. xx. 24, 2 Tim. iv. 7, Gal. ii. 2.—ὑπονοεῖτε: three times in Acts, cf. xxv. 18, xxvii. 27; nowhere else in N.T., but see Judith xiv. 14, Tob. viii. 16, Ecclus. xxiii. 21. Note this free reproduction of the words of the Evangelists—essentially the same but verbally different.—οὐκ εἰμὶ ἐγὼ, I am not he, i.e., the Messiah; best to punctuate as in A. and R.V., so Wendt; but see on the other hand Bethge and Weiss, and the reading they adopt: τί ἐμὲ ὑπον. εἶναι, οὐκ εἰμὶ ἐγώ; the gloss ὁ XC. after ἐγώ, old enough to have crept into the text, shows that the punctuation in A.V. was a natural one, Simcox, u. s., p. 70.

Ver. 26. ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί: the address of ver. 16 is here renewed in more affectionate tones, and here as in ver. 16 both Jews and proselytes are two classes, here both regarded by Paul as ἀδελφοί.—ὑμῖν, see critical notes. Some take it as marking a sharp antithesis between the Jews of Antioch and those of Jerusalem (an antithesis not removed by ἡμῖν), as if the Jews at Antioch and of the Dispersion were contrasted with the Jews of the capital. But γὰρ need not mark a contrast, it may rather confirm the implication in σωτ. ταύτης that Jesus was the Saviour, for He had suffered and died, and so had fulfilled the predictions relating to the Messiah. Nor indeed was it true that those who crucified the Saviour had excluded themselves from the offer of the Gospel: ὁ λόγος τῆς σ., cf. Ephes. i. 13, Phil. ii. 16, 1 Thess. ii. 13, etc.—ἀπεστάλη: if we read the compound ἐξαπ., critical notes, R.V. "is sent forth," i.e., from God, cf. x. 36. Weiss takes the verb as simply referring to the sending forth of the word from the place where it was first announced. But cf. on the other hand Gal. iv. 4, 6, and ver. 23 above, where God is spoken of as the agent in the Messianic salvation, and on the possible force of ὁ λόγος τῆς σωτ. and ἐξαπεστάλη here see Ramsay, Expositor, December, 1898.

Ver. 27. Both A. and R.V. take ἀγνοήσαντες as governing τοῦτον and τὰς φωνάς. But καί may be not copulative but intensive—not only did they not recognise the Christ, but even condemned Him to death; so Rendall. Meyer rendered καί = "also," and makes τὰς φωνάς the direct object of ἐπλήρ. Wendt renders as A. and R.V., see critical notes.—ἀγνοήσαντες, cf. iii. 14, it is very doubtful how far we can see in the expression an excuse in the former passage, and guiltiness here. Paul speaks of himself as acting ἀγνοῶν and yet obtaining mercy, 1 Tim. i. 13, cf. also for the use of the word by Paul xvii. 23, and frequently in his Epistles.

Ver. 29. ὡς δὲ ἐτέλεσαν ἅπαντα: St. Paul was evidently acquainted with the details of the Passion as well as with the main facts of the death and burial, cf. 1 Cor. xi. 23; and for the verb used here Luke xviii. 31, xxii. 37, John xix. 28, 30; only here in Acts, Weiss regards the subject of ἐτέλ., καθέλ., ἔθηκαν as presupposed as known in accordance with the Gospel history, but St. Paul may have been speaking in general terms of the action of the Jews, although not the enemies of Christ but His friends actually took Him down and buried Him. Taken literally, St. Paul's statement agrees with

[1] ητησαντο—ℵ reads ητησαν, so W.H. marg., but mid. better, "asked for themselves". D reads κριναντες αυτον παρεδωκαν Πιλατῳ ινα εις αναιρεσιν; Blass and Hilg. omit ινα; see ver. 29.

[2] ετελεσαν, in D ετελουν.

[3] D reads after γεγρ.: ητουντο τον Π. τουτον μεν σταυρωσαι και επιτυχοντες παλιν . . . The reason of these insertions, as has been suggested, seems the same as in the previous verses—to gain a complete, although summary, account according to the Gospels. Syr. Harcl. mg. after γεγρ. postquam crucifixus esset, petierunt a Pilato ut de ligno detraherent eum. Impetraverunt . . . Blass combines the two in β (cf. also Hilg.). But one seems rather a corruption of the other, although the same motive mentioned above might lead to the insertion of either.

[4] After οιτινες ℵAC 13, 15, 18, 61, Sah., Boh., Syrr. P. (H.), Arm., Aeth. read νυν, so Tisch., R.V., [W.H.]; but om. BEHLP, Chrys., so Blass, Weiss, [W.H.]. Perhaps it fell out because the Apostles not only now first, but for a long time past, were witnesses. D, Vulg., Syr. Harcl. read αχρι νυν, so Blass in β, and Hilg.

Wendt (1899) attaches great prob. to W.H. explanation, see App., p. 95; ημιν alone being the orig. reading. DE, Gig., Vulg., so Blass and Hilg., add ημων after πατερας, which shows how easily additions would follow τεκνοις.

the Gospel of Peter, 21-24, as Hilgenfeld noted. But Joseph of Arimathæa and Nicodemus were both Jews and members of the Council.—τοῦ ξύλου, cf. v. 30, x. 39. Jüngst, without any ground, as Hilgenfeld remarks, refers ver. 29 partly on account of this expression to a reviser, and so 34-37. On ξύλον, significant here and in Gal. iii. 13, see Ramsay, Expositor, December, 1898.—εἰς μν., cf. 1 Cor. xv. 4, the death followed by the burial, and so the reality of the death, "ἐκ νεκρῶν," was vouched for.

Ver. 31. ὤφθη, see Milligan's note on the word, Resurrection of our Lord, p. 265; Witness of the Epistles (1892), pp. 369, 377, 386; and Beyschlag, Leben Jesu, i., p. 434 (second edition), cf. Luke xxiv. 34, 1 Cor. xv. 5 ff.—ἐπὶ: with accusative of duration of time, cf. xvi. 18, xviii. 20, xix. 8, 10, 34, xxvii. 20, cf. Luke iv. 25, xviii. 4; in classical writers, but only in St. Luke in N.T., except Heb. xi. 30, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 53.—οἵτινες: if we add νῦν, see critical notes, the word intimates that this announcement of Jesus as the Messiah was not first made by Paul, as some new thing, but that His Apostles were still bearing the same witness to the Jews (λαόν) as a living message in the same city in which Jesus had been crucified.

Ver. 32. καὶ ἡμεῖς, cf. 1 Cor. xv. 11, "whether it were I or they," etc., "ut illi illis, sic nos vobis".—εὐαγγελ., see above on p. 210, and Simcox, u. s., pp. 78, 79.—τὴν πρὸς τοὺς π. ἐπαγγελίαν γεν., cf. Rom. xv. 8, Acts xxvi. 6.

The former rendering is quite compatible with the view that the reference of the word here is not to the resurrection of Jesus, but to the raising up of Jesus as the Messiah, cf. iii. 22, vii. 37, Deut. xviii. 15. The [1] τῳ ψαλμῳ τῳ δευτερῳ γεγ. ELP, Vulg., Syr. H., R.V. (T.R.); τῳ ψ. γεγ. τῳ δευτ. ℵABC 13, 61, Arm., W.H. But in D (τῳ) πρωτῳ ψ. γεγ., cf. Or., Hil., Gig., Latin MS. known to Bede, Tisch., Meyer, Blass. The δευτ. and πρωτ. is the only important var., and the authority for the latter is almost entirely Western. According to Origen the Jews frequently combined Ps. i. and ii. (cf. also Justin, Apol., i., 40; Tert., adv. Marc., iv., 22; Cypr., Testim., i., 13), "so that a 'Western' scribe, being probably accustomed to read the two Psalms combined, would be under a temptation to alter δευτ. to πρωτ. and not vice versâ," W.H., App., p. 95. In D, Syr. Harcl. marg. the quotation also comprises Ps. ii. 5 (cf. Blass in β, and Hilg.); see Wendt (1899), note, p. 241; Belser, p. 69. Wern. omits εν τ. πρ. ψ. altogether; "fort. recte," Blass.

[2] εν ετερῳ, D, Gig., Vulg., Hilg. read ετερως—may have been changed into εν ετερ. διοτι, so ℵAB, R.V., W.H., under influence of Heb. v. 6, but more probably corruption.

first prophecy, ver. 33, would be fulfilled in this way, whilst in vv. 34 and 35 the prophecy would be fulfilled by the resurrection from the dead, ἀνασ. ἐκ νεκρῶν (see Knabenbauer in loco, p. 233 ff.). Wendt argues that Heb. i. 5, where the same prophecy is quoted as in ver. 33, also refers to the raising up as the Messiah, but see on the other hand Westcott, Hebrews, in loco.

Ver. 34. μηκέτι μ. ὑποσ. εἰς διαφθ., cf. Rom. vi. 9, "no more to return to corruption," does not of course mean that Christ had already seen corruption, so that there is no need to understand διαφθ. of the place of corruption, sepulchrum, with Beza, Kuinoel. Hilgenfeld refuses to follow Jüngst, Sorof, Clemen in referring vv. 34-37 to a reviser, for he justly remarks that the speech which was intended to move the Israelites to a recognition of Jesus as the promised Saviour of the seed of David, would have been imperfect, unless it had set forth His sufferings and after-resurrection.—Δώσω κ.τ.λ.: "I will give you the holy and sure blessings of David". This rendering makes the connection with the next verse more evident, cf. Isa. lv. 3, καὶ διαθήσομαι ὑμῖν διαθήκην αἰώνιον τὰ ὅσια Δαυὶδ τὰ πιστά. "By David was understood the Messiah, which yet the Rabbis themselves have well observed:" J. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. (so Schöttgen), in loco. "The everlasting covenant," what was it but the holy and sure blessings promised to David? But these blessings, ὅσια, sancta promissa Davidi data, are connected with the resurrection of Christ because ("διότι not διό, T.R., see critical notes, stating the cause, not the consequence") only in the triumph of God's Holy One (τὸν ὅσιον) are these blessings ratified and assured. Just as Peter (ii. 47), so here Paul applies the passage in Ps. xvi. directly to Christ, Briggs, Messianic Prophecy, p. 151.

Ver. 36. γὰρ: David is contrasted with Christ by St. Paul as by St. Peter, ii. 29.—ἰδίᾳ γενεᾷ ὑπηρ.: "after he had in his own generation served the counsel of God, fell on sleep," R.V., but in margin the rendering of A.V. is practically retained. It seems best to take ἰδίᾳ γενεᾷ as a dative of time, cf. ver. 20, Ephes. iii. 5 (so Blass, Wendt, Zöckler, Felten), and not as dat. commodi. St. Paul's point seems to be (1) the contrast between the service of David which extended only for a generation, and the service of Christ which lasted through all ages permanently. But this contrast would be also marked if we adopt R.V. margin rendering and govern ἰδίᾳ γεν. by ὑπηρ. (see Weiss). (2) The second point of contrast is between the corruption which David saw, and the incorruption of the Holy One of God. Weiss still connects τῇ Θεοῦ βουλῇ with ἐκοιμήθη; see margin (2) in R.V.; but this does not seem so significant as the contrast drawn between David serving the counsel or purpose of God for one, or during one generation, whilst in Christ the eternal purpose of God was realised.—προσετέθη πρὸς τοὺς π. αὐτοῦ: Hebraistic expression, lit., "was added," i.e., in Sheol, cf. Gen. xxvi. 8, Judg. ii. 10, 1 Macc. ii. 69.

διαφθοράν. 37. ὃν δὲ ὁ Θεὸς ἤγειρεν, οὐκ εἶδε διαφθοράν. 38. Γνωστὸν οὖν ἔστω ὑμῖν, ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, ὅτι διὰ τούτου [1] ὑμῖν ἄφεσις ἁμαρτιῶν καταγγέλλεται· 39. καὶ [2] ἀπὸ πάντων ὧν οὐκ ἠδυνήθητε ἐν τῷ νόμῳ Μωσέως δικαιωθῆναι, ἐν τούτῳ πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων δικαιοῦται.

Ver. 37. ἤγειρεν: more than resurrection from the dead, "hic non notatur resuscitatio ex mortuis; quippe quæ ipsa in conclusione evincitur: sed quem Deus suscitavit est Sanctus Dei, ver. 35, ut hæc Subjecti descriptio contineat ætiologiam," Bengel.

Ver. 38. γνωστὸν οὖν: "incipit adhortatio quæ orationem claudit," Blass.—ἄφεσις ἁμαρ.: the keynote of St. Paul's preaching, cf. xxvi. 18, as it had been of St. Peter's, ii. 38, v. 31, x. 43; and as it had been of the preaching of the Baptist, and of our Lord Himself.—διὰ τούτου, i.e., Christ—through Him Who died, and was risen again—the phrase is characteristically Pauline, cf. x. 43.

Ver. 39. So far the words represent the entire harmony between the preaching of St. Peter and St. Paul, and there is no reason to attribute this verse, as also x. 43, with Jüngst, to any reviser; δικαιοῦσθαι ἀπό only elsewhere in Rom. vi. 7. But if St. Paul's next words seem to imply that within certain limits, i.e., so far as it was obeyed, the law of Moses brought justification, they affirm at the same time the utter inefficacy of all legal obedience, since one thing was certain, that the law exacted much more than Israel could obey; complete justification must be found, if anywhere, elsewhere. Can we doubt that St. Paul is here giving us what was really his own experience? (See Briggs, Messiah of the Apostles, p. 76.) In spite of all his efforts to fulfil the law, there was still the feeling that these efforts were hopelessly deficient; there was an area of transgression in which the law, so far from justifying, condemned. But in the Messiah, the Holy One of God, he saw a realisation of that perfect holiness to which in the weakness of the flesh he could not attain, and in Him, Who died, and rose again, for us—that Righteous One, Whom he saw, not only on the road to Damascus, but ever on his right hand by the eye of faith—he found complete and full justification. That this forgiveness of sins is not connected specially with the Death of Christ, but with His Resurrection, or rather with His whole Messianic character, to which the Resurrection put the final seal, is certainly not to be regarded as an indication of a non-Pauline view, cf. Romans iv. 25, viii. 34, 2 Cor. v. 15. Moreover, if we consider the connection of the whole address, the Resurrection is not regarded apart from the Death of Christ: vv. 26-29 show us that the Message of Salvation starts from the Death of Christ, and is based upon that, cf. Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden, p. 54. It is unreasonable to complain that St. Paul's conception of justification in this address falls below his characteristic and controlling idea of it (McGiffert, p. 186). We could not justly expect that the Apostle's utterances, thus summarised by St. Luke, would contain as full and complete a doctrinal exposition as his Galatian and Roman Epistles. To the former Epistle McGiffert points as giving us what Paul actually taught in Galatia; but there is no contradiction between the teaching given us in St. Luke's account of the address in Pisidian Antioch and St. Paul's account of his teaching to his converts in his letter "the coincidences between the two are so striking as to make each the best commentary on the other . . . and there is no such close resemblance between the Epistle and any other of Paul's addresses reported in Acts," Ramsay, Expositor, December, 1898. "Historical Commentary on Gal." see below, and also Lightfoot, on Gal. iii. 11. St. Paul's teaching is essentially the same in the synagogue at Antioch as when he is writing to his Galatian converts: only in Christ is justification, and in the law as such there is no forgiveness of sins. He does not say in so many words that there was no sin from which men could be freed under the law of Moses, but it is evident that the most solemn warning with which the Apostle follows up his declaration could only be justified on the ground that some essential principle was involved in the acceptance or rejection of the work of Christ. On δικαιόω in classical literature, in LXX, and in N.T., see Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, pp. 104, 105, and Sanday and Headlam, Romans, pp. 30, 31.

P. and H., Sah., Boh., Arm., Aeth., Chrys., so Tisch., W.H., Blass, R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. Evidence overwhelming for R.V; the subject of the verbs not being clear the sentence was interpreted wrongly. BE (81) omit παρεκαλουν—B inserting ηξιουν after σαβ., while Chrys. substitutes ηξιουν for παρεκ. W.H., App., p. 95, suspect primitive corruption, probably in opening words, and see Hort's suggestion. μεταξυ—D reads εξης, Hilg. retains; Blass rejects, although he thinks it good as an explanation.

Ver. 40. ἐν τοῖς προφ., cf. Luke xxiv. 44, and Acts xxiv. 14; John vi. 45.—ἐπέλθῃ: quite Lucan in this sense, cf. viii. 24, Luke xi. 22, xxi. 26 (James v. 1).

Ver. 41. Hab. i. 5, but here slightly different from the Hebrew "behold, ye among the nations," in LXX through the possible mistake of reading the Hebrew noun as if = deceitful ones (with the idea perhaps of impudence, shamelessness). On βλέπ. μὴ ἐπέλ. see Burton, pp. 85, 89; Viteau, p. 83 (1893).—ἀφανίσθητε: added by LXX to the "wonder marvellously" of Heb. and LXX: "perish," "vanish away," R.V. margin, an idea involved in Heb. though not expressed: verb frequent in LXX, in N.T. three times, in Matt. vi., and nowhere else except James iv. 14, see Mayor's note, in loco. The Apostle here transfers the prophecies of the temporal judgments following on the Chaldean invasion to the judgment of the nation by the Romans, or to the punishment which would fall upon the Jews by the election of the Gentiles into their place. Perhaps the latter is more probable before his present audience. The πᾶς ὁ πιστ. naturally leads him to the warning for those who disbelieved (ἔργον ᾧ οὐ μὴ πιστεύσητε). It is tempting to regard the words with Ramsay (Expositor, December, 1898), as insisting upon the marvellous and mysterious nature of God's action in the sending forth of His Son, but the context (cf. ἐπέλθῃ) here, and the O.T. prophecy, both point to the imminence of judgment and penalty.—ἐργάζομαι: the present (so in LXX), because the result was so certain that it was regarded as actually in process. With true rhetorical force St. Paul concludes his speech, as at Athens, by an appeal to awaken all consciences, cf. St. Peter's closing words, ii. 36, iii. 26—possibly, as at the close perhaps of St. Stephen's speech, signs of impatience had begun to manifest themselves in his audience (Plumptre).

Ver. 42. ἐξιόντων: "and as they went out," i.e., the Apostles, before the synagogue broke up the congregation of Jews and proselytes besought them—not "when they had gone out," which would introduce a confusion of time; see critical notes. Wendt refers to ver. 15, and takes ἀρχισυ. as the subject of παρεκάλουν.—εἰς τὸ μ. Σ.: "the next Sabbath," A. and R.V., cf. for εἰς iv. 3. μετ. here an adverb, later Greek, cf. Barn., Epist., xiii., 5; Clem. Rom., Cor., i. 44, and so in Josephus; ver. 44 apparently decides for the rendering above. Others take it of the days during the intervening week, between the Sabbaths, cf. J. Lightfoot, in loco, and Schöttgen.

Ver. 43. λυθ. δὲ: Paul and Barnabas

43. λυθείσης δὲ τῆς συναγωγῆς, ἠκολούθησαν πολλοὶ τῶν Ἰουδαίων καὶ τῶν σεβομένων προσηλύτων τῷ Παύλῳ καὶ τῷ Βαρνάβᾳ [1]· οἵτινες προσλαλοῦντες αὐτοῖς, ἔπειθον αὐτοὺς ἐπιμένειν τῇ χάριτι τοῦ Θεοῦ.

[1] Βαρναβᾳ, 137, Syr. Harcl. mg. add αξιουντες βαπτισθηναι, so Blass in β. Belser supports, p. 69, and thinks that it explains context, but if thus important it seems curious that it should have been omitted. At end of verse D, Syr. H. mg., Prov. add εγεν. καθ' ολης της πολεως διελθειν τον λογον (cf. E, Wern.), so Blass in β., and Hilg. επιμενειν, but προσμ. ℵABCDE 61, Chrys., Tisch., W.H., Blass, R.V., Weiss Wendt, Hilg.

D reads only Παυλου; so Blass and Hilg. Belser defends (with addition in previous verse) as marking exactly what the people would be likely to say, p. 69. But as D reads τον λογον του Θ. in previous verse, probably the change may have been made here merely to avoid repetition, Weiss, Codex D, p. 76.

[3] D commences πολυν τε λογον ποιησαμένου περι του κυριου (all this following upon Παυλου at close of previous verse): may be meant to mark that the opposition showed itself after Paul had spoken at length. αντιλ. και DIP 40, Syr. had gone out before the synagogue was formally broken up; δέ marks the contrast in the case of those who followed them to hear more.—τῶν σεβ. προσ.: only here. σεβ. τὸν Θεόν or φοβ. τὸν Θεόν: used elsewhere of the uncircumcised Gentiles who joined the Jewish synagogue, whilst προσήλυτοι means those who became circumcised and were full proselytes: "devout," R.V., referring rather to the outward worship, "religious," A.V., rather to inward feelings (but in ver. 50, "devout," A.V.).—οἵτινες (ix. 35, xi. 28) refers to the Apostles, but see on the other hand Rendall's note, pp. 92, 165, referring it to the people (so apparently Calvin). The Apostles thought by the eager following of the people that the grace of God had found an entrance into their souls, see critical notes for D. —προσλαλοῦντες: in N.T. only elsewhere in xxviii. 20, cf. Wisdom xiii. 17 (Exod. iv. 16, A B³).

Ver. 44. ἐρχ., see critical notes.—σχεδὸν, cf. xix. 26, Heb. ix. 22, each time before πᾶς, and in 2 Macc. v. 2, 3 Macc. v. 14, 45. In classical use as in text, often with πᾶς.—συνήχθη, i.e., in the synagogue, not, as some have thought, before the lodging of the Apostles.

Ver. 45. οἱ Ἰ.: not the proselytes with them (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 101). —τοὺς ὄχλους, cf. ver. 48, τὰ ἔθνη.—ἀντιλ. καὶ, see critical notes; if retained, participle emphasises finite verb: "not only contradicting but blaspheming"; see Simcox, *Language of the N. Ver. 46. παῤῥησιασάμενοι, see on ix. 27.—ἦν ἀναγκαῖον, cf. on ver. 14.—ἐπειδὴ δὲ, see critical notes. δέ marks the contrast, but its omission emphasises it even more vividly and sternly.—ἀπωθεῖσθε: "ye thrust it from you," R.V.; repellitis, Vulgate; only in Luke and

Paul, cf. 1 Tim. i. 19, Rom. xi. 1, Acts vii. 27, 39; frequent in LXX, cf., e.g., Ps. xciii. 14, Ezek. xliii. 9, and 3 Macc. iii. 22, vi. 32, 4 Macc. ii. 16.—οὐκ ἀξίους, cf. Matt. xxii. 8.

Ver. 47. γὰρ: this action of the Apostles in turning to the Gentiles was not arbitrary.—Τέθεικα, cf. Isa. xlix. 6 (Luke ii. 32). In LXX B reads δέδωκα instead of Τέθ., and inserts after it εἰς διαθήκην γένους; not in Hebrew.—σε really refers to the Servant of the Lord, the Messiah; cf. Delitzsch, Das Buch Jesaia, p. 486, fourth edition; but the Apostles speak of an ἐντολή given to them, because through them the Messiah is proclaimed to the Gentiles; see note on i. 8.

Ver. 48. ἐδόξ. τὸν λ. τοῦ K.: δοξ. τὸν Θ.; frequent in Luke and Paul, cf. 2 Thess. iii. 1 for the nearest approach to the exact phrase here. — ὅσοι ἦσαν τεταγ.: there is no countenance here for the absolutum decretum of the Calvinists, since ver. 46 had already shown that the Jews had acted through their own choice. The words are really nothing more than a corollary of St. Paul's ἀναγκαῖον: the Jews as a nation had been ordained to eternal life—they had rejected this election—but those who believed amongst the Gentiles were equally ordained by God to eternal life, and it was in accordance with His divine appointment that the Apostles had turned to them. Some take the word as if middle, not passive: "as many as had set themselves unto eternal life," and in support of this Rendall refers to 1 Cor. xvi. 15, ἔταξαν ἑαυτοὺς (see also Blass, in loco). The rendering here given by Rendall may be adopted without pressing the military metaphor in the verb, as has sometimes been done; see Wendt's note, p. 308 (1888). St. Chrysostom takes the expression (rightly as Wendt thinks): ἀφωρισμένοι τῷ Θεῷ. Mr. Page's note, in loco, should be consulted.

Ver. 49. διεφέρετο; divulgabatur, "was spread abroad," R.V.; not only by the preaching of the Apostles themselves, but by small knots of Christians in other towns, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 105, and so Blass, in loco; only here in N.T. in this sense, so in (Wisdom xviii. 10) Plut.; Lucian; imperfect, a certain lapse of time is implied, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 105.—ὅλης τῆς χώρας: the phrase, "the whole Region," indicates that Antioch was the centre of a Region, a notice which introduces us to an important fact of Roman imperial administration. Antioch, as a Roman colony, would be the natural military and administrative centre of a certain Regio, and there is evidence that in Southern Galatia there were also other distinct Regiones, χῶραι, Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 102-104, 109, 110-112.

Ver. 50. παρώτρυναν: "urged on," R.V.; only here in N.T., not in LXX or Apocrypha; so in Pind., Lucian, and so too in Josephus, Ant., vii., 6, 1, καὶ ἐξέβαλον αὐτοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν ὁρίων αὐτῶν. 51. οἱ δὲ ἐκτιναξάμενοι τὸν κονιορτὸν τῶν ποδῶν αὐτῶν ἐπ᾽ αὐτούς, ἦλθον [1] εἰς Ἰκόνιον. 52. οἱ δὲ μαθηταὶ ἐπληροῦντο χαρᾶς καὶ Πνεύματος Ἁγίου.

XIV. 1. ἘΓΕΝΕΤΟ δὲ ἐν Ἰκονίῳ, κατὰ τὸ αὐτὸ εἰσελθεῖν αὐτοὺς εἰς τὴν συναγωγὴν τῶν Ἰουδαίων, καὶ λαλῆσαι οὕτως ὥστε πιστεῦσαι and also in Hippocrates and Aretaeus.—ἐπήγειραν, cf. xiv. 2; nowhere else in N.T., several times in LXX, and also frequently in Hippocrates and Galen, Hobart, pp. 225, 226. On the addition in Codex D see critical notes, and Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 105, 106.—τὰς εὐσχ.: "of honourable estate," R.V.; not of character, but of position, cf. Mark xv. 43. This influence assigned to women at Antioch, and exerted by them, is quite in accordance with the manners of the country, and we find evidence of it in all periods and under most varying conditions. Thus women were appointed under the empire as magistrates, as presidents of the games, and even the Jews elected a woman as an Archisynagogos, at least in one instance, at Smyrna, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 102; Church in the Roman Empire, p. 67; C. and H., p. 144; "Antioch," Hastings' B.D.; Loening, Die Gemeindeverfassung des Urchristenthums, p. 15.—τοὺς πρώτους: perhaps approaching them through their wives. On the addiction of women to the Jewish religion cf. Jos., B. J., ii., 20, 2; Strabo, vii., 2; Juvenal, vi., 542; see Blass, Felten, Plumptre, in loco, and instances in Wetstein.—ἐξέβαλον αὐτοὺς, see xiv. 21.

Ver. 51. ἐκτιναξάμενοι, cf. Matt. x. 14, Luke x. 11, Mark vi. 11. The symbolic act would be understood by the Jews as an intimation that all further intercourse was at an end. There is no reason to see in the words a late addition by the author of Acts to the source; the disciples mentioned in ver. 52 need not have been Jews at all, but Gentiles, and in xiv. 21 nothing is said of any intercourse except with those who were already disciples.—Ἰκόνιον, see on xiv. 1.

Ver. 52. χαρᾶς, cf. 1 Thess. i. 6, Rom. xiv. 17, 2 Tim. i. 4.

CHAPTER XIV.—Ver. 1. ἐν Ἰκονίῳ (Konia), sometimes regarded as a Roman colony towards the end of the reign of Claudius, thus dignified on account of the title conferred upon the frontier town, Claudio-Derbe. But Hadrian, not Claudius, constituted it a colony. In ver. 6 the Apostles flee from Iconium to the cities of Lycaonia, Lystra and Derbe, and the inference from this statement is that Iconium was not itself Lycaonian. But this inference justifies the local accuracy of the historian, as it would appear that the people of Iconium regarded themselves as Phrygian even after Iconium had been united with Lycaonia in one district of Roman administration: cf. Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 37 ff., and the testimony of the Christian Hierax, 163 A.D., before his Roman judge: "I have come hither (i.e., as a slave), torn away from Iconium of Phrygia": on the road travelled by the Apostles see also Ramsay, u. s., p. 27 ff. Strictly speaking, Lystra and Derbe were cities of Lycaonia-Galatica, while Iconium reckoned itself as a city of Phrygia-Galatica, all three being comprised within the Roman province of Galatia. See also Rendall, Acts, p. 262. On the place and its importance, situated with a busy trade on the principal lines of communication through Asia Minor, see C. and H., smaller edition, p. 145, B.D.². Iconium is the scene of the famous Acts of Paul and Thekla, forming a part of the Acts of Paul, C. Schmidt's translation of which we must await with interest. See Harnack, Chronol., i., p. 493, Wendt (1899), p. 42, Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 375, and "Iconium," Hastings' B.D.—κατὰ τὸ αὐτὸ, "together," so R. and A.V., cf. LXX, 1 Sam. xi. 11, or it may mean "at the same time". Blass however (so Ramsay, Weiss, Rendall) renders "after the same fashion," i.e., as at Antioch. But for this meaning cf. xvii. 2, where a different phrase is used.—Ἑλλήνων: on the whole best taken as referring to the σεβ. or φοβ. τὸν Θεόν, because in ver. 2 we have ἔθνη, which would signify the Gentiles generally, as opposed to those devout persons who as proselytes had joined the Jewish synagogue.

Ver. 2. ἀπειθοῦντες, see critical notes. If we read ἀπειθήσαντες, "that were disobedient," R.V., but cf. John iii. 36, and Page's note in loco. Lumby quotes

Ἰουδαίων τε καὶ Ἑλλήνων πολὺ πλῆθος. 2. οἱ δὲ ἀπειθοῦντες[1] Ἰουδαῖοι ἐπήγειραν καὶ ἐκάκωσαν τὰς ψυχὰς τῶν ἐθνῶν κατὰ τῶν ἀδελφῶν. 3. ἱκανὸν μὲν οὖν χρόνον διέτριψαν παῤῥησιαζόμενοι ἐπὶ

[1] απειθουντες, but aor. απειθησαντες ℵABC 13, 61, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. D, Syr. Harcl. mg., cf. Blass in β, and Hilg., read οι δε αρχισυναγωγοι των Ιουδαιων και οι αρχοντες της συναγωγης (τ. σ. om. by Syr. H.), and for επηγειραν DE, Gig., Wern., Syr. H. read επηγαγον (αυτοις om. by Syr. H.) διωγμον κατα των δικαιων. These readings may have arisen from the seeming inconsequence of vv. 1-3 as they stand in the ordinary text. We read of the opposition of the Jews, and yet the Apostles abode a long time, etc. Ramsay therefore maintains that there is some corruption, and is prepared to follow Spitta in omitting ver. 3 (although for a different reason). But as the text stands it is quite possible to suppose that the effect of the preaching in the synagogue would be twofold, ver. 2 thus answering to the last clause of ver. 1, and that the disciples continued to speak boldly, encouraged by success on the one hand and undeterred by opposition on the other, the consequence being that the division in the city was still further intensified. Ramsay sees in the reading at the commencement of the verse which marks the distinction between αρχοντες and αρχισυναγωγοι a proof that the Bezan reading here cannot be an original first century one, although in its carefulness to enumerate the different classes of Jews it may embody an actual popular tradition (see his article on "The Rulers of the Synagogue," Expositor, April, 1895, and compare C. R. E., p. 46). On κατα των δικαιων see also Ramsay, C. R. E., p. 46; δικαιοι is not used by Luke of Christians, rather αγιοι or αδελφοι. At the end of the verse D(E), Gig., Par., Wern., Syr. H. mg. add ὁ δε κυριος εδωκεν ταχυ ειρηνην, which seem introduced to make an easy transition from ver. 2 to ver. 3, a second tumult being referred to in ver. 5; see crit. notes. Cf. εκ δευτερου, Blass in β. See further Weiss, Codex D, p. 77; Wendt (1899), pp. 247, 248; Harris, Four Lectures, etc., pp. 23, 69; and for decided support of β, Belser, p. 70 ff.; Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., i., pp. 52, 53, 1896, and Acta Apost., p. 245, 1899; and especially Blass, Philology of the Gospels, pp. 121, 127; Zöckler, Greifswalder Studien, p. 135; see also Salmon, Introd., p. 598; but on the other hand Schmiedel, Encycl. Bibl., i., p. 53.

Baruch i. 19, and regards the expression here as stronger than "unbelieving," rather unbelief breaking forth into rebellion, as in the case of these Jews at Iconium and elsewhere. Ramsay renders "the disaffected".—ἐκάκωσαν: "exasperated," Ramsay; only here in N.T. in this sense, five times in Acts, once in quotation; only once elsewhere in N.T., 1 Pet. iii. 13, cf. for its use here Jos., Ant., xvi., 1, 2; vii., 3; viii., 6. It is used several times in LXX, but not in this sense, the nearest approach to it is Ps. cv. (LXX) 32. The same phrase occurs twice, Num. xxix. 7, xxx. 14, but with a different meaning or reading in D. See critical notes.

Ver. 3. ἱκανὸν μὲν οὖν χ. οὖν: as a result from the two previous verses, the accession to their numbers and the disaffection. Blass sees in the aorists ἐπήγ. and ἐκάκ. a proof that the disaffected Jews succeeded in their attempts, and he asks if this was so, how were the Apostles able to remain? The answer is to be found, he thinks, in D, see above, so Hilgenfeld, who holds that this reading makes it conceivable how Paul and Barnabas could continue their work. On ἱκανός with χρόνος, peculiar to St. Luke, see p. 215. Ramsay sees the same force in the aorists, and therefore ver. 3 seems so disconnected that he can only regard it as an early gloss similar to many which have crept into the Bezan text. He thus inclines to adopt here Spitta's hypothesis, and to regard vv. 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7 as a primitive document. The Bezan text is to him simply an attempt to remedy the discrepancy which was felt to exist between vv. 2 and 3, and it presupposes two tumults: one in ver. 2, and the other in vv. 4 and 5. But there seems nothing unnatural in taking οὖν as marking a result from the events of the two previous verses, not from the second alone, or in the extended stay of the Apostles in the divided city. (Wendt (1899) supposes that in the original source ver. 3 preceded ver. 2, which makes the sequence quite easy. Clemen is much more drastic in his methods, and refers ver. 2 and vv. 4-6a to his Redactor Antijudaicus.)—παῤῥησ.: speaking boldly in spite of the opposition of the Jews, see above on the verb, p. 242.—ἐπὶ, cf. iv. 17, 18 (elsewhere with ἐν), the Lord being the ground and support of their preaching; Calvin notes that the words may mean that they spoke boldly in the cause of the Lord, or that relying on His grace they took courage, but that both meanings really run into each other.—τῷ Κυρίῳ: difficult to decide whether the reference is to Jesus; Nösgen takes it so, not only on account of St. Luke's usual way of giving Him this title, but also because the Acts speak expressly of the miracles of the Apostles as works of Christ, iii. 16, cf. iv. 30. On the other hand Meyer-Wendt appeals to iv. 29, xx. 24, 32 (but for last passage see var. lect.), Heb. ii. 4.

[1] Wendt (1899), p. 248, maintains that ver. 3 preceded ver. 2 in the source, thus simplifying, as he thinks, the order of thought. τῳ λογῳ, in ℵA, Syr. Pesh. επι precedes, so Tisch., Wendt, and Weiss; cf. Heb. xi. 4, but prep. om. by ℵcBCDELP, Chrys., so W.H., Blass, Hilg. και διδ., om. και ABDEP, Chrys., so W.H., Blass, R.V., Wendt, Weiss, Hilg.; διδοντος so ℵ 4, 21, 133, Tisch.

[2] εσχισθη, D, Syr. Pesh. ην εσχισμενον, and for οι δε D reads αλλοι δε, so Hilg.; Harris regards these as cases of Latinisation, so Corssen, p. 43. At end of verse, D, Syr. Harcl. mg. add κολλωμενοι δια τον λογον του Θεου (so Blass in β and so Hilg.), the verb is Lucan, but we cannot say that it is original.

[3] Syr. Harcl. mg. has "et iterum excitaverunt persecutionem secundo Judæi cum Gentibus et lapidantes eos eduxerunt eos ex civitate," so Blass in β; cf. also Ephrem; Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 23. Hilg. follows T.R. Harris also quotes "et iniuriaverunt et lapidaverunt eos," d, which he suspects to be more archaic than its Greek. It is difficult to see how this can agree with συνιδοντες in the next verse, which could not be used of an assault actually committed, but Syr. Harcl. omits συνιδ.

Ver. 4. ἐσχίσθη δὲ, better "and the multitude" (see Page's note on ver. 3), cf. xxiii. 7, John vii. 43. There is no such marked success in ver. 3 as in Ramsay's view. In Thessalonica, xvii. 4, 5, a similar division, cf. Luke xii. 51.—ἀποστόλοις: the note of Weiss here takes the word, not in its technical sense at all, but only as missionaries; but see above on xiii. 1.

Ver. 5. The real contrast is marked in this verse, ὡς δὲ ἐγέν. Hitherto the evil results indicated in ver. 2 had not resulted in an open combination of Jews and Gentiles to injure Paul and Barnabas, but now the Jews and their rulers were prepared to act in concert with the Gentiles, so that the opposition assumed a public shape, and a definite accusation of blasphemy could be formulated against the Apostles.—ὁρμὴ, "onset," R.V.; "assault," A.V., but neither word seems appropriate, since neither onset nor assault actually occurred. It seems therefore better to take the word as expressing the inclination, or hostile intention, or instigation, and to connect it with the infinitives. In classical Greek the word is used of eagerness (joined with ἐπιθυμία), of impulse, of eager desire of, or for, a thing, cf. Thuc. iv. 4, Plat., Phil., 35 D, although it is also used of an assault or attack. The only other place in the N.T. in which it occurs is James iii. 4 (R.V. renders "impulse"). Hesychius regards it as equivalent to βουλή, ἐπιθυμία, but see also for its use as expressing attack, violence, 3 Macc. i. 16, 23; iv. 5.—σὺν τοῖς ἄρχουσιν αὐτῶν, i.e., of the Jewish synagogues, as αὐτῶν shows. Hackett and Lumby take it of the heathen magistrates. On the distinction between these and the ἀρχισυνάγωγος, see Schürer, div. ii., vol. ii., pp. 64, 250, E.T. The magistrates of the city could not have participated in an act of mob-violence, and the plot to stone the Apostles seems to point to Jewish instigation for enforcing the punishment of blasphemy.—ὑβρίσαι, "to entreat them shamefully," so A. and R.V., indicating outrage, insolence in act, cf. Matt. xxii. 6, Luke xviii. 32, 2 Macc. xiv. 42, 3 Macc. vi. 9; in Luke xi. 45 of insulting words. St. Paul uses the same word of treatment at Philippi, 1 Thess. ii. 2, and he describes his own conduct towards the Christians by the cognate noun ὑβριστής, 1 Tim. i. 13.

[1] Syr. Harcl. mg. (cf. Flor.) reads "et fugientes pervenerunt in Lycaoniam, in civitatem quandam, quæ vocatur Lystra, et Derben," so Blass in β; in civit. quandam does not sound Lucan. After περιχωρον DE (Flor., Vulg.) add ολην, so Blass and Hilg., but see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 113.

[2] At end of verse D(E), Flor., Wern., Prov. add εκινηθη ολον το πληθος επι τη διδαχη, and also apparently by way of transition to the following narrative ὁ δε Π. και Β. διετριβον εν Λυστροις, so Blass and Hilg., but see Ramsay, u. s., and Weiss, Codex D, p. 78. E has εξεπλησσετο πασα ἡ πολυπληθεια επι τη διδαχη αυτων, and Harris thinks that the gloss arose in Latin and points out the closeness of d and e here (see also Blass, Proleg., p. 28). But it has been pointed out that the Latin of d and Flor. also differ.

Ver. 6. συνιδόντες, cf. xii. 12, v. 2, only in Luke and Paul, 1 Cor. iv. 4; 1 Macc. iv. 21; 2 Macc. iv. 41, xiv. 26, 30; 3 Macc. v. 50.—κατέφυγον, cf. Matt. x. 23: "We ought not to run into danger, but to flee from it if needful, like these leaders of the Church wishing to extend their preaching, and to multiply by persecution" Oecumenius; only elsewhere in N.T., Heb. vi. 18; see Westcott, l.c., cf. Deut. iv. 42, Numb. xxxv. 26; 1 Macc. v. 11, etc. So in classical Greek with εἰς, ἐπί, πρός.—εἰς τὰς πόλεις τῆς Λ. Λύστραν καὶ Δέρβην, καὶ τὴν περίχωρον: in these words Ramsay sees a notable indication of St. Luke's habit of defining each new sphere of work according to the existing political divisions of the Roman Empire: "Lystra and Derbe and the surrounding Region"; in going from Antioch to Iconium the travellers entered no new Region (χώρα), but in ver. 6 another Region is referred to, comprising part of Lycaonia, consisting of two cities and a stretch of cityless territory; and if this is so, we see also in the words an indication of St. Paul's constant aim in his missionary efforts, viz., the Roman world and its centres of life and commerce; when he reached the limit of Roman territory (Derbe) he retraced his steps. The position of Lystra, about six hours south-south-west from Iconium, near the village Khatyn Serai, is now considered as established by Professor Sterrett's evidence based on an inscription; and from similar evidence of inscriptions it appears that Lystra had been a Roman colonia since Augustus, Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 47 ff., and Wendt (1899), p. 248; O. Holtzmann, Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, p. 102. The site of Derbe cannot be quite so satisfactorily determined, but probably near the village Losta or Zosta; about three miles north-west of this place, a large mound, by name Gudelissin, is marked by evident traces of the remains of a city, "Derbe," Hastings' B.D.; Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 54 ff., and Wendt (1899), p. 249. From 41-72 A.D. Derbe was the frontier city of the Roman province on the south-east. But if St. Paul thus found in Lystra and Derbe centres of Roman commercial life, we must modify our view of the wild and uncivilised nature of the region into which the Apostles penetrated after leaving Antioch and Iconium, cf. C. and H., p. 147, with Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 56, 57. If Paul had gone to the ruder parts of Lycaonia, it is very doubtful whether the inhabitants could have understood him, or any one addressing them in Greek (see also Rendall, Acts, p. 263).

Ver. 7. See critical notes for reading in D.—κἀκεῖ; found in four other places in Acts, but not at all in Luke's Gospel.—εὐαγγελ. ἦσαν: "they were engaged in preaching the Gospel," Ramsay; on participle with ἦν or ἦσαν see i. 10.

Ver. 8. ἐν Λύστροις: here neuter plural, and not as in vv. 6 and 21, feminine. Clemen, p. 115, and Jüngst, p. 131, see a proof in this that 8-18, or 21a, was interpolated by a redactor. But Hilgenfeld points out that the same interchange of feminine singular and neuter plural recurs in xvi. 1, 2; cf. also 2 Tim. iii. 11. The miracle which follows has often been compared with those narrated in iii. 1 ff., and it has been alleged that this second miracle is a mere imitation of the first, to

[1] εν Λυστροις, D omits (so Hilg. and Blass in β, where he reads και (εκει))—attractive, although probably due to the previous interpolation, because it would do away with the perplexity of the two readings εν Λ. αδυν. (so Weiss) and αδυν. εν Λ. (W.H.).

[2] εκ κ. μητρος Blass thinks out of iii. 2, so apparently Wendt—χωλος om. D, Gig., but see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 114.

[3] περιεπεπατηκει, but περιεπατησεν ℵABC 61, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, R.V., Blass. At end of verse Flor. reads υπαρχων εν φοβῳ του θεου, so Blass in β; D omits του θεου and puts the clause after λαλουντος in ver. 9; so Hilg. υπαρχ. omitted above, where it seems clearly an interpolation in T.R. out of iii. 2. According to Flor. the man would be a proselyte, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 116, Hilgenfeld, Blass; but Weiss, Codex D, p. 78, regards the reading in Flor. as quite secondary, and it is to be noticed that D omits entirely the words του θεου after φοβῳ.

[4] ηκουε BCP, Sah., Syr. Harcl., so W.H., R.V., Blass, Wendt, Weiss; ηκουσεν ℵADEHL 13, 61, Syr. Pesh., Boh., Arm., Æth., Chrys., so Tisch. Flor. adds "libenter," and Gig. adds επιστευσεν, so Blass in β.

keep up the parallel between Peter and Paul. But whilst there are, no doubt, features in common in the two narratives—no great matter for surprise in similar healings, where a similarity of expressions would fitly recur, especially in the literary usage of a medical writer (see Zöckler, p. 240)—the differences are also marked: e.g., in the Petrine miracle the man is a beggar, and asks only for alms; in the Pauline nothing is said of all this, even if the first fact is implied—in the Petrine miracle nothing is said of the man's faith, although it is implied (see notes, in loco); here it is distinctly stated—in the earlier miracle Peter is represented as taking the man and raising him up; here nothing of the kind is mentioned (see further on the two miracles, and the different motive in their performance, Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, p. 267). On St. Paul's own claim to work miracles see 2 Cor. xii. 12, Rom. xv. 19, Gal. iii. 5. If the latter passage occurs in an Epistle addressed amongst other Churches to Christians in Lystra, in accordance with the South Galatian theory, the assertion of miraculous powers is the more notable; see also McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 189.—ἀδύν. τοῖς π.: adjective only here in N.T. in this sense, cf. LXX, S. Tobit ii. 10, v. 9, ἀδύν. τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς. It is used frequently in a similar sense by medical writers, Hobart, p. 46.—ἐκάθητο; not "dwelt" Hebraistic; but simply "used to sit," cf. Luke xviii. 35, John ix. 8; probably in the forum, cf. ver. 11 (Blass).—ἐκ κοιλ. μητρὸς α.; "no mendicant pretender, but one whose history from infancy was well known". See Ramsay on the "triple beat," St. Paul, p. 115.

Ver. 9. οὗτος; a genuine Lucan mark of connection, Friedrich, p. 10.—ἤκουε; "used to hear," or "was listening to," i.e., was an habitual hearer of Paul's preaching, see critical notes on D. Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 114, 116, regards the man as a proselyte, cf. additions in Bezan text, but for another view of the additions here and in ver. 10, Page, Classical Review, July, 1899.—ἀτεν., see above, i. 10.—τοῦ σ., Burton, Moods and Tenses, p. 158.

Ver. 10. ἀνάσ. . . . ὀρθός: verb, as elsewhere, ix. 34, 40, but only here with ἐπὶ τοὺς π., hitherto they had been too weak to support him, ὀρθός signifying that he was entirely whole, cf. reading in D. On ὀρθός see Hobart, p. 46: it was frequently used by medical writers, so by Hippocrates and Galen, with ἵστημι; only elsewhere in N.T. in a figurative sense and in a quotation, Heb. xi. 13. The collocation is also found in classical Greek, and cf. 1 Esdras ix. 46 (see also Hatch and Redpath), but cf. also ἀνορθόω, Luke xiii. 13, and the combination in Galen of ὀρθόω and τὸ ἀδύνατον κῶλον.—ἥλλετο καὶ περιεπ., see also reading in D. If we read ἥλατο, note aorist and imperfect, he sprang up with a single bound, whilst the walking is a continuous action, or inceptive: "he began to walk".

ἐπὶ τοὺς πόδας σου ὀρθός. καὶ ἥλλετο[1] καὶ περιεπάτει. 11. Οἱ δὲ ὄχλοι ἰδόντες ὃ ἐποίησεν ὁ Παῦλος, ἐπῆραν τὴν φωνὴν αὐτῶν Λυκαονιστὶ λέγοντες, Οἱ θεοὶ ὁμοιωθέντες ἀνθρώποις κατέβησαν πρὸς ἡμᾶς· 12. ἐκάλουν τε τὸν μὲν Βαρνάβαν, Δία[2]· τὸν δὲ Παῦλον,

[1] ηλλετο, but ηλατο ℵABC 61, Vulg., Sah., Boh., Chrys., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Wendt, Weiss. D, Syr. H. mg. (Flor.), Hilg. have και ευθεως παραχρημα ανηλατο, so Vulg., Gig. ανηλ. for ηλ. (εξηλ. E).

[2] Δια ℵABCP, Syr. H. mg., so Weiss, W.H., Blass in β; Διαν DEHLP[2] 15, 40, 61, so Hilg.; cf. Grimm-Thayer and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 89.

Ver. 11. ἐπῆραν τὴν φ. αὐτῶν: aorist; lifted up their voices with a sudden outburst, and then went on to devise names for the two: ἐκάλουν, "were for calling," imperfect; cf. Luke i. 54 (Rendall). The phrase here only found in ii. 14, xxii. 22 and Luke xi. 27; Friedrich, p. 29, cf. LXX, Judg. ix. 7; phrase also found in classical Greek.—οἱ ὄχλοι: the common city mob; the crowd, who would speak in their own native tongue. The Apostles had evidently spoken in Greek, which the native Lycaonians would understand and speak, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 57. But in moments of excitement their native tongue would rise more naturally to their lips, and they would give expression to their old superstitious beliefs, see Church in the Roman Empire, p. 58, and Wendt (1888), p. 313.—Λυκαονιστὶ: specially mentioned not only on account of its naturalness here (see above) but also because, as St. Chrysostom noted, this mention of the fact would explain why Paul and Barnabas made no protest. Bethge's objection that ὁμοιοπαθεῖς (ver. 15) shows that St. Paul understood the words of ver. 11 is no answer, because the preparations for the sacrifice, rather than the words of the people, enabled the Apostles to understand the bearings of the scene. On the speech of L. see Conder, Palestine Explor. Fund, October, 1888.—Οἱ θεοὶ κ.τ.λ.: the knowledge of the story of Baucis and Philemon, according to which Jupiter and Mercury visited in human form the neighbouring district, Ovid, Met., viii., 611 ff., would render such words quite natural (cf. Fasti, v., 495, and Dio Chrys., Orat., xxxiii., p. 408). Baur, Zeller, and Overbeck, followed by Wendt, object that the people would not have thought of such high gods, but rather of magicians or demons, and the latter evidently thinks that St. Luke has coloured the narrative by introducing into it the form which in his opinion the adoration of the Apostles would assume; but the same narrative emphasises the fact that the miracle was a notable one, and we can scarcely limit the bounds of excitement on the part of a superstitious people who were wont to make their pilgrimages to the spot where Jupiter and Mercury conversed with men. At Malta a similar result follows from the miracle of Paul, and heathen mythology was full of narratives of the appearances of high gods, which were by no means strange to N.T. times (see Holtzmann's note, Hand-Commentar, p. 378). Moreover, the people, rude as they were, might easily have seen that Paul and Barnabas were not altogether like the common magicians of the day. The main incident, McGiffert admits, was entirely natural under the circumstances, and is too striking and unique to have been invented, Apostolic Age, pp. 188, 189.

Ver. 12. ἐκάλουν, see above on ver. 11.—τὸν μὲν Β. Δία· τὸν δὲ Π. Ἑρμῆν. The relative estimate of the Lycaonians was strikingly in accordance with Oriental notions—Barnabas, the more silent and passive, is identified with Jupiter; and Paul, the more active, with Mercury. Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 57; St. Paul, pp. 84, 85; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 189. With the reason given for the identification of Paul with Mercury, cf. Iamblichus, De Myst. Ægypt., i., where Mercury is designated as Θεὸς ὁ τῶν λόγων ἡγεμών (see also Wetstein). The comparison could not have been because of the Apostle's insignificant appearance (although the fact that he was the younger of the two men may be taken into account), since Hermes is always represented as of a graceful well-formed figure. On the traditional accounts of Paul's personal appearances see Wendt (1888), in loco, Blass, Renan, and Plumptre, Acts (Excursus, pp. 191, 192). It is of interest to note that in Gal. iv. 14 Paul writes to

Ἑρμῆν, ἐπειδὴ αὐτὸς ἦν ὁ ἡγούμενος τοῦ λόγου.[1] 13. ὁ δὲ ἱερεὺς τοῦ Διὸς τοῦ ὄντος πρὸ τῆς πόλεως[2] αὐτῶν, ταύρους καὶ στέμματα

[1] Flor. om. επειδη αυτος . . . του λ., and Blass brackets, comparing xvii. 18, xviii. 3, where some Western authorities omit explanatory clause. Ramsay also rejects clause, St. Paul, p. 117, but Hilg. retains. It is quite possible that in these cases the Western reading may be original, and the explanation may have been added later.

[2] D reads του οντος Διος προ πολεως (Blass accepts, so Hilg., adding της before πολ.), and D, Gig. read οι ιερεις, so Hilg. (Blass rejects), so D reads επιθυειν, so Hilg. (not Blass). Ramsay, C. R. E., p. 51, and St. Paul, p. 118, defends all these readings as indications of local accuracy; see notes. Perhaps he forces too much his rendering of επιθυειν.

the Galatians: "Ye received me as a messenger of God," Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 117.

Ver. 13. ὁ δὲ ἱερεὺς. Plural in D; strongly rejected by Blass, with other details. Ramsay defends D (p. 118), and points out that at each of the great temples in Asia Minor a college of priests would be in regular service: see also Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 52, 53.—τοῦ Διὸς τοῦ ὄντος πρὸ τῆς π. αὐτῶν, see critical notes. R.V., omitting αὐτῶν, renders "whose temple was before the city," i.e., enshrined in the temple outside the gate as the protecting deity. Zöckler, with Ramsay, compares "Ζεὺς Προάστιος" on an inscription at Claudiopolis, cf. also παρὰ Διΐ (=ad fanum Jovis), παρ᾽ Ἥρῃ, and modern, the name of a church in Rome, "S. Paolo fuori le mura" (see also Holtzmann and Wendt). Here again the reading of D seems to bring out the technical force of the phrase more accurately, τοῦ ὄντος Δ. πρὸ πόλεως (so Blass in β)—possibly = Προπόλεως (cf. an unpublished inscription of Smyrna with the phrase ἱέρεια πρὸ πόλεως or Προπόλεως). In this phrase, as read in D, the force of the participle is retained in a way characteristic of Acts, as almost = τοῦ ὀνομαζομένου: see on xiii. 1, a characteristic lost by the transposition of ὄντος; see on the whole question Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 51 ff., and also on the possible site of the temple. The words cannot refer to the statue of Jupiter (so lately Rendall), to which no priests would be attached. See Blass in Studien u. Kritiken, 1900, p. 27, n. 1.—ταύρους καὶ στέμματα: brought by the ministri who would be included in the generic term priests. On the sacrifice of a bull to Jupiter, Ovid, Met., iv., 755, as also to Mercury, Persius, Sat., ii., 44. On the garlands to wreathe and adorn the victims, Æneid, v., 366; Eur., Heracl., 529, perhaps also for the priests and the altars, the doors, and the attendants; see instances in Wetstein, and cf. Tertullian, De Corona, x. The words do not refer to the Apostles; the aim seems to be indicated in ἤθελε θύειν.—ἐπὶ τοὺς πυλῶνας: some see a reference to the gates of the city, mainly because of the collocation τοῦ ὄντος πρὸ τῆς Π. Blass supposes that the priest came from the temple outside to the city gates, but in that case Ramsay urges that Lucan usage would = πύλη rather than πυλών, cf. ix. 24, xvi. 13. Others take it of the gates of the temple in front of which the altar stood, cf. οἱ μὲν ἱεροὶ τοῦ νεὼ πυλῶνες, Plut., Tim., xii. Ramsay suggests that the priests probably prepared their sacrifices at the outer gateway of the temple grounds, as something beyond the usual ritual, and so not to be performed at one of the usual places, cf. ἐπιθύειν D; St. Paul, p. 119. Others again refer the words to the gates leading into the atrium or courtyard of the house in which the Apostles were lodging, partly on the ground that the word ἐξεπήδησαν is best referred to the house (cf. Judith xiv. 17, and Susannah, ver. 39). But the verb may mean that they ran hastily out of the city to the temple, and there mingled with the crowd: in 2 Macc. iii. 18 the same verb is used of a general rush of the people to the temple for supplication to heaven.—ἤθελε θύειν: What was his motive? Was he acting in good faith, or out of complaisant regard to the wishes of the multitude (Ewald), or for the sake of gain? On the attitude of the native priests see Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 144. In the present instance it would appear that they had known of the Apostles' preaching for some time at all events, and also, it may be, of its success, cf. D., xiv. 7, critical notes, and apparently they were willing to honour the Apostles with divine honours, and to turn the religious revival to their own ends.

[1] οι αποστολοι om. D, Flor., Gig., Syr. Pesh., Blass "recte". Weiss thinks om. caused because offence was taken at the extension of the title to Barnabas. In ver. 4 Barnabas is not expressly mentioned, while here he is not only mentioned by name but placed first.

[2] εισεπηδησαν, but εξεπ. ℵABCDE 13, 61, Chrys., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.

[3] επι τον Θεον τον ζωντα ℵcABCD²E 13, 40, 61, Ath., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; cf. Blass, Gram., p. 144. D has ευαγγ. υμιν τον Θεον (so Iren.), and again επι τον Θεον ζωντα τον ποιησαντα, thus reading τον Θεον in both places (whilst Blass in β and Hilg. follow Flor. in omitting τον Θεον the second time). Ramsay however also retains the words in both places, as "the God" was the title under which the supreme God was worshipped in Asia Minor, St. Paul, p. 118.

Ver. 14. ἀκούσ.: how, we are not told; whether, as Blass supposes, they had returned to their lodgings, and hurried forth to the city gates when they heard what was going on, or whether, later in the day, they hurried from the city to the temple when they heard of the approaching sacrifice, we do not know, and a better knowledge of the localities would no doubt make many points clearer. The crowd who had seen the miracle, ver. 11, would naturally be eager to follow the priest to the sacrifice, σὺν τοῖς ὄχλοις, ver. 13.—διαῤῥήξαντες: in token of distress and horror, cf. Gen. xxxvii. 29, 34; Josh. vii. 6; Matt. xxvi. 65; frequently in LXX, and several times in 1 Macc.—εἰσεπήδησαν: xvi. 29, see critical notes.

Ver. 15. ἄνδρες: brief address in accordance with the hurry of the moment. —ὁμοιοπαθεῖς, James v. 17, "of like passions," so R.V. in both passages, but 'nature' in margin, so Ramsay. But to others the latter word seems too general, and they explain it as meaning equally capable of passion or feeling, as opposed to the ἀπάθεια of the idols; or, equally prone to human weakness, and not all-powerful as the people seemed to infer from the miracle (Bethge); whilst others again take it as meaning ὁμοίως θνητός (so Blass). On its meaning in Wisdom vii. 3 see Grimm, sub v., and Speaker's Commentary. In 4 Macc. xii. 13 it is also used to mark the atrocious nature of persecution inflicted by one who, a man himself, was not ashamed τοὺς ὁμοιοπαθεῖς γλωττοτομῆσαι: cf. its use in medical writers and in classical Greek (Wetstein); by the Fathers it was used of our Lord Himself, Euseb., H. E., i., 2, cf. Heb. iv. 15 (see Mayor on James v. 17).—εὐαγγελιζ.: we preach not ourselves—Paul was a "messenger of God" in a higher sense than the people conceived; on the construction see above p. 210 and Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 79. For reading in D see critical note = bringing you glad tidings of "the God"—in Asia Minor a familiar term for the great God, so that just as St. Paul introduces the Christian God at Athens as "the Unknown God," whom the Athenians had been worshipping, so here he may have used a familiar term known to the crowd around him at Lystra, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 118.—ἐπιστρέφειν ἐπὶ, cf. especially 1 Thess. i. 9, in Acts ix. 35, xi. 21, xv. 19, xxvi. 20; on the construction see Wendt, and Weiss, in loco, cf. iv. 18, v. 28, 40, infinitive after παραγγέλλειν.—τὸν ζῶντα, see critical note.—τούτων: may be used contemptuously, as if St. Paul pointed to the preparations for the sacrifice.—ματαίων, cf. Jer. ii. 5, x. 3, of the gods of the nations and their worship, cf. also 2 Kings xvii. 15 B, Jer. viii. 19; cf. Rom. i. 21, Ephes. iv. 17. The "living" God manifests His life in creation—a manifestation to which St. Paul would naturally appeal before such an audience; even in writing to Christian converts of the deepest mysteries of the faith he does not forget that the God of Nature and the God of Redemption are one, cf. Ephes. iii. 9, R.V.; so too St. Peter prefaces the first Christian hymn with the same words used here by the Apostle of the Gentiles, iv. 24. On the tact of St. Paul at Lystra and at Athens, laying the foundation of his teaching as a wise master-builder in the truths of natural religion, and leading his audience from them as stepping-stones to higher things, see notes on xvii. That he did not even at Lystra confine his teaching or his appeal simply to Nature's witness, see notes on vv. 22 and 23.

Vv. 16-17. ὅς: God working not only in creation, but in history, not only the source of life but the personal living Guide and Ruler of man, even in His tolerance far removed from the easy indifference of the gods of Olympus. The three present participles ἀγαθ. . . . διδ. . . . ἐμπ. . . . mark the continuous activity and goodness of God, and are all three epexegetical of ἀμάρτυρον; whilst the second participle is generally regarded as specifying a mode of the first, and the third as expressing a consequence of the second.—οὐρανόθεν: only again in xxvi. 13 in N.T., see 4 Macc. iv. 10; so in Hom. and Hes., old genitive of οὐρανός.—ὑετοὺς διδοὺς καὶ καιροὺς καρπ.: the Apostle's appeal becomes more significant when we remember that Zeus was spoken of as ὑέτιος, ἐπικάρπιος (Bethge); the rain was regarded in the East as a special sign of divine favour, and here, as in the O.T., God's goodness and power in this gift are asserted as against the impotence of the gods of the heathen, see especially Jer. xiv. 22, and cf. 1 Kings xviii. 1 and 1 Sam. xii. 17 where this same phrase ὑετ. διδόναι is used of God.—καρπ.: here only in N.T., cf. LXX, Jer. ii. 21, Ps. cvi. 34, and also classical; cf. for the whole passage Cicero, De Nat. Deorum, ii., 53.—ἐμπιπλῶν (ἐμπιπλάω), cf. Luke i. 53, vi. 25, Rom. xv. 24, John vi. 12, frequent in LXX, e.g., Ps. cvi. 9, Isa. xxix. 19, Jer. xxxviii. 14, Ecclus. iv. 12; see also below on εὐφροσ.—καρδίας: Blass compares Luke xxi. 34, where the heart is spoken of as overcharged with surfeiting, as here it is spoken of as filled with food. But the word may be used not merely as = ὑμᾶς, or in a merely material sense, but as including the idea of enjoyment, cf. LXX, Ps. ciii. 15; Winer-Moulton, xxiii. 1, and Alford on James v. 5.—εὐφροσύνης: in its ordinary Greek use might simply mean "good cheer," although we need not limit it here with Grotius to wine as in Ecclus. xxxi. 28; very frequently used in LXX (only here and in ii. 28 in N.T.), sometimes of mere festive joy, Gen. xxxi. 27, sometimes of religious gladness, Deut. xxviii. 47. Although St. Paul could not have used it here as it is employed in ii. 28, yet he might perhaps have used it as a kind of transition word to lead his hearers on to a deeper gladness of heart, a richer gift of God than corn and wine, cf. Ps. iv. 7, and for the phrase ἐμπ. εὐφροσ. Isa. xxix. 19, Ecclus. iv. 12. It may well be that whilst we have in this address the germ of the thoughts afterwards developed in Rom. i. 18, 23, etc., St. Paul did not press his argument on this occasion as in his Epistle, but took the first step to arrest the attention of his hearers by an appeal to the goodness, not to the severity, of God—the goodness which leadeth to repentance. It has been thought that the words οὐρ. ἡμῖν διδούς κ.τ.λ. are rhythmical, and may have been some familiar fragment of a song, or a citation from a Greek poet, in which the Apostle expressed his thoughts; others have maintained that they may have formed part of the hymn sung in the procession for the sacrifice, and that St. Paul made the words his text; see Humphry, in loco; Farrar, St. Paul, i., p. 384; Felten, in loco; but it may be fairly said that the O.T. language was in itself quite sufficient to suggest the Apostle's words. On the remarkable parallels between this speech and the sayings of Pseudo-Heracleitus in his letters see Gore, Ephesians, p. 253 ff., but see also Bernays, Die Heraklitischen Briefe, p. 29.—πάντα τὰ ἔθνη: "all the Gentiles," R.V., the words divided mankind into two classes, but there was the same Lord over all, Rom. iii. 29.—ἐν ταῖς παρῳχ. γενεαῖς: "in the generations gone by," R.V. παρῳχ.: not in LXX or Apocrypha, but classical, and used also by Josephus.—εἴασε (cf. xvii. 30, Rom. iii. 25, 26) . . . πορεύ. ταῖς ὁδοῖς αὐτῶν, i.e., without summoning them as now to repent, cf. for the combination ix. 31, and for the expression 2 Cor. xii. 18, Jude v. 11, James v. 20 (in classical Greek cf. Thuc., iii., 64, ἄδικον ὁδὸν ἰέναι), cf. also the contrast between God's ways and the wilfulness of Israel in the past, Ps. lxxxi. 13 and previous verses, expressed in the same phraseology.

H. mg. add αλλα πορευεσθαι εκαστον εις τα ιδια, cf. v. 18 D, John vii. 53; Flor. adds "et discedere eos ab se" (so Blass in β preceding previous addition; Hilg. omits).

[3] At the begin. of verse CDE (Flor. Cassiod.), Syr. H. mg., Arm., Bed. read διατριβοντων δε αυτων και διδασκοντων evidently to show that the outbreak did not ensue immediately upon the intended worship. D, Flor., Syr. H. mg. H. mg., Flor. proceed και διαλεγομενων αυτων παρρησιᾳ επεισαν τους οχλους αποστηναι απ' αυτων ("ne crederent illis docentibus," Flor.), λεγοντες οτι ουδεν αληθες λεγουσιν αλλα παντα ψευδονται—so Blass throughout in β, and Hilg., see Belser, p. 71, in support, on the ground that β thus explains fully the change in the attitude of the people; but the whole might proceed from a reviser, and need not be original.

Ver. 17. καίτοιγε, see critical notes. If we read καίτοι the word is only found in the N.T. here and in Heb. iv. 3; used here as an adversative conjunction; see Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 168, and further Blass, Gramm., pp. 242, 264; Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 118 (1893); see 4 Macc. ii. 6.—ἀμάρτυρον: not in LXX or Apocrypha; only here in N.T., but in classical Greek, and also in Josephus, see instances in Wetstein. This witness is not as at Athens, xvii. 27, Rom. ii. 15, to man's consciousness and conscience, but rather to God's presence in nature, cf. for the expression LXX, Ps. lxxxviii. 37, ὁ μάρτυς ἐν οὐρανῷ πιστός, and Pseudo-Heracleitus, letter iv., where the moon is spoken of as God's οὐράνιος μαρτυρία; see below on ver. 17.—οὐκ ἀφῆκεν: non reliquit sed sivit (Blass).—ἀγαθοποιῶν, see critical notes. Neither ἀγαθουργέω nor ἀγαθοεργέω, 1 Tim. vi. 18, occur in classical Greek or LXX. T.R. uses the more familiar word; found three times in Luke's Gospel and elsewhere in N.T., and also a few times in LXX (in different senses), but not in classical Greek; see Plummer on Luke vi. 33, and Hatch, Essays in B. G., p. 7.

Ver. 19. ἐπῆλθον δὲ: on readings to account for the interval see critical notes. Nothing in the narrative forbids some kind of interval, whilst nothing is said as to its duration.—Ἰουδαῖοι: a proof of their enmity in that they undertook a long journey of some one hundred and thirty miles.—πείσαντες τοὺς ὄ.: mobile vulgus. The change in their attitude need not surprise us, cf. the fickleness of the inhabitants of Malta, xxviii. 6, and, more notably still, the change of feeling in the multitudes who could cry Hosannah! and Crucify! The Scholiast, Homer, Il., iv., 89-92, has ἄπιστοι γὰρ Λυκάονες, ὡς καὶ Ἀριστοτέλης μαρτυρεῖ. These Jews may have received help from their fellow-countrymen, some few of whom were resident in Lystra, xvi. 1, or possibly, as McGiffert suggests, it may have been easy to incite the populace against Paul and Barnabas, because of the Apostles' rejection of the divine honours offered to them. But probably the persuasion implies that they influenced the multitudes to regard the miracle, the reality of which they could not dispute, as the work not of beneficent gods but of evil demons. The form of punishment, λιθάσαντες, would seem at all events to point to Jewish instigation, although the stoning took place not outside but inside the city, cf. 2 Cor. xi. 25, 2 Tim. iii. 11, and Wendt (1888), p. 318, as against Zeller. In Gal. vi. 17 the Apostle may allude to the scars marked on him by these same people (Ramsay, Zahn), cf. also Clem. Rom., Cor., v. 6. λιθασθείς: "Uti Paulus prius lapidationi Stephani consenserat: ita nunc veterem culpam expiat, 2 Cor. xi. 25" (Wetstein). On the undesigned coincidence between this narrative and the notice in 2 Tim. cf. Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, xii., 5. Hilgenfeld refers this verse to his "author to Theophilus," but the change in the multitude and the hatred of the Jews are not surprising, but perfectly natural. —ἔσυρον: perhaps as a last indignity, cf. viii. 3, xvii. 6.—νομίσαντες: St. Luke's words do not require us to infer that St. Paul was rendered lifeless, and we need not suppose that he was more than stunned. But at the same time the narrative undoubtedly leads us to recognise in St. Paul's speedy recovery from such an outrage, and his ability to resume his journey, the good hand of God upon him. We may again notice St. Luke's reserve in dwelling on the Apostle's sufferings, and his carefulness in refraining from magnifying the incident.

Ver. 20. κυκλ.: Bengel says "tanquam sepeliendum," and others have held the same view, but the word need not imply more than that the disciples surrounded him, to help if human aid could profit, and to lament for him in his sufferings. Amongst the mourners the youthful Timothy may well have found a place. On Timothy's means of knowing of the Apostle's sufferings here narrated see Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, u. s.—μαθητῶν: the Apostles' work had not therefore been unsuccessful: there were converts willing to brave persecution, and to avow themselves as disciples.—τῇ ἐπαύριον: the journey to Derbe was one of some hours, not free from risk, and the mention of Paul's undertaking and finishing it on the morrow indicates how wonderfully he had been strengthened in his recovery. The word is found ten times in Acts, and not at all in Luke's Gospel, but cf. αὔριον Luke x. 35, Acts iv. 5 only; Hawkins' Horæ Syn., p. 144. It occurs three times in chap. x., no less than in the second half of the book.—σὺν τῷ Β.: apparently he had been free from attack, since Paul was the chief speaker, and consequently provoked hostility.

Ver. 21. εὐαγγελ.: continuous preaching, present participle, and the result, many disciples; not "having taught many," A.V., but "had made many disciples," R.V., cf. Matt. xxviii. 19. No doubt they pursued the same course as at Lystra, and again we have direct proof that the teaching of the Gospel was not in vain: it is therefore quite unwarrantable to suppose that Paul's καὶ Ἰκόνιον καὶ Ἀντιόχειαν, 22. ἐπιστηρίζοντες τὰς ψυχὰς τῶν μαθητῶν, παρακαλοῦντες ἐμμένειν τῇ πίστει, καὶ ὅτι διὰ πολλῶν θλίψεων δεῖ ἡμᾶς εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ. 23. χειροτονήσαντες δὲ αὐτοῖς πρεσβυτέρους κατ' ἐκκλησίαν, προσευξάμενοι μετὰ νηστειῶν, παρέθεντο αὐτοὺς τῷ Κυρίῳ εἰς ὃν speech at Lystra indicates the powerlessness of the message of the Gospel in contact with deep-rooted heathenism (Bethge); in vv. 22, 23 we have abundant proof that Paul had not limited his first preaching in Lystra to truths of natural religion, for now on his return the disciples are bidden ἐμμένειν τῇ πίστει, and they are commended to the Lord, εἰς ὃν πεπιστεύκεισαν, "on whom they had believed". No persecution is mentioned at Lystra, with which cf. 2 Tim. iii. 11.—ὑπέστρεψαν: how they were able to do this after they had been recently expelled, cf. Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 70 ff., and McGiffert, Apostolic Age, pp. 190, 191—no permanent disability could be inflicted on them by the magistrates, and the person expelled might return after a little, especially if new magistrates had been appointed in the interim. Moreover, on their return journey the Apostles may have refrained from open and public preaching, and devoted themselves rather to the organisation of the Christian communities. (There is therefore no ground for Hilgenfeld's and Wendt's reference of ver. 19 to a different source from the verse before us.) At the same time the courage of the Apostle is also noteworthy: "neque enim securum petit, ubi instar emeriti militis otio fruatur, sed etiam repetit loca, in quibus paullo ante male tractatus fuerat," Calvin.

Ver. 22. ἐπιστηρίζοντες: only in Acts, cf. xv. 32, 41; for the simple verb see xviii. 23 (W.H., R.V.), and Luke xxii. 32, and six times in St. Paul's Epistles, frequent in LXX, but not in any similar sense, although for the simple verb cf. Ps. li. (l.) 12.—ἐμμένειν, Gal. iii. 10, Heb. viii. 9, two quotations: in the former, with the simple dative; in the latter, with ἐν; several times in LXX, and with both constructions, cf. Xen., Mem., iv., 4.—τῇ πίστει: subjective or objective, as a feeling of trust, or a belief, a creed? That it was used in the latter sense by St. Paul we cannot doubt, in such passages as Col. i. 23, 1 Tim. v. 8 (cf. 1 Pet. v. 9, Jude vv. 3, 20), and St. Luke may have used the word in this latter sense in recording the incident. But cf. also vi. 7, xiii. 8, where the word may be used, as perhaps here, in a kind of intermediate stage.—ὅτι, cf. xi. 3, xv. 1, we have the language of the preachers themselves, but it is precarious to conclude that ἡμᾶς includes the presence of the author of the book, St. Luke himself. The ἡμᾶς may simply mean that the speakers thus associated themselves with their hearers, and drew a general lesson similar to that drawn by St. Paul in 2 Tim. iii. 12, as he looked back upon these same sufferings at the close of his life. The teaching thus expressed may have struck deep root in the heart of one of St. Paul's hearers—why not Timothy?—and have been repeated by him to St. Luke as the Apostle had uttered it; see further in its bearing on the date, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 123. Alford's note strongly maintains that Luke himself was present, see in loco and also Proleg., pp. 6, 7. On the possibility that the words contain an Agraphon of the Lord see Resch, Agrapha, pp. 148, 278, and cf. Epist. Barn., vii., 11.—θλίψεων, cf. xx. 23, quite a Pauline word, not used by Luke at all in his Gospel (five times in Acts), cf. 1 Thess. iii. 3 and ii. 12, and Epist. Barn., u. s. On St. Paul's reference to "the kingdom of God," sometimes as future, sometimes as actually present, see Witness of the Epistles, p. 311, note (1892).

Ver. 23. χειροτονήσαντες δὲ αὐτοῖς πρεσβ., see above, x. 41, where the compound verb is used, "chosen of God," ὑπὸ Θ. The simple verb is only used here and in 2 Cor. viii. 19: lit., to elect by popular vote, by show of hands, but it is by no means a word of certain meaning, and came to be used, as Ramsay admits, in the sense of appointing or designating. Here evidently the word is not used in the literal sense given above, as Paul and Barnabas appoint, and that the idea of popular election did not necessarily belong to the word, at least in later Greek, is evident from Josephus, Ant., vi., 13, 9, τὸν ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ κεχειροτονημένον βασιλέα: cf. xiii. 2, 2, of the appointment of Jonathan as high priest by Alexander. On the later use of the word, of which there is no early trace, as referring to the stretching out of the bishop's hands in the laying on of hands, cf.

πεπιστεύκεισαν. 24. καὶ διελθόντες τὴν Πισιδίαν, ἦλθον εἰς Παμφυλίαν· 25. καὶ λαλήσαντες ἐν Πέργῃ[1] τὸν λόγον, κατέβησαν εἰς

[1] εν Περγῃ ℵcBCDEHLP, so Lach., W.H. text, Rendall, Hilg.; εις την Π. ℵ*A (without art.) 61, so Tisch., W.H. marg., Weiss, Wendt, Blass—the change of εν into εις is quite inconceivable, so Weiss, who compares other frequent uses of εις as characteristic of Acts ii. 5, ix. 21 (Apostelgeschichte, p. 36).

"Ordination" (Hatch, Dict. of Chr. Ant., ii., p. 1501 ff.). Blass takes the word here as = καθιστάναι, and compares Titus i. 5, although he thinks that nothing is said here about the mode of election, and that the Church may have had some share in it. So too Ramsay compares the same passage, Titus i. 5, and concludes that St. Paul doubtless followed there the same method which he followed here, a method in which the votes and voices of each congregation were considered, cf. 2 Cor. viii. 19. But the office to which Luke was appointed in 2 Cor., l. c., was not an office which involved ordination, and we could not argue from it alone to the method of the appointment of elders in the passage before us. At the same time it may be fully admitted that the Church was not without some share in the election of the elders, and it must not be forgotten that, in the case of the Seven, the Church had elected, and the Apostles had ordained, Acts vi. 3. In Clem. Rom., Cor., xliv., whilst the Apostles took care to secure that after their death distinguished men should appoint presbyters and deacons, yet the latter were elected with the consent of the whole Church, and they were exposed, as it were, to the judgment of the Church (see on this voice of the Church, Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 89, and Gore, Church and the Ministry, p. 100 ff.). If we compare the language of Acts vi. 3, Tit. i. 5, Clem. Rom., Cor., xlii., 4, xliv., 2, 3, and the use of the verb καθίστημι in each, it would seem that the κατάστασις was throughout reserved to the Apostles or their representatives, whilst the Church, if not always selecting, may at least be regarded as consenting, συνευδοκησάσης τῆς ἐκκλησίας πάσης, Clem. Rom., u. s., xliv., 3; see "Bishop" (Haddan), Dict. of Chr. Ant., i., p. 213. But, further, in the passage before us it is not impossible that the choice as well as the ordination of the presbyters may be referred to Paul and Barnabas, cf. the pronoun αὐτοῖς: "having appointed for them," and in newly founded communities it was not unnatural that the Apostles should exercise such choice and authority. On the use of the verb in the Didaché, xv., 1, and its compatibility with ordination in accordance with Apostolic practice and injunction, see Gore, Church and the Ministry, p. 281; and further, Church Quarterly Review, 42, p. 265 ff., on the strictures passed by Loening, Die Gemeindeverfassung, 61, 62.—κατ' ἐκκλησίαν, "in every Church," distributive, ii. 46, v. 42, cf. Titus i. 5, Clem. Rom., Cor., xlii., 4. On the spread of Christianity in Asia Minor see additional note at end of chapter.—προσευξ. μετὰ νησ.: Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 122, speaks of the solemn prayer and fasting which accompanied the appointment of the elders, and of this meeting and rite of fasting, as the form permanently observed, cf. xiii. 1-3. The two participles χειροτ. and προσευξ. evidently refer to the appointment, and not to the subsequent commendation. See also Harnack, Proleg. to Didaché, p. 148; and on the other hand, Overbeck, Wendt, Weiss, Zöckler.—παρέθεντο, xx. 32, cf. Luke xii. 48, xxiii. 46, 1 Pet. iv. 19, cf. 1 Tim. i. 18, 2 Tim. ii. 2 (in no parallel sense in the other Evangelists). In the first three passages above used as here of solemn committal to God; also of giving into another's charge or keeping, cf. παραθήκη, 1 Tim. vi. 20, 2 Tim. i. 12, 14. In classical Greek of money or property entrusted to one's care. In Tobit x. 12 (cf. i. 14, iv. 1, 20) both verb and noun are found together, παρατίθεμαί σοι τὴν θυγατέρα μου ἐν παραθήκῃ S (see Hatch and Redpath).—αὐτοὺς may refer to the believers in general, cf. Hort, Ecclesia, p. 66.—τῷ Κ., i.e., Christ, as the πιστεύω indicates: the phrase πιστ. εἰς, or ἐπί τινα, is peculiarly Christian, cf. Lightfoot on Gal. ii. 16.

Ver. 24. διελ. τὴν Π. "having made a missionary journey through Pisidia," see above on xiii. 6. Here it seems clearly implied that Pisidian Antioch was not in Pisidia, see above on xiii. 14, and Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 124.

Ver. 25. καὶ λ. ἐν Πέργῃ τὸν λόγον: in the beginning of their journey they probably made a slight stay at Perga, but without preaching there—possibly for the reason mentioned above which prompted them to hurry on to Antioch, and possibly because, as C. and H. (so Felten) think, the inhabitants at the time of the Apostles' first visit were all leaving Perga for the cool mountain districts, their summer retreats, whereas on the return journey of the missionaries Perga would again be full (C. and H., pp. 131, 158, smaller edition).—ἐν Π., see critical notes. — κατέβησαν, went down, i.e., to the sea coast where Attalia lay, cf. xvi. 8 (xiii. 4), Jonah i. 3, so in classical Greek ἀναβαίνω, to go up from the coast.—Ἀττάλειαν: mentioned because it was the harbour of embarkation, and so called from Attalus II. Philadelphus, king of Pergamus, its builder, B.C. 159-138; is a port for the trade of Egypt and Syria, Strabo, xiv., 4. It bears the modern name of Adalia, and until quite recent days it was the chief harbour of the south coast of Asia Minor. See B.D.[2], and Hastings' B.D., "Attalia" (Ramsay). The distance from Perga was about sixteen miles, and the travellers would reach it across the plain: formerly they had gone up the Cestrus to Perga, and probably they now go to Attalia to find a ship for Antioch. See Hackett, in loco, and C. and H.

Ver. 26. κἀκεῖθεν, cf. vii. 3, and Luke xi. 53, in six other places in Acts in a local sense as here, only once elsewhere in N.T., in Mark ix. 30, in same sense; see also xiii. 21.—ἦσαν παραδεδομ.: "they had been committed," R.V., in xv. 40 "commended"; in both passages A.V. "recommended," a rendering which has changed its meaning; only in these two passages in this sense, but cf. 1 Pet. ii. 23 (John xix. 30).—ὃ ἐπλήρωσαν, cf. xii. 25, xiii. 25, still, as hitherto, St. Paul found the χάρις of God "sufficient".

Ver. 27. συν. τὴν ἐκκλ., cf. xv. 30, as was natural, for they had been sent out by them.—ἀνήγγειλαν: xv. 4 (xx. 20, 27), lit., to carry back tidings (so in classical Greek, as from a less to a greater), cf. 2 Cor. vii. 7; used here as in Æschylus, Xen., Polyb., of messengers reporting what they had seen or heard (Grimm). Blass takes it as simply = ἀπαγγέλλω as in LXX and later Greek. —ὅσα: "how many (or 'how great') things". — μετ' αὐτῶν, i.e., on their behalf; cf. xv. 4, Luke i. 58, 72, x. 37, cf. 1 Sam. xii. 24, Ps. cxxvi. 2, 3, Hebrew עָשָׂה עִם, Ps. cxix. 65, and cannot = per ipsos, which would require διά—the phrase may therefore be described as a Hebraism; it occurs only in Luke; Friedrich, p. 33.—ὅτι ἤνοιξε . . . θύραν: a striking coincidence with St. Paul's use of the same metaphor elsewhere, cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 9, 2 Cor. ii. 12, Col. iv. 3, and cf. Rev. iii. 8. St. Paul's Galatian Epistle clearly shows that his missionary work in Galatia had met with much success, and that the Churches now founded held a large place in his affections, cf. Gal. iv. 14, 15. Enough had been accomplished, even if all his desires were still unfulfilled, to make him eager for a continuation of the work to which he had been called as an Apostle of the Gentiles, see McGiffert, Apostolic Age, pp. 191, 192; Hort, Ecclesia, p. 66: "perhaps the greatest epoch in the history of the Ecclesia at large": Spitta refers the whole verse to his Redactor, p. 171.

Ver. 28. χρόνον οὐκ ὀλίγον: only in Acts, where it occurs eight times, cf. xii. 18, etc.; on the length of time thus spent see "Chronology of the N.T.," Hastings' B.D., and also Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 74, with which cf. Lewin, Fasti Sacri, p. 288.

Additional Note.—In chapters xiii. and xiv. many critics find the commencement of a new source, a belief based to a great extent upon the view that Barnabas and Saul are here introduced as if they had not been previously mentioned. But whilst some description is given of each of the remaining persons in the list (xiii. 1), nothing is added to the name of Barnabas or of Saul, so that it seems quite permissible to argue that these two are thus simply mentioned by name because they were already known. It is therefore not surprising to find that some writers, e.g., Hilgenfeld, regard these chapters as part of a previous source, so too Wendt, Spitta, Jüngst. Others see in these chapters a separate document, possibly not used again by the author of Acts; a document composed by a different hand from that to which we owe the "We" sections, and incorporated by the author of the whole book into his work (McGiffert). Others again see in these same chapters the commencement of a Travel-Document, containing not only these two chapters, but also the later journeys of St. Paul, coming to us from the same hand as the "We" sections, and from the same hand as the rest of the book (Ramsay). It is disappointing to find how Clemen, while referring xiii., xiv. to his good source, Historia Pauli, goes even further than Spitta in breaking up the different parts of the narrative: e.g., xiv. 8-11, we owe to the Redactor Judaicus, and vv. 19, 20, 22*b*, 23 in the same chapter to the Redactor Anti-Judaicus. (See on the whole question Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., 1e Heft, 1896; Wendt (1899), p. 225, note; Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 243, 244 (second edition).) It is no wonder in face of the unsatisfactory attempts to break up these chapters, or to separate their authorship from that of the rest of the book, that Zahn should maintain that a man like Luke needed for the composition of chapters xiii.-xxviii. no other source than his recollections of the narratives recited by St. Paul himself, or of the events in which he, as St. Paul's companion, had participated, Einleitung in das N. T., ii., 412 (1899), cf. Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 25, 26. Certainly the unity of authorship between the two chapters under consideration and the rest of the book seems most clearly marked in language and style: e.g., κατασείειν, xiii. 6, only found elsewhere in N.T., Acts xii. 17, xix. 33, xxi. 40; ἐπαίρειν τὴν φωνήν, xiv. 11, only elsewhere in N.T., Luke xi. 27, Acts ii. 14, xxii. 22; παραχρῆμα, xiii. 11, elsewhere in N.T., ten times in Luke's Gospel (only twice in St. Matthew, and not at all in the other Evangelists), Acts iii. 7, v. 10, xii. 23, xvi. (26), 33; ἦν, with participle, xiii. 48, xiv. 7, 12, 26; δή, xiii. 2; ἄχρι, xiii. 6, 11; ἱκανός with χρόνος, xiv. 3, elsewhere in N.T. in Luke only, and eight times in Acts in all parts; ἀτενίζειν in xiii. 9 and xiv. 9 and the frequent recurrence of τέ in both chapters. It is also perhaps worthy of observation that out of some twenty-one words and phrases found only in the "We" sections, and in the rest of Acts (Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 151), six occur in these two chapters, and two of them twice: ἀποπλέω, xiii. 4, xiv. 26; διατρίβω with accusative of time, xiv. 3; ἔξειμι, xiii. 42; ἡμέραι πλείους, xiii. 31; προσκέκλημαι with accusative, xiii. 2, 7; ὑπονοέω, xiii. 25. On the position of these two chapters relatively to chap. xv. see below.

Additional note on xiv. 23.—On the rapid spread of Christianity in Asia Minor see Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i., pp. 87, 94, 95, 135-137, and Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 161, 397. The old nature religion with its negation of moral distinctions and family ties was doomed, a religion which on the one hand made woman the head of the family, and on the other hand compelled her to a so-called sacred service which involved the surrender of all which in a civilised community womanhood held most dear. The strength of the old ritual, however, was so great that it seems to have been maintained in Phrygia even after a higher type of society became known in the Roman period. But with the growth of Roman organisation and educational influences the minds of men were at least prepared for new ideas, and at this juncture St. Paul came preaching a gospel of home life, of Christian purity; and wherever higher social ideas had already penetrated he found converts disposed to follow his teaching as "a more excellent way". In connection with the wide spread of Christianity in Asia Minor see also Orr, Some Neglected Factors in the Study of the Early Progress of Christianity, p. 48 ff. (1899).

It is very probable that the successful mission of Paul and Barnabas was really the immediate cause of this protest on the part of the narrow Judaic party. This party, as the Church in Jerusalem grew, may well have grown also; the case of Cornelius had been acquiesced in, but it was exceptional, and it was a very different thing to be asked to embrace all Gentiles in the new covenant, and to place them on a level with the Jewish Christians, whether they did homage or not to the Mosaic law, Hort, Ecclesia, p. 67; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 192.

Ver. 2. στάσεως: the word, with the exception of Mark xv. 7, and Heb. ix. 8 (in a totally different sense), is peculiar to St. Luke: twice in his Gospel, and five times in Acts; used in classical Greek of sedition, discord, faction, and so of the factious opposition of parties in the state; frequent in LXX, but only once in any similar sense, Prov. xvii. 14.—συζητήσεως, but ζητ.: "questioning," R.V., cf. John iii. 25; three times in St. Paul, 1 Tim. vi. 4, 2 Tim. ii. 23, Tit. iii. 9, in a depreciatory sense in each case; not in LXX or Apocrypha.—οὐκ ὀλίγης, see on xii. 18 and xiv. 28; eight times in Acts.—ἔταξαν, sc., οἱ ἀδελφοὶ, ver. 1; no discrepancy with Gal. ii. 2, see additional note.—τινας ἄλλους: Titus amongst them, Gal. ii. 1, 3; expression found only here in N.T.; men like the prophets and teachers in xiii. 1 may have been included. Blass in β reads without authority εγενετο δε στασις και ζητησις ουκ ολιγη, to give good construction, and on the supposition that all authorities have been influenced by α. After αυτους D, Syr. Harcl. mg., Gig., Wer., Prov. add ελεγεν γαρ ο Π. μενειν (εκαστον) ουτως καθως επιστευσεν διισχυριζομενος; cf. 1 Cor. vii. 17, 20, 24. Hilg. brackets all this. διισχυριζ. only in Luke in N.T., Luke xxii. 59, Acts xii. 15 (Zahn). In place of εταξαν D, Syr. Harcl. mg. read οι δε εληλυθοτες απο Ιερ. παρηγγειλαν αυτοις. The subject of εταξαν is probably the Antiochian Christians, the brethren, vv. 1 and 3, but "those from Jerusalem" was assumed to be the subject, and so to remove all doubt the gap was supplied as above, and παρηγγειλαν appeared more fitting than εταξαν, which seemed too dictatorial when applied to men in the high position of Paul and Barnabas (Weiss, Codex D, p. 80). Blass reading αυτοις omits Π. και Β. . . . εξ αυτων. But D, which alone has αυτοις, has the rest as well, and it is uncertain whether αυτοις ever stood alone. After εις Ι. D 137, Syr. Harcl. mg. insert οπως κριθωσιν επ' αυτοις (137, αυτων) περι τ. ζητηματος τουτου, cf. xxv. 9; so Blass and Hilg.

At end of verse C³HL add και οτι ηνοιξεν τοις εθνεσιν θυραν πιστεως, cf. xiv. 27, where all authorities read it; Blass however inserts it here (so also Hilg.) on the ground of its suitability and rejects it in the former passage; see also Blass, p. xv.

Christians, as amongst the Jews (Gen. xviii. 16), a mark of affection and respect. The meaning of the word, as Wendt points out, depends on the context.—ἐκδιηγ.: only here and in quotation, xiii. 41 in N.T., "telling the tale of the conversion of the Gentiles"; so διηγεῖσθαι and ἐξηγεῖσθαι more frequently in Luke than in other N.T. writers. Hobart describes all three as medical terms but all three also occur frequently in LXX. ἐκδ.: cf. Hab. i. 5; several times in Ecclus., also in Josephus and Arist. Ver. 5. For D see critical note.—ἐξανέστησαν: compound verb in this sense here only in N.T. (only elsewhere in quotation, Mark xii. 19, Luke xx. 28), but in classical Greek and in LXX, cf. Obad. i. 1, Ecclus. viii. 11, xvii. 23, 1 Macc. ix. 40. The double compound apparently gives at least some measure of emphasis, Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 43.—τινες τῶν ἀπὸ τῆς αἱρ. τῶν Φ.:

[1] D, Syr. Harcl. mg. begin verse οι δε παραγγειλαντες αυτοις αναβαινειν προς τους πρεσ. εξανεστησαν λεγοντες, so Blass in β, so Hilg., but with αποστολους instead of πρεσβ., Blass "male," omitting τινες . . . πεπιστευκοτες. According to this reading the Jerusalem Christians who stirred up the disputed question in Antioch are now identified with those who rise up against Paul and Barnabas in Jerusalem. A.V. margin, following Beza and some of the older commentators, make this sentence part of the narrative of Paul and Barnabas, "there rose up, said they (ελεγον)," etc. Weiss, Völter, Spitta, see here a proof of a combination of two sources. But there does not seem to be any reason why, as in T.R., the Pharisees at Jerusalem should not represent the same point of view as had been presented by the Jews who had come down to Antioch; that they did so with accentuated bitterness in Jerusalem is quite in accordance with the notice in Gal. ii. 4, but this fact need not exclude the previous raising of the question against the Apostles in Antioch, especially as the Jews who had come thither from Jerusalem were plainly not merely Jews but Judaisers. See Wendt (1899), following Meyer, and for a favourable judgment of the Bezan text Salmon, Introd., p. 598; see also Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., i., 1896, and Acta Apost., p. 246, 1899; on the other hand Weiss, Codex D, p. 80, and Wendt (1899), Introd., p. 49, and on this occasion Zahn, Einleitung, ii., p. 344.

[2] After πρεσβ. 137, Syr. Harcl. mg. add συν τω πληθει so Blass in β, and Hilg. The πληθος here, although not mentioned except in authorities just named, is plainly presupposed in vv. 12 and 22, and Wendt (1899) opposes the view that we have before us in its omission elsewhere a trace of distinct sources.

probably in some smaller and more private assembly in answer to the ἀνήγγ. of ver. 4, which seems to mean that the delegates at first announced informally in Jerusalem what had happened, just as they had done in Phœnicia and Samaria, cf. παρείσακτοι ἀδελφοί, Gal. ii. 4. The Pharisees took up their remarks, objected—probably basing their teaching on the necessity of circumcision on such passages as Isa. lvi. 6, cf. lii. 1 (Lumby); and then followed as a consequence the official assembly in ver. 6 (see Zöckler's note, ver. 4, and in loco, p. 246, second edition). Or if we consider that a representative meeting of the whole Church is implied in ver. 4, and that the Apostles spoke before it, then the private conference of Gal. ii. 2 may be regarded as taking place between the first public assembly, ver. 4, and the second in ver. 6 (Hort, Ecclesia, p. 69, cf. Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 126).—αἱρέσεως, see above p. 148.—τῶν Φ.: the Pharisaic spirit had already shown itself in xi. 2, but this is the first definite mention in the book of the conversion of any of the Pharisees; not strange after the conversion of the priests, see note on vi. 7, or after the attitude of men like Nicodemus or Joseph of Arimathæa towards our Lord, and the moderate counsels of Gamaliel.—πεπιστευκότες: believed, i.e., that Jesus was the Messiah, and the fulfiller of the law—but still only as the Head of a glorified Judaism, from which Gentiles were to be rigidly excluded unless they conformed to the enactments relating to circumcision. How difficult it was for a Pharisee Quietist probably of the earlier part of the first century to acknowledge that the law of circumcision and of Moses could possibly be regarded as unessential we may learn from Assumption of Moses, ix., 4-6, and viii., on circumcision, and see references on ver. 1.—αὐτούς, i.e., the Gentiles, speaking generally, not the τινας ἄλλους of ver. 2 (Lekebusch), the uncircumcised companions of Paul and Barnabas, although in accordance with Gal. ii. 3-5 such persons would no doubt have been included.—τηρεῖν: only used here by St. Luke of keeping the law, and only elsewhere in James ii. 10 in a similar phrase, cf. Mark vii. 9, John ix. 16, of keeping the law of the Sabbath; Matt. xix. 17, of keeping the commandments; Tobit xiv. 9 (S, al.), Jos., Ant., xiii., 10, 6.

[2] εν ημιν εξελ., but εν υμιν ℵABC 13, 40, 61, Arm., Const., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt (as against Meyer, Blass, Hilg.).

[3] After πειραζετε one Latin MS. and several Latin Fathers omit τον Θεον. Blass says "recte fort.," but does not follow in β. But no need to omit the words or to regard πειραζειν = πειρασθαι (Wendt in loco).

Ver. 6. λόγου: "de causâ quæ in disceptationem venit" (Blass), cf. viii. 21, xix. 38. The Ecclesia at large was in some manner also present at this final assembly, cf. vv. 12, 22, although the chief responsibility would rest with the Apostles and Elders, cf. Iren., Hær., iii., chap. xii. 14, "cum universa ecclesia convenisset in unum," Zöckler, in loco, p. 246, and cf. p. 254; Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 66, 70, and see critical notes above.

Ver. 7. ἀναστὰς, Lucan, see v. 17; the position of Peter is one of authority, not of pre-eminence—the latter belongs to James. The part which Peter had formerly taken in the conversion of Cornelius would naturally make him the most fitting person to introduce the discussion. From Gal. ii. 3 we learn that the general principle was debated with reference to the individual case of Titus.—ἀφ' ἡμερῶν ἀρχαίων: "a good while ago," meaning probably from the beginnings of the Christian Church, cf. xi. 15, xxi. 16; cf. Phil. iv. 15 (see Lightfoot's note, l. c.), and cf. Clem. Rom., Cor., xlvii., 2, and Polycarp, Phil., i., 2; or, if the words are referred to the one definite incident of the conversion of the Gentile Cornelius, some ten or twelve years (Blass, "fortasse") may have passed since that event, possibly longer, see Zöckler, Page, Knabenbauer, in loco. Others take the words as referring to our Lord's declaration to St. Peter as long ago as at Cæsarea Philippi, Matt. xvi. 13-20; see Speaker's Commentary, so Bishop Williams of Connecticut, Studies in the Book of Acts, p. 139 (1888). Rendall connects ἐν ἡμῖν with ἀρχ. on the ground that thus the whole phrase would point to early Christian days, whereas, without qualification, confusion as to its meaning would arise, cf. ver. 21. But a reference to the case of Cornelius need not exhaust the meaning of the phrase, and St. Peter would naturally think of his own choice by God as going back earlier still, dating from the foundation of the Church, and receiving its confirmation and significance in the acceptance of the Gospel by Cornelius.—ἐξελέξατο, see on i. 2.—τοῦ εὐαγγ.: not used by St. Luke in his Gospel, but here and in xx. 24; used once by St. Peter, 1 Pet. iv. 17; so also εὐαγγελίζομαι, three times in the same Epistle.

Ver. 8. ὁ καρδιογνώστης, i. 24, where the same word is used by St. Peter; cf. Jer. xvii. 10. ἐτάζων καρδίας, and cf. St. Peter's words in x. 34.—καθὼς καὶ ἡμῖν, x. 44, xi. 15.

Ver. 9. τῇ πίστει καθαρίσας τ. κ.: the thought is described by Zöckler as equally Petrine, Pauline, and Johannine; cf. iii. 16, 19, 1 Pet. i. 18-21, xiii. 38, Rom. iii. 24, 1 John i. 8, ii. 2, Rev. vii. 14; here it stands in contrast to the outward purification of circumcision upon which the Judaisers insisted, cf. also x. 15, and for the phrase καθαρ. τὴν κ., Ecclus. xxxviii. 10. Rendall renders τῇ πίστει, the faith, i.e., the Christian faith, and he is no doubt right in this, in so far as the faith is faith in Jesus Christ (Schmid, Bibl. Theol. des N. T., pp. 424, 425), cf. St. Peter's language in 1 Pet. i. 18-22.

ἡμῶν οὔτε ἡμεῖς ἰσχύσαμεν βαστάσαι; 11. ἀλλὰ διὰ τῆς χάριτος Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ πιστεύομεν σωθῆναι, καθ' ὃν τρόπον κἀκεῖνοι. 12.[1] Ἐσίγησε δὲ πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος, καὶ ἤκουον Βαρνάβα καὶ Παύλου ἐξηγουμένων ὅσα ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεὸς σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι

D, Syr. Harcl. mg. prefix συγκατατιθεμενων δε των πρεσβυτερων τοις υπο του Πετρου ειρημενοις, so Blass and Hilg., an addition which shows why the multitude kept silence, and connects Peter's speech with Paul and Barnabas. Weiss, p. 84, sees here the characteristic love of D for the gen. abs., cf. ii. 1, iv. 18, etc., and notes that the same stress is here laid as in ver. 5 upon the πρεσβυτεροι rather than upon the Apostles.

Ver. 10. νῦν οὖν: in Acts four times, nowhere else in N.T.; cf. x. 35, nunc igitur: LXX, Gen. xxvii. 8, etc.; 1 Macc. x. 71.—τί πειράζετε τὸν Θ., cf. v. 9, they put God to the proof, as to whether He had not admitted unworthy persons into the Church.—ἐπιθ. ζυγὸν: on the infinitive see Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 151; Blass, Gram., p. 221: metaphor common among the Rabbis, and also in classical literature, cf. Jer. v. 5, Lam. iii. 27, Ecclus. li. 26 (Zeph. iii. 9), and Matt. xi. 29 (Luke xi. 46), Gal. v. 1. Possibly in Jer. v. 5 reference is made to the yoke of the law, but Psalms of Solomon, vii., 8, cf. xvii., 32, present undoubted instances of the metaphorical use of the term "the yoke" for the service of Jehovah. In Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, iii., 8 (Taylor, second edition, p. 46), we have a definite and twice repeated reference to the yoke of Thorah, cf. Apocalypse of Baruch, xli., 3 (Charles' edition, p. 66 and note), and also Psalms of Solomon, Ryle and James, p. 72, note. It would seem therefore that St. Peter uses an almost technical word in his warning to the first Christians.—τῶν μαθητῶν, i.e., of those who had learnt of Christ and knew the meaning of His yoke, Matt. xi. 29.—ἰσχ. βαστάσαι: cf. xiii. 39. St. Peter no less than St. Paul endorses the charge made by St. Stephen, vii. 53.—οὔτε ἡμεῖς: a remarkable confession on St. Peter's lips: the conversations with Paul and Barnabas, Gal. ii. 7, may well have confirmed the attitude which he had taken after the baptism of Cornelius (Zöckler).

Ver. 11. διὰ τῆς χ.: twice in his First Epistle St. Peter speaks of the grace of God, of the God of all grace; so also of the grace prophesied beforehand, of the grace brought to them, cf. also iii. 7 and 2 Pet. iii. 18. The exact phrase here is not found elsewhere in St. Peter, although common in St. Paul, but see Plumptre (Cambridge Bible) on 1 Pet. v. 12. In R.V. σωθῆναι is joined more clearly with διά than in A.V.—κἀκεῖνοι, i.e., the Gentile Christians, not οἱ πατέρες (as St. Aug. and Calvin). For points of likeness between these, the last words of St. Peter in Acts, and his previous utterances, with characteristic idioms and expressions, see Alford on Acts xv. 7 ff., cf. Schmid, Bibl. Theol. des N. T., p. 427.

Ver. 12. ἐσίγησε: may mean "became silent," "itaque antea non tacuerant" (Blass), cf. Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, 21, A. and R.V., "kept silence".—πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος: implying a general assembly of the Church; on the word see ii. 6, iv. 32, etc.—ἤκουον: imperfect, marking a continuous hearing; the silence and the audience both testified to the effect produced by St. Peter's words.—Βαρ. καὶ Π., on the order here and in ver. 25 cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 84.—ἐξηγουμένων: setting forth in detail; see above on ver. 3, and x. 8.—ὅσα ἐποί., cf. xiv. 27 and ver. 4. In each case the appeal is made to what God had done, and to the further answer to the prayer of iv. 30 by the miracles wrought among the Gentiles: it was an answer which a Jewish audience would understand, John iii. 2. The historical truthfulness of Paul and Barnabas thus recounting the facts, and leaving the actual proof of the rightfulness of their method of working to Peter and James, is to Zeller inconceivable—an objection sufficiently answered by the consideration that Luke wished to represent not so much the attitude of Paul and Barnabas, but that of the original Apostles to the Gentile-question; and in Jerusalem it was only natural that Peter and James should be the spokesmen.

Ver. 13. μετὰ δὲ τὸ σ., i.e., after Barnabas and Paul had ceased speaking.—ἀπεκ. Ἰ. λ.: his speech may be divided into two parts: (1) reference to the prophecy foretelling the reception of the Gentiles; (2) his opinion on the conditions of that reception. ἀ. ἀκούσατέ μου: only here and in James ii. 5.

Ver. 14. Συμεὼν: Peter so named only here and in 2 Pet. ii. 1. The use of the word here in its old Hebrew form by James is exactly what we should expect, cf. Luke ii. 25, 34, W.H.; probably therefore the form current in Jerusalem, a form which reappears in the list of the successors of St. James in the bishopric of the Holy City, Eusebius, H. E., iv., 5, cf. Luke xxiv. 34, from which also it would appear that the Hebrew name of Peter, in the contracted or uncontracted form, was current in Jerusalem.—πρῶτον like ἀπ' ἀρ. ἡμ. in ver. 7.—ἐπεσκέψατο, cf. James i. 27, and above on vii. 23, Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 105.—λαβεῖν: infinitive of purpose, ἐξ ἐθνῶν λαὸν, ex gentibus populum, "egregium paradoxon" Bengel; the converts from among the Gentiles were no less than Israel the people of God. On ἔθνος and λαός see iii. 25.—τῷ ὀνόματι, i.e., who should bear His Name as a people of God, or may mean simply "for Himself," God's name being often so used. On the "pregnant use" of the word cf. James ii. 7, v. 10, 14. St. James thus in his address agrees with St. Peter.

Ver. 15. καὶ τούτῳ, "and to this agree," A. and R.V., i.e., to the fact just stated (so Wendt, Weiss, Blass, Ramsay); if the pronoun referred to St. Peter, as some take it, we should have had οἱ προφῆται, not as in text, οἱ λ. τῶν π. The quotation Amos. ix. 11, 12, is freely cited from the LXX, and indeed the chief point made by St. James depends upon that version.—τῶν προφ., plural, as including those prophets whose words of prophecy had been of similar import.

Ver. 16. Μετὰ ταῦτα: both Hebrew and LXX, ἐν τῇ ἐκεῖ. τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, i.e., in the Messianic times, after the predicted chastisement of Israel: the house of David is in ruins, but it is to be re-erected, and from the restoration of its prosperity the Messianic blessings will flow: "the person of the Messiah does not appear in this prophecy, but there is the generic reference to the house of David, and the people of Israel," Briggs, Messianic Prophecy, p. 163, Delitzsch, Messianische Weissagungen, second edition, p. 94. St. James sees the spiritual fulfilment of the prophecy in the kingdom of Christ erected on the Day of Pentecost, and in the ingathering of the Gentile nations to it. On the Messianic interpretations of the passage amongst the Jews see Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii., 734.—ἀναστρέψω καὶ ἀνοι.: like Hebrew אָשׁוּב = I will return and do, i.e., I will do again—but not in LXX or Hebrew. In the latter we have simply אָקִים, and in LXX ἀναστήσω, where St. James has ἀνοικοδομήσω: the idea of restoration is fully contained in the twice repeated ἀνοι. and in ἀνορθώσω.—τὴν σκ. Δ. πεπτ.: the noun is used to show how low the house of David (2 Sam. vii. 12) had fallen—it is no longer a palace but a hut, and that in ruins: the Hebrew word might be used for a temporary structure of the boughs of trees as at the Feast of Tabernacles. We may compare the way in which this hope of restoration asserted itself in Psalms of Solomon, xvii., 23, where Ryle and James, p. 137, compare the words with Amos ix. 11, Jer. xxx. 9, etc. From the passage before us the Messiah received the name of Bar Naphli, "Son of the fallen".—κατεσκαμμένα, see critical note. In LXX B has κατεσκαμ., A κατεστρ.

The quot. in Amos ix. does not contain γνωστα απ' αιωνος, so that the words were separated from the clause and formed into an independent sentence. T.R. is supported by EHLP, Syr. H., Const., Chrys.; whilst AD, Vulg., Syr. H. mg., Irint., Blass in both texts, and Hilg. read γνωστον απ' αιωνος εστι τῳ κυριῳ το εργον αυτου.

[3] After εγω Iren. adds το κατ' εμε "secundum me," cf. Rom. i. 15; may be translator's paraphrase; retained by Blass in β.

Ver. 17. ὅπως ἂν ἐκζητ. οἱ κ. τῶν ἀνθρώπων τὸν Κ.: LXX and Hebrew are here considerably at variance. Hebrew: "that they may possess the remnant of Edom". In LXX: "that the rest of men may seek after (the Lord)" (so also Arabic Version, whilst Vulgate, Peshitto, and Targum support the Massoretic text, see Briggs, u. s., p. 162). In LXX A τὸν Κ. is found, but not in B. In LXX rendering אָדָם, men, takes the place of אֱדוֹם, Edom, and יִדְרְשׁוּ instead of יִירְשׁוּ, i.e., דָּרַשׁ, to seek, instead of יָרַשׁ, to possess.—καὶ πάντα τὰ ἔθνη: explicative, "the rest of men," i.e., the heathen: "sine respectu personarum et operum".—ὅπως ἄν, Winer-Moulton, xlii., 6; Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 85; cf. Luke ii. 35, Acts iii. 19, Rom. iii. 4, and in no other instances, three of these quotations from LXX.—ἐφ' οὓς ἐπικέκ. . . . ἐπ' α.: "upon whom my name is called [pronounced]": Hebraistic formula, cf. LXX, Jer. xli. 15; and Deut. xxviii. 10, Isa. lxiii. 19, 2 Macc. viii. 15. In James ii. 7, and only there in the N.T. does the same formula recur (see Mayor, Introd., and Nösgen, Geschichte der Neutest. Offb., ii., 51).

Ver. 18. In R.V. the phrase ἀπ' αἰῶνος is connected closely with the preceding clause, see critical notes: "who maketh these things known from the beginning of the world" ("of time," Ramsay), or margin, "who doeth these things which were known" etc. St. James may perhaps have added the words freely to the LXX to emphasise his argument that the call of the Gentiles was a carrying out of God's eternal purpose, but there is nothing corresponding to the words in the Hebrew, although at the end of ver. 11 we have כִּימֵי עוֹלָם: LXX, καθὼς αἱ ἡμέραι ἀπ' αἰῶνος, and somewhat similar phrase in Isa. xlv. 21, see Zöckler, in loco, for different authorities, and for further discussion of the words, Klostermann, Probleme im Aposteltexte, p. 128. ἀπ' αἰῶνος is peculiar to Luke in N.T., cf. Luke i. 70, Acts iii. 21; it may simply = "of old time," see Plummer, St. Luke, l. c., but here it may intimate that St. James refers to that purpose of God revealed by all the prophets, as in iii. 21. In Psalms of Solomon, viii., 7, ἀπ' αἰῶνος seems to be equivalent to "from the creation of the heaven and earth," cf. Ps. cxviii. 52. If the conference was held in Greek, as we may reasonably conclude from the fact that Gentile interests were at stake, and that many of the Gentiles, as of the Hellenistic Jews, would probably be present, it is very significant that St. James, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, quotes the rendering of the LXX so apposite for his purpose, and that he should see the spiritual restoration of the house of David in the kingdom of Jesus, and the fulfilment of prophecy in the reception of the Gentiles into the kingdom of the Messiah, so exclusively guarded by the Jews.

[1] απο om. ℵBD 61, 180, so Tisch., W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. και του πνικτου om. art. AB 13, 61, so W.H., Weiss. D, Gig., Iren. omit και του πνικτου (see also ver. 29). Wendt (1888) accounts for the omission partly by the fact that no such command was precisely given in Lev. xvii. 13 (so Meyer, Alford), and partly from the laxer views of the Western Church; but (1899, Introd., p. 50) he now gives in his adherence to Corssen's view (G. G. A., p. 442; 1896), with which compare for similarity Zahn's explanation, Einleitung, ii., pp. 344, 345 (1899), Weiss, Codex D, p. 198, that the omission, as also the addition following (see below), were intended to do away with the Judaic and ceremonial character of the decree, and to substitute the comprehensive moral prescription of the Sermon on the Mount; so too recently Harnack. του πνικ. being eliminated αιμα can be referred to homicidium, Tert., De Pud., xii., so that the decree means that they should abstain from pollutions, viz., idolatry, fornication, bloodshed (cf. the punctuation in β), and that they should love their neighbours (the negative injunction of the Golden Rule); see below. See further in favour of the omission Blass, Præf., Evang. sec. Lucam, p. xxv. (1897); Philology of the Gospels, p. 250; but for a very different reason; as against the interpretation given above by Harnack and others to αιμα, see also Blass, Studien und Kritiken, i., 1900; Hilgenfeld, also Corssen, C. G. G., p. 445 ff., remark on the probability of Montanistic influences in the Bezan text of the passage before us, and in reply to their strictures see Blass, Evang. sec. Lucam, Præf., p. xxiv. ff. At the end of the clause we have και οσα μη θελουσιν εαυτοις γινεσθαι ετεροις μη ποιειν, so D, 11 minuscules, Sah., Aeth., Iren. (cf. also ver. 29). Harris, Four Lectures, etc., pp. 31, 32, points out that the addition was known to Aristides (Seeberg, Die Apologie des A., p. 213), and that therefore the Acts was known and used and interpolated by the middle of the second century. But he refrains from speaking positively as to the source of this variant in Acts, as "the negative precept turns up everywhere in the early Church, having been absorbed in the first instance from Jewish ethics"; cf. also Weiss, Codex D, p. 109. So Theophilus, Didache, Const. Apost. and Ephrem on Rom. iii. 21 and viii. 7; see Harris, u. s.; Resch, Agrapha, p. 95; W.H., App., 96. Zahn unhesitatingly refers the addition to the Didache, but it is very doubtful how far the Didache enjoyed the high and wide credit which Zahn attaches to it: about 110-140 the words were interpolated in the text in the East, and soon after, but by no means with universal acceptance, they found their way into the Western text. Blass in Studien und Kritiken, u. s., replies further to Harnack. Harnack asks why the "golden rule," if genuine, is not found in xxi. 25. Blass replies that Luke kept a rough draft for himself in which were both πνικτα and the rule, and thus omitted πνικτα in β, and in α the rule "brevitati consulens".

Ver. 19. διὸ ἐγὼ κρίνω: "wherefore my judgment is". St. James apparently speaks as the president of the meeting, Chrysostom, Hom., xxxiii., and his words with the emphatic ἐγώ (Weiss) may express more than the opinion of a private member—he sums up the debate and proposes "the draught of a practical resolution" (see however Hort, Ecclesia, 79; Hackett, in loco; and on the other hand Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 147). If a position of authority is thus given to St. James at the conference, it is very significant that this should be so in Jerusalem itself, where the Twelve would naturally carry special weight. But this presidency and Apostolic authority of St. James in Jerusalem is exactly in accordance with the remarkable order of the three names referred to by St. Paul in Gal. ii. 9 (cf. Acts xii. 17, xxi. 18). At the same time ver. 22 shows us that neither the authority of St. James nor that of the other Apostles is conceived of as overriding the general consent of the whole Church.—μὴ παρενοχλεῖν: only here in N.T.; "not to trouble," A. and R.V.; it may be possible to press the παρά, "not to trouble further," i.e., by anything more than he is about to mention, or in their conversion to God. The verb is found with dative and accusative in LXX; for the former cf. Judg. xiv. 17, 1 Macc. x. 63 SR, xii. 14; and for the latter Jer. xxvi. (xlvi.) 27, 1 Macc. x. 35. Bengel takes παρά as = præter, but whilst it is very doubtful how far the preposition can be so rendered here, he adds fides quieta non obturbanda.—τοῖς ἐπισ. cf. xi. 21, "who are turning to God"; present participle, as in acknowledgment of a work actually in progress.

Ver. 20. ἐπιστεῖλαι (xxi. 25), Heb. xiii. 22; the verb is used of a written injunction, Westcott, l. c. (so Wendt here and in xxi. 25, and so Klostermann), and so often in ecclesiastical writers; here it may mean to write or enjoin, or may well include both, cf. Hort, Ecclesia, p. 70, Westcott, u. s., Weiss, in loco; in classical Greek it is used in both senses. In LXX it is not used, except in a few passages in which the reading is doubtful, ἀπ. for ἐπ., see Hatch and Redpath, sub v.—τοῦ ἀπέχεσθαι: Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 159, cf. Jer. vii. 10, 1 Pet. ii. 11, 1 Tim. iv. 3; generally without ἀπό.—τῶν ἀλισγημάτων: from Hellenistic verb, ἀλισγεῖν, LXX, Dan. i. 8, Mal. i. 7, 12, Ecclus. xl. 29 (S, al); may mean the pollution from the flesh used in heathen offerings = εἰδωλοθύτων in ver. 29 (xxi. 25), cf. 1 Cor. viii. 1, x. 14 ff., but see further Klostermann, Probleme im Aposteltexte, p. 144 ff., and Wendt, 1888 and 1899, in loco. The phrase stands by itself, and the three following genitives are not dependent upon it. If St. James's words are interpreted more widely than as = εἰδωλοθύτων, ver. 29, they would involve the prohibition for a Christian not only not to eat anything offered to idols, or to share in the idolatrous feasts, but even to accept an invitation to a domestic feast of the Gentiles or at least to a participation in the food on such an occasion. That it was easy for Christians to run these risks is evident from 1 Cor. viii. 10 when St. Paul refers to the case of those who had not only eaten of the flesh offered to idols, but had also sat down to a feast in the idol's temple.—τῆς πορνείας: the moral explanation of this close allocation of idolatry and uncleanness is that the former so often involved the latter. But Dr. Hort whilst pointing out that such an association is not fanciful or accidental, reminds us that we ought not to lay too much stress on the connection, since many forms of idolatry might fairly be regarded as free from that particular stain. The language, however, of St. James in his Epistle shows us how imperative it was in the moral atmosphere of the Syria of the first century to guard the Christian life from sexual defilement, and the burning language of St. Paul in 1 Cor. vi. 15 and 1 Thess. iv. 3, etc., shows us the terrible risks to which Christian morality was exposed, risks enhanced by the fact that the heathen view of impurity was so lax throughout the Roman empire, cf. Horace, Sat., i., 2, 31; Terence, Adelphi, i., 2, 21; Cicero, Pro Cælio, xx.; and on the intimate and almost universal connection between the heathen religious guilds and societies and the observance of nameless breaches of the Christian law of purity, see Loening, Die Gemeindeverfassung des Urchristenthums, and his references to Foucart, p. 12 ff. Without some special prohibition it was conceivable that a man might pass from some scene of licentious indulgence to the participation in the Supper of the Lord (Plumptre, Felten). An attempt has been made to refer the word here to the sin of incest, or to marriage within the forbidden degrees, rather than to the sin of fornication, so Holtzmann, Ritschl, Zöckler, Wendt, Ramsay; but on the other hand Meyer, Ewald, Godet, Weiss, and others take the word in its general sense as it is employed elsewhere in the N.T. From what has been said above, and from the way in which women might be called upon to serve impurely in a heathen temple (to which religious obligation, as Zöckler reminds us, some have seen a reference in the word here, cf. also Wendt, p. 332 (1888)), we see the need and the likelihood of such a specific enjoinder against the sin of fornication. Bentley conjectured χοιρείας or πορκείας.—τοῦ πνικτοῦ: "from that which has been strangled," lit., such beasts as had been killed through strangling, and whose blood had not been let out when they were killed. For this prohibition reference is usually made to Lev. xvii. 13, Deut. xii. 16, 23, so Weiss, Wendt, Zöckler, Plumptre, Felten, Hackett. But on the other hand Dr. Hort contends that all attempts to find the prohibition in the Pentateuch quite fail, although he considers it perfectly conceivable that the flesh of animals strangled in such a way as not to allow of the letting out of blood would be counted as unlawful food by the Jews, cf. Origen, c. Cels., viii., 30; Judaistic Christianity, p. 73, and Appendix, p. 209. But his further remark, that if such a prohibition had been actually prescribed (as in his view it is not) we should have a separate fourth precept referring only to a particular case of the third precept, viz., abstinence from blood, is probably the reason why in D, cf. Irenæus, Hær., iii., 12, 14; Cyprian, Testim, iii., 119; Tertullian, De Pudicitia, xii., the words καὶ τοῦ πνικτοῦ are omitted here and in the decree, ver. 29, although it is also possible that the laxer views on the subject in the West may have contributed to the omission (see Zöckler and Wendt). Dr. Hort leaves the difficulty unsolved, merely referring to the "Western" text without adopting it. But in xxi. 25 the words are again found in a reference to, and in a summary of, the decree, although here too D consistently omits them (see critical notes).—τοῦ αἵματος: specially forbidden by the Jewish law, Lev. xvii. 10, cf. iii. 17, vii. 26, xix. 26, Deut. xii. 16, 23, xv. 23, and we may refer the prohibition, with Dr. Hort, to the feeling of mystery entertained by various nations of antiquity with regard to blood, so that the feeling is not exclusively Jewish, although the Jewish law had given it such express and divine sanction. "The blood is the life," and abstinence from it was a manifestation of reverence for the life given by and dedicated to God. This was the ground upon which the Jews based, and still base, the prohibition. Nothing could override the command first given to Noah, Gen. ix. 4, together with the permission to eat animal food, and renewed in the law. αἷμ. cannot refer (so Cyprian and Tertullian) to homicide, as the collocation with πνικτοῦ (if retained) is against any such interpretation. See additional note (2) at end of chapter.

Ver. 21. ἐκ γενεῶν ἀρχαίων: pointing back to the first days when the Diaspora had first spread to any considerable extent in heathen lands: see on ver. 7. The exact phrase (ἀπὸ) γενεῶν ἀρχ. occurs in Psalms of Solomon, xviii., 14—from the generations of old the lights of heaven have not departed from their path. For the custom referred to here, see Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 55, E.T. The words seem closely connected in sense with the preceding in this way, viz., that the Gentile proselytes could long ago in the synagogues have been acquainted week by week with the spirit and enactments of the Mosaic law, and they would thus be the more easily inclined to take upon themselves the few elementary precepts laid down in the decree of the Jerusalem Church, so as to avoid any serious cause of offence to their Jewish-Christian brethren. Others however take the meaning to be that, as the Jewish Christians in their continual association with the synagogue would still hear the law read every Sabbath, there would be no intercourse between them and the Gentile Christians, unless the latter observed the necessary restrictions enjoined by the decree for brotherly intercommunion. There is no occasion to interpret the meaning to be that it is superfluous to write the decree to the Jewish Christians, since they knew its contents already from the law (so St. Chrysostom, and Blass), for a decree for the Jewish Christians is not in question, see ver. 23. Others again interpret: there is no fear that the Mosaic law should be neglected or despised "for Moses, etc.". See further, Wendt, Weiss, McGiffert, Knabenbauer.

Ver. 22. ἔδοξε: the word is often found in public resolutions and official decrees, Herod., i., 3; Thuc., iv., 118 L) and S.).—τοῖς ἀποσ. . . . ἐκλεξ. . . . γράψ.: on the irregular construction see Page and Rendall, and instances in Alford and Lumby; and further, Burton, N. T. Moods and Tenses, p. 173.—σὺν ὅλῃ τῇ ἐκκλ., cf. ver. 12, πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος, cf. Iren., Hær. iii., 12.—

Blass, following Sah., Orig., reads αδελφοις here and brackets the same word after Κιλ., so Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 171, rejecting the word as an accidental corruption; "The Apostles and the Elders unto the brethren," etc., R.V. renders "The Apostles and the elder brethren," a title which the Jerusalem Church might use in addressing younger Churches (Rendall), but see commentary.

ἐκλεξ. ἄνδρας πέμψαι: "to choose men out of their company, and send," R.V. In A.V. we lose sight of the fact that the choice was thus made in the rendering "chosen men," a rendering which takes ἐκλεξ. middle as if passive (see Wendt's just criticism, and cf. ver. 40 ἐπιλεξ.).—Ἰούδαν τὸν ἐπικ. Β., see critical note, sometimes regarded as a brother of Joseph Barsabbas in i. 23. Ewald thinks that he was actually identical with him. Nothing further is known of him, but if he was a brother of Joseph Barsabbas, he too may have been amongst the personal followers of the Lord; hence his leading position, see also B.D.[2] "Judas," p. 1830.—Σίλαν, cf. ver. 40, xvi. 19, 25, 29, xvii. 4, 10, 14, xviii. 5, 2 Cor. i. 19, 1 Thess. i. 1, 2 Thess. i. 1, 1 Pet. v. 12. The name may have been contracted for Silvanus, but it may also have been a Greek equivalent for a Hebrew name שְׁלִשִׁי = Tertius, or שֶׁלַח, Gen. x. 24, see especially Winer-Schmiedel, p. 143, note, and Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 23, who prefers שָׁאַל, „bitten, erfragen". Paul always used the form Σιλουανός (so 1 Pet. v. 12), Blass, Gram., pp. 70, 71, Winer-Schmiedel, u. s., and also pp. 74, 75. On the supposed identity of Silas with Titus, who is never mentioned in Acts, see above; and Wendt, in loco. If the two passages, 2 Cor. i. 19 and viii. 23, on which the advocates of this view rely make the identity possible, the description of Titus, Gal. ii. 3, is completely at variance with the description of Silas in this chapter ("perversa, ne quid durius dicam, conjectura" Blass, in commenting on the supposed identity).—ἡγουμένους, cf. ver. 32, προφῆται ὄντες: the word is also used in Heb. xiii. three times, once of those who had passed away, ver. 7, and in vv. 17 and 24 of actual authorities to be obeyed. The word is applied in the LXX to various forms of authority and leadership (see also references to the word in classical Greek, Grimm-Thayer), and cf. Clem. Rom., Cor., i., 3 (xxi., 6), with v. 7, xxxvii. 2, lv. 1, lx. 4. It is quite possible that it may have essentially = διδάσκαλοι, xiii. 1 (cf. xiv. 12, ἡγούμ. τοῦ λόγου), cf. Heb. u. s., with Didaché, iv., 1, and see Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 249; Harnack, Proleg. to Didaché, p. 95; or the mere fact that Judas and Silas may both have been personal followers of Jesus would have conferred upon them a high degree of authority (Plumptre); or the term ἡγου. may be used as a general one, and we cannot say to what particular office or qualification it may have extended besides that involved in ver. 32. For use of the word in sub-apostolic times see Gore, Church and the Ministry, p. 322, etc., Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, pp. 166, 186. The word may be called characteristic of St. Luke (Friedrich, p. 22, cf. Luke xxii. 26, Acts vii. 10 (of civil rule), xiv. 12).

Ver. 23.—οἱ ἀπόστ. καὶ οἱ πρεσβ. καὶ οἱ ἀδελ., but in R.V. "the Apostles and the elder brethren," see critical notes. The phrase as it stands in R.V. has been called meaningless (Page), but Hort, Ecclesia, p. 71, while admitting that the phrase is unusual, defends it as indicating that they who held the office of elder were to be regarded as bearing the characteristic from which the title itself had arisen, and that they were but elder brethren at the head of a great family of brethren (cf. Knabenbauer in loco). It is of course quite possible that ἀδελ. is merely to be taken as in apposition to ἀπόστ. and πρεσβ., meaning that as brethren they sent a message to brethren (Wendt, Felten, Page).—τοῖς κατὰ τὴν Ἀ. κ.τ.λ., see below.—χαίρειν: amongst the Epistles of the N.T. only that of St. James thus commences, as has been often pointed out by Bengel and others. The coincidence may be a chance one, but it is the more remarkable, since the letter may well have been written and dictated by St. James in his authoritative position. On the phrase in letters see Mayor's interesting note on James i. 1. It occurs again in Acts xxiii. 26, but nowhere else in N.T.

Ver. 24. On the similarity of this verse in phraseology to St. Luke's preface, Luke i. 1, Schwegler, Zeller, Weiss, Friedrich, Hilgenfeld, and others have commented. But, after all, in what does the likeness consist? Simply in the fact that here as there we have ἐπειδή introducing the antecedent clause, and ἔδοξεν the subsequent clause. Friedrich (p. 46) considers this as too striking to be a matter of chance, but strangely he writes each of the two passages as if they commenced with the same word, see below on ver. 28 —ἐπειδήπερ. This word is a curious one, and is only found in Luke i. 1 (not in LXX), but there is no authority for reading it in the passage before us in Acts. Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, p. 45, refers to instances of a similar formula and phraseology as in use in Jewish writings, cf. Jost, Jüd. Gesch., i., 284.—τινὲς ἐξ ἡμῶν, cf. for the expression Gal. ii. 12.—ἐξελ., see critical notes.—ἐτάραξαν ἡμᾶς, cf. Gal. i. 7, v. 10. λόγοις may mean with words only, words without true doctrine.—ἀνασκευάζοντες, "subverting," A. and R.V.; not in LXX, and only here in N.T., in classical Greek, primarily colligere vasa, to pack up, and so to carry away: or to dismantle a place; to destroy, overthrow, and so trop. as in text—of breaking treaties (Polyb.), of destroying an opponent's arguments (Arist.). Nösgen and Felten note it amongst the non-Lucan words in the decree, so βάρος, τὸ ἐπάναγκες, διὰ λόγου, ἀπαγγέλλειν, εὖ πράττειν, ἔρρωσθε, ἀγαπητός.—οἷς οὐ διεστειλάμεθα: "to whom we gave no commandment," R.V., omitting "such," not in text, and weakens; in Tyndale, Cramner, and Genevan Version; cf. Gal. ii. 12, and Acts xxi. 20; only used once in passive in N.T., Heb. xii. 20, often in LXX in middle voice, meaning to warn, cf. also its meaning in Judith xi. 12 with Mark v. 43, etc.

Ver. 25. γενομ. ὁμοθυμαδόν: "having come to one accord," "einmutig geworden," Weiss: ὁμοθ., though frequent in Acts, see i. 14, only here with γεν. For the form of the phrase as indicating mutual deliberation on the part of the Church collectively see "Council," Dict. of Chr. Ant., i., 474.—ἐκλεξ. ἄνδρας: "to choose out men and send them unto you," R.V., whether we read accusative or dative see critical note, and cf. ver. 22.—ἀγαπητοῖς: very frequent in St. Paul's Epistles; used three times by St. James in his Epistle, twice by St. Peter in his First Epistle, four times in the Second, cf. iii. 15, where the word is used by St. Peter of St. Paul, ten times by St. John: it was therefore a very natural word to occur in the letter, and we may compare it with the right hand of fellowship given by the three Apostles just named to Barnabas and Paul, Gal. ii. 9.—Β. καὶ Π.: this order because in Jerusalem Church; see above on ver. 12. Meyer, Bleek, Nösgen, Wendt, all note its truthful significance.

Ver. 26. παραδεδωκόσι τὰς ψ. α.: "hazarded their lives," A. and R.V.; so in classical Greek, and in LXX, Dan. iii. 28 (95). The sufferings of the missionaries in their first journey were evidently well known, and appeal was fittingly made to them in recognition of their self-sacrifice, and in proof of their sincerity.

[1] At end of verse, DE 137, Syr. Harcl. mg. add εις παντα πειρασμον, so Blass in β, Hilg. Harris, Four Lectures, etc., pp. 85, 86, describes this as the best example extant of a Syriac assimilation in the text of Acts; παραδεδωκασιν in D, ambiguous, but in Sirach, ii., 1, Syriac had rendered "thou hast surrendered thy soul to all temptations" (ετοιμασον την ψυχην σου εις πειρασμον, LXX); gloss added here for clearness. Weiss, Codex D, p. 82, refers the words to a reminiscence of Acts xx. 19.

Ver. 27. Ἰ. καὶ Σ. καὶ αὐτοὺς: "who themselves also shall tell you the same things by word of mouth," R.V. Judas and Silas were sent to confirm personally the contents of the letter, as they could speak with authority as representing the Church at Jerusalem, while Barnabas and Saul alone would be regarded as already committed to the conciliatory side (Alford). The present participle, as the writer thinks of Judas and Silas as actually present with the letter at its reception, cf. ἀπεστάλκαμεν, "we have sent" by a common idiom, and also xxi. 16; Blass compares Thuc., vii., 26, ἔπεμψαν ἀγγέλλοντας, Gram., p. 194.—τὰ αὐτὰ: not the same things as Barnabas and Paul had preached, but, as διὰ λ. intimates, the same things as the letter contained, see critical notes.

Ver. 28. ἔδοξε γὰρ τῷ Ἁ. Π. καὶ ἡμῖν: "causa principalis" and "causa ministerialis" of the decree. The words of Hooker exactly describe the meaning and purpose of the words, E. P., iii., 10, 2, cf. viii., 6, 7, and cf. St. Chrysostom's words, Hom., xxxiii., "not making themselves equal to Him [i.e., the Holy Ghost]—they are not so mad—the one to the Holy Ghost, that they may not deem it to be of man; the other to us, that they may be taught that they also themselves admit the Gentiles, although themselves being in circumcision". On other suggested but improbable meanings see Alford's and Wendt's notes. The words became a kind of general formula in the decrees of Councils and Synods, cf. the phrase commonly prefixed to Councils: Sancto Spiritu suggerente (Dict. Chr. Ant., i., 483). On this classical construction of ἔδοξε τῷ with the infinitive see Nestle's note, Expository Times, December, 1898. Moreover it would seem that this ἔδοξε is quite in accordance with the manner in which Jewish Rabbis would formulate their decisions.—μηδὲν πλέον . . . βάρος: the words indicate authority on the part of the speakers, although in ver. 20 we read only of "enjoining". St. Peter had used the cognate verb in ver. 10, cf. Rev. ii. 24, where the same noun occurs with a possible reference to the decree, see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 309, and Plumptre, in loco.—ἐπάναγκες, i.e., for mutual intercourse, that Jewish and Gentile Christians might live as brethren in the One Lord. There is nothing said to imply that these four abstinences were to be imposed as necessary to salvation; the receivers of the letter are only told that it should be well with them if they observed the decree, and we cannot interpret εὖ πράξετε as = σωθήσεσθε. At the same time the word was a very emphatic one, and might be easily interpreted, as it speedily was, in a narrower sense, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 172; Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 310. Rendall compares the use of ἀναγκαῖος in Thuc., i., 90.

Ver. 29. ἀπέχ.: preposition omitted as in ver. 20, W.H.; so usually in classical Greek, but in N.T. ἀπέχ. ἀπό, 1 Thess. iv. 3, v. 22; so in LXX, Job i. 1, 8, ii. 3, etc. On the difference in meaning in the two constructions, see Alford and Wendt, in loco.—εἰδωλοθύτων, see ver. 20.—πνικτοῦ: omitted in Western text; see critical notes.—διατηροῦντες ἑαυτοὺς: verb, only in Luke, cf. Luke ii. 51 (in LXX with ἐκ or ἀπό, Ps. xi. 7, Prov. xxi. 23). In Jas. i. 27 we have a somewhat striking similarity of expression (cf. also John xvii. 15).—εὖ πράξετε: "it shall be well with you," R.V.; viz., through the peace and concord established in the Christian community, cf. 2 Macc. ix. 19, so in classical Greek. The reading in A.V. is somewhat ambiguous, but the Greek signifies τούτων, 29. ἀπέχεσθαι εἰδωλοθύτων καὶ αἵματος καὶ[1] πνικτοῦ καὶ πορνείας. ἐξ ὧν διατηροῦντες ἑαυτοὺς εὖ[2] πράξετε. ἔῤῥωσθε.

30. Οἱ μὲν οὖν ἀπολυθέντες[3] ἦλθον εἰς Ἀντιόχειαν· καὶ συναγαγόντες τὸ πλῆθος, ἐπέδωκαν τὴν ἐπιστολήν. 31. ἀναγνόντες δὲ ἐχάρησαν ἐπὶ τῇ παρακλήσει. 32. Ἰούδας δὲ καὶ Σίλας, καὶ αὐτοὶ προφῆται ὄντες,[4] διὰ λόγου πολλοῦ παρεκάλεσαν τοὺς ἀδελφούς, καὶ

P. and H., Arm., Aeth., Const., Chrys., etc.; πνικτων ℵ*A*BC 61, 137, Sah., Boh., Clem., Or., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt (πνικτου introduced after ver. 20). After πορνειας D, Par., Wer.², Syr. Harcl. mg., Sah., Aeth., Irint., Cypr. (with many variations) read και οσα μη θελετε εαυτοις γινεσθαι, ετερῳ μη ποιειν, so Blass in β, and Hilg.

[2] πραξετε ℵAB, Vulg., all edd.; πραξατε CDHL; πραξητε E; see Zahn, u. s., p. 354. After πραξ. D, Iren., Tert. (Ephrem) add φερομενοι εν τω αγιῳ πνευματι, so Blass in β. Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 77, thinks that the gloss has been misplaced, and declining all references to Montanus or Marcion or to N.T. parallels, regards it as simply an expansion or explanation of απολυθεντες, ver. 30; cf. xiii. 4. Weiss also declines all Montanist influence, but takes the words after ευ πραξ. as meaning that they would fare well being guided by the Holy Spirit, by Whom the decree, ver. 28, had been inspired. ερρωσθε, Blass brackets in β, om. by Irenæus; see also Zahn, u. s., p. 354.

[3] ηλθον, but κατηλθον ℵABCD 61, Vulg., Arm., Aeth., Theophyl., so Tisch., W.H., Blass, R.V., Weiss, Wendt. After απολυθεντες D* adds εν ημεραις ολιγαις, so Blass in β, and Hilg. Belser, Beiträge, p. 72, speaks of the addition as more valuable than much gold, as showing their eagerness to bring the good news to Antioch, and the speed of their travelling, contrasted with ver. 3. Weiss however would connect it (p. 82), not with the time consumed in the journey, but with the time of their departure, i.e., they set off a few days after the Council to put an end to the disquietude at Antioch.

[4] After οντες D adds πληρεις πνευματος αγιου, so Blass and Hilg., no Montanistic source; either explanation of προφ. (unnecessary), or may be connected with δια λογου implying that their oral words no less than the written letter were spoken in the Holy Ghost (Weiss, p. 82). Mr. Page, Classical Review, p. 320 (1897), refers this addition, with similar ones in vv. 7 and 29 of this chap., to the characteristic of D "to emphasise words and actions as inspired".

prosperity. For D, see critical notes.—ἔῤῥωσθε, see critical notes, 2 Macc. xi. 21 and 33, 3 Macc. vii. 9, etc., and often in classics; a natural conclusion of a letter addressed to Gentile Christians, see additional note (2) at end of chapter.

Ver. 30. οἱ μὲν οὖν . . . ἀναγνόντες δέ: two parties are presented as acting in concert as here (or in opposition), see Rendall, Acts, Appendix on μὲν οὖν, p. 161.—ἦλθον, but κατῆλθον R.V., Jerusalem is still the centre from which Barnabas and Paul go down. See reading in D, critical note.—τὸ πλῆθος = ἡ ἐκκλησία, cf. xiv. 27; Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 59, especially refers to this passage: τὸ πλ. = Christengemeinde at Antioch, cf. plebs, populus in Lat. Chr. authors.—ἐπέδωκαν τὴν ἐπισ., see instances in Wetstein of same phrase in same sense.

Ver. 31. παρακλήσει: A. and R.V. "consolation" ("exhortation" margin, R.V.). The former rendering seems suitable here, because the letter causes rejoicing, not as an exhortation, but as a message of relief and concord. Ramsay and Hort render "encouragement". Barnabas was a fitting bearer of such a message, cf. iv. 36.

Ver. 32. καὶ αὐτοὶ προφ. ὄντες: Wendt, so Meyer, takes καὶ αὐτοί not with προφ. ὄντες (these words in commas), but with the words which follow, indicating that Judas and Silas gave encouragement to the brethren personally (cf. ver. 27), as the letter had verbally; but punctuation of T.R. in R.V., W.H., Weiss, etc. On καὶ αὐτοί and its frequency in St. Luke, Friedrich, p. 37; Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ (1899), p.

Harcl. mg., Arm., Aeth^ut., so Blass and Hilg. Also D, Gig., Wern., Prov., Vulg.^clem., Cassiod. add μονος δε Ιουδας επορευθη (Wern. adding "reversus est Hierosolyma," cf. also Vulg.^cl.). It is difficult to see why if 34^a was genuine it should have been omitted, but the sentence may have been introduced to account for the presence of Silas at Antioch in ver. 40; so Weiss and Corssen. (In C and D αυτους instead of αυτου, and in a few mins. αυτοθι.) Ver. 34^a is defended as genuine by Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 174, 175; Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 148 (whilst both regard 34^b as a gloss); cf. Belser, Beiträge, p. 73, on the same ground, viz., that ver. 33 does not declare that Judas and Silas actually departed, but only that they were free to depart. The Bezan reviser found the first part of the verse in his text and added the second. Blass retains both parts of the verse in β. If the first clause was introduced to explain a supposed difficulty about Silas, it must be remembered that the difficulty was more fanciful than real, since Barnabas takes Mark from Jerusalem, xiii. 13 (see Ramsay, u. s.). W.H., App., p. 96, considers the first clause as probably Alexandrian, as well as Western, while Corssen regards them both as Western.

33.—παρεκάλεσαν: A. and R.V. "exhorted"; R.V. margin, "comforted," Ramsay, "encouraged" (so Hort; or "exhorted"). Possibly the word may include something of all these meanings (see also Alford's note).—ἐπεστήριξαν, cf. xiv. 22.

Ver. 33. ποιήσαντες δὲ χρόνον, cf. xviii. 23, and xx. 3, only in Acts in N.T., cf. 2 Cor. xi. 25, James iv. 13. For the phrase both in LXX and classical Greek (so in Latin), see Wetstein, Blass, Grimm. In LXX cf. Prov. xiii. 23, Eccl. vi. 12 (Tob. x. 7), so Hebrew עָשָׂה.—μετ' εἰρήνης: exact phrase only Heb. xi. 31 in N.T.; in LXX several times; in Apocryha, in 1 and 3 Macc.—πρὸς τοὺς ἀποσ.: but if as in R.V., "unto those that had sent them" (see critical notes and Hort, Ecclesia, p. 73), i.e., the whole synod at Jerusalem, not only the Apostles.

Ver. 34. Omitted in R.V. text, but not in margin. See critical notes.

Ver. 35. διέτριβον, cf. xii. 19, and see also on xvi. 12. In LXX cf. Lev. xiv. 8, Jer. xlii. (xxxv.) 7, Judith x. 2, 2 Macc. xiv. 23. So also in classics with or without χρόνον.—διδάσ. καὶ εὐαγγ.: possibly the first may refer to work inside the Church, and the second to work outside, but the distinction can scarcely be pressed. Within this time, according to Wendt, falls the incident between Paul and Peter, Gal. ii. 11. On the other hand, see Weiss, Apostelgeschichte, p. 194, who thinks that the τινας ἡμέρας excludes, Gal. ii., etc., but the phrase is very indefinite, and may have included months as well as days, cf. xvi. 12, and ix. 23. On the incident referred to see additional note at end of chapter.

Ver. 36. μετὰ δέ: second missionary journey commences, ending xviii. 22.—ἐπιστρέψαντες, reversi, cf. Luke ii. 39, W.H., xvii. 31. The word is so used in LXX, and in modern Greek (Kennedy, p. 155).—δή, see on xiii. 2.—ἐπισκεψ., see above on vi. 3. The word was characteristic of a man like St. Paul, whose heart was the heart of the world, and who daily sustained the care of all the churches.—πῶς ἔχουσι: "in fide, amore, spe . . . nervus visitationis ecclesiasticæ" Bengel.

Ver. 37. ἐβουλεύσατο, but ἐβούλετο see critical note, "wished," volebat; R.V., "was minded" almost too strong. Possibly owing to his kinship, Barnabas may have taken a more lenient view than Paul.

Ver. 38. ἠξίου, cf. xxviii. 22 (Luke vii. 7), and cf. 1 Macc. xi. 28, 2 Macc. ii. 8, etc.—ἐβούλ. is a mild word compared with this.—συμπαραλαβεῖν, cf. xii. 25, used also by Paul in Gal. ii. 1 of taking Titus with him to Jerusalem, and nowhere else in N.T. except in this passage, cf. Job i. 4, 3 Macc. i. 1, so in classical Greek.—τὸν ἀποστάντα ἀπ' αὐτῶν: the neutral word ἀποχωρεῖν ἀπ' αὐτῶν, xiii. 13, is not used here, but a word which may denote not disloyalty in the sense of apostasy from Christ, but to the mission, ἐπιμεῖναι αὐτοῦ. 35. Παῦλος δὲ καὶ Βαρνάβας διέτριβον ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ, διδάσκοντες καὶ εὐαγγελιζόμενοι, μετὰ καὶ ἑτέρων πολλῶν, τὸν λόγον τοῦ Κυρίου.

1 Tim. iv. 1 (Rendall); it is doubtful, however, whether we can press this (see Weiss, in loco).—τοῦτον: significant at the end of the verse, and note also decisive contradiction between συμπαραλ., ver. 37, and μὴ συμπαραλ. here.

Ver. 39. παροξυσμός, Heb. x. 24, in different sense, nowhere else in N.T. The verb is found twice, Acts xvii. 16, 1 Cor. xiii. 5; in the former passage of Paul's righteous provocation in Athens, and in the latter of irritation of mind as here; the noun twice in LXX of God's righteous anger, Deut. xxix. 28, Jer. xxxix. (xxxii.) 37 (cf. also the verb, Deut. ix. 7, 8, etc.), so too in Dem. Both noun and verb are common in medical language (Hobart); παροξυσμός, φησίν, ἐγένετο οὐχ ἔχθρα οὐδὲ φιλονεικία; in the result good, for Mark was stirred up to greater diligence by Paul, and the kindness of Barnabas made him cling to him all the more devotedly, cf. Oecumenius, in loco.—ἀποχωρισθῆναι: "they parted asunder," R.V., cf. διαχωρίζεσθαι ἀπό, Gen. xiii. 11, 14, cf. Luke ix. 33.—παραλαβόντα: not the compound verb, because Barnabas alone takes Mark.—ἐκπλεῦσαι: with εἰς also in xviii. 18, with ἀπό in xx. 6; on πλέω and the number of its compounds in St. Luke, cf. xxvii. 4, etc.—εἰς Κ.: where he could be sure of influence, since by family he belonged to the Jews settled there, iv. 36. Barnabas is not mentioned again in Acts, and it is to be noted that St. Paul's friendship was not permanently impaired either with him or with Mark (see Chrysostom, in loco, and cf. 1 Cor. ix. 6). In Gal. ii. 13 St. Paul in speaking of Barnabas marks by implication his high estimate of his character and the expectations he had formed of him; καὶ Β. "even Barnabas" (Lightfoot, Gal., in loco, and Hackett). According to tradition Barnabas remained in Cyprus until his death, and the appearance of Mark at a later stage may point to this; but although possibly Mark's rejoining Paul may have been occasioned by the death of Barnabas, the sources for the life of Barnabas outside the N.T. are quite untrustworthy, "Barnabas," B.D.[2]; Hackett, Acts, p. 192. Whatever his fortunes may have been, St. Luke did not estimate his work in the same category as that of Paul as a main factor in the development of the Church, although we must never forget that "twice over did Barnabas save Saul for the work of Christianity".—Μάρκον: In his two imprisonments St. Paul mentions Mark in terms of high approval, Col. iv. 10, 11, Philem. 24, 2 Tim. iv. 11. In the first imprisonment St. Paul significantly recommends him to the Colossians as being the cousin of Barnabas, one of his own fellow-labourers unto the kingdom of God, one amongst the few who had been a παρηγορία, a comfort unto him. In such words as these St. Paul breaks the silence of the years during which we hear nothing of the relations between him and Mark, although the same notice in Colossians seems to indicate an earlier reconciliation than the date of the letter, since the Churches of the Lycus valley had already been instructed to receive Mark if he passed that way, Expositor, August, 1897, "St. Mark in the N.T." (Dr. Swete), p. 85.

Ver. 40. Π. δὲ ἐπιλεξ. Σ.: not in the place of Mark, but in the place of Barnabas, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 171; having chosen, i.e., for himself: sibi eligere; only in N.T. in this sense, but in classical Greek and in LXX, 1 Sam. ii. 28 A, 2 Sam. x. 9 R, Ecclus. vi. 18, 1 Esdras ix. 16, 1 Macc. i. 63 R, v. 17, etc.; "elegit ut socium, non ut ministrum" (Blass). If Silas had not returned to Jerusalem, but had remained in Antioch (see above on ver. 35), he had doubtless recommended himself to Paul by some special proof of fitness for dealing sympathetically with the relations of the Jewish Christians and the Gentile converts. This sympathy on the part of Silas would be the more marked and significant as he was himself almost certainly a Hebrew; otherwise we cannot account for his high position in the Jerusalem Church, ver. 22, although his Roman citizenship is implied in xvi. 37; perhaps this latter fact may account for his freedom from narrow Jewish prejudices. If we may identify, as we reasonably may, the Silas of Acts with the Silas (Silvanus) of the Epistles, 2 Cor. i. 19, 1 Thess. i. 1, 2 Thess. i. 1, 1 Pet. v. 12, the last mention of him by St. Peter becomes very suggestive. For St. Peter's First Epistle contains the names of the two men, Mark and Silvanus, who had originally been members of the Jerusalem Church, Acts xii. 12, xv. 22, and moreover the two oldest of St. Paul's associates, whose brotherly Christian concord had been broken for the time (when Paul chose the latter in the place of Barnabas, and rejected Mark's services altogether), but who are now both found at St. Peter's side in Rome (assuming that Babylon is Rome), evidently at one with him and with each other; the one the bearer of a letter, the other the sender of greetings, to Pauline Churches. If St. Paul had passed to his rest, and the leader had thus changed, the teaching was the same, as the names of Silvanus and Mark assure us, and St. Peter takes up and carries on the work of the Apostle of the Gentiles, see Dr. Swete, u. s., pp. 87, 88.—ἐξῆλθε, cf. Luke ix. 6, 3 John, ver. 7, where the word is used of going forth for missionary work.—παραδοθεὶς, cf. xiv. 26. Possibly we may infer that the Church took Paul's view of the point at issue between himself and Barnabas, but on the other hand we cannot prove this, because the writer's thoughts are so specially fixed upon Paul as the great and chief worker in the organisation and unification of the Church.

Ver. 41. διήρχετο, see above on xiii. 6.—Συρίαν καὶ Κιλικίαν: as Barnabas had turned to Cyprus, the scene of his early labours in the Gospel, and perhaps also his own home, so Paul turned to Syria and Cilicia, not only because his home was in Cilicia, but also because he had worked there in his early Christian life and labours, Gal., i., 21, 23. It is a coincidence with the notice in Gal. that St. Luke here and in ver. 23 presupposes the existence of Churches in Syria and Cilicia, although nothing had been previously said of their foundation, whilst the presence of Saul at Tarsus is twice intimated, ix. 30, xi. 25. Moreover the commencement of the letter, vv. 22, 23, indicates that these regions had been the centre of the teaching of the Judaisers, and St. Paul's presence, together with the fact that Silas, a prominent and leading member of the Jerusalem Church, was his colleague, would doubtless help to prevent further disquiet. On the addition to the verse in the Bezan text see critical note.

Amongst recent writers on the Acts, Mr. Rendall has stated that the evidence for the identification of Acts xv. with Gal. ii. 1-10 is overwhelming, Appendix to Acts, pp. 357, 359. If we cannot fully endorse this, it is at all events noticeable that critics of widely different schools of thought have refused to regard the alleged differences between the two as irreconcilable; in this conservative writers like Lechler, Godet, Belser, Knabenbauer and Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 627, 628; scientific critics, as we may call them, like Reuss, B. Weiss; and still more advanced critics like Lipsius and H. Holtzmann are agreed. This general agreement is recognised and endorsed by Wendt, p. 255 (1899), see also K. Schmidt, "Apostelkonvent," in Real-Encyclopädie für protest. Theol. (Hauck), p. 704 ff. Amongst English writers Lightfoot, Hort, Sanday, Salmon, Drummond, Turner may be quoted on the same side (so too McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 208), (see for the points of agreement, Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 123; Drummond, Galatians, p. 73 ff.; Salmon, "Galatians," B.D.²; Reuss, Geschichte des h. S. des N. T., p. 60, sixth edition, and very fully in Belser, Die Selbstvertheidigung der h. Paulus im Galaterbriefe, p. 83 ff., 1896; for the difficulty in identifying Gal. ii. with any other visit of St. Paul to Jerusalem, cf. Salmon, Lightfoot, u. s., and Zahn, u. s., Felten, Introd. to Apostelgeschichte, p. 46). But the recent forcible attempt of Professor Ramsay to identify Gal. ii. 1-10 with St. Paul's second visit to Jerusalem, Acts xi. 30, xii. 25, and not with the third visit, Acts xv., has opened up the whole question again (see on the same identification recently proposed from a very different point of view by Völter, Witness of the Epistles, p. 231, and also by Spitta, Apostelgeschichte, p. 184). At first sight it is no doubt in favour of this conclusion that according to Acts the journey, xi. 30, is the second made by St. Paul to Jerusalem, and the journey in xv. the third, whilst Gal. ii. 1 also describes a journey which the Apostle αἷς κατηγγείλαμεν τὸν λόγον τοῦ Κυρίου, πῶς ἔχουσι· 37.[1] Βαρνάβας δὲ ἐβουλεύσατο συμπαραλαβεῖν τὸν Ἰωάννην τὸν καλούμενον Μάρκον· himself represents as his second to the mother-city. We cannot fairly solve this difficulty by cutting the knot with McGiffert, who regards Acts xi. 30 and xv. as = Gal. ii. 1-10, and thinks that Luke found two independent accounts of the same journey, and supposed them to refer to separate events (Apostolic Age, p. 171); or by concluding with Drummond, Galatians, p. 78, that the writer of Acts made a mistake in bringing St. Paul to Jerusalem at the time of the famine, so that Gal. ii. and Acts xv. both refer to his second visit (cf. to the same effect, Wendt, p. 218 (1899), who looks upon the visit described in xi. 25 as a mistake of the author, at all events as regards Paul). But McGiffert and Drummond are both right in emphasising one most important and, as it seems to us, crucial difficulty in the way of the view advocated by Ramsay; if he is correct, it is difficult to see any object in the visit described in Acts xv. After the decision already arrived at in Gal. ii. 1-10: Acts xi. 30, xii. 25, the question then ex hypothesi at issue could scarcely have been raised again in the manner described in Acts xv. Moreover, whilst Ramsay admits that another purpose was achieved by the journey to Jerusalem described in Gal. ii. 1-10, although only as a mere private piece of business, St. Paul, p. 57, he maintains that the special and primary object of the visit was to relieve the poor. But if the pillars of the Church were already aware, as ex hypothesi they must have been aware, that St. Paul came to Jerusalem bringing food and money for the poor (Acts xi. 29, 30), we may be pardoned for finding it difficult to believe that the "one charge alone" (Gal. ii. 10) which they gave him was to do the very thing which he actually came for the purpose of doing. If, too, Barnabas and Saul had just been associated in helping the poor, and if the expression ὃ καὶ ἐσπούδασα, Gal. ii. 10, refers, as Professor Ramsay holds, to this service, we should hardly have expected Paul to use the first person singular, but rather to have associated Barnabas with himself in his reference to their work of love and danger. Professor Ramsay emphasises the fact (Expositor, p. 183, March, 1896) that Luke pointedly records that the distribution was carried out to its completion by Barnabas and Saul in person (Acts xii. 25). Why then does Paul only refer to his own zeal in remembering the poor in Acts xi. 29, and xii. 25 = Gal. ii. 1-10? (On the force of the aorist as against Professor Ramsay's view, see Expositor, March, 1899, p. 221, Mr. Vernon Bartlet's note.) Gal. ii. 10 should rather be read in the light of 1 Cor. xvi. 1-3; if the first-named Epistle was also the first in point of time, then we can understand how, whilst it contains no specific and definite mention of a collection for the Church at Jerusalem, which is so emphasised in 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2 Cor. viii. 9, etc., yet the eager desire of the pillars of the Church that the poor in Judæa should be remembered, and the thought of a fund for supplying their needs, may well have been working in St. Paul's mind from the earlier time of the expression of that desire and need, Gal. ii. 10, Expositor, November, 1893, "Pauline Collection for the Saints,' and April, 1894, "The Galatians of St. Paul," Rendall Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 67.

For reasons why St. Paul did not refer to his second visit to Jerusalem when writing to the Galatians see on xi. 30, and Salmon, "Galatians," B.D.[2], p. 1111; Sanday, Expositor, February, 1896, p. 92; Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 61; "Acts of the Apostles," p. 30, Hastings' B.D. and "Chron. of the N.T.," ibid., p. 423; Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 629. Further: Dr. Sanday has emphasised the fact that at the time of St. Paul's second visit to Jerusalem the state of things which we find in Acts xv. (the third visit) did not exist; that a stage in the controversy as to the terms of admission of Gentile converts had been reached by the date of Acts xv. which had not been reached at the date of xi. 30; that at this latter date, e.g., there was no such clear demarcation of spheres between St. Peter and St. Paul, and that it is not until Acts xiii. 46 that the turning-point is actually reached: henceforth St. Paul assumes his true "Apostleship of the Gentiles," and preaches a real "Gospel of the uncircumcision"; see especially Expositor, July, 1896, p. 62. Of course Professor Ramsay's theory obliges us to place Gal. ii. 1-10 before the Apostolic Conference, and to suppose that when the events narrated in Gal. ii. took place, the journey of Acts xiii., xiv. was still in the future. But is not the whole tone and attitude of St. Paul in Gal. ii. 1-10, placing himself, e.g., before Barnabas in ver. 9 and evidently regarding himself as the foremost representative of one sphere of missionary work, as St. Peter was of the other, ver. 8, more easily explained if his first missionary journey was already an accomplished fact and not still in the future?

38. Παῦλος δὲ ἠξίου,[1] τὸν ἀποστάντα ἀπ' αὐτῶν ἀπὸ Παμφυλίας, καὶ μὴ συνελθόντα αὐτοῖς εἰς τὸ ἔργον,[2] μὴ συμπαραλαβεῖν τοῦτον.

[1] For ηξιου D reads ουκ εβουλετο λεγων.

[2] For μη συμπ. τουτον D reads τουτον μη ειναι συν αυτοις; see on the passage Weiss, Codex D, p. 83; but if Weiss is correct, it has been well asked, how came Paul to take Silas? Hilg. reads ιεναι for ειναι. συμπαραλαβειν, cf. ver. 37, but pres. infin. ℵABC 61, 180, Tisch., W.H., Blass, R.V., Wendt, Weiss.

In the two short references to Paul's second visit to Jerusalem, Acts xi. 30, xii. 25, it is still "Barnabas and Saul," so too in xiii. 1, 2, 7; not till xiii. 9 does the change come: henceforth Paul takes the lead, vv. 13, 16, 43, 45, 50, etc., with two exceptions as Professor Ramsay pointedly describes them (see above on xiii. 9), and in the account of the Conference and all connected with it St. Luke and the Church at Antioch evidently regard Paul as the leader, xv. 2 (2), 22 (although the Church at Jerusalem places Barnabas first, vv. 12, 25). But in xi. 30, xii. 25 the historian speaks of "Barnabas and Saul". The whole position of St. Paul assigned to him by St. Luke in Acts xv. is in harmony with the Apostle's own claims and prominence in Gal. ii. 1-10; it is not in harmony with the subordinate place which the same St. Luke assigns to him in the second visit to Jerusalem. In other words, if Gal. ii. 1-10 = Acts xv., then St. Paul's claim to be an Apostle of the Gentiles is ratified by the Gentile Luke; but if Gal. ii. 1-10 = Acts xi. 30, xii. 25, then there is no hint in Acts that Luke as yet regarded Paul in any other light than a subordinate to the Hebrew Barnabas; he is still Saul, not Paul. For the points of discrepancy between Gal. ii. 1-10 and Acts xv. see same authorities as above; one point upon which Ramsay strongly insists, viz., that a visit which is said to be "by revelation," Gal. ii. 2, cannot be identified with a visit which takes place by the appointment of the Church, Acts xv. 2, is surely hypercritical; it would not be the first occasion on which the Spirit and the Church had spoken in harmony; in Acts xiii. 3, 4 the Church ἀπέλυσαν sent away Paul and Barnabas, and yet in the next verse we read οἱ ἐκπεμφθέντες ὑπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος, see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 125; Drummond, Galatians, p. 75; Turner, "Chronology of the N.T.," Hastings' B.D., p. 424; cf. also Wendt, p. 258 (1899), and Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 632, who both point out that the statements referred to are by no means mutually exclusive. On the whole question see Wendt's 1899 edition, p. 255 ff., and Expositor, 1896 (February, March, April, July) for its full discussion by Dr. Sanday and Professor Ramsay.

A further question arises as to the position to be assigned to the incident in Gal. ii. 11-14. Professor Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 157 ff., supposes that it took place before the Apostolic Conference, and finds a description of the occasion of the incident in Acts xv. 1, Acts xv. 24, Gal. ii. 12, i.e., in the words of three authorities, St. Luke, the Apostles at Jerusalem, and St. Paul himself; the actual conflict between St. Peter and St. Paul took place after the latter's second visit to Jerusalem, but before his third visit. The issue of the conflict is not described by Paul, but it is implied in the events of the Jerusalem Conference, Acts xv. 2, 7. Barnabas had wavered, but had afterwards joined Paul; Peter had been rebuked, but had received the rebuke in such a way as to become a champion of freedom in the ensuing Conference, employing to others the argument which had convinced himself, cf. Acts xv. 10, Gal. ii. 14. Mr. Turner, "Chronology of the N.T.," Hastings' B.D., i., 424, is inclined to adopt this view, which identifies the two Judaising missions from Jerusalem to Antioch, Gal.

39. ἐγένετο οὖν παροξυσμός, ὥστε ἀποχωρισθῆναι αὐτοὺς ἀπ' ἀλλήλων, τόν[1] τε Βαρνάβαν παραλαβόντα τὸν Μάρκον ἐκπλεῦσαι εἰς Κύπρον·

[1] D amplifies after αλληλων τοτε Β. παραλαβ. τον Μ. επλευσεν εις Κ., so Blass and Hilg. Weiss sees in τοτε a characteristic of D; cf. ii. 37.

ii. 12 and Acts xv. 1, while he still maintains the ordinary view that Gal. ii. 1-10 = Acts xv. This, as he points out, we may easily do, whilst Gal. ii. 11-14 may be allowed to precede Gal. ii. 1-10 in order of time, and in the absence of the ἔπειτα in Gal. i. 18, 21, ii. 1 there is nothing to suggest that the chronological series is continued. It may be noted that Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, v., 9, had remarked that there is nothing to hinder us from supposing that the dispute at Antioch was prior to the Conference at Jerusalem. Moreover it may be fairly urged that this view puts a more favourable construction on the conduct of St. James and St. Peter in relation to the compact which they had made with Paul at the Jerusalem Conference. But on the attitude of St. James and the expression ἐλθεῖν τινὰς ἀπὸ Ἰακώβου, see Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 79; Lightfoot on Gal. ii. 12; Drummond, Galatians, p. 85; and with regard to the conduct of St. Peter, see Hort, u. s., p. 76; Lightfoot on the collision at Antioch, Galatians, p. 125 ff.; and Salmon, "Galatians," B.D.², p. 1114; Drummond, u. s., p. 78.

On Zahn's position that the dispute between Peter and Paul took place before the Apostolic Conference, when the former betook himself to Antioch after his liberation, Acts xii. 5 ff., a view put forward also by Schneckenburger, Zweck der Apostelgeschichte, p. 109 ff., see Neue Kirchl. Zeitschr., p. 435 ff., 1894, and Belser's criticism, Die Selbstvertheidigung des h. Paulus im Galaterbriefe, p. 127 ff., 1896 (Biblische Studien).

Wendt, pp. 211, 212 (1899), while declining to attempt any explanation either psychological or moral of St. Peter's action in Gal. ii. 11-14, points out with justice how perverse it is to argue that Peter could not have previously conducted himself with reference to Cornelius as Acts describes when we remember that in the incident before us Barnabas, who had been the constant companion of St. Paul in the Gentile mission, shared nevertheless in St. Peter's weakness.

Additional note (2), cf. ver. 29.

A further question arises as to why the particular prohibitions of the Decree are mentioned. According to a very common view they represented the Seven Precepts of Noah, six of which were said to have been given by God to Adam, while the seventh was given as an addition to Noah. The Seven Precepts were as follows: (1) against profanation of God's name; (2) against idolatry; (3) against fornication; (4) against murder; (5) against theft; (6) to obey those in authority; (7) against eating living flesh, i.e., flesh with the blood in it, see Schürer Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 318, E.T.; Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 69. No doubt there are points of contact between these Precepts and the four Prohibitions of the Decree, but at the same time it would seem that there are certainly four of the Precepts to which there is nothing corresponding in the Decree. The Precepts were binding on every Gêr Toshav, a stranger sojourning in the land of Israel, but it has been erroneously supposed that the Gêr Toshav = σεβόμενος, and thus the conclusion is drawn that the idea of the four prohibitions was to place Gentiles on the footing of σεβόμενοι in the Christian community. Against this identification of the Gêr Toshav and the σεβόμενος Schürer's words are decisive, u. s., pp. 318, 319. But if this view was valid historically, the position of the Gentile Christians under such conditions would have been far from satisfactory, and we cannot suppose that Paul would have regarded any such result as a success; still circumcision and the keeping of the law would have been necessary to entitle a man to the full privilege of the Christian Church and name. Ritschl, who takes practically the same view as Wendt below, admits that in a certain degree the Gentile Christians would be regarded as in an inferior position to the Jewish Christians, Altkatholische Kirche, pp. 131, 133, second edition.

It seems even more difficult to trace the prohibitions of the Decree to the Levitical prohibitions, Lev. xvii., xviii., which were binding on strangers or sojourners in Israel (LXX προσήλυτοι), since, if the written law was to be the source of the Jerusalem prohibitions, it is inexplicable that the variations from it both in matter and number should be so observable (Hort, u. s., p. 70); and although Wendt (so Ritschl, Overbeck, Lipsius, Zöckler, Holtzmann, and others; see on the other hand, Weiss, Biblische Theol., p. 145; Felten, Apostelgeschichte, p. 297; Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 306; Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., i., 72, 73, 1896) adopts the view that in the four prohibitions of the Jerusalem Decree we have the form in which prohibitions binding upon proselytes in the wider sense, i.e., upon the uncircumcised φοβούμ. or σεβ. τὸν Θεόν, existed in the Apostolic days, he can only say that this is "very probable": of direct historical evidence, as Zöckler admits, there is none. The difficulty is so great in supposing that Paul and Barnabas could have submitted to the distinction drawn between the Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians that it has led to doubts as to the historical character of the decree. Weizsäcker and McGiffert maintain that the decree was formulated after Paul's departure, when James had reconsidered the matter, and had determined that some restriction should be put upon the complete Gentile liberty which had been previously granted. But this view can only be maintained by the sacrifice of xvi. 4, where Paul is distinctly said to have given the decrees to the Churches to keep.

Ramsay, agreeing with Lightfoot, calls the Decree a compromise, and although, as he points out, it seems impossible to suppose that St. Paul would have endorsed a decree which thus made mere points of ritual compulsory, it is probable, he thinks, that after the exordium in which the Jewish party had been so emphatically condemned, the concluding part of the Decree would be regarded as a strong recommendation that the four points should be observed in the interests of peace and amity (St. Paul, p. 172). In a previous passage, p. 167, he seems to take a very similar view to Wendt, who answers the question as to how the Precepts of the Decree were to be observed by the Gentile converts by maintaining that they were an attempt to make intercourse more feasible between the Jewish Christians and their Gentile brethren, p. 265 (1899).

We naturally ask why the Decree apparently fell so quickly into abeyance, and why it did not hold good over a wider area, since in writing to Corinth and Rome St. Paul never refers to it. But, to say nothing of the principle laid down in the reading of Codex D (see above on p. 323), St. Paul's language in 1 Cor. viii. 1-13, x. 14-22, Rom. xiv., may be fairly said to possess the spirit of the Decree, and to mark the discriminating wisdom of one eager to lead his disciples behind the rule to the principle; and there is no more reason to doubt the historical truth of the compact made in the Jerusalem Decree, because St. Paul never expressly refers to it, than there is to throw doubt upon his statement in Gal. ii. 10, because he does not expressly refer to it as an additional motive for urging the Corinthians to join in the collection for the poor saints, 2 Cor. viii. 9. But further, there is a sufficient answer to the above question in the fact that the Decree was ordained for the Churches which are specifically mentioned, viz., those of Antioch (placed first as the centre of importance, not only as the local capital of Syria, but as the mother of the Gentile Churches, the Church from which the deputation had come), Syria and Cilicia. In these Churches Jewish prejudice had made itself felt, and in these Churches with their constant communication with Jerusalem the Decree would be maintained. The language of St. James in xxi. 25 proves that some years later reference was naturally made to the Decree as a standard still regulating the intercourse between Jewish and Gentile Christians, at least in Jerusalem, and we may presume in the Churches neighbouring. St. Paul's attitude towards the Decree is marked by loyal acceptance on the one hand, and on the other by a deepening recognition of his own special sphere among the Gentiles as the Apostle of the Gentiles, Gal. ii. 9. Thus we find him delivering the Decrees to the Churches of his first missionary journey, xvi. 4, although those Churches were not mentioned in the address of the Decree (no mention is made of the same action on his part towards the Churches in Syria and Cilicia, xv. 41, doubtless because they were already aware of the enactments prescribed). It may well be that St. Paul regarded himself as the missionary-Apostle of the Church at Antioch, sent forth from that Church for a special work, and that he would recognise that if the Antiochian Christians were to be loyal to the compact of Jerusalem, he as their representative and emissary must enforce the requirements of that compact in revisiting those regions in which the converts had been so instrumental in causing the Decree to be enacted.

But the work upon which he had been specially sent forth from Antioch had been fulfilled, xiv. 27; the Conference at Jerusalem had assigned a wider and a separate sphere to his labours; henceforth his Apostleship to the Gentiles εἰς τὰ ἔθνη was more definitely recognised, and more abundantly fulfilled; and in what may be called strictly Gentile Churches, in Churches not only further removed from Palestine, but in which his own Apostleship was adequate authority, he may well have felt that he was relieved from enforcing the Decree. In these Churches the stress laid upon such secondary matters as "things strangled and blood" would simply have been a cause of perplexity, a burden too heavy to bear, the source of a Christianity maimed by Jewish particularism, see Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 127, 305; Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 88, 89; Judaistic Christianity, p. 74; Speaker's Commentary, Acts, p. 325; Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 254; "Apostelkonvent," K. Schmidt in Real-Encyclopädie für protest. Theol. (Hauck), pp. 710, 711 (1896); Wendt, p. 269 (1899); and for the after-history of the Decree, K. Schmidt, u. s., Lightfoot, u .s., Plumptre, Felten, and cf. also Hooker's remarks, Eccles. Pol., iv., 11, 5 ff.

On the attempt to place the Apostolic Conference at Jerusalem before chaps. xiii. and xiv., see Apostelgeschichte, Wendt (1899), pp. 254, 255, and McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 181. Weizsäcker adopts this view because no mention is made in Gal. i. 21 of the missionary journey in Acts xiii., xiv., and he therefore maintains that it could only have taken place after the Conference, but the Epistle does not require that Paul should give a complete account of all his missionary experiences outside Judæa; he is only concerned to show how far he was or was not likely to have received his Gospel from the older Apostles.

Moreover, it is very difficult to find a place for the close companionship of Paul and Barnabas, and their mutual labours in xiii., xiv. subsequent to the incident described in Gal. ii. 13, whether that incident took place just before or just after the Jerusalem Conference; in either case a previous mutual association between Paul and Barnabas in mission work amongst the Gentiles, such as that described in Acts xiii., xiv., accounts for the expectations Paul had evidently formed of Barnabas, Gal. ii. 13, and also for the position which the latter holds in Gal. ii. 1-10.

Space forbids us to make more than a very brief reference to the attempts to break up chap. xv. into various sources. Spitta, who places the whole section xv. 1-33 before chap. xiii., refers vv. 1-4, 13-33 to his inferior source B, which the reviser has wrongly inserted here instead of in its proper place after xii. 24, and has added vv. 5-12. Clemen in the same section, which he regards as an interpolation, assigns vv. 1-4, 13-18, 20-22, to his Redactor Judaicus, and vv. 5-12, 19, 23-33 to Redactor Antijudaicus. Clemen, like Spitta, holds that ver. 34 simply takes up again xiv. 28; further, he regards xxi. 17-20a as the source of xv. 1-4, but Jüngst cautiously remarks that there is nothing strange in the fact that an author should use similar expressions to describe similar situations (p. 146)—a piece of advice which he might himself have remembered with advantage on other occasions. Hilgenfeld's "author to Theophilus" plays a large part in the representation of the negotiations at Jerusalem in respect to the Conference and the Decree, and this representation is based, according to Hilgenfeld, upon the narrative of the conversion of Cornelius which the same author had formerly embellished, although not without some connection with tradition (Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., p. 59 ff., 1896). Still more recently Wendt (1899) credits the author of Acts with a tolerably free revision of the tradition he had received, with a view of representing the harmony between Paul and the original Apostles in the clearest light: thus the speeches of Peter and James in xv. are essentially his composition; but Wendt concludes by asserting that it seems in his judgment impossible to separate exactly the additions made by the author of Acts from the tradition, another note of caution against hasty subjective conclusions.

(cf. vv. 5, 12 for omission of αποστολοι in β). The words look like an obvious addition, cf. xvi. 4, but Belser, Beiträge, p. 73, defends as "very interesting," as showing that whilst the mission of Judas and Silas was limited to Antioch, Paul was afterwards in person the bearer of the decree to the Churches in Syria and Cilicia; see however Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 173, 174; C. R. E., p. 87.

After γυν. 25 (Gig., Prov., Wern.) has χηρας—Blass rejects. At beginning of verse D, Syr. Harcl. mg. (Gig., Cassiod.) prefix διελθων δε τα εθνη ταυτα, to show that Lystra and Derbe were not included in Syria and Cilicia, so also the και in AB may point to the same reason; see Ramsay, C. R. E., p. 87.

15, xxi. 7, xxv. 13, xxvi. 7, xxvii. 12, xxviii. 13, 1 Cor. x. 11, xiv. 36, Ephes. iv. 13, Phil. iii. 11. But whilst in St. Paul it is used in a figurative sense, it is used eight times by St. Luke of arriving at a place and making some stay there, cf. 2 Macc. iv. 21, 44. The fact that the verb is thus used frequently in the second part of Acts and not in i.-xii. is surely easily accounted for by the subjects of the narrative (Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 147).—εἰς Δέρβην καὶ Λ.: if we read εἰς before Λ., also (see critical note): "he came also to Derbe and to Lystra". The purpose was implied in xv. 36, but here places mentioned in the inverse order of xiv. 6 since coming from Cilicia through the "Cilician Gates" St. Paul would visit Derbe first, see Hastings' B.D., "Derbe" (Ramsay). The two places are grouped together as a region according to the Roman classification (Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 110, 179). The second εἰς before Λ. marks that while Derbe is mentioned as a place visited, Lystra is the scene of the events in the sequel.—καὶ ἰδού: indicating the surprising fact that a successor to Mark was found at once (so Weiss); whilst Hort still more significantly marks the form of the phrase by pointing out that St. Luke reserves it for sudden and as it were providential interpretations, Ecclesia, p. 179, cf. i. 10, viii. 17, x. 17, xi. 7: however disheartening had been the rupture with Barnabas, in Timothy Paul was to find another "son of consolation," cf. Hort's comment on 1 Tim. i. 18 in this connection, u. s., pp. 179-185. It must not however be forgotten that there are good reasons for seeing in Timothy not the successor of Barnabas (this was Silas), but of Mark. It could hardly be said of one in the position of Silas that he was like Mark a ὑπηρέτης, on a mere subordinate footing, whereas on the other hand the difference of age between Barnabas and Timothy, and their relative positions to St. Paul would have naturally placed Timothy in a subordinate position from the first.—ἐκεῖ, i.e., at Lystra, most probably. The view that reference is made not to Lystra but to Derbe arises from supposing that in xx. 4 the word Δερβαῖος refers to Timothy and not to Gaius, the truth being that Timothy is not described because already well known. Certainly the fact that his character was testified of by those of Lystra, as well as St. Paul's reference to Lystra in 2 Tim. iii. 11, seems to favour Lystra as being at all events the home of Timothy, if not his birthplace. There is no reason why the Gaius mentioned as of Macedonia, xix. 29, should be identified with the Gaius of xx. 4. Gaius was a very common name, and in the N.T. we have apparently references to four persons bearing the name. Blass however refers Δερβαῖος in xx. 4 to Timothy.—υἱὸς γυναικός τ. Ἰουδ. πιστῆς π. δὲ Ε.: such marriages although forbidden by the law, Ezra x. 2, were sanctioned under certain conditions, cf. xxiv. 24 in the case of Drusilla, wife of Aziz, king of Emesa (see also C. and H., p. 203), who became a proselyte and actually accepted circumcision. In the Diaspora such marriages would probably be more or less frequent, especially if the husband became a proselyte. In this case even if he were ranked as one,

it could only have been as a "proselyte of the gate," otherwise Timothy would surely have been circumcised. We cannot argue from the fact that the boy had been trained in the Jewish Scriptures that his father was a proselyte, for the early training of the child was evidently the work of the mother, 2 Tim. iii. 15. But such a duty according to Jewish law rested primarily upon the father, and the fact that the father here is described as a Greek, without any qualifying adjective as in the case of the wife, indicates that he was a heathen, see Weiss, in loco; Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 115. The mother, Eunice (on spelling see Hastings' B.D.), may conceivably have been a proselyte, as the name is Greek, as also that of Lois, but Ἰουδ. seems to indicate that she was a Jewess by birth. Whether she was a widow or not we cannot say, although there is some evidence, see critical note, which points to the influence of some such tradition. On the picture of a Jewish home, and the influence of a Jewish mother, see Edersheim, u. s.—πιστῆς: Lydia uses the same term of herself in ver. 15. Both mother and son were probably converted in St. Paul's former visit, and there is no reason to suppose with Nösgen that the conversion of the latter was a proof of the growth of the Church in the Apostle's absence.

Ver. 2. ἐμαρτυρεῖτο, cf. vi. 3, x. 22, xxii. 12. The good report which may well have been formed to some extent by the aptitude and fitness which Timothy had shown in the Church during St. Paul's absence may also have helped the Apostle in the selection of his future companion. The union of Lystra and Iconium is quite natural for common intercourse, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 178. There is no reason to suppose with Rendall that Iconium would be the home of Eunice, as the synagogue and principal Jewish colony were there, see Edersheim, u. s.

Ver. 3. περιέτεμεν αὐτὸν: the act might be performed by any Israelite; cf. Gen. xvii. 23 for a similar phrase which may indicate that St. Baul performed the act himself. See also Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, ii., 674; the marriage and the exemption of Timothy from the Mosaic law may be regarded as typical of a relaxation of the exclusive Jewish standard in Lycaonia and Phrygia, and an approximation of the Jew to the pagan population around him, confirmed as it is by the evidence of inscriptions.—διὰ τοὺς Ἰ.: the true answer to the objection raised against Paul's conduct may be found in his own words, 1 Cor. ix. 20 (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 19). As a missionary he would have to make his way amongst the unbelieving Jews in the parts which were most hostile to him, viz., Antioch and Iconium, on his road into Asia. All along this frequented route of trade he would find colonies of Jews in close communication, and the story of Timothy's parentage would be known (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 180). But if so, his own usefulness and that of Timothy would be impaired, since his Jewish countrymen would take offence at seeing him in close intercourse with an uncircumcised person (a reason which McGiffert admits to be conceivable, Apostolic Age, p. 232), and Timothy would have been unacceptable to them, since with a Jewish mother and with a Jewish education he would be regarded as one who refused to adhere to the Jewish rule: "partus sequitur ventrem" (see Wetstein and Nösgen), and to remedy the one fatal flaw which separated him from them: see, however, B. Weiss, Die Briefe Pauli an T., Introd., p. 2, who disagrees with this reason, whilst he lays stress on the other reason mentioned above. On the other hand, both among unbelieving and Christian Jews alike the circumcision of Timothy would not fail to produce a favourable impression. Amongst the former the fact that the convert thus submitted even in manhood to this painful rite would have afforded the clearest evidence that neither he nor his spiritual father despised the seal of the covenant for those who were Jews according to the flesh, whilst the Christian Jews would see in the act a loyal adherence to the Jerusalem decree. It was no question of enforcing circumcision upon Timothy as if it were necessary to salvation; it was simply a question of what was necessary under the special circumstances in which both he and Paul were to seek to gain a hearing for the Gospel on the lines of the Apostolic policy: "to the Jew first, and also to the Greek"; "neque salutis æternæ causa Timotheus circumciditur, sed utilitatis, Blass, cf. Godet, Epître aux Romains, i., pp. 43, 44; Hort, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 85-87; Knabenbauer, in loco. "There is no time in Paul's life when we should suppose him less likely to circumcise one of his converts," says McGiffert, u. s., p. 233, but there were converts and converts, and none has pointed out more plainly than McGiffert that the case of Titus and that of Timothy stood on totally different grounds, and none has insisted on this more emphatically than St. Paul himself: ἀλλ᾽ οὐδὲ Τίτος, Gal. ii. 3. The case of Titus was a case of principle: Titus was a Greek, and if St. Paul had yielded, there would have been no need for the Apostle's further attendance at the conference as the advocate of freedom for the Gentile Churches. In the words Ἕλλην ὤν, Gal. ii. 3, there may have been a tacit allusion to the different position of Timothy, whose parentage was different, and not wholly Gentile as in the case of Titus. For a defence of the historical nature of the incident as against the strictures of Baur, Zeller, Overbeck, Weizsäcker, see Wendt, 1898 and 1899, who regards St. Paul's action as falling under the Apostle's own principle, 1 Cor. ix. 19.—ὑπῆρχεν: Blass translates fuerat, and sees in the word an intimation that the father was no longer living, otherwise we should have ὑπάρχει, cf. Salmon, Hermathena, xxi., p. 229.

Ver. 4. A proof of St. Paul's loyalty to the Jerusalem compact. The decree had not been delivered in Syria and Cilicia (where the letter had been already received), but in Galatia St. Paul delivers it. Wendt regards vv. 4 and 5 as interpolated by the author, who desires to give a universal importance to the decree which had previously been read to a few specified Churches (so too Spitta, Jüngst, Hilgenfeld, Clemen, who refers the verses to his Redactor Antijudaicus). But St. Paul might well feel himself bound to deliver the decree to the Churches evangelised by him before the conference in Jerusalem. Weiss, therefore, is probably right in pointing out that as no mention is again made of any similar proceeding, the action was confined to the Pauline Churches which had been previously founded, Churches which were, as it were, daughter Churches of Antioch.—δόγματα: in the N.T. only in Luke and Paul (cannot be supported in Heb. xi. 23), and only here of the decrees of the Christian Church relative to right living, cf. Ignat., Magnes., xiii., 1; Didachê, xi., 3. In 3 Macc. i. 3 it is used of the rules and requirements of the Mosaic Law, cf. its use by Philo, see further Plummer on Luke ii. 1, and Grimm, sub v. Dr. Hort refers the word back to xv. 22, ἔδοξεν, and so κεκρ. to κρίνω, xv. 19 (cf. xxi. 25), used by St. James. In these expressions he sees "more than advice," but "less than a command," and so here he regards "resolutions" as more nearly expressing the force of this passage, Ecclesia, pp. 81, 82; see however above on xv. 19.

Ver. 5. αἱ μὲν οὖν ἐκκ.: the last time ἐκκλησία is used by St. Luke, except of the Jerusalem Church, and in the peculiar case of the elders at Ephesus, Hort, Ecclesia, p. 95. Rendall, Appendix, μὲν οὖν, p. 165, connects this verse with the following paragraph, cf. ix. 31, so apparently Blass in β.—ἐστερεοῦντο: only used in N.T. in Acts, cf. iii. 7, 16, and only here in this figurative sense, and it is very possible that St. Luke as a medical man might thus employ the verb which he had twice used in its literal sense, cf. similar instances in Hobart's Introd., p. xxxii.; here as in vi. 7, ix. 31, we have the outward growth of numbers and the inward in the stead-

Ver. 6. διελθόντες δὲ τὴν Φ. καὶ τὴν Γ. χώραν, see critical notes, and also additional note at the end of chap. xviii. If we follow R.V. text and omit the second τὴν, and regard both Φ. and Γ. as adjectives with Ramsay and Lightfoot (so Weiss and Wendt, cf. adjective Πισιδίαν, xiii. 14; but see also xviii. 23), under the vinculum of the one article we have one district, "the Phrygo-Galatic country," i.e., ethnically Phrygian, politically Galatian; see also Turner, "Chronology of the N.T.," Hastings' B.D., i., 422, and "The Churches of Galatia," Dr. Gifford, Expositor, July, 1894. But Zahn, Einleitung, i., 134, objects that if Ramsay sees in ver. 6 a recapitulation of the journey, and action in vv. 4 and 5, and includes under the term Phrygo-Galatia the places visited in the first missionary journey, we must include under the term not only Iconium and Antioch, but also Derbe and Lystra. But the two latter, according to xiv. 6, are not Phrygian at all, but Lycaonian. Ramsay, however, sufficiently answers this objection by the distinction which he draws between the phrase before us in xvi. 6 and the phrase used in xviii. 23: τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν. In the verse before us reference is made to the country traversed by Paul after he left Lystra, and so we have quite correctly the territory about Iconium and Antioch described as Phrygo-Galatic; but in xviii. 23 Lystra and Derbe are also included, and therefore we might expect "Lycaono-Galatic and Phrygo-Galatic," but to avoid this complicated phraseology the writer uses the simple phrase: "the Galatic country," while Phrygia denotes either Phrygia Galatica or Phrygia Magna, or both, and see Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 77 and 91-93, and Expositor, August, 1898. Dr. Gifford, in his valuable contribution to the controversy between Prof. Ramsay and Dr. Chase, Expositor, July 1894, while rejecting the North-Galatian theory, would not limit the phrase "the Phrygian and Galatian region" to the country about Iconium and Antioch with Ramsay, but advocates an extension of its meaning to the borderlands of Phrygia and Galatia northward of Antioch.—κωλυθέντες: a favourite word in St. Luke, both in Gospel and Acts, six times in each, cf. viii. 36, x. 47. How the hindrance was effected we are not told, whether by inward monitions, or by prophetic intimations, or by some circumstances which were regarded as providential warnings: "wherefore they were forbidden he does not say, but that they were forbidden he does say—teaching us to obey and not ask questions," Chrys., Hom., xxxiv. On the construction of κωλυθ. with διῆλθον (see critical notes) cf. Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 89; St. Paul, p. 211; Expositor (Epilogue), April, 1894, and Gifford, u. s., pp. 11 and 19. Both writers point out that the South Galatian theory need not depend upon this construction, whether we render it according to A.V. or R.V., εἴασεν αὐτοὺς τὸ Πνεῦμα. 8.[1] παρελθόντες δὲ τὴν Μυσίαν, κατέβησαν εἰς Τρῳάδα. 9. καὶ ὅραμα διὰ τῆς νυκτὸς ὤφθη τῷ Παύλῳ[2]· ἀνήρ τις ἦν Μακεδὼν ἑστώς, παρακαλῶν αὐτὸν καὶ λέγων, Διαβὰς εἰς

[1] For παρελθοντες D, Gig., Vulg. read διελθοντες, so Blass ("recte ') in α and β. But the meaning of παρελ. is disputed. In its ordinary sense of "passing alongside" it can hardly stand, or even "passing along Mysia," i.e., on border of Mysia and Bithynia (Weiss, Codex D, p. 26), as the travellers to reach Troas would pass through Mysia, see below in comment. It seems unlikely that διελθ., a common word, should be changed to παρελθ.—the converse is far more probable; see also Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 83, note. For κατεβησαν D has κατηντησαν: "nos venimus," Iren., iii., 14, 1; see especially Harris, u. s., pp. 64, 65.

(ανηρ) Μακεδων τις ην, so ℵABCD² 13, 31, 61, Vulg., so Tisch., W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt; Μακ. τις, om. ην DE; so D reads also εν οραματι, and before ανηρ D, Syr.-Pesh., Sah. insert ωσει. After εστως D, Syr. Harcl. mg., Sah. add κατα προσωπον αυτου. Belser points out that the phrase occurs only in Luke, Luke ii. 31, Acts iii. 13, xxv. 16, and regards it as original; but see also Corssen, u. s., pp. 436, 437, who compares α and β, and holds that in the latter the reviser has purposely added words for clearness in the description. Blass in β and Hilg. both read these additions.

see further Askwith, Epistle to the Galatians, p. 46, 1899.

Ver. 7. κατὰ τὴν Μ.: "over against Mysia," R.V., i.e., opposite Mysia, or perhaps, on the outskirts of Mysia, cf. xxvii. 7, and Herod., i., 76, κατὰ Σινώπην, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 194, Wendt, p. 354 (1888), and Gifford, u. s., p. 13. If we read εἰς for κατά (2), it means that they endeavoured to go out of Asia into the Roman province Bithynia on the north, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 195.—ἐπείραζον: for a similar use of the verb cf. ix. 26, xxiv. 6.—τὸ Πνεῦμα, add Ἰησοῦ, see critical note. Doctrinally, the expression shows that the Spirit may be called the Spirit of Christ, Rom. viii. 9, or of Jesus, no less than the Spirit of God, Rom., l. c., Matt. x. 20; see Westcott, Historic Faith, p. 106.

Ver. 8. παρελθόντες: "passing by Mysia". Ramsay renders "neglecting Mysia," cf. St. Paul, pp. 194, 196, 197, i.e., passing through it without preaching. McGiffert, p. 235, so Wendt (1899), following Ramsay. Rendall, p. 278, explains "passing along or alongside of Mysia," i.e., skirting it, the southern portion of it. The words cannot mean passing by without entering. Mysia was part of Asia, but there was no disobedience to the divine command, which, while it forbade them to preach in Mysia did not forbid them to enter it. Troas could not be reached without crossing Mysia; Blass sees this clearly enough (but note his reading): "non prætereunda sed transeunda erat Mysia, ut ad Ægæum mare venirent," Blass, in loco, cf. also Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 76; Wendt (1899), in loco.—Τρῳάδα: a town on the sea coast (Alexandria Troas, in honour of Alexander the Great), a Roman colony and an important port for communication between Europe and the north-west of Asia Minor, opposite Tenedos, but not to be identified with New Ilium, which was built on the site of ancient Troy, considerably further north. It was not reckoned as belonging to either of the provinces Asia or Bithynia, cf. also xx. 5, 2 Cor. ii. 13, 2 Tim. iv. 13: C. and H., pp. 215 and 544, Renan, St. Paul, p. 128, Zöckler, in loco.

Ver. 9. καὶ ὅραμα: used by St. Luke eleven times in Acts elsewhere (in N.T. only once, Matt. xvii. 19), three times in i.-xii., and eight times in xii.-xxviii. (see Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 144). But St. Luke never uses ὄναρ; sometimes ὅρ. διὰ νυκτός as here, sometimes ὅρ. alone. It is quite arbitrary on the part of Baur, Zeller, Overbeck to interpret this as a mere symbolical representation by the author of the Acts of the eagerness of the Macedonians for the message of salvation; see as against this view not only Wendt and Zöckler but Spitta, p. 331. Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., ii., p. 189, 1896, thinks that the "author to Theophilus" here used and partly transcribed an account of one of the oldest members of the Church of Antioch who had written the journey of St. Paul partly as an eye-witness, and see for the question of the "We" sections Introduction.—ἀνήρ τις ἦν Μ.: Ramsay,

Μακεδονίαν βοήθησον ἡμῖν. 10.[1] ὡς δὲ τὸ ὅραμα εἶδεν, εὐθέως ἐζητήσαμεν ἐξελθεῖν εἰς τὴν Μακεδονίαν, συμβιβάζοντες ὅτι προσκέκληται ἡμᾶς ὁ Κύριος εὐαγγελίσασθαι αὐτούς. 11. Ἀναχθέντες οὖν ἀπὸ τῆς Τρωάδος, εὐθυδρομήσαμεν εἰς Σαμοθράκην, τῇ τε here in agreement with Renan, identifies this man with St. Luke, St. Paul, pp. 202, 203. But it can scarcely be said that anything in the narrative justifies this identification. Ramsay asks: Was Luke already a Christian, or had he come under the influence of Christianity through meeting Paul at Troas? and he himself evidently sympathises entirely with the former view. The probability, however, of previous intercourse between Luke and Paul has given rise to some interesting conjectures—possibly they may have met in student days when Luke studied as a medical student in the university (as we may call it) of Tarsus; in the passage before us the succeeding words in ver. 10 lead to the natural inference that Luke too was a preacher of the Gospel, and had already done the work of an Evangelist. Ramsay admits that the meeting with Luke at Troas may have been sought by Paul on the ground of the former's professional skill, p. 205. He further maintains that Paul could not have known that the man was a Macedonian unless he had been personally known to him, but surely the man's own words sufficiently implied it (Knabenbauer), even if we do not agree with Blass, in loco, that Paul must have recognised a Macedonian by his dress. At all events it is quite unnecessary with Grotius (so Bede) to suppose that reference is made to the angel of Macedonia, "angelus Macedoniam curans," Dan. x. 12. On the importance of this verse in the "We" sections see Introduction: Ramsay, p. 200, Blass, Proleg., p. x.

[1] D, Sah. read διεγερθεις ουν διηγησατο το οραμα ημιν, and D continues και ενοησαμεν οτι προσκεκληται ημας ο κ. ευαγγελισασθαι τους εν τη Μακεδονιᾳ, so Blass in β, and Hilg. Wendt (1899) refers to Corssen, u. s., and regards addition as simply elaboration of the vision.

Ver. 10. εἰς Μ.: It is easy to understand St. Paul's eagerness to follow the vision after he had been twice hindered in his purpose, although it may well be that neither he nor St. Luke regarded the journey from Troas to Philippi as a passage from one continent to another continent—Macedonia and Asia were two provinces of the Roman empire, Ramsay, p. 199. But in the good Providence of Him Who sees with larger other eyes than ours St. Paul's first European Church was now founded, although perhaps it is venturesome to say that the Gospel was now first preached on the continent of Europe, as the good tidings may have reached Rome through the Jews and proselytes who heard St. Peter on the day of Pentecost, cf. Acts ii. 9; see McGiffert's remarks, pp. 235, 236, on the providential guidance of St. Paul at this juncture, and Lightfoot, Biblical Essays "The Churches of Macedonia".—συμβιβάζοντες, see on ix. 22.

Ver. 11. ἀναχθέντες, see on xiii. 13.—εὐθυδρομήσαμεν: only in Acts here and in xxi. 1, nowhere else in N.T., not in LXX or Apocrypha but used by Philo, cf. St. Luke's true Greek feeling for the sea, Ramsay, p. 205. Strabo used εὐθύδρομος, p. 45, and elsewhere St. Luke's language may point to the influence of the great geographer; see Plumptre's Introduction to St. Luke's Gospel.—Σαμοθρᾴκην: an island of the Ægean sea on the Thracian coast about half-way between Troas and Neapolis, but with adverse winds or calms the voyage from Philippi to Troas takes five days, xx. 6. Samothracia, with the exception of Mount Athos, was the highest point in this part of the Ægean, and would have been a familiar landmark for every Greek sailor, see C. and H., pp. 220, 221.—Νεάπολιν: modern Cavallo, the harbour of Philippi, lying some miles further north: Thracian, but after Vespasian reckoned as Macedonian; opposite Thasos, C. and H., p. 221; Renan, Saint Paul, p. 139.—τῇ τε ἐπιούσῃ, sc., ἡμέρᾳ, cf. xx. 15, xxi. 18, with ἡμέρᾳ added, vii. 26, xxiii. 11, so too in classical Greek, Polyb., Jos.; in N.T., phrase only found in Acts: mark the exact note of time.

Ver. 12. ἐκεῖθέν τε εἰς Φ.: on or near the site of Krenides (Wells or Fountains), so called from its founder Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. Near Philippi, Octavius and Anthony had decisively defeated Brutus and Cassius, ἐπιούσῃ εἰς [1] Νεάπολιν, 12. ἐκεῖθέν τε εἰς Φιλίππους, ἥτις ἐστὶ πρώτη [2] τῆς μερίδος τῆς Μακεδονίας πόλις κολωνία.

Ἦμεν δὲ ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ πόλει διατρίβοντες ἡμέρας τινάς, 13. τῇ τε ἡμέρᾳ τῶν σαββάτων ἐξήλθομεν ἔξω τῆς [3] πόλεως παρὰ ποταμόν, οὗ ἐνομίζετο προσευχὴ εἶναι, καὶ καθίσαντες ἐλαλοῦμεν ταῖς συνελθούσαις

[1] Νεαπολιν, but Νεαν Πολιν ℵABD², so Tisch., W.H., Blass, R.V., Weiss; see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 37; D 137, Syr. Harcl. mg. prefix τῃ δε επαυριον, so Blass and Hilg. If this is a revision, it is a further proof of the oft-recurring fact that the Western reviser takes nothing for granted.

[2] πρωτη της μεριδος της Μ. πολις κολωνια; om. της before Μ. ℵACE 31, 40, 61, 180, Tisch., W.H., R.V., but retained in BDHLP, so by Weiss; B has the article before Μ. instead of before μεριδος. ℵAC read πρωτη της μεριδος Μακεδονιας π. κ.; B has πρωτη μεριδος της Μακ.; D has κεφαλη της Μακ. (so Hilg.). Blass in β (so Prov.) (see p. xx.) inserts πρωτης μεριδος της Μακ. and rejects κεφαλη, which is read in D and Syr.-Pesh., Lat. caput, while μεριδος is omitted by D 137, Syr. Pesh. and Harcl.; see W.H., App., for Hort's conjecture, Πιεριδος; Lightfoot, Phil., p. 50; Wendt, 1888 and 1899; and Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 100, and C. R. E., p. 156; see additional note at end of chapter.

[3] πολεως, but πυλης ℵABCD 13, 40, 61, Vulg., Sah., Boh., W.H., R.V., Weiss, so Blass and Hilg.; πολ. may have been a marginal expl. of πυλης (see Alford and Wendt). ενομιζετο προσευχη ειναι, so EHLP, Amm., Chrys., Theophyl., but Ramsay and Wendt both follow T.R.—Tisch., W.H., Weiss, R.V. prefer ενομιζομεν προσευχην, following ℵC 13, 40, 61, Boh., Aethro. (ℵ ενομιζεν)—AB have ενομιζομεν προσευχη, but this may testify to the originality of the nom., so D εδοκει προσευχη (Blass in β, so Hilg.); cf. Vulg., "videbatur oratio". In α text Blass conjectures ου ενομιζον εν προσευχῃ ειναι. Weiss maintains that in AB the ν in προσευχην has dropped out, and regards ℵC as unquestionably correct.

and to that event it owed the honour of being made a Roman colony with the jus Italicum (R.V., "a Roman colony"), or in other words, "a miniature likeness of the great Roman people," cf. Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 51. Hence both in St. Luke's account of the place, and in St. Paul's Epistle we are constantly face to face with the political life of Rome, with the power and pride of Roman citizenship. But its geographical position really invested Philippi with its chief importance, thoroughfare as it was on the great Egnatian Way for the two continents of Europe and Asia. At Philippi we are standing at the confluence of the stream of Europe and Asiatic life; we see reflected in the evangelisation of Philippi as in a mirror the history of the passage of Christianity from the East to the West, Lightfoot, Phil., p. 49; Renan, St. Paul, p. 140; McGiffert, Apostolic Christianity, p. 239; Speaker's Commentary, vol. iii., 580; C. and H., p. 202 ff.—πρώτη τῆς μερίδος, see Additional note. — κολωνία: "a Roman colony," R.V., there were many Greek colonies, ἀποικία or ἐποικία, but κολ. denoted a Roman colony, i.e., a colony enjoying the jus Italicum like Philippi at this time, governed by Roman law, and on the model of Rome; see "Colony" in B.D.² and Hastings' B.D.—ἦμεν . . . διατρ., see above on i. 10; characteristic Lucan construction.

Ver. 13. πόλεως, see critical notes, and C. and H., p. 226, note.—παρὰ ποταμόν: "by a river side," A. and R.V., see critical notes; here Ramsay sees in the omission of the article a touch of local familiarity and renders "by the river side". On the other hand Weiss holds that the absence of the article merely denotes that they supposed they should find a place of prayer, since a river provided the means for the necessary purifications.—οὗ ἐνομ. προσευχὴ εἶναι, see critical notes: "where there was wont to be held a meeting for prayer" (Ramsay); on the nominative see above. A further difficulty lies in the word ἐνομίζετο. Can it bear the above rendering? Rendall, p. 103, thinks that it hardly admits of it; on the other hand Wendt and Grimm compare 2 Macc. xiv. 4, and see instances of the use of the passive voice in L. and S., Herod., vi., 138. Thuc., iv., 32. Wendt renders γυναιξί. 14. Καί τις γυνὴ ὀνόματι Λυδία, πορφυρόπωλις πόλεως Θυατείρων, σεβομένη τὸν Θεόν,[1] ἤκουεν· ἧς ὁ Κύριος διήνοιξε τὴν

"where there was according to custom a place for prayer". The R.V. reads οὗ ἐνομίζομεν προσευχὴν εἶναι, "where we supposed there was a place of prayer". There is very good authority for rendering προσευχή, "a place of prayer," cf. 3 Macc. vii. 20; Philo, In Flacc., 6; Jos., Vita, 54, cf. also Juvenal, iii., 295, and Tertullian, Adv. Nat., i., 13, etc. To these instances we may add a striking use of the word in an Egyptian inscription, possibly of the third century B.C., Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, pp. 49, 50, see also Curtius, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, ii. 542. No doubt the word occurs also in heathen worship for a place of prayer, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 69, E.T., cf. also Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 214. Where there were no synagogues, owing perhaps to the smallness of the Jewish believers or proselytes, there may well have been a προσευχή, and St. Luke may have wished to mark this by the expression he chooses (in xvii. 1 he speaks of a συναγωγή at Thessalonica), although on the other hand it must not be forgotten that προσευχή might be used of a large building capable of holding a considerable crowd (Jos., u. s.), and we cannot with certainty distinguish between the two buildings, Schürer, u. s., pp. 72, 73. That the river side (not the Strymon, but a stream, the Gangas or Gangites, which flows into the larger river) should be chosen as the place of resort was very natural for the purpose of the Levitical washings, cf. also Juvenal, Sat., iii., 11, and long before Tertullian's day the Decree of Halicarnassus, Jos., Ant., xiv., 10, 23, cf. Ps. cxxxvii. 1, Ezra viii. 15, 21, cf. Plumptre's note on Luke vi. 12.—ταῖς συνελθούσαις γυν.: "which were come together," R.V., i.e., on this particular occasion; A.V. "resorted". It is noticeable that in the three Macedonian towns, Philippi, Thessalonica, Berœa, women are specially mentioned as influenced by the Apostle's labours, and, as in the case of Lydia, it is evident that the women of Philippi occupied a position of considerable freedom and social influence. See this picture fully borne out by extant Macedonian inscriptions, which assign to women a higher social position in Macedonia than was the case for instance in Athens, Lightfoot, Philippians, pp. 55, 56; Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 224, 227, 252. In this lies an answer to the strictures of Hilgenfeld, who regards the whole of ver. 13 as an interpolation of the "author to Theophilus," and so also the expression πορ. ἡμῶν εἰς τὴν προσευχήν, whereas it was quite natural that Paul should go frequently to the Jewish house of prayer.

Ver. 14. Λυδία: she may have taken her name "a solo natali," as Grotius and others have thought, like many of the libertinae, Afra, Græca, Syra; but the name was a popular one for women, cf. its frequent use in Horace. Renan takes it as meaning "the Lydian," and compares Κορινθία in inscriptions, St. Paul, p. 116, cf. also Zahn, Einleitung, i., 375, but on the other hand, Nösgen, in loco.—πορφυρόπωλις: a seller of purple at Philippi of the purple dyed garments from Thyatira, which formed the finest class of her wares. It is evident that she must have possessed a considerable amount of capital to carry on this trade, and we may note that she was thus in a position to help Paul in the expenses connected with his trial, without endorsing Renan's view that she was his wife, St. Paul, p. 148; see below on xxiv. 26. The expression σεβ. τὸν Θεόν shows that she was "a proselyte of the gate"; she could easily have gained her knowledge of the Jewish religion as she was πόλεως Θυατείρων where a Jewish colony had been planted, and there is reason to believe that the Jews were specially devoted to the dyeing industry for which Thyatira and the Lydian land in general were noted. Thus the inscriptions make it certain that there was a guild of dyers οἱ βαφεῖς at Thyatira, cf. Spohn, Miscell. erud. ant., p. 113; Blass in loco; Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i., p. 145; Renan, St. Paul, p. 146, note; Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 376. According to Strabo, Thyatira was a Mysian town, but Ptolemy, v. 2, describes it as belonging to Lydia.—ἤκουεν: imperfect, denoting continuous hearing; the baptism would naturally follow after a period of hearing and instruction, "quod evenit aor. διήνοιξεν declaratur" Blass, see also Bengel.—διήνοιξε τὴν καρδίαν, cf. xvii. 3, Eph. i. 18; in LXX, cf. Hos. ii.

καρδίαν, προσέχειν τοῖς λαλουμένοις ὑπὸ τοῦ Παύλου. 15. ὡς δὲ ἐβαπτίσθη, καὶ ὁ οἶκος αὐτῆς, παρεκάλεσε λέγουσα, Εἰ κεκρίκατέ με πιστὴν τῷ Κυρίῳ εἶναι, εἰσελθόντες εἰς τὸν οἶκόν μου [1] μείνατε· καὶ παρεβιάσατο ἡμᾶς. 16. Ἐγένετο δὲ πορευομένων ἡμῶν εἰς προσευχήν,[2] παιδίσκην τινὰ ἔχουσαν [3] πνεῦμα Πύθωνος ἀπαντῆσαι ἡμῖν, ἥτις ἐργασίαν πολλὴν παρεῖχε τοῖς κυρίοις αὐτῆς μαντευομένη.

[3] πνευμα Πυθωνος, but acc. ℵABC*D* 13, 33, 61, Vulg., Or., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.; T.R. has in its favour C³D²EHLP, tol., Syr. H. mg. gr., Chrys., Eustath., Lucif., Gig.

15 (17), 2 Macc. i. 4. The verb is frequent in St. Luke, Luke xxiv. 31, 32, 45, and in ii. 23 quotation, Acts vii. 56, xvii. 3; only once elsewhere in N.T., Mark vii. 34. "To open is the part of God, to pay attention that of the woman," Chrysostom: ὥστε καὶ θεῖον καὶ ἀνθρώπινον ἦν.—τοῖς λ. ὑπὸ τοῦ Π.: C. and H. see an indication of St. Luke's own modesty: "we spake" in ver. 13, but now only Paul is mentioned.

Ver. 15. ὁ οἶκος: as in the case of Cornelius, so here, the household is received as one into the fold of Christ, cf. ver. 33 and xviii. 8. We cannot say whether children or not were included, although we may well ask with Bengel: "quis credat in tot familiis nullum fuisse infantem?" but nothing against infant baptism, which rests on a much more definite foundation, can be inferred from such cases, "Baptism," Hastings' B.D., p. 242. Possibly Euodia and Syntyche and the other women, Phil. iv. 2, 3, may have been included in the familia of Lydia, who may have employed many slaves and freed women in her trade.—εἰ κεκρίκατε: almost = since you have judged me, viz., by my baptism; or εἰ if instead of ἐπεὶ chosen with delicate modesty.—μείνατε: this has been called the first instance of the hospitality which was afterwards so characteristic of the early Church, and enforced by the words of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John alike; 1 Pet. iv. 9, Rom. xii. 13, 1 Tim. v. 10, etc., 3 John 5, cf. Clement, Cor., i., 17, and see Westcott on Heb. xiii. 2, Uhlhorn, Charity in the Early Church, pp. 91, 325, E.T.; "Hospitality" in B.D.², and Smith and Cheetham, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. Another trait is thus marked in the character of Lydia, the same generosity which afterwards no doubt made her one of the contributors to the Apostle's necessities, as a member of a Church which so frequently helped him.—παρεβιάσατο: only used by St. Luke, once in Luke xxiv. 29, in the same sense as here, cf. LXX, 1 Sam. xxviii. 23, Gen. xix. 9, 2 Kings ii. 17, v. 16 (A omits). The word expresses urgency, but not compulsion (in classical Greek it is used of violent compulsion). The word may imply that Paul and his companions at first declined, cf. 2 Cor. xi. 9 (so Chrys., Bengel), although on occasion he accepted the aid of Christian friends, Phil. iv. 15, and the hospitality of a Christian host, Rom. xvi. 23; or it may refer to the urgent entreaty of Lydia in expression of her thankfulness.

Ver. 16. If we add the article τὴν, see critical note: "to the place of prayer," R.V.—πνεῦμα Πυθῶνος: in R.V., accusative, see critical note, "a spirit, a Python," margin, i.e., a ventriloquist (Ramsay). The passage most frequently quoted in illustration is Plutarch, De defectu Orac., ix., from which it appears that ventriloquists who formerly took their name from Εὐρυκλῆς a famous ventriloquist (cf. Arist., Vesp., 1019) were called Πύθωνες. The word ἐγγαστρίμυθος, ventriloquist (Hebrew אוֹב), of which Πύθων is thus used as an equivalent, is the term employed in the LXX, Lev. xix. 31, xx. 6, 27, 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, etc., for those that have a familiar spirit (cf. also the use of the two words ἐγγαστρ. and Πύθων amongt the Rabbis, R. Salomo on Deut. xviii. 11, and instances in Wetstein), i.e., a man or a woman in whom is the spirit of divination; Gesenius uses אוֹב for the divining spirit, the python, supposed to be present in the body of a sorcerer or conjurer,

17. αὕτη[1] κατακολουθήσασα τῷ Παύλῳ καὶ ἡμῖν, ἔκραζε λέγουσα, Οὗτοι οἱ ἄνθρωποι δοῦλοι τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ὑψίστου εἰσίν, οἵτινες and illustrates from this passage in Acts, and adds that the LXX usually render אבות correctly by ἐγγαστρίμυθοι, ventriloquists, since amongst the ancients this power of ventriloquism was often misused for the purposes of magic. But in addition to ventriloquism, it would certainly seem from the narrative in Acts that some prophetic power was claimed for the maiden, μαντευομένη, so Blass in describing the ἐγγαστρ. "credebatur dæmon e ventre illorum loqui et vaticinari," cf. τὴν Εὐρυκλέους μαντείαν, Arist., u. s.); so too Suidas explains Πύθων as δαιμόνιον μαντικόν, connecting the word directly with the Pythian serpent or dragon, the reputed guardian of the oracle at Delphi, slain by Apollo, the successor to the serpent's oracular power. If therefore the girl was regarded as inspired by the Pythian Apollo, the expression in T.R. simply expresses the current pagan estimate of her state; this is the more probable as the physicians of the time, e.g., Hippocrates, spoke of the way in which some symptoms of epilepsy were popularly attributed to Apollo, Neptune, etc.; article "Divination," B.D.², i., 490; C. and H., p. 231, smaller edition; Lightfoot, Phil., p. 54; Plumptre and Wendt, in loco, and Page on the derivation of the word.—ἐργασίαν: only in Luke and Paul; A. and R.V. "gain," although primarily the word denotes work done, so Rendall, "business"; Wisdom xiii. 19 well illustrates its use here. The word is used of gain (quæstus), Xen., Mem., iii., 10, 1.—τοῖς κυρίοις αὐτῆς, ver. 19, seems to imply not successive but joint owners (on the plural in Luke see Friedrich, p. 21).—μαντευ.: if Luke had believed in her power he would more probably have used προφητεύειν. μαντευ. used only here in N.T., but it is significant that in LXX it is always employed of lying prophets or of divination contrary to the law, e.g., Deut. xviii. 10, 1 Sam. xxviii. 8 (9), Ezek. xiii. 6, xxi. 29 (34), Micah iii. 11, etc. The Greeks themselves distinguished between the two verbs and recognised the superior dignity of προφητεύειν; e.g., Plato contrasts the μάντις who more or less rages (cf. derivation μανία, μαίνομαι, thus fitly used of Pythonesses, Sibyls, and the like) with the προφήτης, Timæus, 71 E, 72 A, B, Trench, Synonyms, i., 26.

[1] κατακολουθουσα is read by ℵBD 180, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Hilg.; but Blass in β follows T.R. ημιν (2)—υμιν is best supported, ℵBDE, Vulg., Syrr. P. and H., Arm., Aethpp., Theodt., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.; Meyer and Lach. follow T.R. (AC²HLP, Sah., Boh., Aethro., Or., Chrys., Eusth.). ημιν would have been easily changed, as it seemed unfitting for the demons.

Ver. 17. κατακολουθήσασα, but if we follow R.V. the present participle denotes that she continuously followed after (κατά), and kept crying (ἔκραζε). The verb is only used by St. Luke in N.T., cf. Luke xxiii. 35; in LXX, Jer. xvii. 16, Dan., LXX, ix. 10, 1 Esd. vii. 1, Jud. xi. 6, 1 Macc. vi. 23, but not in same literal sense as here; used by Polyb., Plut., Jos.—οὗτοι: placed emphatically first (see also Friedrich, pp. 10, 89). If we turn to the Gospel narratives of those possessed with evil spirits, as affording an analogy to the narrative here, we recall how Jesus had found recognition, cf. Mark i. 24, iii. 11, Luke iv. 41 (where the same verb, κράζω, is used of the ἀκάθαρτα πνεύματα καὶ δαιμόνια).—τοῦ Θ. τοῦ ὑψ.: similar title used by the demoniacs in Mark v. 7, Luke viii. 28; see Plumptre's note on former passage. Both Zeller and Friedrich note that Luke alone employs ὁ ὑψ. of God without any word in apposition, Luke i. 32, 35, 76, vi. 35, Acts vii. 48, and that we have the title with τοῦ Θεοῦ, both in his Gospel and Acts. (Heb. vii. 1, probably from Gen. xiv. 18.)—ἡμῖν—ὑμῖν very strongly supported, see critical note. But ἡμῖν might easily have been altered into ὑμῖν, as the former would appear to be an unfitting expression for the evil spirit: but ἡμῖν may point to that disturbed and divided consciousness which seems to have been so characteristic of the possessed (Edersheim); at one time the girl was overmastered by the evil spirit who was her real Κύριος, at another she felt a longing for deliverance from her bondage, and in ἡμῖν she associates herself with those around her who felt a similar longing for some way of salvation, for we must by no means regard her as a mere impostor (Ramsay).

καταγγέλλουσιν ὑμῖν ὁδὸν σωτηρίας. 18. τοῦτο δὲ ἐποίει ἐπὶ πολλὰς ἡμέρας. διαπονηθεὶς δὲ ὁ Παῦλος, καὶ ἐπιστρέψας, τῷ πνεύματι εἶπε, Παραγγέλλω σοι ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐξελθεῖν[1] ἀπ' αὐτῆς. καὶ ἐξῆλθεν αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ. 19. Ἰδόντες δὲ οἱ κύριοι αὐτῆς,[2] ὅτι ἐξῆλθεν ἡ ἐλπὶς τῆς ἐργασίας αὐτῶν, ἐπιλαβόμενοι τὸν Παῦλον καὶ τὸν Σίλαν εἵλκυσαν εἰς τὴν ἀγορὰν ἐπὶ τοὺς ἄρχοντας[3]·

[1] Instead of εξελ. D has ινα εξελθῃς; instead of εξ. αυτῃ τῃ ωρᾳ D has ευθεως; so Blass in β, and Hilg. Belser strongly supports D, see his remarks, Beiträge, p. 77; Blass retains changes in β.

[2] Instead of οτι εξηλθεν η ελπις Blass and Hilg. read οτι απεστερηνται της εργ. αυτων, and adds with D ης ειχον δι' αυτης; but this spoils the play on the εξηλθεν, see below.

[3] αρχοντας, but Gig., Lucif. (not D), Blass ("recte"), read στρατηγους, omitting στρατηγοις in ver. 20.

Ver. 18. διαπονηθεὶς, only here and in iv. 2 in N.T.; its use in LXX in two passages only does not help us much, see iv. 2, and in classics it is not used in the sense required here. Aquila uses it four times of the Hebrew עָצַב in passages which show that the word may combine the ideas of grief, pain, and anger, Gen. vi. 6, xxxiv. 7, 1 Sam. xx. 3, 34. It may be noticed that the word and other compounds of πονεῖν are frequent in medical writers.—Παραγγέλλω, see on i. 4. The same strong word is used of our Lord, Luke viii. 29, where He charged another unclean spirit to come out.—ὀνόματι, see above on iii. 6, "Demonology," Hastings' B.D., where reference is made to Sayce, Hibbert Lect., pp. 302-347, as to the belief in the powerful efficacy of the name, the name meaning to an ancient Semite personal power and existence.—ἐξελθεῖν ἀπ' αὐτῆς: the phrase occurs in Luke much more frequently than in any other N.T. writer; nine times in his Gospel of the coming out of evil spirits, as here. Rendall sees in the phrase the medical accuracy of the writer in describing the process of the cure; the evil spirit must not only come out, but depart, pp. 104, 280; it must however be remembered that St. Matthew uses the same phrase twice of the departure of evil spirits from men, xii. 43, xvii. 18. Paul charges the evil spirit to depart; it departed, and with it departed the master's hope of gain (see also Weiss, in loco).—αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ: "that very hour," R.V., cf. xxii. 13, eo ipso tempore; peculiar to Luke, cf. Luke ii. 38, x. 21, xii. 12, xx. 19, xxiv. 33 (so too Friedrich, p. 37). We are not told anything further of the history of the girl, but we may well believe that she too would partake of the generous help of Lydia, and of the other Christian women at Philippi, who would see in her no longer a bondservant to the many lords who had had dominion over her, but a sister beloved in the One Lord.

Ver. 19. ὅτι ἐξ. ἡ ἐλπὶς κ.τ.λ.: "The most sensitive part of 'civilised' man is his pocket," Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 237, and we can see how bitter was the hostility excited both here and at Ephesus when the new faith threatened existing pecuniary profits.—ἐπιλαβ.: here with hostile intent, see above on ix. 27 and further on xvii. 19.—εἵλκυσαν: with violence, so ἕλκω in James ii. 4 (Acts xxi. 30), cf. Saul before his conversion, viii. 3, σύρων. "Everywhere money the cause of evils: O that heathen cruelty! they wished the girl to be still a demoniac, that they might make money by her!" Chrys., Hom., xxx., 5.—εἰς τὴν ἀγ.: where the magistrates would sit, as in the Roman forum.—ἄρχοντας . . . στρατηγοῖς: it is of course possible that the two clauses mean the same thing, and that the expressions halt, as Lightfoot and Ramsay maintain, between the Greek form and the Latin, between the ordinary Greek term for the supreme board of magistrates in any city ἄρχοντες, and the popular Latin designation στρατηγοί, prætores ("non licet distinguere inter ἀρχ. et στρατ.," Blass, so O. Holtzmann, Weiss, Wendt). But the former may mean the magistrates who happened to be presiding at the time in the forum, whereas the milder verb προσαγαγόντες may imply that there was another stage in the case, and that it was referred to the στρατηγοί, the prætors (as they called themselves), because they were the chief magisterial authorities, and the accusation assumed a political form. Meyer and Zöckler, H. Holtzmann distinguish between the two, as if ἀρχ. were the local magistrates of the town, cf. πολιτάρχης, xvii. 6. In the municipia and coloniæ the chief governing power was in the hands of duoviri who apparently in many places assumed the title of prætors, cf. Cicero, De Leg. Agr., ii., 34, where he speaks with amusement of the duoviri at Capua who showed their ambition in this way, cf. Horace, Sat., i., 5, 34. A duumvir of Philippi is a title borne out by inscriptions, Lightfoot, Phil., p. 51, note; Felten, p. 315.

Ver. 20. οὗτοι, contemptuously Ἰουδ. ὄντες: If the decree of Claudius expelling the Jews from Rome had been enacted, it would have easily inflamed the minds of the people and the magistrates at Philippi against the Jews (cf. xviii. 2, so Holtzmann). Of the bad odour in which the Jews were held we have also other evidences, cf. Cicero, Pro Flacco, xxviii.; Juvenal, xiv., 96-106. On the attitude of the Romans towards the Jews see Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. xix. ff. It was of this intense feeling of hatred and contempt felt by Romans and Greeks alike that the masters of the maiden availed themselves: "causa autem alia atque prætextus caussæ," Blass; the real cause was not a religious but a social and mercenary one, see above on ver. 19, and Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 131; where the accusation was brought on purely religious grounds, as, e.g., at Corinth, xviii. 13, the Roman governor declined to be judge of such matters.—ἐκταράσσουσιν: "exceedingly trouble" (ἐκ), cf. LXX, Ps. xvii. 4, lxxxvii. 16, Wisd. xvii. 3, 4, see Hatch and Redpath, xviii., 7; Plut., Cor., xix., more often in classical Greek, συνταράσσω.

Ver. 21. ἔθη: religious customs here; the charge ostensibly put forward was really that of introducing a religio illicita, licita as it was for the Jews themselves. No doubt the fact that they were Jews presented in itself no ground of accusation, but their Jewish nationality would suggest the kind of customs with the introduction of which it would be easy to charge them, e.g., circumcision. The introduction of Jewish habits and mode of life included under ἔθη, cf. vi. 14, xxi. 21, would upset the whole social system, so that here, as on other occasions, the missionaries suffered from being identified with their Jewish countrymen.—οὐκ ἔξ. παραδέχεσθαι: Wetstein, in loco; Marquardt, Röm. Staatsrecht, iii., 70, and see preceding verse, cf. xv. 5, xxi. 21. In LXX, cf. Exod. xxiii.—Ῥωμαίοις οὖσι: in natural contrast (at the end of the sentence) to the despised Jews: as inhabitants of a Roman colonia they could lay claim to the proud title. On the force of ὑπάρχοντες and οὖσι see Alford's note in loco.

Ver. 22. συνεπέστη: only here in N.T., cf. xviii. 12, not in LXX, but cf. Num. xvi. 3, used in classical Greek, but not in same sense. No reason is given, but the ὄχλος would have been easily swayed by hatred of the Jews, and further incensed perhaps at finding an end put to their love of the revelations of fortune-telling.—περιῤῥήξ. αὐτῶν τὰ ἱμάτια, i.e., they rent off the garments of Paul and Silas; just as there is no change of subject before ἐπιθ., so here probably what was done by the lictors is said to have been done by the magistrates. There is no need to suppose with Bengel that the prætors tore off the prisoners' clothes with their own hands. Grotius (but see on the other hand Calvin's note in loco) takes the words as meaning that the prætors rent off their own clothes (reading αὑτῶν); so Ramsay speaks of the prætors rending their garments in horror at the ἀσέβεια, the impiety. But not only would such an act be strange on the part of Roman magistrates, but also the verb seems to make against the interpretation; it means in classical and in later Greek to rend all round, tear off, cf. the numerous instances in Wetstein, and so it expresses the rough way in which the lictors tore off the garments of the prisoners. In 2 Macc. iv. 38 the word is used of tearing off the garments of another, see Wendt's (1888) note in loco.—ῥαβδίζειν: to beat with rods: thrice St. Paul suffered this punishment, 2 Cor. xi. 25, grievous and degrading, of a Roman scourging, cf. his own words in 1 Thess. ii. 2, ὑβρισθέντες ὡς οἴδατε ἐν Φιλίπποις. Nothing can be alleged against the truthfulness of the narrative on the ground that Paul as a Roman citizen could not have been thus maltreated. The whole proceeding was evidently tumultuary and hasty, and the magistrates acted with the high-handedness characteristic of the fussy provincial authorities; in such a scene St. Paul's protest may well have been made, but would very easily be disregarded. The incident in xxii. 25, which shows us how the Apostle barely escaped a similar punishment amidst the tumult and shouts of the mob in Jerusalem, and the instances quoted by Cicero, In Verr., v., 62, of a prisoner remorselessly scourged, while he cried "inter dolorem crepitumque plagarum" Civis Romanus sum, enables us to see how easily Paul and Silas (who probably enjoyed the Roman citizenship, cf. ver. 37) might have protested and yet have suffered.

ειν· 23. πολλάς τε ἐπιθέντες αὐτοῖς πληγάς, ἔβαλον εἰς φυλακήν, παραγγείλαντες τῷ δεσμοφύλακι ἀσφαλῶς τηρεῖν αὐτούς· 24. ὃς παραγγελίαν τοιαύτην εἰληφώς, ἔβαλεν αὐτοὺς εἰς τὴν ἐσωτέραν φυλακήν, καὶ τοὺς πόδας αὐτῶν ἠσφαλίσατο εἰς τὸ ξύλον. 25. Κατὰ δὲ τὸ μεσονύκτιον Παῦλος καὶ Σίλας προσευχόμενοι ὕμνουν τὸν Θεόν·

Ver. 23. δεσμοφύλακι, Lucian, Tox., 30; Jos., Ant., ii., 5, 1, LXX ἀρχιδεσμοφύλαξ, Gen. xxxix. 21-23, xl. 3 A, xli. 10 A (cf. the word ἀρχισωματοφύλαξ, Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 93). Chrysostom and Oecumenius identify him with Stephanus, but he was the first-fruits of Achaia, 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

Ver. 24. ἐσωτέραν: comparative for superlative, as often in N.T. (Blass). Not necessarily underground, but a part of the prison which would have been further from such light and air as could be had.—τὸ ξύλον, Hebrew סַד, Job xxxiii. 11 (A κυκλώματι), cf. Arist., Eq., 367, 393, 705; Herod., vi., 75; ix., 37; and instances in Wetstein, Liv., viii., 28, Plaut., Capt., iii., 70, Latin nervus. So Eusebius uses the word of the martyrs in Gaul (see Alford). In Jeremiah's case another and equivalent word is used in the Heb. xxix. 26 = LXX ἀπόκλεισμα. The same Hebrew is used in 2 Chron. xvi. 10, where LXX has simply φυλακή.—ἠσφαλίσατο: only elsewhere in N.T. in Matt. xxvii. 64, 65, 66; in LXX and Polyb., cf. critical note, ver. 30 in β.

Ver. 25. κατὰ δὲ τὸ μεσονύκτιον: neuter of the adjective μεσονύκτιος, cf. xx. 7, Luke xi. 5, elsewhere only in Mark xiii. 35, often in medical writers, also in Arist., Strabo, Plutarch; in LXX, Judg. xvi. 3 A, Ruth iii. 8, Ps. cxviii. 62 (Isaiah lix. 10).—προσευχόμενοι, see on chap. xii. 12.—ὕμνουν with accusative Heb. ii. 12 only, cf. Ephes. v. 19, Col. iii. 16, Trench, Syn., ii., 129. "Hoc erat gaudium in Spiritu sancto: in carcere ubi nec genua flectere, nec manus tollere poterant" Wetstein, cf. too the often-quoted words of Tertullian Ad Martyres, ii.: "Nihil crus sentit in nervo quum animus in cœlo est," and Chrys., Hom., xxxvi., "This let us also do, and we shall open for ourselves—not a prison, but heaven. If we pray, we shall be able even to open heaven. Elias both shut and opened heaven by prayer."—ἐπηκροῶντο: used by Plato (Comicus), and referred to by Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 73, as one of the rare words mainly colloquial common to N.T. and the comic poets; it occurs also in Lucian, and in Test., xii., Patr. Not found in LXX (but the cognate noun of hearing so as to obey in 1 Sam. xv. 22). But it is peculiar to St. Luke in N.T., and it was the technical word in medical language for auscultation; the word might therefore naturally be employed by him to denote attentive hearing as God "gave songs in the night". Both verbs ὑμν. and ἐπηκ. are in the imperfect; they were singing, and the prisoners were listening, when the earthquake happened.

Ver. 26. ἄφνω, see on ii. 2.—σεισμὸς, cf. iv. 31, where the divine nearness and presence were manifested in a similar manner; the neighbourhood and the period were conspicuous for such conἐπηκροῶντο δὲ αὐτῶν οἱ δέσμιοι. 26. ἄφνω δὲ σεισμὸς ἐγένετο μέγας, ὥστε σαλευθῆναι τὰ θεμέλια τοῦ δεσμωτηρίου [1]· ἀνεῴχθησάν τε παραχρῆμα αἱ θύραι πᾶσαι, καὶ πάντων τὰ δεσμὰ [2] ἀνέθη. 27. ἔξυπνος δὲ γενόμενος ὁ δεσμοφύλαξ, καὶ ἰδὼν ἀνεῳγμένας τὰς θύρας τῆς φυλακῆς, σπασάμενος [3] μάχαιραν ἔμελλεν ἑαυτὸν ἀναιρεῖν, νομίζων ἐκπεφευγέναι τοὺς δεσμίους. 28. ἐφώνησε δὲ φωνῇ μεγάλῃ ὁ Παῦλος λέγων, Μηδὲν πράξῃς σεαυτῷ κακόν· ἅπαντες γάρ ἐσμεν ἐνθάδε.

[1] ανεῳχθησαν, but BCD 31, 33, 40, 180; so Lach., Alford, W.H., Blass, Weiss Hilg. have ηνεῳχθησαν, whilst ℵAE 13, 54, 61, Or., Tisch have ηνοιχθησαν; Wendt cannot decide. παραχρημα om. B, Lucif., Gig., so Blass; Hilg. retains vulsions of nature, cf. Plumptre on Matt. xxiv. 7, and Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 221.—παραχρῆμα, see critical notes.—ἀνεῴχθησάν τε . . . αἱ θύραι πᾶσαι: any one who has seen a Turkish prison, says Prof. Ramsay, will not wonder at this; "each door was merely closed by a bar, and the earthquake, as it passed along the ground, forced the door-posts apart from each other, so that the bar slipped from its hold, and the door swung open," and see further description on same page.—ἀνέθη, cf. xxvii. 40, nowhere else in N.T. in same sense; in LXX we have the same collocation of words in Mal. iv. 2. See also for the phrase, Plut., Alex., 73; see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 101. If we ask, Why did not the prisoners escape? the answer is that a semi-Oriental mob would be panic-stricken by the earthquake, and there is nothing strange in the fact that they made no dash for safety; moreover, the opportunity must have been very quickly lost, for the jailor was not only roused himself, but evidently called at once to the guard for lights; see Ramsay's description, u. s., and the comments of Blass, in loco, and Felten, note, p. 318, to the same effect as Ramsay, that the prisoners were panic-stricken, and had no time to collect their thoughts for flight.

[2] ανεθη, ℵ[1]D[1] ανελυθη, so Hilg.

[3] μαχαιραν, BCD 61* prefix την, so Lach., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Blass, Hilg.

Ver. 27. ἔξυπνος: only here in N.T., once in LXX, 1 Esd. iii. 3, of Darius waking from sleep.—μάχαιραν: article omitted in T.R., see critical note. Weiss thinks that the omission occurs since in xii. 2, and five times in Luke, no article is found with μάχαιρα. τὴν = his sword, cf. Mark xiv. 47.—ἤμελλεν, cf. iii. 3, v. 35, xii. 6, etc., characteristic Lucan word, see Friedrich, p. 12. The act was quite natural, the act of a man who had lost in his terror his self-control (Weiss).—ἑαυτὸν ἀναιρεῖν: to avoid the disgraceful fate which would be allotted to him by Roman law, according to which the jailor was subjected to the same death as the escaped prisoners would have suffered (Wetstein, in loco), cf. xii. 19, xxvii. 42.—νομίζων, see on vii. 25. It seems hyper-critical to ask, How could Paul have seen that the jailor was about to kill himself? That there must have been some kind of light in the outer prison is evident, otherwise the jailor could not have even seen that the doors were open, nor is there any difficulty in supposing that Paul out of the darkness of the inner prison would see through the opened doors any one in the outer doorway, whilst to the jailor the inner prison would be lost in darkness. Moreover, as Blass notes, Paul may have heard from the jailor's utterances what he meant to do: "neque enim tacuisse putandus est" (see also Ramsay, Felten, Hackett, Lumby, in loco).

Ver. 28. μηδὲν πράξ. σεαυτῷ κακόν: Blass remarks that the distinction between πράσσειν and ποιεῖν is not always precisely observed in N.T., and takes it as = Attic, μ. ποιησῃς. πράσσειν is not found in St. Matthew or St. Mark and only twice in St. John, whilst by St. Luke it is used six times in his Gospel, thirteen times in Acts, elsewhere in N.T. only by Paul. Philippi was famous in the annals of suicide (C. and H.); see also Plumptre's note in loco.—ἅπαντες γάρ ἐ.: "Multa erant graviora, cur non deberet se interficere; sed Paulus id arripit, quod maxime opportunum erat" Bengel.

Ver. 29. φῶτα: "lights," R.V., plural, and only in plural in later Greek, cf. 1 Macc. xii. 29, of fires in a military encampment; "the prisoners' chains were loosed, and worse chains were loosed from himself; he called for a light, but the true heat was lighted in his own heart" Chrys., Hom., xxxvi.—εἰσεπήδησε, cf. xiv. 14, ἐκπ., both verbs only in Luke in N.T. In LXX, cf. Amos v. 19, Sus., ver. 26, especially the latter, found also in classical Greek.—ἔντρομος γεν., see above.—προσέπεσε: he may have known of the words of the maiden, ver. 17, and recognised their truth in the earthquake, and in the calmness and demeanour of Paul; hence too his question.

[1] At beginning of verse Blass in β prefixes ακουσας δε ο δεσμοφυλαξ (quo audito cust. carc. Gig., Wer.).

[2] D, Syr. H. mg. add (και) τους λοιπους ασφαλισαμενος after εξω, see on this touch Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 222, who accepts it as most prob. genuine, retained by Blass and Hilg.; Syr. H. mg. adds "appropinquavit et" (προσηλθεν in β).

[3] του K., W.H. text, R.V. marg., Blass, Wendt, Weiss, following ℵ*B, read Θεου; see Weiss, Apostelgeschichte, p. 5.

Ver. 30. Κύριοι, in respect, cf. John xx. 15.—ἵνα σωθῶ; the word of the maiden σωτηρία and the occurrence of the night may well have prompted the question. The context, ver. 31, seems to indicate the higher meaning here, and the question can scarcely be limited to mere desire of escape from personal danger or punishment. On the addition in D see critical note.

Ver. 31. ἐπὶ τὸν K.: "non agnoscunt se dominos" Bengel—they point him to the One Lord.—οἶκος . . . οἰκίᾳ: the first word is most frequently used in Attic Greek, and in the N.T. for household, cf. ver. 15, but both words are used in Attic, and in the N.T., for familia. σὺ καὶ ὁ οἶκός σου: "and thou shalt be saved, thou and thy house," R.V., not as if his faith could save his household, as A.V. might imply, but that the same way was open to him and to them (Alford, see also Meyer-Wendt, and Page).

Ver. 32. καὶ ἐλάλησαν: before baptism instruction.

Ver. 33. ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ τῆς νυκτὸς, cf. ver. 18, "at that hour of the night"; the jailor will not delay for a moment his first Christian duty, Matt. xxv. 36.—ἔλουσεν ἀπὸ τῶν πληγῶν: "and washed them of their stripes," Ramsay; i.e., the stains of the wounds caused by the lictors (for similar construction of λούειν ἀπό see Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 54). Hobart, p. 112, compares Galen's words, τὸ αἷμα τοῦ τετρωμένου μέρους ἀποπλῦναι.—καὶ οἱ αὐτοῦ πάντες: for the bearing of the words on Infant Baptism, see on ver. 15. It may of course be said that the expression evidently implies the same persons who are instructed in ver. 32, but it cannot be said that the phrase may not include any other members of the household. The two washings are put in striking juxtaposition: the waters of baptism washed the jailor from deeper stains and more grievous wounds than those of the lictors' rods, Chrys., Hom., xxxvi.—παραχρῆμα, emphatic, see above on p. 106.

Ver. 34. ἀναγαγών τε αὐτοὺς: τε closely connects this second proof of his thankfulness with the first ἀναγ.: "he brought them up into," R.V.; Blass thinks that the ἀνά means that he brought them up from underground, but it may simply mean that the house was built over the prison; see also Knabenbauer in loco.—παρέθηκε τράπ.: the phrase is a classical one, so in Homer, also in Polyb.; so in Homer a separate table is assigned to each guest, Odys., xvii., 333; xxii., 74. But the word is also used as implying the meal on the table see L.

35. Ἡμέρας δὲ γενομένης [1] ἀπέστειλαν οἱ στρατηγοὶ τοὺς ῥαβδούχους λέγοντες, Ἀπόλυσον τοὺς ἀνθρώπους ἐκείνους. 36. ἀπήγγειλε δὲ ὁ δεσμοφύλαξ τοὺς λόγους τούτους πρὸς τὸν Παῦλον, Ὅτι ἀπεστάλκασιν οἱ στρατηγοί, ἵνα ἀπολυθῆτε· νῦν οὖν ἐξελθόντες πορεύεσθε [2] ἐν εἰρήνῃ. 37. ὁ δὲ Παῦλος ἔφη πρὸς αὐτούς,[3] Δείραντες ἡμᾶς δημοσίᾳ, ἀκατακρίτους, ἀνθρώπους Ῥωμαίους ὑπάρχοντας, ἔβαλον εἰς φυλακήν, καὶ νῦν λάθρα ἡμᾶς ἐκβάλλουσιν; οὐ γάρ· ἀλλὰ ἐλθόντες αὐτοὶ

[1] D, Syr. H. mg., after γεν., add συνηλθον οι στρατηγοι επι το αυτο εις την αγοραν και αναμνησθεντες τον σεισμον τον γεγονοτα εφοβηθησαν, so Blass in β, and Hilg. Belser and Zöckler both defend this and subsequent additions in D as valuable in explanation of the sudden change of resolve on the part of the magistrates; but see also Weiss, Codex D, p. 86, and Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 223. After εκεινους D 137, Syr. Harcl. add ους εχθες παρελαβες.

[2] After πορευεσθε Blass and Hilg. omit εν ειρηνῃ, following D and Gig.

and S., cf. Tobit ii. 2, παρετέθη μου ἡ τράπεζα, S. Ps. lxxvii. 20. Paul makes no question about sitting at meat with the uncircumcised (Weiss).—ἠγαλλιάσατο: it is suggestive that St. Luke uses the cognate noun of this same verb to describe the intense exulting gladness of the early Church at Jerusalem in their social life, ii. 46—here was indeed an Agape, a Feast of Love, cf. 1 Pet. i. 6, 8, iv. 13 (Matt. v. 12, Rev. xix. 7); in St. Luke the word occurs twice in his Gospel, i. 47, x. 21, and in Acts ii. 26, quotation (see above); not found in classical Greek, but formed probably from ἀγάλλομαι, Hellenistic, often in LXX. At the same time the word πεπιστευκώς, perfect participle, shows that this fulness of joy was caused by his full profession of belief; it was the joy of the Holy Ghost which followed on his baptism: "rejoiced greatly with all his house, having believed on the Lord," gaudebat quod crediderat, Blass (reading imperfect ἠγαλλιᾶτο, see critical note). See also Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 194 (1893).—πανοικὶ (-εὶ, W.H., App., p. 154), cf. παραπληθεί, Luke xxiii. 18. In LXX the word is found, Exod. i. 1, but A has -κίᾳ 3 Macc. iii. 27, where A has also -κίᾳ. On St. Luke's fondness for πᾶς and its related forms see Friedrich, p. 6. The form preferred in Attic is πανοικησίᾳ. The word in text is found in Jos., Philo, and in Plato, Eryx., p. 392 C., cf. Blass, in loco, and Proleg., p. 19.

Ver. 35. ἀπέσ. οἱ στρατηγοὶ: we are not told the reason of this sudden change in the action of the prætors, and no doubt the omission may fairly account for the reading in D, see critical notes. At the same time it is quite characteristic of St. Luke to give the plain facts without entering upon explanations. Meyer thinks that they were influenced by the earthquake, while Wendt rather inclines to the view that they were incited to this action, so inconsistent with their former conduct, by fresh intelligence as to their own hasty treatment of the missionaries; Ramsay combines both views, and see also St. Paul, p. 224, on the contrast brought out by St. Luke, and also on the Bezan text; see to the same effect Zöckler, in loco. Blass accounts for the change of front on the part of the prætors by supposing that they saw in the earthquake a sign that they had insulted a foreign deity, and that they had therefore better dismiss his servants at once, lest further mischief should result.—τοὺς ῥαβ.: "the lictors" R.V. margin, apparently as the duoviri aped the prætors, so the lictors carried the fasces and not the baculi, cf. Cicero, De Leg. Agr., ii., 34; Farrar, St. Paul, i., 493; Grimm-Thayer, sub v., and references in Wetstein: διὰ τί λικτώρεις τοὺς ῥαβδούχους ὀνομάζουσι; Plut., Quæst. Rom. 67.

Ver. 36. νῦν οὖν, Lucan, cf. x. 33, xv. 10, xxiii. 15.—ἐν εἰρήνῃ (omitted by D): the jailor may well have used the words in a deeper sense after the instruction of Paul, and his own admission to citizenship in a kingdom which was "righteousness, peace, joy in the Holy Ghost".

Ver. 37. Δείραντες ἡμᾶς δ.: in flagrant violation of the Lex Valeria, B.C. 509, and the Lex Porcia, B.C. 248; see also Cicero, ἡμᾶς ἐξαγαγέτωσαν. 38. ἀνήγγειλαν δὲ τοῖς στρατηγοῖς οἱ ῥαβδοῦχοι τὰ ῥήματα ταῦτα· [1] καὶ ἐφοβήθησαν ἀκούσαντες ὅτι Ῥωμαῖοί εἰσι, 39. καὶ ἐλθόντες παρεκάλεσαν αὐτούς, καὶ ἐξαγαγόντες ἠρώτων

[1] D reads at beginning of verse και παραγενομενοι μετα φιλων πολλων εις την φυλακην (εις τ. φ. 137, Syr. H. mg.). After εξελθειν the same authorities continue ειποντες Ηγνοησαμεν τα καθ' υμας οτι εστε ανδρες δικαιοι. D then continues (137, Syr. H. mg., Ephr.) και εξαγαγοντες παρεκαλεσαν αυτους λεγοντες· Εκ της πολεως ταυτης εξελθατε, μηποτε παλιν συστραφωσιν ημιν επικραζοντες καθ' υμων (so practically the other authorities above, followed here by Blass in β, and Hilg.). Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 224, points out that the Bezan text hits off the situation with obvious truth, and the way in which in the Ægean cities the weak municipal government was always a danger to order, "one would gladly think this Lucan". Belser draws attention to the fact that συστραφ. has a parallel in Acts xxiii. 12; see Harris, Four Lectures, etc., pp. 26, 27, for Ephraem's commentary on vv. 35-37, 39, and likenesses to the Bezan text. Schmiedel, Encycl. Bibl., p. 52, regards this passage as plainly derived from a fusion of two texts, and as militating strongly against Blass.

In Verrem, v., 57, 66, it was the weightiest charge brought by Cicero against Verres. To claim Roman citizenship falsely was punishable with death, Suet., Claud., xxv. — ἀκατακρίτους: "uncondemned" gives a wrong idea, cf. also xxii. 25, although it is difficult to translate the word otherwise. The meaning is "without investigating our cause," res incognita, "causa cognita multi possunt absolvi; incognita quidem condemnari nemo potest," Cicero, In Verrem, i., 9, see also Wetstein, in loco. The word is only found in N.T., but Blass takes it as = Attic, ἄκριτος, which might be sometimes used of a cause not yet tried. The rendering "uncondemned" implies that the flogging would have been legal after a fair trial, but it was illegal under any circumstances, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 224. —δημοσίᾳ contrasted with λάθρα, so a marked contrast between ἔβαλον εἰς φυλ. and ἐκβάλλουσιν.—Ῥωμαίους ὑπάρχοντας: "Roman citizens as we are," the boast made by the masters of the girl, ver. 21. St. Paul, too, had his rights as a Roman citizen, see below on xxii. 28. The antithesis is again marked in the Apostles' assertion of their claim to courtesy as against the insolence of the prætors — they wish ἐκβάλλειν λάθρα; nay, but let them come in person (αὐτοί), and conduct us forth (ἐξαγαγέτωσαν).—οὐ γὰρ: non profecto; Blass, Grammatik, pp. 268, 269, "ut sæpe in responsis," see also Page, in loco.—ἐξαγ.: not only his sense of justice, but the fact that the public disgrace to which they had been subjected would seriously impede the acceptance of the Gospel message, and perhaps raise a prejudice to the injury of his Philippian converts, would prompt Paul to demand at least this amount of reparation. Wetstein's comments are well worth consulting.

Ver. 38. ἀνήγγειλαν, see critical notes. —ἐφοβήθησαν, so the chief captain, xxii. 29; and no wonder, for the illegal punishment of Roman citizens was a serious offence. If convicted, the magistrates would have been degraded, and incapable in future of holding office; cf. Cicero, In Verrem, v., 66; Rep., ii., 31; and see Blass, note on xxii. 29, Grotius, in loco, and O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 99. In A.D. 44 the Rhodians had been deprived by Claudius of their privileges for putting some Roman citizens to death (Speaker's Commentary, in loco).

Ver. 39. See addition in D, critical note. The fear of a further riot expressed by the magistrates is exactly what we should expect in the cities of the Ægean lands, which were always weak in their municipal government. D also expresses the naïve way in which the magistrates not only try to throw the blame upon the people, but wanted to get out of a difficulty by procuring the withdrawal from the city of the injured parties, Ramsay, u. s., p. 224. The Greek pointedly and dramatically expresses the change in the whole situation: ἐλθόντες—παρεκάλεσαν —ἐξαγαγόντες ἠρώτων! (Wendt).

Ver. 40. εἰς, see critical notes; they would not leave the city without once more visiting the household out of which grew the Church dearest to St. Paul; see Lightfoot's remarks on the growth of the Church from "the Church in the house," Philippians, pp. 57, 58.—ἐξῆλθον: the third person indicates that the narrator of the ἐξελθεῖν τῆς πόλεως. 40. ἐξελθόντες δὲ ἐκ τῆς φυλακῆς εἰσῆλθον εἰς τὴν Λυδίαν· καὶ ἰδόντες τοὺς ἀδελφούς,[1] παρεκάλεσαν αὐτούς, καὶ ἐξῆλθον.

[1] After αδελφους D adds διηγησαντο οσα εποιησεν Κυριος αυτοις, so Blass in β, and Hilg.

"We" section, xvi. 9, 10, remained at Philippi, Timothy probably accompanying Paul and Silas. In xx. 5 we again have ἡμᾶς introduced, and the inference is that St. Luke remained at Philippi during the interval, or at least for a part of it; and it is reasonable to infer that he laboured there in the Gospel, although he modestly refrains (as elsewhere) from any notice of his own work. The Apostle's first visit to Philippi represented in epitome the universality of the Gospel, so characteristic of St. Luke's record of our Lord's teaching, and so characteristic of the mind of St. Paul. Both from a religious and social point of view the conversions at Philippi are full of significance. The Jew could express his thankfulness in his morning prayer that God had not made him a Gentile—a woman—a slave. But at Philippi St. Paul taught in action the principle which he enforced in his Galatian Epistle, iii. 28, and again in writing to the Colossians, iii. 11: "Christ was all and in all"; in Him the soothsaying slave-girl, the proselyte of Thyatira, the Roman jailor, were each and all the children of God, and fellow-citizens with the saints, Lightfoot, Introduction to Philippians; Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, pp. 15, 26, 137 (second edition).

The narrative of St. Paul's visit to Philippi has been made the object of attack from various quarters. Most of the objections have been stated and met by Professor Ramsay, and a summary of them with their refutation is aptly given in a recent article by Dr. Giesekke (Studien und Kritiken, 1898) described at length in the Expository Times, March, 1898, see also Knabenbauer, pp. 292, 293. The view that the narrative is simply a fiction modelled upon the escape of St. Peter in iv. 31 and xii. is untenable in face of the many differences in the narratives (see the points of contrast in Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 315, 316). (Schneckenburger in his list of parallels between Peter and Paul in Acts apparently makes no mention of the supposed parallel here.) Zeller's attempt to connect the narrative with the story in Lucian's Toxaris, c. 27, is still more absurd, cf. Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 262 (second edition), and Farrar, St. Paul, i., 501, whilst more recently Schmiedel (1898) attempts to find a parallel in Euripides, Bacchæ, 436-441, 502, 602-628, see Wendt's note, p. 282 (1899). Weizsäcker boldly refuses to admit even the imprisonment as a fact, and regards only the meeting of Paul with the soothsayer as historical. But it should be noted that he allows the Apostle's intercourse with Lydia and his instruction of the women to be genuine historical incidents, and he makes the important remark that the name of Lydia is the more credible, since the Philippian Epistle seems to support the idea that women received Paul and contributed to the planting of the Church (Apostolic Age, i., 284, E.T.). Holtzmann represents in a general manner the standpoint of modern advanced criticism, when he divides the narrative of the events at Philippi into two parts, the one concerned with events transacted under the open heaven, belonging not only to the "We" source but bearing also the stamp of reality, whilst the other part is not guaranteed by the "We" source, and is full of legendary matter. Thus vv. 25-34 are dismissed as a later addition, and Ramsay's fresh and careful explanations are dismissed by Holtzmann as "humbug"! Theologische Literaturzeitung, No. 7, 1899.

Additional Note.—Chap. xvi. 12, "which is a city of Macedonia, the first of the district," R.V. This might mean, so far as πρώτη is concerned, that Philippi was the city nearest in the district, and the city which they first reached. Neapolis, which actually came first on the route, was not generally regarded as Macedonian but Thracian; so Lightfoot, Rendall, O. Holtzmann. Or it might also mean that it was "the chief" (A.V.), the leading city of its division of Macedonia (Ramsay). Here again Ramsay sees a proof of St. Luke's intimate acquaintance with the rivalries of the Greek cities, and of his special interest in Philippi. In B.C. 167 the province Macedonia had been divided by the Romans into four districts, μερίς, and even if this division were obsolete at the time, another would be likely to succeed to it (so Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 158, as against Lightfoot, Phil., p. 50, who takes πρώτη as denoting not the political but the geographical position of Philippi.) At this time Amphipolis was the chief (πρώτη) city of the district to which both it and Philippi belonged, but though Amphipolis held the rank, Philippi claimed the same title, a case of rivalry between two or even three cities which often occurred. This single passage Ramsay regards as conclusive of the claims of Philippi, see St. Paul, p. 207, and Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, ii., 429. As to whether μερίς can be used in the sense of a division of a province, cf. Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 158, and the instances quoted from Egypt, and also Expositor, October, 1897, p. 320, as against Hort's limitation of the term. Hort, W.H., App. 96 (to whose view Rendall inclines, cf. also Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 375), thinks that μερίδος must be a corruption, and proposes Πιερίδος, Pieria being an ancient name of that part of Macedonia; but he declines to draw any positive conclusion in its favour. Wendt, following Meyer, regards πρώτη as signifying rank, and so far he is in agreement with Ramsay. But as Amphipolis was really the chief town of the district, he contends that πόλις κολωνία might be taken as one phrase (see also Hackett, Overbeck, Weiss, Holtzmann), and so he regards the whole expression as signifying that Philippi is spoken of as the most considerable colony-town in that district of Macedonia, whilst he agrees with Hort and Lightfoot in maintaining that πρώτη is only classical as an absolute title of towns in Asia Minor. This Ramsay allows, but the title was frequent in Asia and Cilicia, and might easily have been used elsewhere, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 156; Holtzmann quite admits that the term may have been applied as in Asian towns to signify the enjoyment of certain privileges. For Ramsay's criticism of Codex D, which substitutes κεφαλὴ τῆς Μ. and omits μερίδος altogether, see Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 156, 157, and Expositor, u. s., κεφαλή being evidently substituted because the term πρώτη is ambiguous, and so liable to be misunderstood. Blass himself finds fault with D, and also considers πρώτη wrong, not only because Amphipolis was superior in rank, but because Thessalonica was called πρώτη Μακεδόνων, C. T. Gr., 1967. But this would not prevent the rivalry amongst other towns in the various subdivisions of the province. Blass reads in β πρώτης μερίδος (a reading which Lightfoot thinks might deserve some consideration, though unsupported, if the original Roman fourfold division of the provinces were still maintained, see above, p. 355), and takes it as referring to Philippi as a city of the first of the four regiones.

CHAPTER XVII.—Ver. 1. διοδεύσαντες δέ: "and they went along the Roman road" (Ramsay): verb only found in Luke, Luke viii. 1, and here, but frequent in LXX, and used also by Polyb. and Plut., cf. Gen. xiii. 17, etc., so in 1 Macc. three times. The famous road, the Via Egnatia, Horace, Sat., i., 5, 97, extended for a distance of over five hundred miles from the Hellespont to Dyrrhachium; it was really the continuation through Macedonia of the Via Appia, and it might be truly said that when St. Paul was on the Roman road at Troas or Philippi, he was on a road which led to the gates of Rome; see some interesting details in C. and H., p. 244. The article "certam atque notam viam designat," Blass, in loco, and Gram., p. 149, but see also Weiss, in loco.—Ἀμφ., thirty-two or thirty-three miles from Philippi. The Via Egnatia passed through it (cf. C. and H., and Hackett, in loco). The import of its name may be contained in the term applied to it, Thuc., iv., 102, περιφανής, conspicuous towards sea and land, "the all around [visible] city"; or the name may simply refer to the fact that the Strymon flowed almost round the town, Thuc., u. s. Its earlier name, "Nine Ways," Ἐννέα ὁδοί, Thuc., i., 100; Herod vii., 114, indicated its important position, and no doubt this occasioned its colonisation by the Athenians in B.C. 437. In the Peloponnesian War it was famous as the scene of the battle in which both Brasidas and Cleon fell, Thuc., v., 6-11, whilst for his previous failure to succour the place Thucydides had himself been exiled (Thuc., i., 26). From the Macedonians it passed eventually into the hands of the Romans, and in B.C. 167 Æmilius Paulus proclaimed the Macedonians free and Amphipolis the capital of the first of the four districts into which the Romans divided the province (Liv., xlv., 18, 29). In the Middle Ages Popolia, now Neochori: B.D.[2] and Hastings' B.D., C. and H. The route may well have been one of the most beautiful of any day's journey in St. Paul's many travels, Renan, St. Paul, pp. 154, 155.—Ἀπολλωνίαν: to be carefully distinguished from the more celebrated Apollonia in Illyria—apparently there were three places in Macedonia bearing this name. The Antonine Itinerary gives it as thirty miles from Amphipolis, and thirty-seven from Thessalonica, but the other authorities, for example, the Jerusalem Itinerary, differ a little. The Via Egnatia passed through it, and the name is probably retained in the modern Pollina. It is quite possible that the two places are mentioned as having formed St. Paul's resting-place for a night, see references above.—Θεσσαλονίκην: Saloniki; formerly Therme; the name had been most probably changed by Cassander in honour of his wife Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander the Great, Polyb., xxiii., 4, 4. Under the Romans it became the capital of the second of the four districts of Macedonia Provincia (Liv., xlv., 29), and later it was made the metropolis of the whole when the four districts were united into one. It was the largest as well as the most populous city in Macedonia, and like Ephesus and Corinth it had its share in the commerce of the Ægean. From its geographical position it could not cease to be important; through the Middle Ages it may fairly be described as the bulwark of Christendom in the East, and it still remains the second city in European Turkey. St. Paul, with his usual wisdom, selected it as marking a centre of civilisation and government in the district: "posita in gremio imperii Romani," as Cicero says. C. and H., p. 247 ff.; Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 151; Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 253 ff.; Schaff-Herzog, Encycl., iv.—ὅπου ἦν ἡ συν.: implying that there was no synagogue at Amphipolis or Apollonia, the former being a purely Hellenic town, and the latter a small place. ὅπου may = οὗ simply, but if distinguished from it implies oppidum tale in quo esset (as in distinction to the other places named); see Wendt and Blass. In Agrippa's letter to Caligula we have plain evidence of the existence of Jews in Macedonia, O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 180; Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., E.T., pp. 222, 232. As the name remains in the modern Saloniki, manent Judaei quoque (Blass), C. and H., 250, see also in this connection, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 236.

Ver. 2. κατὰ τὸ εἰωθὸς: phrase peculiar to St. Luke, only here and in Luke iv. 16. St. Paul follows his usual principle: "to the Jew first".—ἐπὶ σάββατα τρία: "for three Sabbath days" or "weeks," R.V., margin, the latter strongly supported by Zahn, Einleitung, i., 152. This may be the exact period of work within the synagogue. For ἐπί cf. iii. 1, iv. 15, xiii. 31, xvi. 18, etc.; Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 152, used in the "We" sections, and also predominantly, though not exclusively, in the rest of Acts or Luke or either of them; see on Acts xxvii. 20, xxviii. 6; Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 53; see also Blass, Gram., p. 133.—διελέγετο αὐτοῖς: he reasoned, rather than disputed, as the word is sometimes rendered—ten times in Acts, seven times rendered by R.V., "reasoned," cf. also Heb. xii. 5, and twice "discoursed," xx. 7, 9, once only "disputed," xxiv. 12, cf. Jude 9. Here the word may point to a conversational intercourse between St. Paul and his fellow-countryman (cf. ver. 17 and Mark ix. 34); so Overbeck, Holtzmann, Wendt, on the force of the verb with the dative or πρός. That such interchange of speech could take place in the synagogue we learn from John vi. 25, 29, Matt. xii. 9. In classical Greek with the dative or πρός the word means to converse with, οὗτός ἐστιν[1] ὁ Χριστός, Ἰησοῦς, ὃν ἐγὼ καταγγέλλω ὑμῖν. 4. καί τινες ἐξ αὐτῶν ἐπείσθησαν, καὶ προσεκληρώθησαν τῷ Παύλῳ καὶ τῷ Σίλᾳ, τῶν τε[2] σεβομένων Ἑλλήνων πολὺ πλῆθος, γυναικῶν τε τῶν

Ι., so Tisch., W.H. marg., so Hilg. with comma after Χ.; Χρ. ο Ι., so E 32, 177, 180. Probably the many changes arose from the unusual description in B with the double article.

[2] σεβ. Ελλ., AD 13, 40, 61, Vulg., Boh., Gig. have σεβ. και Ελλ., so Lach. This reading is defended by Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 235, and Hilgenfeld, Zw. Th., 1896, p. 198, so in 1899, Acta Apost. (but not by Blass in β text); see notes in comment. Wendt (1899) finds a solution of the reading in the wish to express that Paul won converts amongst other Gentiles than the proselytes. γυναικων τε, but D, Gig. και γυναικες των πρ. ουκ ολιγ. Probably the reviser took πρωτων as referring only to the men, and thought that the expression meant "wives of the chief men" (so too Weiss explains the words), and then altered above to bring out this sense more clearly. πρωτων of course could be taken as masc., but better to refer it to γυν. = ευσχ., xiii. 50, xvii. 12 (Wendt, 1899). Belser, however, pp. 81, 82, strongly supports the originality of D; he points out that in Acts we never have the expression των πρ. used of women, and that the reading in D harmonises with the thought that the influence of these women as wives of the leading citizens may account for the mild treatment of the Apostles.

to argue, and thus in Xen., Mem., i., 6, 1, ii., 10, 1, we have the construction διαλ. π. τινι or πρός τινα to discuss a question with another, so that the word might easily have the meaning of arguing or reasoning about a question, but not of necessity with any hostile intent; even in Heb. xii. 5 it is the fatherly παράκλησις which reasoneth with sons. Blass supports the imperfect as in T.R., Gram., p. 186.—ἀπὸ γραφῶν, i.e., drawing his proofs from them, or if a discussion is meant, starting from them; Winer-Moulton, xlvii., Grotius, so Overbeck, Kuinoel, Weiss, Wendt take the word with διανοίγων.

Ver. 3. διανοίγων, sc., αὐτάς, a favourite word with St. Luke, cf. xvi. 14; here, as in Luke xxiv. 32, 45, he alone uses it of making plain to the understanding the meaning of the Scriptures, "opening their meaning".—καὶ παρατιθ. "and quoting to prove" (Ramsay), i.e., bringing forward in proof passages of Scripture; so often amongst profane writers in a similar way, instances in Wetstein; lit., the word means "to set forth," and this was the older English meaning of allege; in middle voice, to set forth from oneself, to explain; to quote in one's own favour, as evidence, or as authority, "Non other auctour allegge I," Chaucer, Hours of Fame, 314.—τὸν Χ. ἔδει παθεῖν: "that it behoved the Christ to suffer," R.V., cf. Luke xxiv. 25, 46; now as ever "to the Jews a stumbling-block," see above on p. 113, and cf. xxvi. 23; so also in writing to the Thessalonian Church the Apostle insists on the same fundamental facts of Christian belief, 1 Thess. iv. 14.—καὶ ὅτι οὗτος κ.τ.λ.: "and that this Jesus whom, said he, I proclaim unto you is the Christ," R.V. adds ὁ before Ἰ. The words said he are inserted because of the change of construction, cf. i. 4, xxiii. 22, Luke v. 14, specially frequent in Luke. On St. Paul's preaching that "Jesus was the Christ," and what it involved, see Witness of the Epistles, p. 307 ff.

Ver. 4. προσεκληρώθησαν: "there were in addition gathered to them" (Ramsay), giving the verb a passive meaning answering to its form; or "these were allotted to them, associated with them, as disciples [by God]," cf. Ephes. i., 11. The verb is often used in Philo, also found in Plutarch, Lucian, but only here in N.T. Mr. Rendall, while pointing out that the A.V. and R.V. "consorted" gives the impression of outward association only, regards the passive aorist as a middle in meaning, and renders "threw in their lot with Paul and Silas". According to A.V. and R.V., W. H., Weiss, and Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 89, two classes seem to be mentioned besides the Jews, viz., devout Greeks, and some of the chief women. According, however, to Ramsay, comparing A and D (see p. 235, St. Paul), we have three classes besides the Jews, viz., proselytes, Greeks, chief women (added as a climax), see critical note, but also McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 247. The difficulty in T.R. and authorities first mentioned is that their rendering restricts St. Paul's work not only to three Sabbaths or weeks, but to the synagogue and its worshippers, whereas from 1 Thess. i. 9, ii. 14, it would appear that the Church contained a large number of converted heathens. McGiffert thinks it possible that St. Luke may have only recorded the least important of Paul's labours, just as he only mentions his work in three Macedonian towns, whereas he may easily have laboured over a wider area, 1 Thess. i. 7; but see Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, ix., 6, and on the reading, Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 152. In any case it would seem that a small minority of Jews is contrasted with a large number of born Gentiles, so that the Thessalonian Church may have been spoken of by St. Paul as one of Gentile Christians, who had been opposed not only to Christianity, but earlier still to Judaism, 1 Thess. i. 9, 10.—γυν. τε τῶν πρώτων οὐκ ὀλίγαι: here, as at Philippi and Berœa, the three Macedonian towns, the prominence assigned to women quite in accordance with what we know from other sources; see above. The mention both here and in ver. 12 that the women were the leading high-born women intimates that the poorer women would follow the men of the lower orders, ver. 5. Dr. Hort regards the women here as the Jewish wives of heathen men of distinction, as in xiii. 50, Judaistic Christianity, p. 89, but in xiii. 50 the opposition to the Apostles proceeds from these women of the higher classes, and it seems much more likely that those mentioned here were Macedonian women.

[1] απειθουντες om. ℵABE, Vulg., Syr. P. H., Sah., Boh., Arm., Aethpp., so Tisch., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, W.H.; προσλ. δε οι l. οι απειθ. HLP; reading in T.R. very ill supported; and there are other variations. Probably απειθ. is an addition after xiv. 2. D reads οι δε απειθ. l. συνστρεψαντες (συστροφη occurs twice in Acts, not elsewhere in N.T., but not συστρεφω in sense demanded here), so Blass in β, and Hilg. αγαγειν, but προ- ℵAB, Vulg., Tisch., Weiss, Wendt, W.H., R.V., Blass in β; Meyer follows T.R. with HP; προσαγ. in E; αναγαγ. in L; εξαγαγ. in D, so Hilg.

Ver. 5. ἀπειθ., see critical note.—ζηλώσαντες: the jealousy is apparent, whether the word is read or not (cf. β), a jealousy aroused not only by the preaching of a Messiah, but also by the success of such preaching.—προσλαβ., cf. xviii. 26 for similar sense of the verb, cf. 2 Macc. viii. 1, x. 15.—τῶν ἀγοραίων . . . πον.: "certain vile fellows of the rabble," R.V.; πον. translated in A.V. "lewd" (A.-S. loewede) means simply "people," hence (1) the common people and (2) the ignorant and rude among the people, cf. Spenser, Shep. Kal. Feb., 245: "But little ease of thy lewd tale I tasted" (Skeat); and in the sense of vicious, Ezek. xvi. 27, A. and R.V. (see Lumby's note in loco — the German Leute is the word nearest akin to it.)—ἀγορ.: hangers-on in the market-place; Blass renders "tabernarii aliique in foro versantes," see instances in Wetstein (Aristophanes, Xen., Plut.), who compares "canalicolæ" hodie canaille. In Latin, subrostrani, subbasilicani; Germ. Pflastertreter, our Loafer, Grimm-Thayer, Farrar, St. Paul, i., 513, and Nösgen, in loco. On the distinction sometimes but probably fancifully maintained between ἀγοραῖος and ἀγόραιος, see Alford on xix. 38; Wendt (1888), in loco; Winer-Schmiedel, p. 69; Grimm-Thayer, sub v. For the accent of πονηρός see also Winer-Schmiedel, u. s.—τῇ οἰκίᾳ Ἰ.: in which the Apostles were lodging, or in which the Christian assemblies were held. We know nothing further for certain of this Jason, cf. Rom. xvi. 21 where a Jason is mentioned as a companion of Paul, and amongst his συγγενεῖς. If he was a Jew, as is most probable, we may infer that his Jewish name was Joshua or Jesus, but that he used the name Jason, the nearest Greek equivalent, in his intercourse with Greeks and Hellenists; cf. for a similar change of the two names 2 Macc. i. 7, iv. 7, and cf. Jos., Ant., xii., 5, 1, where we read that Jason's real name was Joshua, but that he changed it into the former, owing no doubt to his Hellenising; see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 184, note; Wendt and Zöckler express themselves doubtfully, and hold that the name may be here a Greek name, and its bearer not a Jew at all.—ἐπιστάντες, cf. iv. 1, vi. 12, Friedrich, p. 87.—δῆμον: to a public meeting, or to the crowd who shall inflict vengeance on them, there and then (so Weiss, Lumby); C. and H. take it of the free assembly of the people, so Ramsay. A true cause does not need such methods or supporters, "non tali auxilio nec defensoribus istis".

Ver. 6. ἔσυρον: the word indicates the violence of the mob.—πολιτάρχας: the word is an excellent instance of the accuracy of St. Luke; it is not used by any classical author of the magistrates of any city (in classical Greek we have only the form πολίαρχος and πολίταρχος), but an inscription on an arch spanning a street of the modern city has been preserved containing the title (and also containing the names which occur among the names of St. Paul's converts, Sosipater, Gaius, Secundus), see Bœckh, C. I. Gr., 1967. The arch is assigned to the time of Vespasian, and the entablature preserved by the British consul at the instance of Dean Stanley in 1876 is in the British Museum, see Blass, in loco, Speaker's Commentary, C. and H. (small edition), p. 258, Knabenbauer in loco, and for other inscription evidence, Zahn, Einleitung, i., 151. But more recently Burton (Amer. Jour. of Theol., July, 1898, pp. 598-632) has collected no less than seventeen inscriptions on which the word πολιτάρχαι or πολιταρχοῦντες (πολειταρχ-), the latter more frequently, occurs: of these thirteen are referred to Macedonia, and of these again five to Thessalonica, extending from the beginning of the first to the middle of the second century, A.D. The number of the politarchs in Thessalonica varies from five to six (see Theol. Literaturzeitung, 1899, 2, for notice of Burton's article by Schürer), and on spelling, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 82 note.—τὴν οἰκουμένην: no doubt in the political sense "the Roman Empire" since the charge was a political one, and was naturally exaggerated through jealousy and excitement. There is therefore no need for the hypercritical remarks of Baur, Zeller, Overbeck, against the truthfulness or accuracy of the expression.—ἀναστατώσαντες: only in Luke and Paul, xxi. 38, Gal. v. 12, see LXX, Dan. vii. 23 (in a different sense), Deut. xxix. 27, Græc. Venet. (Grimm-Thayer, sub v.), and several times in the O.T., fragments of Aquila, Symmachus, and in Eustathius, see also Hatch and Redpath, sub v.). οὗτοι, contemptuous.

Ver. 7. ὑποδέδεκται: no notion of secrecy as Erasmus and Bengel, but as in Luke x. 38, xix. 6; only found in these three passages in Luke, and in James ii. 25, cf. LXX, Tob. vii. 8, Jud. xiii. 13 (see Hatch and Redpath for both instances), 1 Macc. xvi. 15, and 4 Macc. xiii. 17, often in classical Greek without any notion of secrecy.—οὗτοι πάντες: the words may be taken as referring not only to Jason and the accused, but with Alford, "all these people," i.e., Christians wherever found.—ἀπέναντι: only here in N.T. in this sense (common in LXX and Apocrypha, so also Polyb., i., 86, 3), cf. Ecclus. xxxvi. (xxxiii.) 14.—δογμάτων, see on xvi. 4. The word may here refer to the successive decrees of the emperors against treason, and there is no need to refer it in this passage to the decree of Claudius, see on xviii. 2, but rather to the Julian Leges Majestatis.—β. λέγοντες ἕτερον εἶναι: this was the charge, the political charge of high treason, brought against our Lord Himself by the Jews, Luke xxiii. 2, John xix. 12, 15. The nature of this charge may fairly point to a Jewish source, for the Jews thought of the Messiah as a king, and in their hostility to Paul they could easily accuse him of proclaiming Jesus or another king, another emperor (Ramsay), instead of Caesar; so McGiffert on this passage, "whose trustworthiness can hardly be doubted" (Apostolic Age, p. 246). The Epistles to the Thessalonians contain passages which might be as easily perverted in the same direction, 1 Thess. ii. 12, iv. 14, v. 2, 23; 2 Thess. i. 5-8, or the fact that Jesus was so often spoken of as Κύριος, "that deathless King Who lived and died for men," might have given colour to the charge, cf. on the coincidence and accuracy of the Acts and 1 Thess. ii. 14-16, Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, ix., 5, and McGiffert, u. s.

Ver. 8. ἐτάραξαν: the people would be disturbed at intelligence which might point to a revolution, and the politarchs, lest they should themselves be liable to the same charge of treason for not defending the honour of the emperor. No charge would be more subtle in its conception, or more dangerous in the liabilities which it involved, cf. Tacitus, Ann., iii., 38.

Ver. 9. λαβόντες τὸ ἱκανὸν = satis accipere (cf. Mark xv. 15, and Wetstein, in loco). Blass regards the phrase as a commercial one, due to the frequency of commercial intercourse, and cf. v. 31, xviii. 15, xix. 38 (xxiv. 24, β); properly a pecuniary surety, or sureties, here security for good behaviour from Jason and the others, that nothing illegal should be done by them, and certainly nothing against the majesty of the emperor. The words have been explained as meaning that securities were given for the production of the Apostles, and that thus Jason and his friend, by sending them off at night, ran a risk of their lives (Chrys., Grotius), or that the Apostles should not be sheltered any longer, or that they should be obliged to depart at once. Evidently the magistrates did not consider the evidence very weighty = ἀπέλυσαν αὐτούς.

Ver. 10. εὐθέως . . . ἐξέπεμ.: there was need of immediate action, either in obedience to the direct charge of the magistrates that Paul should not come again to Thessalonica, or from danger of a revival of the tumult. That St. Paul left Thessalonica with grief and pain is evident from 1 Thess. ii. 17-20, but he felt that the separation was necessary at least for a time. But still he looked back upon Thessalonica and his work with an ungrudging affection, and his converts were his glory and joy. In the opening words of his First Epistle, i. 7 (cf. 2 Thess. i. 4, 2 Cor. viii. 1), he speaks in a way which not only implies that his own work extended further in and from Thessalonica than the Acts alone enables us to learn, but that the furtherance of the Gospel was due to the Thessalonians themselves. See McGiffert, p. 255, on St. Paul's quiet hand-to-hand work at Thessalonica. For it was not only in the synagogue that St. Paul laboured, as if the message of the Gospel was formal and official, but amongst them who were working like himself for their daily bread, 1 Thess. ii. 9, 2 Thess. iii. 8, see Ramsay's note, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 85, on St. Paul's work at Thessalonica. The phrase "night and day," 1 Thess. ii. 9, need not imply, as the Speaker's Commentary, that Paul had only the Sundays for preaching, because his other days were so fully occupied; but the phrase means that he started work before dawn, and thus was able to devote some of the later part of the day to preaching. On the striking parallel between the characteristics of the Thessalonians of St. Paul's Epistles and the Acts and the characteristics which were marked by St. Jerome in his day, see Speaker's Commentary, iii., 701.—Βέροιαν (or Βέρροια): in the district of Macedonia called Emathia, Ptol., iii., 12, originally perhaps Pherœa, from Pheres, its founder (see Wetstein): about fifty miles southwest of Thessalonica. It was smaller and less important than the latter, but still possessing a considerable population and commerce, owing to its natural advantages, now Verria or Kara Feria, see B.D.[2] and Hastings' B.D., Renan, St. Paul, p. 162, and C. and H., small edition, p. 261. According to the Itineraries, two roads led from Thessalonica to Berœa. Wetstein quotes a curious passage from Cicero, In Pisonem, xxvi., which may possibly indicate that Paul and Silas went to Berœa on account of its comparative seclusion (so Alford, Farrar, Felten): Cicero calls it "oppidum devium".—εἰς τὴν συν. The Jewish population was at least considerable τὴν συναγωγὴν τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἀπῄεσαν. 11. οὗτοι δὲ ἦσαν[1] εὐγενέστεροι τῶν ἐν Θεσσαλονίκῃ, οἵτινες ἐδέξαντο τὸν λόγον μετὰ πάσης προθυμίας, τὸ καθ᾽ ἡμέραν ἀνακρίνοντες τὰς γραφάς, εἰ ἔχοι ταῦτα οὕτως. 12. πολλοὶ μὲν οὖν ἐξ αὐτῶν ἐπίστευσαν,[2] καὶ τῶν Ἑλληνίδων

[1] For ευγενεστεροι D, Par.[1] read ευγενεις, but not Blass or Hilg. Whether το is to be retained (W.H., Weiss, Blass) before καθ᾽ ημεραν or omitted is difficult to decide (Wendt); it may easily have fallen out, or may have been added, cf. Luke xi. 3, and at end of verse καθως Π. απαγγελλει is added by β, after 137, Gig., Syr. H. mg., so Hilg.

[2] After επιστ. D adds τινες δε ηπιστησαν, cf. xxviii. 24; see Ramsay, C. R. E., p. 160 (also Corssen, u. s., p. 444, who thinks that the addition proceeded from anti-Jewish feeling). In the same verse D reads και των Ελληνων και των ευσχημονων α. και γ. ικανοι επιστευσαν. Here Ramsay holds that D misses a characteristic of Macedonia, viz., the prominent part played by the women, C. R. E., pp. 160, 161. Blass omits και after Ελλην. Hilg. follows D here and above.

enough to have a synagogue, and thither Paul, according to his custom, went first.—ἀπῄεσαν: only here in N.T., cf. 2 Macc. xii. 1, 4 Macc. iv. 8; here it may imply that on their arrival Paul and Silas left their escort, and went into the synagogue.

Ver. 11. εὐγενέστεροι: only in Luke and Paul in the N.T., so in classics the word is used of noble birth, Luke xix. 12, 1 Cor. i. 26 (Job i. 3), or of nobility of character as here, cf. also its use in 4 Macc. iii. 5, ix. 23, 27 (and εὐγενῶς in 2 Macc. xiv. 42, and several times in 4 Macc.). We may compare the wide and varying use of the Latin ingenuus in accordance with the context, its meaning here is that the Berœans were far from the strife and envy of the Thessalonian Jews; see Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 154, 160, 163, on the less favourable attitude of Codex Bezæ to the Berœans than the T.R., and critical note; see also above on xiii. 50.—προθ.: another word only in Luke and Paul, cf. 2 Cor. viii. 11, 12, 19, ix. 2; not in LXX, but once in Ecclus. xlv. 23, frequent in classical Greek.—τὸ καθ᾽ ἡμέραν: indicates that St. Paul made a lengthy stay at Berœa also, cf. Luke xi. 3, xix. 47, but elsewhere without the article, with the article peculiar to Luke (see Plummer's note on Luke xi. 3). On the frequency of καθ᾽ ἡμέραν in Luke's writings see Friedrich, p. 9, and above on Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 33. If τό is read, see critical note, it particularises the repetition or constancy of the act.—ἀνακρ.: "examining," R.V. (the word in St. John v. 39, which A.V. also renders "search," is ἐρευνάω), cf. 1 Cor. x. 25, 27, used elsewhere by St. Luke of a judicial inquiry or investigation, Luke xxiii. 14, Acts iv. 9, xii. 19, xxiv. 8, xxviii. 18. The word is only found in Luke and Paul, once in LXX, 1 Sam. xx. 12, in a general sense, and in Susannah, vv. 48, 51, where it is connected with a judicial inquiry, as elsewhere in Luke. In classical Greek used also in the general sense of examining closely, questioning, sifting.—τὰς γραφάς: Blass explains "locos a Paulo allatos," but although these were ipso facto included, the term can hardly be so limited, cf. xviii. 24, 28, and Lightfoot on Gal. iii. 22. "Character verae religionis, quod se dijudicari patitur," Bengel.—εἰ ἔχοι, Burton, p. 52, cf. Luke i. 29, iii. 15. Wendt rightly points out that the positive praise bestowed on the Jews of Berœa tends in itself to contradict the theory that Acts was written to emphasise the unbelief of the Jews, and to contrast their unbelief with Gentile belief.

Ver. 12. See critical note and Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, u. s. As at Thessalonica, so here the Apostles' work extended beyond the limits of the synagogue. Ἑλληνίδων: the term relates to the men as well as to the women—the Jewish men had already been included in the first word πολλοί, see Alford, Weiss, Wendt, Zöckler.—εὐσχημόνων, see above on xiii. 50. Blass refers the term to ἀνδρῶν also, and points out that Sopater of Berœa alone in Acts is named πατρόθεν according to Greek custom, cf. xx. 4 (R.V., W.H., Weiss, Wendt). See also Orr, Neglected Factors in the Early Progress of Christianity, p. 107.

Ver. 13. οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Θ. Ἰ.: as before in the first journey, the bitter and enduring malice of the Jews followed Paul γυναικῶν τῶν εὐσχημόνων καὶ ἀνδρῶν οὐκ ὀλίγοι. 13. ὡς δὲ ἔγνωσαν οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Θεσσαλονίκης Ἰουδαῖοι, ὅτι καὶ ἐν τῇ Βεροίᾳ κατηγγέλη ὑπὸ τοῦ Παύλου ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἦλθον κἀκεῖ σαλεύοντες[1] τοὺς ὄχλους. 14. εὐθέως δὲ τότε τὸν Παῦλον ἐξαπέστειλαν οἱ ἀδελφοὶ πορεύεσθαι ὡς[2] ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν· ὑπέμενον δὲ ὅ τε Σίλας καὶ ὁ Τιμόθεος ἐκεῖ. 15. Οἱ δὲ καθιστῶντες τὸν Παῦλον ἤγαγον αὐτὸν

[1] After σαλ. ℵABD 13, 40, 61, verss., except Aeth., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Hilg., add και ταρασσοντες. Meyer thinks the words a gloss and cf. ver. 8. D also reads οτι (ο) λογος του Θεου κατηγγελη εις Βεροιαν και επιστευσαν, so Hilg. and Blass in β. The και επιστ., the reception of the Gospel, was the reason of this turbulent action. At end of verse D, Syr. Pesh. add ου διελιμπανον (cf. Acts viii. 24 β), so Blass and Hilg. In Luke vii. 45 we have διαλειπω, and only in that place in N.T. But διαλιμπανω occurs also, Tob. x. 7, ου διελιμπανε θρηνουσα Τωβιαν (but S al.). This may have suggested viii. 24. It may perhaps be noted that διαλιμπανω is a medical word = διαλειπω (Galen).

[2] Before επι read according to ℵABE 13, 40, 61, Vulg., Syr. Pesh., Boh., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, εως instead of ως; Meyer retains ως. In D, Sah., Aeth., word omitted. υπεμενον, but υπεμειναν ℵB 61, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; υπεμεινεν AD 27, 137, Sah., Syr. Pesh., so Lach, Hilg., and Blass in β. τε (for δε) ℵABE, Syr. P. and H., Aeth., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt.

from one place to another, and the use of his name alone shows that he was their chief aim.—κἀκεῖ: the word is often taken with σαλεύοντες, for it was not their advent which had happened previously, but their incitement to risk against Paul, so Page, Weiss, Wendt, Rendall, etc.; on the word see above on xiv. 7.—σαλεύοντες, cf. also for its figurative use 2 Thess. ii. 2, very frequent in LXX, and sometimes in figurative sense, as often in the Psalms, cf. 1 Macc. vi. 8, see above on ii. 25, and critical note on D.

Ver. 14. εὐθέως δὲ τότε: evidently the same riot and danger followed as at Thessalonica; St. Luke often passes over the difficulties and dangers which drove Paul from place to place (Ramsay).—ὡς: if we read ἕως, R.V., see critical note, "as far as to the sea," but ὡς ἐπί might well mean ad mare versus, ad mare, so Alford, Blass, and instances in Wetstein. There is no need to suppose that the words express a feigned movement to elude pursuit, "as if towards the sea" (see this meaning supported by Rendall, p. 108).—ἐπὶ τὴν θ.: probably he would embark at Dium near the foot of Olympus, which was connected by a direct road with Berœa (Lewin, C. and H., but see, however, Renan, Saint Paul, p. 166, note).—ὑπέμ. . . . ἐκεῖ, i.e., remained behind at Berœa, probably to gain the first intelligence from Thessalonica as to the possibility of St. Paul's return, and to bring the news to the Apostle, whose next stage may not have been decided upon until he reached the coast.

Ver. 15. καθιστῶντες, see critical note, i.e., the Berœan brethren. In N.T. only here in this sense, cf. Josh. vi. 23, 2 Chron. xxviii. 15, so also in classical Greek and in later Greek (instances in Wetstein); they accompanied Paul probably for protection as well as guidance (it has sometimes been supposed that disease of the eyes rendered the guidance necessary, but the word is used quite generally); see further additional note at end of chapter and critical note above, Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 159, 160. If we compare xviii. 5 it looks as if Timothy and Silas only overtook Paul at Corinth, and that he had left Athens before they reached that city. But from 1 Thess. iii. 1 it appears that Timothy was with Paul at Athens, and was sent from thence by him to Thessalonica, and this is quite in accordance with Paul's earnest wish that Timothy and Silas should come to him as quickly as possible (if we suppose that they only rejoined him in xviii. 5, they must have taken a much longer time than was necessary for the journey). But if Paul remained alone, as he states, 1 Thess. iii. 1, at Athens, Silas must also have been sent away; and we may well suppose that as Timothy was sent to comfort the Thessalonians for St. Paul's delay in returning to them, so Silas may have ἕως Ἀθηνῶν[1]· καὶ λαβόντες ἐντολὴν πρὸς τὸν Σίλαν καὶ Τιμόθεον, ἵνα ὡς τάχιστα ἔλθωσι πρὸς αὐτόν, ἐξῄεσαν.

[1] καθισταvοντες in AB 25, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; D καταστανοντες, so Hilg. Blass in β follows reading in T.R. After Αθηνων D adds παρηλθεν δε την Θεσσαλιαν· εκωλυθη γαρ εις αυτους κηρυξαι τον λογον, so Blass in β, and Hilg.; cf. also Ephraem (Harris, Four Lectures, etc., pp. 28, 47, 83). Ramsay, C. R. E., p. 160, thinks that the reviser did not observe that Paul probably sailed direct from the coast of Macedonia to Athens; in other words, he mistook a sea voyage for a journey by land. But Harris, u. s., p. 83, holds that Ramsay may be incorrect in this, and that the reviser meant to imply that St. Paul went to Athens by sea, but that he did not go through Thessaly, but coasted by it. It is also possible that παρηλθεν may mean "neglected" Thessaly in the sense that he did not preach to them, and in this sense Harris, p. 84, believes that Blass would find it possible to defend the Lucanity of the gloss; see also Wendt (1899), p. 288, note.

[2] θεωρουντος, instead of dat. as in T.R., ℵABE 40, 61, 180, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; D has the dat., so Blass in β, and Hilg., which seems conformity to αυτῳ.

been sent to Philippi, with which St. Paul was frequently in communication at this time, Phil. iv. 15. But after their return to Corinth from their mission, they found that St. Paul had already gone on to Corinth, and there they rejoined him. See on the whole subject, Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 233, 240, as against McGiffert; Wendt (1899) and Felten, in loco; Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, ix., 4.

Ver. 16. ἐκδεχομένου, cf. 1 Cor. xi. 33, xvi. 11, rare in classical Greek in this sense.—παρωξύνετο: "was provoked," R.V., only found elsewhere in N.T. in St. Paul's own description of ἀγάπη, 1 Cor. xiii. 5, and cf. xv. 39 (see note) and Heb. x. 24 for the cognate noun, see on the latter, Westcott, in loco. In LXX both verb and noun are used for burning with anger, or for violent anger, passion, Hos. viii. 5, Zech. x. 3, Deut. xxix. 28, Jer. xxxix. (xxxii.) 37; cf. Dem., 514, 10; ὠργίσθη καὶ παρωξύνθη (Meyer-Wendt).—τὸ πνεῦμα: expression principally used in Paul, cf. 1 Cor. ii. 11, Rom. i. 9, viii. 16, etc. Blass calls it periphrasis hebraica, and cf. Luke i. 47.—θεωροῦντες: "beheld," R.V., as of contemplation in thought, Latin, contemplari.—κατείδωλον: "full of idols," R.V.—the rendering "wholly given to idolatry" was not true, i.e., idolatry in the sense of worshipping the innumerable idols. If the city had been sincerely devoted to idol worship St. Paul might have had more to appeal to, "verum monumenta pietatis reperiebat Paulus, non ipsam, quæ dudum evanuerat," Blass. A.V. follows Vulgate, "idololatriæ deditum". The adjective is found only here, but it is formed after the analogy of κατάδενδρος, κατάμπελος, so Hermann, ad Vig., p. 638 (1824), "κατείδωλος πόλις non est, uti quidam opinantur, simulacris dedita urbs, sed simulacris referta". No word could have been more fitly chosen to describe the aspect of Athens to St. Paul as he wandered through it, a city which had been described as ὅλη βωμός, ὅλη θῦμα θεοῖς καὶ ἀνάθημα, see below on ver. 17. Before he actually entered the city, as he walked along the Hamaxitos road, St. Paul would have seen altars raised at intervals to the unknown gods, as both Pausanias and Philostratus testify, see "Athens," F. C. Conybeare, in Hastings' B.D. "He took these incomparable figures for idols," writes Renan (Saint Paul, p. 172) as he describes the beautiful sculptured forms upon which the eyes of the Apostle would be fixed, but the man who could write Rom. i. must have been keenly alive to the dangers which followed upon "the healthy sensualism of the Greeks".

Ver. 17. μὲν οὖν . . . τινὲς δὲ, see Rendall, p. 162, Appendix on μὲν οὖν, for the antithesis; a simple instance of two parties acting in opposition. Page however finds the antithesis to μὲν οὖν in ver. 19. ἐπιλαβ. δὲ (so W. H.), and regards τινὲς δὲ . . . συνέβαλλον αὐτῷ as almost parenthetical, see below on ver. 19.—διελέγετο: "he reasoned," R.V. (so Ramsay), see above on ver. 2. —ἐν τῇ συν.: on the synagogue see "Athens," F. C. Conybeare, in Hastings' B.D., but St. Paul did not confine himself to the synagogue, although undeterred by their hatred he went first to his own countrymen, and to the proselytes. But probably they were not numerous (see Farrar, St. Paul, i., 533), and the Apostle carried the same method of reasoning into the market-place—as was natural in the city of Socrates, he entered into conversation with those whom he met, as the same philosopher had done four hundred years before. Thus he became an Athenian to the Athenians: see the striking parallel in the description of Socrates, "he was to be seen in the market-place at the hour when it was most crowded," etc., and the words used by Socrates of himself, Plato, Apol., 31 A, quoted by Grote, viii., 211, 212, small edit., p. 212. F. C. Conybeare, u. s., compares the experiences in Athens of the Apostle's contemporary Apollonius with those of St. Paul; he too reasoned διελέξατο with them on religious matters, Philostr., Vit. Apollonii Tyanæ, iv., 19. The words ἐν τῇ συν. are placed in brackets by Hilgenfeld, and referred by Clemen to his Redactor Antijudaicus, whilst Jüngst retains the words but omits 16b, and with Van Manen and Clemen regards the whole of Paul's subsequent speech to the philosophers as the interpolation of a Redactor, p. 161 ff.—ἐν τῇ ἀγορᾷ: not the market-place like that which fills a bare space in a modern town, but rather to be compared with its varied beauty and its busy crowd to the square of some Italian city, e.g., the Piazza di Marco of Venice. There the Apostle's eye would fall on portico after portico, adorned by famous artists, rich in noble statues, see F. C. Conybeare, u. s., and Renan, Saint Paul, p. 180. On the west lay the Stoa Pœcile, whence the Stoics received their name, and where Zeno met his pupils, whilst the quiet gardens of Epicurus were probably not far distant (see on the site of the Agora to which St. Luke refers, "Athens," B.D.², i., 292, 293, and also C. and H., smaller edition, p. 273, Hackett, in loco, for different views as to its site).—κατὰ πᾶσαν ἡμέραν: every day, for he could take advantage by this method not only of the Sabbaths and days of meeting in the synagogues, but of every day, cf. the words of Socrates, Plato, u. s., in describing his own daily work of conversation with every one τὴν ἡμέραν ὅλην πανταχοῦ προσκαθίζων. The phrase seems to denote some time spent at Athens.—παρατυγχάνοντας: "chance comers" (like another Socrates), used only here in N.T., but cf. Thuc., i., 22, not in LXX or Apocrypha. Athens was full not only of philosophers, but we can imagine from the one phrase applied to it, Tac., Ann., ii., 55, what a motley group might surround the Apostle, illa colluvies nationum.

Ver. 18. συνέβαλλον αὐτῷ: a word peculiar to St. Luke; three times in his Gospel, four times in Acts; it need not have necessarily a hostile sense as in Luke xiv. 31, but simply means that amongst the chance comers in the Agora there were some who "engaged in discussions" with him (so Blass like Latin, consilia conferre, sc. λόγους), a meaning perhaps suggested by the imperfect. Grotius and others take it as "translatio de prœliis sumpta, ut apparet, Luc. xiv. 31. Utitur ita sæpe Polybius, quem sequi amat Lucas."—Ἐπικουρείων: so called from Epicurus, 342-270 B.C.; his disciples were known also as the School of the Garden, from the garden in Athens where the master instructed them, in distinction from the disciples of the Porch or the Academy. We must be careful to remember that as in numberless other cases, so the system of the founder suffered at the hands of his successors, and that the life of Epicurus himself was far removed from that of a mere sensualist, or "Epicure" in its later sense. But it was evident that a life which made pleasure and happiness the be-all and end-all of existence, however safeguarded by the conditions imposed at the outset by Epicurus, was liable to degenerate into a mere series of prudential calculations, or a mere indulgence of the senses and appetites. In his determination to rid men of the σπερμολόγος οὗτος λέγειν; οἱ δέ, Ξένων δαιμονίων δοκεῖ καταγγελεὺς εἶναι[1] · ὅτι τὸν Ἰησοῦν καὶ τὴν ἀνάστασιν αὐτοῖς εὐηγγελίζετο.

[1] οτι τον Ι. . . . ευηγγελιζετο om. by D, Gig., one of these places where explanatory clauses are omitted in D, and also by Blass in β, and Hilg. Blass, p. x., cf. xiv. 12, xvii. 18, "a scriptore potius in α adjecta puto, qui videret ea lectoribus vel omnibus vel quibusdam vel necessaria esse vel utilia". It is possible that the writer scrupled to appear to class Ιησους among the δαιμονια. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 242, thinks the clause foreign to Luke's fashion; apparently a gloss, suggested by ver. 32.

superstitious fears which were the chief cause of the miseries of humanity, Epicurus opposed the popular Polytheism, and regarded the gods as living a life of passionless calm far removed from mundane strifes and sorrows, "careless of mankind". The Stoics branded Epicurus as an Atheist, but the materialistic creed of Epicurus and his followers had at all events this merit, that its bold criticism of existing beliefs was serviceable in undermining the prevailing acceptance of a gross and crude mythology, whilst it helped to assert in contradistinction to a paralysing fatalism the doctrine of the freedom of man's will (see F. C. Conybeare, "Epicureans," Hastings' B.D.; Westcott, "Epicureans," B.D.[2]; Wallace, Epicureanism).—Στωϊκῶν: The Stoics, so called from the Stoa Pœcile at Athens where Zeno of Citium, the founder of the school, 340-260 B.C., met his pupils, and where his successors debated (Capes, Stoics, p. 30), spoke in their theology of a providence ruling the world, of a first cause and a governing mind. But their creed was essentially Pantheistic, although the verses of Cleanthes' Hymn ("the most important document of the Stoic theology," Ueberweg) seemed to breathe the accents of a higher and nobler belief. But no devotional phrases could disguise a Pantheism which regarded the world as the body of God, and God as the soul of the world, which held that apart from external nature the Supreme God had no existence which identified Him with fate and necessity, while the history of the universe was an unfolding of the providence of God, but a providence which was but another name for the chain of causation and consequences, inviolable, eternal. The leading maxims of the ethical system of the Stoics was the injunction to live according to nature, although the expression of the rule varied in the earlier and later schools. But as this life was best realised in conformity to the law of the universe, in conformity with reason as the highest element in man, the Stoic ideal, in spite of its recognition of virtue, became not merely stern and intellectual, but impassive and austere; in aiming at apathy the Stoic lost sympathy with the most ennobling and energetic emotions, and thus wrapped up in the cloak of his own virtue he justified, at least from an ethical point of view, the description which classed him as the Pharisee of Greek philosophy. In addressing an audience composed at all events in part of the representatives of these two great philosophic schools it may be said that St. Paul was not unmindful of his own former training in the early home of Stoicism (see on p. 235). And so in speaking of creation and providence, of the unity of nations in the recognition of all that was true even in Pantheism, St. Paul has been described as taking the Stoic side against the Epicureans, or at least we may say that he in his speech asserts against some of the cardinal errors of the Epicureans the creative and superintending power of God. But to the Stoic and Epicurean alike the Christian Creed would proclaim that All's Love, yet all's Law; to the Stoic and Epicurean alike, the Pharisee and Sadducee of the world of philosophy, the bidding came to repent and obey the Gospel, no less than to the crowd whom sages and philosophers despised: "Paulus summa arte orationem suam ita temperat, ut modo cum vulgo contra Philosophos, modo cum Philosophis contra plebem, modo contra utrosque pugnet," Wetstein; see Capes, Stoicism; Lightfoot, Philippians, "St. Paul and Seneca"; Zahn, Der Stoiker Epiktet und sein Verhältniss zum Christenthum; Ueberweg, Hist. of Phil., i., p. 185 ff.; Rendall, Marcus Antoninus, Introd. (1898); Gore, Ephesians, p. 253 ff.—καί τινες ἔλεγον: these are generally taken to include the philosophers, and the remarks following are referred to them; sometimes the first question to the Epicureans, and the second criticism to the Stoics. But it has recently been maintained that we need not refer to the two sects of philosophers this unfavourable criticism on St. Paul; "Epicureans," Conybeare in Hastings' B.D. Certainly the οἱ δέ has no οἱ μέν as if two opposing schools were meant. The punctuation in R.V., which simply states the fact that amongst those in the Agora certain also τινὲς δὲ καὶ of the philosophers, etc., admits of this view that the criticisms were uttered not by the philosophers, but by the curious crowd which thronged the Agora. Ramsay however takes the verse as marking the opinions of the philosophers, and the use of the word σπερμολόγος by Zeno of one of his followers may help to confirm this.—τί ἂν θέλοι: "what would this babbler say?" R.V., not future as in A.V.; the ἂν with optative being used to express what would happen as the fulfilment of some supposed condition, Burton, p. 79, so Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 33 (1893), the condition being if we would listen to him, or if his words have any meaning; optative with ἂν only in Luke, see Burton, u. s.—σπερμολόγος: primarily an adjective, -ον; as a substantive ὁ σπερ. of a rook or crow, or some small bird, picking up seeds, cf. Arist., Av., 233, 580. σπέρμα-λέγω: so far as derivation is concerned it is not connected with σπείρω-λόγους, Latin, seminiverbius (so Augustine, Wycliffe, "sower of words"). The accent shows that this latter derivation is incorrect. Hence a man hanging about the shops and the markets, picking up scraps which fell from the loads and thus gaining a livelihood, so a parasite, one who lives at the expense of others, a hanger-on, Eustathius on Hom., Odys., v., 490; see in Grimm, sub v.; so Dem. speaks of Aeschines, 269, 19, as σπερ. περίτριμμα ἀγορᾶς. The word thus came to be used of a man who picked up scraps of information, and retailed them at second hand. So Eustathius speaks of rhetoricians who were mere collectors of words and consistent plagiarists δι' ὅλου σπερμολογοῦντες; so again he remarks that the word is applied to those who make a show in unscientific style of knowledge which they have got from misunderstanding of lectures (see for these quotations Ramsay, Expositor, September, 1899, p. 222, and the whole article "St. Paul in Athens"). Ramsay maintains therefore that there is no instance of the classical use of the word as a babbler or mere talker, and he sees in the word a piece of Athenian slang, caught up as the Athenians had themselves used it ("sine dubio hoc ex ipso ore Atheniensium auctor excepit" Blass), and applied to one who was quite outside any literary circle, an ignorant, vulgar plagiarist. At the same time it is perhaps difficult to find any single word more to the point than "babbler," A. and R.V. (Tyndall), for, as Alford urges, it both signifies one who talks fluently to no purpose, and hints also that his talk is not his own. We may, however, well owe this rendering to the fact that σπερμολόγος was wrongly derived, as if it meant seminator verborum, whereas its true derivation is given above. De Wette, Overbeck, Nösgen, Weiss, Holtzmann, Zöckler, Wendt, all so render it. An ingenious attempt has been made to connect the word with the Aretalogi (Juvenal, Sat., xv., 16; Suet, Aug., 74) or praters about virtue, who hired themselves as entertainers for the wealthy Roman nobles at their dinners: "mendax aretalogus," Juv., u. s.; Zöckler, in loco. For instances of the use of the word see Wetstein, Ramsay, Nösgen, Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden, p. 77; Rendall (who agrees with Ramsay), and "Babbler," Hastings' B.D.—ξένων δαιμ. δοκεῖ καταγ.: The same kind of accusation had been already made against Socrates, Xen., Mem., i., 1, as also against Anaxagoras and Protagoras, see Josephus, C. Apion., ii., 38, who also tells us how a certain priestess had been condemned in Athens ὅτι ξένους ἐμύει θεούς. In Athens the introduction of strange gods was a capital offence, if by such an introduction the home deities were rejected and the state religion disturbed, but there is nothing to show that the Athenians regarded Paul's teaching in this light, and there is no evidence that the Areopagus had cognisance of serious charges of impiety or of the introduction of foreign religion (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 247).—ξένων: "strange," i.e., foreign.—δαιμονίων used here like the Greek δαιμόνιον in a neutral sense which might refer to deities good or bad. In classical Greek we have καινὰ δαιμόνια, cf. the charge against Socrates, Xen., Mem., i., 1; Plato, Apol., 24 B. καταγγελεὺς: only here in N.T., not found in LXX or classical Greek, the verb καταγγέλλειν occurs twice in 2 Macc. viii. 36, ix. 17, of declaring abroad the power of the God of the Jews. In Plutarch we have κατάγγελος.—δοκεῖ, see Burton, p. 153; on the personal construction with δοκεῖ cf. Gal. ii. 9, Jas. i. 26, etc.—τὸν Ἰ. καὶ τὴν ἀνάστασιν, see critical note. It is possible that the Athenians thought that Paul was preaching two strange deities, Jesus and Resurrection (the latter as a female deity Ἀνάστασις), just as they had their own altars erected to Pity, Piety, Modesty, a view which gains support not only from the collocation of the words, but from the use of the article with both, and from the supposition that Paul was held to be a preacher of more than one strange God; so Chrys., Oecum., Selden, and list given by Wendt (1888), in loco. Wendt also (1899) inclines to this view, which is adopted by Renan, Overbeck, Holtzmann, Felten, McGiffert, Knabenbauer, cf. also the punctuation in R.V., which may imply this view (see Humphry on R.V., in loco). As against this view see Hackett's note, p. 213, who thinks it hardly conceivable that the Apostle could express himself so obscurely on the subject as to afford any occasion for this gross mistake (so also Farrar). The article before ἀνάσ. is taken by Nösgen as referring simply to the general resurrection, a view which he regards as agreeing with the prominence given to the doctrine in ver. 31. It is argued that if ἀνάσ. referred to the resurrection of Jesus we should have αὐτοῦ which has crept into some copies, but the address itself shows that the Apostle spoke of the resurrection of Jesus as affording a pledge of a general resurrection.

Ver. 19. ἐπιλαβ.: as to whether we regard this as done with hostile intent, or not, will depend upon the view taken of the meaning of the Areopagus. If the latter means "the Hill of Mars," to which the Apostle was taken for a quiet hearing and for unimportant discussion, then the former is clearly inadmissible; if, however, the Areopagus meant the Council of Areopagus, then that action would seem to have been indicative at least of malice and dislike. The verb in the N.T. is used only in the middle, with accusative or genitive, and most frequently by St. Luke, five times in his Gospel, seven times in Acts, twice by St. Paul, only once by St. Matthew and by St. Mark. In each case it can be determined by the context whether it is used in a favourable or unfavourable sense. So too in LXX (always with genitive), where it is frequently used, the context alone decides. Certainly ix. 27 presents a close verbal parallel in language, as the participle ἐπιλ. is followed as here by ἤγαγον (Weiss), but the context there expresses beyond all doubt a friendly action. Grotius (so Weiss, Wendt, Felten, Zöckler, Bethge) attributes friendliness to the action here, and renders "manu leniter prehensum," so too F. C. Conybeare, "Areopagus," Hastings' B.D., renders it "took Paul by the hand," but in three of the four parallels to which he refers χείρ is expressed, and for the fourth see above. But the view taken of the following words will help us to decide, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 245, and Expositor, September, 1895, pp. 216, 217.—ἐπὶ τὸν Ἄ. πάγον, Curtius, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, ii., p. 528, note, and Ramsay, Expositor, u. s., p. 217, point out that ἐπί with accusative would be the correct expression for taking any one before an official court, cf. ix. 21, xvi. 19, xvii. 6, xviii. 12—a regular Lucan preposition in this sense—cf. also Herod., iii., 46, 156; viii., 79. But it does not therefore follow that a regular trial was instituted, as Chrys., Theophylact and others have held, since there is nothing in the context to indicate this. But the form of expression certainly does seem to indicate that Paul was taken not to the Hill of Mars, as is generally held, but before a court or council. And there is substantial evidence for believing that the term Areopagus (as Blass admits) was not merely local, but that it was sometimes used as = the Council or Court of Areopagus, cf. Cicero, Ad Atticum, i., 14, 5; De Nat. Deorum, ii., 29; Rep., i., 27. Moreover, there is good reason to believe that the council, although deriving its name from the hill, did not always meet on the hill, and also that it had the power of taking official action in questions bearing upon public teaching in the city (cf. Renan, Saint Paul, pp. 193, 194, and authorities cited). It is therefore not an improbable inference that Paul would be brought before such a court for inquiry into his teaching; beyond this inference perhaps we cannot go; even to call the inquiry a προδικασία (so Curtius) may be to apply a technical term unwarranted by the context, which bears no trace of a criminal procedure, cf. Curtius, u. s., pp. 528, 529; Ramsay, u. s.; Plumptre and Rendall, in loco. But where did the council meet for the discharge of such duties as inquiries into the qualification of teachers, as a public court for the maintenance of public order? Probably in the Stoa Basileios; here Demosthenes informs us that some of its duties were transacted (see Expositor, October, 1895, p. 272, and Curtius, u. s., p. 528), and the scene before us is full of the life of the Agora with the corona of people thronging to listen, rather than of the sacred or solemn associations of the Hill of Mars, or of the quietude of a spot far removed from the busy life of the market-place. So too the name "Areopagus" might have been easily transferred to the council sitting in a place other than the hill, so that ἡ βουλὴ ἡ ἐξ Ἀ. π. might easily become Ἄρειος Πάγος informally and colloquially, and the word as used here by St. Luke may really be another proof that, as in σπερμολόγος, the author catches the very word which the Athenians would use, Ramsay, Expositor, September, 1895, p. 216, and Renan, u. s., p. 194, note. But it has further been urged both by Curtius and Ramsay (so also Renan, u. s.) that the Hill of Mars would be a most inconvenient place for public assemblies and speakers, see Ramsay, u. s., p. 213, and Curtius, u. s., p. 529, and even if the spot had been suitable for such purposes, there would have been a want of fitness in the Athenians taking this σπερμολόγος to harangue them on a spot so inseparably associated with the dignity and glory of their city; see also below on vv. 22 and 33.—Δυναμεθα γνῶναι: like the Latin, Possum scire? the question may have been asked in courtesy, or in sarcasm, or ironically; in the repetition of the article the irony may be accentuated.—ἡ ὑπὸ σοῦ λαλ.: "which is spoken by thee," R.V., the Apostle was not speaking about the doctrine, A.V., his words were the doctrine (Lumby). Felten regards the question as courteously put, and sees in it a decisive proof that Paul was not put upon his trial, since a man could not be tried on a charge of which his accusers had no knowledge. But this would not prevent a preliminary inquiry of some kind before the court, prompted by dislike or suspicion.

Ver. 20. ξενίζοντα: rather perhaps startling or bewildering than strange—so too in Polyb., cf. 1 Peter iv. 12, but see Grimm-Thayer, sub v. Ramsay renders "some things of foreign fashion" as if the words were connected with the opinion that the Apostle was an announcer of foreign gods, cf. also 2 Macc. ix. 6, Diod. Sic., xii., 53.—τινα: the rhetorical use of the indefinite τις here strengthening the participle, cf. viii. 9, v. 6, Heb. x. 27.—εἰσφ. . . . ἀκοὰς: Blass suggests a Hebraism, but on the life of Greeks we must look no further than the parallel which the same writer adduces, Soph., Ajax, 147, cf. also Wetstein. The verb is only used here in this sense in N.T.—τί ἂν θέλοι, see critical note and Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 112: "de rebus in aliquem exitum tendentibus," Grimm; cf. ii. 12; so Bethge.

Ver. 21. Ἀθην. δὲ πάντες: "now all Athenians," without any article, a characteristic of the whole people, cf. xxvii. 4, but see Ramsay, Expositor, October, 1895, p. 274, and Blass, Gram., p. 157.—ἐπιδημοῦντες: "sojourning there," R.V., A.V. takes no notice of the word = resident strangers: "unde iidem mores," Bengel; on the population of Athens see F. interests of life were sacrificed to this characteristic (note imperfect tense), restless inquisitiveness, their great orator, Demosthenes, knew when he contrasted this idle curiosity with the vigour and ability of Philip of Macedon, Philippic I., p. 43. The words go to support the interpretation that there was no formal indictment, but they do not destroy the view that there may have been an examinaton into the Apostle's teaching, Curtius, u. s., p. 529.—καινότερον: certainly there is, as Blass says, "mirus consensus" as to this characteristic of the Athenians; see instances in Wetstein: Dem., Philippic I., 43, and Philipp. Epist., 156, 157; Thuc., iii., 38; Theophr., Char., iii., περὶ λογοποιΐας μὴ λέγεταί τι καινότερον; cf. Seneca, Epist., 74. Lit., "some newer thing," something newer than that which had just preceded it as new up to the time of asking. The comparative may therefore indicate more vividly the voracious appetite of the Athenians for news, although it may be also said that the comparative was the usual degree used by the Greeks in the question What news? (usually νεώτερον); indeed their fondness for using the comparative of both νέος and καινός is quite singular (Page, see also Winer-Moulton, xxxv., 4; Blass, Gram., p. 138). The words of Bengel are often quoted, "nova statim sordebant, noviora quærebantur," but it should be noted that he adds "Noviora autem quærebant, non modo in iis quæ gentilia accidunt; sed, quod nobilius videtur, in philosophicis," see for a practical and forcible lesson on the words, F. D. Maurice, Friendship of Books, pp. 84, 85.

Ver. 22. σταθεὶς, Lucan, see i. 15. —ἐν μέσῳ τοῦ Ἀ. π., i.e., in the midst of the Council or Court of Areopagus, see above on ver. 19, cf. iv. 7, Peter stood in the midst of the Sanhedrim. Ramsay pertinently remarks that the words "in the middle of Mars' hill" are far from natural or clear, and those who adopt them usually omit the word "midst," and say that Paul stood on Mars' hill, justifying the expression by supposing that ἐν μέσῳ is a Hebraism for ἐν, i. 15, ii. 22. But whilst a Hebraism would be natural in the earlier chapters referred to, it would be quite out of place here in this Attic scene, cf. also ver. 33, Ramsay, Expositor, September, 1895, so too Curtius, u. s., p. 529, in support of the rendering adopted by Ramsay.—Ἄνδρες Ἀθην.: usual way of beginning a speech; strange to allege it as a proof that the speech is not genuine: "according to the best MS. evidence, Demosthenes habitually, at least in some speeches, said ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι without ὦ. It is therefore a mistake to note as unclassical the use of the vocative here without ὦ, cf. i. 14, xix. 35," Simcox, Language of the New Testament, p. 76, note.—κατὰ πάντα: "in all things I perceive that ye are," R.V., meaning that wherever he looked he had evidence of this characteristic—the A.V. would imply that in all their conduct the Athenians were, etc. The phrase which is common in classics is only found here, in iii. 22, Col. iii. 20, 22, Heb. ii. 5, iv. 15, in N.T.—ὡς, see Grimm-Thayer, sub v., i., d., Winer-Moulton, xxxv., 4.—δεισιδαιμ.: "somewhat superstitious," R.V., but in margin, "somewhat religious," so in xxv. 19 the noun is rendered "religion," R.V. (in margin, "superstition"), where Festus, in speaking to Agrippa, a Jew, would not have been likely to call the Jewish religion a superstition. R.V. gives a better turn to the word than A.V. with Tyndale, "too superstitious," cf. Vulgate, superstitiosiores, as it is incredible that St. Paul should have commenced his remarks with a phrase calculated to offend his hearers. The R.V. has modified the A.V. by introducing "somewhat" instead of "too," according to the classical idiom by which the comparative of an adjective may be used to express the deficiency or excess (slight in either case) of the quality contained in the positive. But the quality in this case may be good or bad, since the adjective δεισιδαίμων and the cognate noun may be used of reverence or of superstition, cf. for the former Xen., Cyr., iii., 3, 58; Arist., Pol., v., 11; cf. C. I. Gr., 2737b; Jos., Ant., x., 32; Polyb., vi., 56, 7, and for the latter, Theoph., Char., xvi.; Plut., De Superstit., 10; Jos., Ant., xv., 8, 2; M. Aurelius, vi., 30, and instances in Philo, cf. also Justin Martyr, Apol., i., 2 (see Hatch, Biblical Essays, p. 43). Ramsay renders: "more than others respectful of what is divine"; so Renan, "le plus religieux"; Holtzmann, "Gottesfürchtige," so Weiss, so Zöckler, "religiosiores ceteris Græcis" (Horace, Sat., i., 9, 70), cf. Winer-Moulton, xxxv., 4. In thus emphasising the religious spirit of the Athenians, St. Paul was speaking in strict accordance with similar testimonies from various quarters, cf. Thuc., ii., 40; Soph., O. C., 260; Jos., C. Apion., ii., 11; Pausanias, In Attic., 24; Petronius, Sat., c. 17. The context, ver. 24, where εὐσεβεῖτε, religiose colitis (Wetstein), is one result of this δεισιδαιμονία, strengthens the view that the adjective is used here in a good sense; cf. the comment on its good use here by St. Chrys., Hom., xxxviii., and Theophylact. There is therefore no reason to suppose that Paul's words were an accommodation to the usual practice of Athenian orators to commence with a mere compliment. At the same time it is possible that with delicate tact the Apostle made use of a word of doubtful meaning, verbum per se μέσον, which could not possibly provoke hostility at the outset, while it left unexpressed his own judgment as to the nature of this reverence for the divine "with kindly ambiguity," Grimm-Thayer.

23. διερχόμενος γὰρ καὶ ἀναθεωρῶν[1] τὰ σεβάσματα ὑμῶν, εὗρον καὶ βωμὸν ἐν ᾧ ἐπεγέγραπτο,[2] Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ. ὃν οὖν ἀγνοοῦντες

[1] For αναθεωρων D (Clem.) has διιστορων (nowhere found in N.T., not used in LXX or classical Greek).

[2] For επεγεγραπτο D (Gig.) has ην γεγραμμενον, so Hilg., and reads Αγνωστων Θεων, see Blass, in loco, for authorities who think this reading original, although in β text he follows T.R. ον . . . τουτον ℵcA²EHLP, Arm., Clem., Ath., Chrys., Cosm., Aug.; ο . . . τουτο ℵ*A*BD¹, Vulg., Or., Hier., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass; ο . . . τουτον 61.

Ver. 23. διερχόμενος γὰρ: "for as I passed along," R.V., through the streets, or perhaps "was wandering through"—Renan has passant dans vos rues, see also on ver. 16 above, and also on viii. 40. A.V., "as I passed by" does not give the force of the word, and apparently means "passed by the objects of your devotion".—ἀναθεωρῶν: accurate contemplari, "observed," R.V., only in later Greek, and in N.T. only in Heb. xiii. 7, "considering with attentive survey again and again," see Westcott, in loco: Weiss renders it here „immer wieder betrachtend," cf. critical notes, cf. Diod. Sic., xiv. 109, and references in Grimm.—τὰ σεβάσματα: "the objects of your worship," R.V., Vulgate, simulacra, the thing worshipped, not the act or manner of worshipping. The A.V. margin gives "gods that ye worship," cf. 2 Thess. ii. 4, where A. and R.V. both render "that is worshipped," σέβασμα in text, and R.V. in margin, "an object of worship"; Bel and the Dragon, ver. 27, Wisdom xiv. 20, xv. 17.—καὶ βωμὸν: "I found also an altar," R.V., i.e., in addition to those with definite dedications; only here in N.T., often in LXX, sometimes of heathen altars, Exod. xxxiv. 13, Numb. xxiii. 1, Deut. vii. 5.—ἐπεγέγραπτο, cf. Luke xvi. 20; on the pluperfect with augment, Blass, Gram., p. 37, see critical note: Farrar, St. Paul, i., 542, takes the word as implying permanence, and perhaps antiquity, so in Speaker's Commentary as of an ancient decayed altar, whose inscription had been forgotten; Mark xv. 26, Rev. xxi. 12 (Heb. viii. 10, x. 16).—Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ: "to an unknown God," R.V.: all previous versions like A.V., but there is no definite article, although in inscriptions it was often omitted. For the existence of altars of this kind the testimony of Pausanias and Philostratus may be fairly quoted; Pausan., i., 1, 4 (cf. v. 14, 6), βωμοὶ θεῶν τε ὀνομαζομένων ἀγνώστων καὶ ἡρώων, and Philost., Vit. Apollon., vi., 2, σωφρονέστερον περὶ πάντων θεῶν εὖ λέγειν, καὶ ταῦτα Ἀθήνησιν, οὗ καὶ ἀγνώστων θεῶν βωμοὶ ἵδρυνται, see references in Wetstein, and cf. F. C. Conybeare, u. s.; Renan, Saint Paul, p. 173; Neander, Geschichte der Pflanzung, ii., 32 ff.; Wendt, etc. Baur, Zeller, Overbeck have maintained that there could have been no such inscription in the singular number as the plural is so much more in harmony with polytheism, although the last named admits that the authorities cited above admit at least the possibility of an inscription as in the text. To say nothing of the improbability that Paul would refer before such an audience to an inscription which had no existence, we may reasonably infer that there were at Athens several altars with the inscription which the Apostle quotes. A passage in Diog. Laert., Epim., 3, informs us how Epimenides, in the time of a plague, brought to the Areopagus and let loose white and black sheep, and wherever the sheep lay down, he bade the Athenians to sacrifice τῷ προσήκοντι θεῷ, and so the plague ceased, with the result that we find in Athens many βωμοὺς ἀνωνύμους, see the passage quoted in full in Wetstein; from this it is not an unfair inference that in case of misfortune or disaster, when it was uncertain what god should be honoured or propitiated, an altar might be erected ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ. (It is curious that Blass although he writes ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ in β thinks that the true reading must have been the plural.) To draw such an inference is much more reasonable than to suppose with Jerome, Tit., i., 12, that the inscription was not as Paul asserted, but that he used the singular number because it was more in accordance with his purpose, the inscription really being "Diis Asiæ et Europæ et Africæ, Diis ignotis et peregrinis," cf. the inscription according to Oecumenius θεοῖς Ἀσίας καὶ Εὐρώπης καὶ Λιβύης Θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ καὶ ξένῳ. But at the very commencement of his speech the Apostle would scarcely have made a quotation so far removed from the actual words of the inscription, otherwise he would have strengthened the suspicion that he was a mere σπερμολόγος. St. Chrysostom, Hom., xxxviii., sees in the inscription an indication of the anxiety of the Athenians lest they should have neglected some deity honoured elsewhere, but if we connect it with the story mentioned above of Epimenides, it would be quite in accordance with the religious character of the Athenians, or perhaps one might rather say with the superstitious feeling which prompted the formula so often employed in the prayer of Greeks and Romans alike Si deo si dea, or the words of Horace (Epod., v., 1), "At deorum quidquid in coelo regit". There is no reason for the view held amongst others by Mr. Lewin that the inscription refers to the God of the Jews. But in such an inscription St. Paul wisely recognised that there was in the heart of Athens a witness to the deep unsatisfied yearning of humanity for a clearer and closer knowledge of the unseen power which men worshipped dimly and imperfectly, a yearning expressed in the sacred Vedic hymns of an old world, or in the crude religions of a new, cf. Max Müller, Selected Essays, i., p. 23 ff.; Zöckler, in loco, "Altar," B.D.[2]; Plumptre, Movements of Religious Thought, p. 78 ff.—ὃν οὖν ἀγνοοῦντες, see critical notes. If we read ὃ for ὅν, we may render with R.V., "what therefore ye worship in ignorance": Vulgate, quod colitis. The mere fact of the erection of such an inscription showed that the Athenians did reverence to some divine existence, although they worshipped what they knew not, St. John iv. 22; not "ignorantly worship," as in A.V., this would have been alien to the refinement and tact of St. Paul.—εὐσεβεῖτε: used here as elsewhere of genuine piety, which St. Paul recognised and claimed as existing in the existence of the altar—the word throws light on the meaning which the Apostle attached to the δεισιδαιμονία of ver. 22; in N.T. only in Luke and Paul, cf. 1 Tim. v. 4, of filial piety (cf. pietas), cf. Susannah, ver. 64 (LXX), and 4 Macc. xi. 5, 8, 23, xviii. 2. "That divine nature which you worship, not knowing what it is" (Ramsay).—τοῦτον ἐγὼ καταγγέλλω ὑμῖν: in these words lay the answer to the charge that he was a σπερμ. or a καταγγελεύς of strange gods. ἐγὼ, emphatic; I whom you regard as a mere babbler proclaim to you, or set forth, the object which you recognise however dimly, and worship however imperfectly. Since the days of St. Chrysostom the verse has been taken as a proof that the words of St. Paul were addressed not to a select group of philosophers, but to the corona of the people.

Ver. 24. ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ποιήσας: "the God Who made all," R.V., the definiteness of the words and the revelation of God as Creator stand in marked contrast to the imperfect conception of the divine nature grasped by the Athenian populace, or even by the philosophers: ἐφθέγξατο φωνὴν μίαν, δι' ἧς πάντα κατέστρεψε τὰ τῶν φιλοσόφων. οἱ μὲν γὰρ Ἐπικούρειοι αὐτόματά φασιν εἶναι τὰ πάντα, καὶ ἀπὸ ἀτόμων συνεστάναι· οἱ δὲ Στωϊκοὶ σῶμα καὶ ἐκπύρωσιν· ὁ δὲ ἔργον Θεοῦ λέγει κόσμον καὶ πάντα τὰ ἐν αὐτῷ. Ὁρᾷς συντομίαν, καὶ ἐν συντομίᾳ σαφήνειαν. St. Paul's language is that of a Jew, a Monotheist, and is based upon Gen. i. 1, Exod. xx. 11, Isa. xlv. 7, Neh. ix. 6, etc., but his use of the word κόσμος (only here in Acts, only three times in St. Luke's Gospel) is observable. The word is evidently not used in the moral sense, or in the sense of moral separation from God, which is so common in St. John, and which is sometimes employed by the Synoptists, and it may well have been chosen by Paul as a word familiar to his hearers. Both by Aristotle and Plato it had been used as including the orderly disposition of the heaven and the earth (according to some, Pythagoras had first used the word of the orderly system of the universe), and in this passage οὐρανοῦ καὶ γῆς may perhaps both be taken or included in the κόσμος, cf. iv. 24, xiv. 15. In the LXX κόσμος is never used as a synonym of the world, i.e., the universe (but cf. Prov. xvii. 6, Grimm, sub v.), except in the Apocryphal books, where it is frequently used of the created universe, Wisdom vii. 17, ix. 3; 2 Macc. vii. 23, viii. 18; 4 Macc. v. 25 (24), etc., Grimm, sub v., and Cremer, Wörterbuch.—οὗτος: "He being Lord of heaven and earth," R.V., more emphatic and less ambiguous than A.V., "seeing that".—ὑπάρχων "being the natural Lord" (Farrar), "He, Lord as He is, of heaven and earth" (Ramsay); see Plummer's note on Luke viii. 41; the word is Lucan, see above on οὐρ. καὶ γῆς κ., cf. Isa. xlv. 7, Jer. x. 16, and 1 Cor. x. 26.—οὐκ ἐν χειροποιήτοις ναοῖς κ.: as the Maker of all things, and Lord of heaven and earth, He is contrasted with the gods whose dwelling was in temples made with hands, and limited to a small portion of space, cf. 1 Kings viii. 27; Jos., Ant., viii., 4, 2, and St. Stephen's words, vii. 48, of which St. Paul here as elsewhere may be expressing his reminiscence, cf. for the thought Cicero, Leg., ii., 10, and in early Christian writers Arnobius and Minucius Felix (Wetstein), see also Mr. Page's note.

Ver. 25. οὐδὲ . . . θεραπεύεται: used in LXX and in classical Greek of the service of the Gods, significantly twice in Epist. Jer., vv. 27, 39, of the worshippers and priests of the idols overlaid with silver and gold, which are contrasted with the true God in that they can save no man from death, or show mercy to the widow and the fatherless, before which the worshippers set offerings and meat as before dead men. "Non quærit ministros Deus. Quidni? ipse humano generi ministrat," Seneca, Epist., 95, and instances in Wetstein; but St. Chrysostom's comment must also be noted, λέγων δέ, μὴ ὑπὸ χ. ἀνθ. θεραπεύεσθαι τὸν θεόν, αἰνίττεται ὅτι διανοίᾳ καὶ νῷ θεραπεύεται.—προσδεόμενός τινος: only here in N.T., to need in addition, as if necessary to perfection, "qui habet quidem aliquid, sed non satis, qui insuper eget," Wetstein, so "cum . . . nullius boni desideret accessionem," Erasmus; a close parallel is found in 2 Macc. xiv. 35 (3 Macc. ii. 9); in both passages the word ἀπροσδεής is used of God, and in the former reference is made to the fact that God was pleased that the temple of His habitation should be amongst the Jews, cf. also Ecclus. lii. 21. Blass and Wetstein both quote a striking Pythagorean saying from Hierocles, see in loco, and to this αὐτάρκεια of the divine nature both the Jewish philosopher Philo and the Roman Epicurean Lucretius from their varying standpoints bore witness, see the instances in Wetstein (cf. Psalm li. 9).—Luther takes τινος as masculine, which as Wendt admits corresponds well to the preceding and also to the following πᾶσι, but it seems best to take it as neuter, of the service which men render, cf. Clem., Cor., lii., 1, ἀπροσδεής, ἀδελφοί, ὁ δεσπότης ὑπάρχει τῶν ἁπάντων, οὐδὲν οὐδενὸς χρῄζει εἰ μὴ τὸ ἐξομολογεῖσθαι αὐτῷ, and Epist. ad Diognetum, iii., 5.—αὐτὸς διδοὺς: "seeing he himself giveth," R.V., so Vulgate ipse, but although αὐτός is so emphatic it was unfortunately ignored in Wycl., Genevan and A.V. The best commentary on the words is in David's words, 1 Chron. xxix. 14, cf. the striking passage in Epist. ad Diognetum, iii., 4.—πᾶσι: taken as neuter or masculine, but perhaps with Bengel "omnibus viventibus et spirantibus, summe προσδεομένοις indigentibus. De homine speciatim, v. seq."—ζωὴν καὶ πνοήν, cf. Gen. ii. 7, not a mere hendiadys, vitam animalem, or spiritum vitalem, but the first word = life in itself, existence; and the second the continuance of life, "per spiritum (halitum) continuatur vita," Bengel: on the paronomasia, see Winer-Moulton, lxviii., 1. For πνοή LXX, Ps. cl. 6, Job xxvii. 3, Isa. xlii. 5, Ecclus. xxx. 29 (xxxiii. 20), 2 Macc. iii. 31, and vii. 9, etc.—τὰ πάντα: omnia quæcumque, Rom. viii. 32, the expression need not be limited with Bethge to all things necessary for the preservation of life and breath.

Ver. 26. "And he hath made of one every nation of men for to dwell," R.V., so also A.V. takes ἐποίησε separately from κατοικεῖν, not "caused to dwell"; ἐποίησε, cf. ver. 24, he made, i.e., created of one; see Hackett's note.—κατοικεῖν: infinitive of purpose.—ἐξ ἑνὸς καὶ τὰ πάντα· 26. ἐποίησέ τε ἐξ ἑνὸς αἵματος[1] πᾶν ἔθνος ἀνθρώπων, κατοικεῖν ἐπὶ πᾶν τὸ πρόσωπον τῆς γῆς, ὁρίσας προτεταγμένους[2]

(αἵματος), see critical note. Rendall renders "from one father" as the substantive really understood, the idea of offspring being implied by ἐξ, cf. Heb. ii. 11, xi. 12: Ramsay, "of one nature, every race of men," etc. Such teaching has often been supposed to be specially directed against the boast of the Athenians that they were themselves αὐτόχθονες (so recently Zöckler, and see instances in Wetstein, cf., e.g., Arist., Vesp., 1076; Cicero, Pro Flacco, xxvi.); but whilst the Apostle's words were raised above any such special polemic, yet he may well have had in mind the characteristic pride of his hearers, whilst asserting a truth which cut at the root of all national pride engendered by polytheism on the one hand, by a belief in a god of this nation or of that, or of a philosophic pride engendered by a hard Stoicism on the other. When Renan and others speak of Christianity extending its hand to the philosophy of Greece in the beautiful theory which it proclaimed of the moral unity of the human race (Saint Paul, p. 197) it must not be forgotten that Rome and not Greece manifested the perfection of Pagan ethics, and that, even so, the sayings of a Seneca or an Epictetus wanted equally with those of a Zeno "a lifting power in human life". The cosmopolitanism of a Seneca no less than that of a Zeno failed; the higher thoughts of good men of a citizenship, not of Ephesus or elsewhere, but of the world, which were stirring in the towns where St. Paul preached, all these failed, Die Heraklitischen Briefe, p. 91 (Bernays); it was not given to the Greek or to the Roman, but to the Jew, separated though he was from every other nation, to safeguard the truth of the unity of mankind, and to proclaim the realisation of that truth through the blood of a Crucified Jew (Alford). On the Stoic cosmopolitanism see amongst recent writers G. H. Rendall, Marcus Antoninus, Introd., pp. 88, 118, 137 (1898).—ἐπὶ πᾶν τὸ πρόσωπον τῆς γῆς, cf. Gen. ii. 6, xi. 8, etc.; Winer-Moulton, xviii., 4, cf. in Latin, maris facies, Æn., v., 768, naturæ vultus, Ovid, Met., i., 6.—ὁρίσας προτεταγ. καιροὺς: if we read προστεταγ. see critical note, "having determined their appointed seasons," R.V. καιρ. not simply seasons in the sense used in addressing the people of Lystra, xiv. 17, as if St. Paul had in mind only the course of nature as divinely ordered, and not also a divine philosophy of history. If the word was to be taken with κατοικίας it would have the article and χρόνος would be more probably used, cf. also πρόσταγμα, Jer. v. 24, Ecclus. xxxix. 16. It is natural to think of the expression of our Lord Himself, Luke xxi. 24, καιροὶ ἐθνῶν, words which may well have suggested to St. Paul his argument in Rom. ix.-xi., but the thought is a more general one. In speaking thus, before such an audience, of a Providence in the history of mankind, assigning to them their seasons and their dwellings, the thought of the Stoic πρόνοια may well have been present to his mind; but if so it was by way of contrast ("sed non a Stoicis Paulo erat discenda πρόνοια," Blass, in loco). St. Paul owed his doctrine of Providence to no school of philosophy, but to the sacred Scriptures of his nation, which had proclaimed by the mouth of lawgiver, patriarch, psalmist, and prophet alike, that the Most High had given to the nations their inheritance, that it was He Who had spread them abroad and brought them in, that it was His to change the times and the seasons, Deut. xxxii. 8, Job xii. 23, Ps. cxv. 16, Dan. ii. 21, see further the note on πρόνοια, Wisdom of Solomon xiv. 3 (xvii. 2), Speaker's Commentary (Farrar).—τὰς ὁροθεσίας τῆς κατοικίας: the first noun is not found elsewhere either in classical or biblical Greek, but cf. Blass, Gram., p. 69. κατοικία: only here in N.T., but frequent in LXX; found also in Polyb., of a dwelling; so in Strabo, of a settlement, a colony. Here, as in the former part of the verse, we need not limit the words to the assertion of the fact that God has given to various nations their different geographical bounds of mountain, river or sea; as we recognise the influence exerted upon the morale of the inhabitants of a country by their physical surroundings, St. Paul's words teach us to see also in these conditions "the works of the Lord"—the words of the most scientific observer perhaps of Palestine, Karl Ritter, are these: "Nature and the course of history show that here, from the beginning onwards there cannot be talk of any chance": G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land, pp. 112, 113, and 302, 303 ff.; Curtius, "Paulus in Athen.," Gesammelte Abhandlungen, ii., 531, 536.

Ver. 27. ζητεῖν = ὅπως ζητῶσι, telic infinitive, Winer-Moulton, xliv. 1.—Κύριον, see critical note. Θεόν: the more fitting word before this audience—Ramsay renders "the God".—εἰ ἄρα γε: "if haply," A. and R.V., ἄρα strengthened by γε; in classical Greek we have ἄρα followed by γε, but not ἄρα. This ἄρα and ἄρα γε are generally regarded as = Latin si forte (Blass, Grammatik, p. 211), although Simcox, Language of the New Testament, pp. 180, 181, in admitting this, is careful to point out that it is misleading to regard ἄρα as = forte. Alford (so Page) maintains that the expression here, as in viii. 22, indicates a contingency which is apparently not very likely to happen. On the other hand Rendall holds that the particle here, as in viii. 22, should be rendered not perhaps or haply, but indeed: "if they might indeed feel after him," etc., expressing a very real intention of God's providence, the optative pointing to the fact that this intention had not yet been realised (pp. 66, 110), cf. also Mark xi. 13, and in 1 Cor. xv. 15, εἴπερ ἄρα (see further Blass, Gram., pp. 254, 267; Burton, pp. 106, 111). With the whole passage, Wisdom xiii. 6 should be compared. On St. Paul's study of the Book of Wisdom at some time in his life see Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. 52.—ψηλαφήσειαν, Æolic aorist, the verb is used several times in LXX for the act of groping in the dark, Deut. xxviii. 29, Job v. 14, xii. 25; Isa. lix. 10; cf. its use also in classical Greek, Odys., ix., 416; so Plato, Phædo, 99 B, where it is used of vague guesses at truth (Wendt, Page). The word would therefore fitly express the thought of men stretching lame hands of faith and groping, and calling to what they feel is Lord of all. Weiss finds the idea of the word as used here, not in the LXX as above, but in 1 John i. 1, of some palpable assurance, which was everywhere possible in a world made by God, ver. 24, Rom. i. 20, and where men's dwellings had been apportioned by Him. But the word might still be used in the above sense, since the recognition of God in His Creation is after all only a partial recognition, and not the highest knowledge of Him; and the inscription "To an Unknown God" testified in itself how imperfect that recognition had been. For the meaning of the verb in modern Greek see Kennedy, p. 156.—καίτοιγε, see critical note. καί γε, cf. ii. 18, quin etiam (quamvis καίτοιγε "vix aptum," Blass). The word ψηλαφ. had intimated "et proximum esse Deum et oculis occultum" (Blass, Knabenbauer), and the Apostle now proclaims the nearness of God, not only in creation, in its maintenance and preservation, but in the spiritual being of man: "Closer is he than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet".—οὐ μακρὰν: the word implies not mere local nearness, but spiritual, cf. Jer. xxiii. 23, and Ephes. ii. 13. With this we may compare Seneca, Ep. Mor., μακρὰν ἀπὸ ἑνὸς ἑκάστου ἡμῶν ὑπάρχοντα. 28. ἐν αὐτῷ γὰρ ζῶμεν καὶ κινούμεθα καί ἐσμεν· ὡς καί τινες τῶν καθ' ὑμᾶς ποιητῶν

xli., 1. "God is near thee; He is with thee; He is within" (quoted by Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 290). The relation of man to God is a personal relationship: God is not "careless of the single life": ἀπὸ ἑνὸς ἑκάστου ἡμῶν, "from each one of us," R.V. The words may well have struck a responsive chord in the hearts, not only of some in the crowd, but of some of the Stoics who were listening, contradictory and incongruous as their system was, with its strange union of a gross material pantheism, and the expression of belief in the fatherly love and goodness of God (see further Lightfoot, u. s., p. 298, and Curtius, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, ii., 530, 531).

Ver. 28. St. Chrysostom comments (Hom., xxxviii.): Τί λέγω μακράν; οὕτως ἐγγύς ἐστιν, ὡς χωρὶς αὐτοῦ μὴ ζῆν. ἐν αὐτῷ γὰρ ζῶμεν κ.τ.λ. . . . καὶ οὐκ εἶπε, δι' αὐτοῦ, ἀλλ' ὃ ἐγγύτερον ἦν, ἐν αὐτῷ. In the three verbs it has been sometimes maintained there is an ascending scale; in God we possess the gift of life, in Him we move, in Him we are (not "have our being" simply), i.e., we are what we are, personal beings. Bethge and Plumptre may be named as two chief supporters of some such view as this, whilst others regard the words (Bengel, Weiss) as merely expressing what had been already expressed in ver. 25, or as referring simply (so Overbeck, Wendt, Felten) to our physical life and being.—τῶν καθ' ὑμᾶς π.: "of your own poets," see Grimm., sub v. κατά, with the accusative as a periphrasis for the possessive pronoun; see also Winer-Moulton, xxii., 7, xlix. d. Blass takes it as = ὑμέτεροι., on the reading see W. H. marg. καθ' ἡμᾶς, though the limited range of attestation prevents them from reading this in the text: "there would be a striking fitness in a claim by St. Paul to take his stand as a Greek among Greeks, as he elsewhere vindicates his position as a Roman (xvi. 37; xxii. 25, 28), and as a Pharisee (xxiii. 6)": W. H., ii., p. 310.—τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἐσμέν: half of an hexameter, the γὰρ καί has nothing to do with the meaning of the quotation in the N.T., but see Winer-Moulton, liii. 10. The words are found in Aratus, B.C. 270, Phænom., 5, and Cleanthes, B.C. 300, Hymn to Jove, 5; for other parallels see Blass, in loco, and Wetstein, so that Zöckler may go too far in saying that St. Paul quoted from the former as his fellow-countryman, Aratus being of Soli in Cilicia. Both poets named were Stoics, and the words may have been well known as a familiar quotation, see on Tarsus, chapter ix. 11. In Cleanthes the actual words are rather different, ἐκ σοῦ γὰρ γένος ἐσμέν, where origin rather than kinship may be meant. No doubt it is possible to exaggerate, with Bentley, St. Paul's knowledge of classical literature, but on the other hand it is not perhaps an unfair inference that a man who could quote so aptly from the poets as here in 1 Cor. xv. 35, and in Tit. i. 12, could have done so at other times if occasion had required, cf. Curtius, ubi supra, Blass, in loco, and Farrar, "Classical Quotations of St. Paul," St. Paul, ii., Exc., iii. As the words of the hymn were addressed to Zeus, a difficulty has been raised as to the Apostle's application of them here, and it has been questioned whether he was acquainted with the context of the words, or whether he was aware of their application. But he must at least have known that they were not originally written of the God Whom he revealed. If so, however, there seems no more difficulty in supposing that he would apply such a hemistich to a higher purpose, than that he should make the inscription on a heathen altar a text for his discourse.

Ver. 29. γένος οὖν ὑπάρχοντες: for ὑπάρχειν, see above on ver. 24; is the inference simply that because we are dependent upon God for all things, it is absurd to suppose that the divine nature can be like to the work of men's hands? This is correct so far as it goes, but is not the further thought implied that as men are the offspring of God, they ought not to think that man is the measure of God, or that the divine nature, which no man hath seen at any time, can be represented by the art of man, but rather as conscious of a sonship with a Father of spirits they ought to worship a Father in spirit and in truth? see quotations from Seneca in Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 290: "The whole world is the temple of the immortal gods. Temples are not to be built to God of stones piled on high . . . ." Fragm. 123 in Lactant. Div. Inst., vi., 25: "God is near thee; He is with thee; He is within," Ep. Mor., xcv., 47: "Thou shalt not form Him of silver and gold, a true likeness of

God cannot be moulded of this material," Ep. Mor., xxxi., 11. See also the striking parallels from Letters of Pseudo-Heracleitus, Gore, Ephesians, p. 254. For a recent view of the possible acquaintance of Seneca with the Christian teaching of St. Paul see Orr, Some Neglected Factors in Early Christianity, pp. 178 ff.—τὸ θεῖον: not "godhead," but "that which is divine," R.V. margin, "the divine nature"; probably the word which the Athenians themselves used, Xen., Mem., i., 4, 18, see instances in Grimm, sub v., of its use in Philo and Josephus, who employ it in the neuter of the one God, Grimm thinks, out of regard for Greek usage.—χρυσῷ ἢ ἀργ. ἢ λίθῳ: (on the form of the word see Blass and critical notes) including, we may suppose, the chryselephantine statues of Phidias in the Parthenon, and a reference to the silver mines of Laurium, and the marble hewn from Pentelicus, cf. Epist. ad Diognetum, ii., 2.—χαράγματι: in apposition to χρύσῳ. χαράσσω, Latin, sculpo, insculpo, only here in N.T. in this sense. Polyb. uses the words of coins stamped (so in Anth. P., v., 30) τὸ χαραχθὲν νόμισμα.—τέχνης καὶ ἐνθ.: "artis externæ, cogitationis internæ". ἐνθ.: a rare word (in the plural, thoughts, cf. Matt. ix. 4, etc.), but used by Thuc., Eur., and also by Hippocrates. See the remarks of Curtius (Gesammelte Abhandlungen, ii., 535) on the words, as indicating that Paul was acquainted with the phrases of Greek authors. The passage in Wisdom xiii. 6 should be carefully noted (see ver. 27 above), and also ver. 10, in which the writer speaks of gods which are the work of men's hands, gold and silver to show art in, i.e., lit., an elaboration of art, ἐμμελέτημα τέχνης. In the words Bethge further sees an intimation that the Apostle had an eye for the forms of beauty represented in the carved statues and idols which met his gaze in Athens; but for a very different view of St. Paul's estimate of art see Renan, Saint Paul, p. 172, Farrar, St. Paul, i., 525, McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 260.—ἀνθρώπου: stands contrasted with τὸ θεῖον; it is the device of man which forms the material into the idol god, and thus human thought becomes the measure of the divine form; Xenophanes (570 B.C.) had ridiculed the way in which the Thracians represented their gods, with blue eyes and fair complexions, whilst the Æthiopians had represented their gods as flat-nosed and swarthy. Zeno had renewed the protest, but some of the best of the heathen philosophers had spoken in inconsistent language on the subject; St. Paul's plain and direct words were the utterances of a man who had in mind the severe and indignant protests of the Hebrew prophets, cf. Isa. xliv. 12.—οὐκ ὀφείλομεν: at the same time the use of the 1st person plural again points to the conciliatory tone of the speech, "clemens locutio" (so Bengel, Wendt); or possibly the words may mean that he is referring in a general way to the beliefs of the people, to the crowd and not to the philosophers: πρὸς τοὺς πολλοὺς ὁ λόγος ἦν αὐτῷ, Chrys. But Nestle has lately called attention to the question as to whether we should not translate: "we are not obliged, not bound to think, we are at liberty not to think so," and thus, instead of a reproof, the words become a plea for freedom of religious thought. The first shade of meaning, he adds, i.e., "clemens locutio," as above, comes nearer to ὀφειλ. μὴ νομίζειν, the second agrees with the other passage in the N.T., 2 Cor. xii. 14, where the negative particle is connected with ὀφείλειν; see Nestle's note in Expository Times, March, 1898, p. 381.

Ver. 30. τοὺς μὲν οὖν χρ.: a contrast drawn between the past times of ignorance, and the present times with God's summons to repentance, but instead of a finite verb we have the participle ὑπεριδών, and so δέ is omitted in the apodosis; see Rendall, in loco, and Appendix on μὲν οὖν, p. 163, and to the same effect, Blass, in loco.—τῆς ἀγνοίας: simply "the times of ignorance," R.V.

τέχνης καὶ ἐνθυμήσεως ἀνθρώπου, τὸ θεῖον εἶναι ὅμοιον. 30. Τοὺς μὲν οὖν χρόνους τῆς ἀγνοίας ὑπεριδὼν ὁ Θεός, τανῦν παραγγέλλει[1]

[1] παραγγελλει ℵcADEHLP, so Blass in β, and Hilg.; απαγγελλει ℵ*AB, Tisch., W.H., R.V. marg., Weiss, Wendt. πασι, but παντας ℵABD²E, Ath., Cyr., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt. For υπεριδων D has παριδων, "recte," Blass (β); neither word occurs elsewhere in N.T.

not "this," as in Vulgate and all E.V. "Ignorantia objicitur Atheniensibus? Hanc ipsi sunt fassi. ἀγνώστῳ, ignoto; ἀγνοοῦντες, ignorantes, v. 23."—ὑπεριδὼν: "overlooked," R.V., "winked at," A.V. The latter rendering occurs three times in LXX, Wisdom xiii. 23, Ecclus. xxviii. 7, and xxx. 11 R.; for the verb παροpᾶν Skeat quotes Lever, Serm., p. 81: "For if ye winke at such matters, God wyl scoull upon you," when the word evidently means to connive at, but not the sense required here, cf. also Chapman, Il., iv., 66. The verb ὑπεροpᾶν is frequent in the LXX, but rather in the sense of despising, neglecting, Gen. xlii. 21, Deut. xxii. 3, 4, Ps. liv. (lv.) 1, Job xxxi. 19, and Ecclus. ii. 10, etc. But here it is used rather as the opposite of ἐφορᾶν, a verb used in classical Greek of overseeing, observing, as of the divine providence of the gods (cf. in N.T. Luke i. 25, Acts iv. 29); so ὑπεροpᾶν = (1) to look over, (2) to overlook, i.e., not attend to, to let pass (cf. the use of ὑπεριδεῖν in LXX, Lev. xxvi. 44 and 3 Macc. vi. 15). Tyndale rendered "regarded not," with which we may compare: "et cum videas perinde te gerere quasi non videas," Erasmus. Both Chrys. and Oecum. comment on the words, pointing out that it is not παρεῖδεν or εἴασεν, but ὑπερεῖδεν, τουτέστιν, οὐκ ἀπαιτεῖ κόλασιν ὡς ἀξίους ὄντας κολάσεως. With the statement of St. Paul here cf. Acts xiv. 16, Rom. iii. 25. But it must be remembered that πάρεσις, Rom. iii. 25, is by no means the same as ἄφεσις ("idem paene est παριέναι quod ὑπεριδεῖν, Acts xvii. 30," Bengel); in considering the strictures of Overbeck against the use of the passage in Romans as a parallel to our present passage, it is not alleged, let it be noted, either here or there that God inflicted no punishment upon the sins of the heathen. Rom. i. 19 is a decided proof of the contrary in the case of the very sin of idolatry which St. Paul condemns in Athens; see the words of Chrys. and Oecum. above, and cf. the comments of Weiss, Wendt, Felten, Plumptre, and McGiffert's note, pp. 260, 261.—τὰ νῦν, see above p. 135; "hic dies, haec hora, inquit Paulus," Bengel, in contrast to the "overlooking" on account of ignorance, and so relatively of excuse (cf. ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ, Rom. iii. 26, i.e., from the N.T. times of salvation to the final judgment).—παραγγέλλει: "commandeth," but in margin, R.V., ἀπαγ., "he declareth": cf. Friedrich, p. 29, on the constant use of the latter in St. Luke's writings, but used twice by St. Paul elsewhere, 1 Cor. xiv. 25, 1 Thess. i. 9.—πᾶσι πανταχοῦ: on this and other collocations with πᾶς as frequent in Luke see Friedrich, p. 5. πανταχοῦ is used in the N.T. four times by St. Luke, cf. Luke ix. 6, Acts xxiv. 3, xxviii. 22 (elsewhere in the Gospels, Mark i. 28, xvi. 20), but it is also used, although only once, by St. Paul, 1 Cor. iv. 17. Wetstein quotes instances of the same collocation in Dem., Philo, and adds: "ex toto terrarum orbe plurimi Athenas advenerant, adeoque hac ipsa Pauli oratione omnibus prædicatur doctrina Evangelii".—μετανοεῖν: for all had sinned, and all would be judged; infinitive after verbs dicendi, expressing what they must do, cf. xiv. 15, iv. 18, v. 28, 40. The context requires something more than a reference of the words to the turning from idol worship to the true God (Holtzmann), it points to the change of mind which was demanded of those whose consciences by sin were accused. To both Stoic and Epicurean the counsel would appear not merely needless, but objectionable. To the latter because it would conflict not only with his denial of immortality, but with his whole idea of the gods, and to the Stoic because the wise man was himself a king, self-sufficing, who stood in no need of atonement, who feared no judgment to come; the famous picture of Josephus was so far realised, and the Epicurean might be called the Sadducee, and the Stoic the Pharisee of ancient philosophy; but in one respect both Stoic and Epicurean were at one—whether they were just persons or not, they "needed no repentance," Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden, p. 115; Lightfoot, "Paul and Seneca" (Philippians, pp. 280, 296, 305); Plumptre, in loco; Zahn, Der Stoiker Epiktet, und sein Verhältniss zum Christenthum, pp. 26, 33, etc.

Ver. 31. διότι—καθότι, R.V., see critical note, only found in St. Luke = quia (Blass) in Luke i. 7, xix. 9, Acts ii. 24, ii. 45, iv. 35 = according as: see Plummer on Luke i. 7, and Blass, Gram., p. 268.—ἔστησεν ἡμέραν: hence the command to repent, cf. 1 Macc. iv. 59 and Blass, in loco.—μέλλει κρίνειν, LXX, Ps. ix. 8, xcv. (xcvi.) 13, xcvii. (xcviii.) 9; its form here may = xii. 6, "on the point of judging" (Weiss).—τὴν οἰκ., so often in LXX, as in instances above.—ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ = δικαίως (as of the moral element in which the judgment will take place), cf. 1 Peter ii. 24 and Rev. xix. 11, cf. Psalms as above, and Ecclus. xlv. 26. —ἐν ἀνδρί: in the person of the man (so Ramsay, Meyer, Alford), not ἄνθρωπος but ἀνήρ, in viro (cf. 1 Cor. vi. 12, ἐν ὑμῖν κρίνεται); above we have ἀνθρώποις, but here the nobler appellation. We may compare with the Christian doctrine Book of Enoch, xli., 9, although according to other Jewish statements it would seem that God, and not the Messiah, was to judge the dead.—ᾧ ὥρισε: ᾧ attraction, cf. ii. 22, see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 225, cf. x. 42, Rom. i. 4. The whole statement, as indeed the general tenor of the address, is entirely in line with the preaching to the Thessalonians in the Epistles written some few months later, cf. 1 Thess. i. 9, 10, iii. 13, iv. 6, v. 2, 2 Thess. i. 7, ii. 12; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 259, and Plumptre, in loco. "Pour un juif, dire que Jésus présidera au jugement, c'était à peu près dire qu'il est créateur. Aussi je ne sais pas de preuve plus éclatante de l'immense impression produite par le Galiléen que ce simple fait . . . après qu'il eut été crucifié, un pharisien, comme l'avait été Paul, a pu voir en lui le juge des vivants et des morts," Colani, J. C. et les Croyances Messianiques de son temps.—πίστιν παρασχών: in classical Greek to afford assurance, a guarantee, see instances in Wetstein. But it is difficult to say how much St. Paul included in the words—to a Jewish audience he would no doubt, like St. Peter, have insisted upon the resurrection of Christ as a final proof given by God that the claims of Christ were true; but to an audience like that at Athens he might well insist upon the fact of the resurrection of the Man ordained by God as a guarantee that all men would be raised; R.V., "whereof he hath given assurance," "whereof" implied in the Greek: marginal rendering in A.V. "offered faith" is omitted in R.V.; "and He hath given all a guarantee in that He hath raised Him from the dead": so Ramsay. Others have taken the words to mean that God thus affords assurance that He will judge the world righteously in that He hath shown His righteousness by raising Christ, others again connect πίστιν closely with ἐν ἀνδρί (so Bethge). If at this point the Apostle was interrupted he may have intended to pursue the theme further, if not then, on some other occasion. But the fact that the speech contains so little that is distinctively Christian is a strong proof of its genuineness; none would have invented such a speech for Paul, any more than they could have invented his discourse at Lystra, see below on p. 381, and Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 150 and 250, 251. Yet in this short address at Athens the Apostle had preached both Jesus and the Resurrection.

Ver. 32. οἱ μὲν ἐχλ. . . . οἱ δέ: verb only here in N.T., implies outward gesture as well as words of scorn (χλεύη, χεῖλος, cf. μυκτηρίζω, μυκτήρ). We usually think of the οἱ μέν as the Stoics, and the οἱ δέ as the Epicureans; e.g., Wetstein after describing the Epicureans adds οἱ δέ = Stoici: cf. Cicero, De Natura Deorum, ii., 17, and Plutarch, De Or. Def., 32. But if the Epicureans ridiculed a resurrection and judgment to come, the Stoics also were separated by a wide gulf from the teaching of St. Paul. Even if it may be said that in general they approximated towards the doctrine of personal existence after death, some of their most famous representatives departed from it; Capes, Stoicism, p. 173; Wallace, Epicureanism, p. 121; Ueberweg, Hist. of Phil., i., p. 196; E.T.

σαντες δὲ ἀνάστασιν νεκρῶν, οἱ μὲν ἐχλεύαζον· οἱ δὲ εἶπον, Ἀκουσόμεθά σου πάλιν περὶ τούτου. 33. καὶ οὕτως ὁ Παῦλος ἐξῆλθεν ἐκ

Rendall, Marcus Antoninus, Introd., pp. 107, 108. "On one point alone were the professors of this school [Stoic] agreed; an external existence of the human soul was out of the question," Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 323. The idea of retribution beyond the grave would have been equally alien to the Stoic as to the Epicurean, and both Stoic and Epicurean alike would have ridiculed the idea of a resurrection of the body. Zöckler, in loco, while referring the οἱ μέν without hesitation to the Epicureans, thinks that possibly Platonists rather than Stoics may be represented by the οἱ δέ. If St. Paul was addressing not only a philosophical but a popular audience, as we have seen reason to believe, it is quite possible that while the majority would laugh at his closing words, Juvenal, Sat., ii., 149, there may have been others who clung to the popular mythology and its crude conceptions, and the Apostle's prediction of a judgment to come may have sufficiently interested them to prompt a desire for further disclosures. — ἀκουσόμεθά σου πάλιν (περὶ τούτου, R.V., neuter, we can hardly refer it to the αὐτόν of ver. 31). The words are often taken to imply a polite rejection of the Apostle's appeal, a courteous refusal to hear anything further; or at all events to express a very cold interest in his announcement. But if we adopt the reading καὶ πάλιν (see critical note) "yet again," R.V., the words rather indicate that a real interest had been excited in some of the hearers (so Calvin, Grotius, Weiss, Alford) and that the marked and defined division of opinion was not merely a dramatic device of the author.

Ver. 33. οὕτως: may mean, with this scanty result, or simply, after these events, in this state of the popular mind, with an expectation of being heard again (Alford); "ancipiti auditorum obsequio; nullo edito miraculo': Bengel. — ἐκ μέσου αὐτῶν: at the opening Paul stood ἐν μέσῳ, ver. 22, τοῦ Ἀ. π.: "the two expressions correspond to and explain each other, . . . he that 'went forth from the midst of them' must have been standing 'in the midst of them'"; cf. Ramsay, Expositor, September, 1895, and for the bearing of the words see above on ver. 22. For similar phrase with μέσου as frequent in St. Luke's writings, Friedrich, p. 22. Ramsay thinks that some danger is indicated, but nothing is said of this; the words apparently refer to no trial, although, perhaps, to some kind of preliminary inquiry, see above, ver. 22.

Ver. 34. τινὲς δὲ: may contrast the favourable with the unfavourable, or perhaps merely continuous.—κολληθέντες, see above on v. 13, implies close companionship upon which their conversion followed, see additional note.—Διονύσιος ὁ Ἀ.: "quam doctrinam scurræ rejecerunt, Areopagita vir gravis accipit". Dionysius was a member of the Council, the words can mean nothing less—it is evident, therefore, that this convert must have been a man of some distinction, as an Areopagite would previously have filled the office of Archon. On the honour attached to the term cf. Cicero, Pro Balbo, xii., and instances cited by Renan, Saint Paul, p. 209, note. It is not improbable that St. Luke may have received from him the draft of St. Paul's address. On the other hand the conversion of a man occupying such a position has excited suspicion, and Baur, Paulus, i., 195, considers that the whole scene on the Areopagus is unhistorical, and owes its origin to the tradition that an Areopagite named Dionysius was converted. So Holtzmann holds that the whole scene was placed on the Areopagus, because, according to report, a member of the Areopagus was converted, Apostelgeschichte, p. 393, similarly Weizsäcker. See further, "Dionysius," B.D.[2], Hastings' B.D., Smith and Wace, Dictionary of Christian Biography, i., p. 846; Felten, Apostelgeschichte, p. 337 and notes below. — Δάμαρις: perhaps Δάμαλις, a heifer, a name popular amongst the Greeks, so Grotius, Wetstein, and Renan, Saint Paul, p. 209, note; see critical note above. We know nothing certain about her, but Ramsay makes the interesting conjecture that as the woman is not described as εὐσχήμων (cf. the description of the women at Thessalonica, Berœa, and Pisidian Antioch, xiii. 50, xvii. 4, 12), she may have been a foreign woman (perhaps one of the educated Hetairai), as at Athens no woman of respectable position would have been present amongst St. Paul's audience. St. Chrysostom (so St. Ambrose and Asterius) thought that she was the wife of Dionysius, but St. Luke calls her γυνή, not ἡ γυνή αὐτοῦ. No mention is made of her in D (but see above μέσου αὐτῶν. 34. τινὲς δὲ ἄνδρες κολληθέντες αὐτῷ ἐπίστευσαν· ἐν οἷς καὶ Διονύσιος ὁ Ἀρεοπαγίτης, καὶ γυνὴ ὀνόματι Δάμαρις,[1] καὶ ἕτεροι σὺν αὐτοῖς.

[1] Before και ετερ. D (Flor.) add ευσχημων. The words και γυνη ονομ. Δ. are omitted in D (retained by Blass in β), see comment., and also by Hilg., who adds ευσχημων after Αρεοπ.

critical note), and Ramsay accounts for this by the view that the reviser of Codex Bezæ was a Catholic, who objected to the prominence given to women in Acts, and that under the influence of this feeling the changes occurred in xvii. 12 (see above) and 34: this prominence assigned to women was, in Ramsay's view, firstly, pagan rather than Christian, and, secondly, heretical rather than Catholic; Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 160, 161; see "Damaris," Hastings' B.D., and Felten, Apostelgeschichte, p. 337.—καὶ ἕτεροι: a significant contrast to the precise results of the Apostle's preaching elsewhere, and yet a contrast which carries with it an evidence of truth. Spitta, p. 242, justly remarks that he knows not how the author of the "We" sections, who was not present at Athens, could have represented the activity of St. Paul in that city better than he has done; the idle curiosity of the Athenians, ver. 21, and after a speech received with ridicule and indifference, a scanty result, graphically represented by two names, of which it is a mere assertion to say that they refer to the sub-apostolic age. Spitta thus refuses to allow any justification for Weizsäcker's rejection of the historical worth of the narrative. Thus in the simple notice of the results of St. Paul's preaching we gain an indication of the historical truthfulness of the narrative. If anywhere, surely at Athens a forger would have been tempted to magnify the influence of St. Paul's intellectual power, and to attribute an overwhelming victory to the message of the Gospel in its first encounter with the philosophic wisdom of the world in a city which possessed a university, the greatest of any of that time, which was known as "the eye of Greece, mother of arts," whose inhabitants a Jewish philosopher (Philo) had described as the keenest mentally of all the Greeks. In answer to the earlier criticism of Zeller and Overbeck, we may place the conclusion of Weiss that the result of St. Paul's labours is plainly not described after a set pattern, but rests upon definite information, whilst Wendt, who refers the composition of the speech, as we have it, to St. Luke, and regards it as derived from information of a speech actually delivered at Athens, insists equally strongly upon the difficulty of supposing that such slender results would be represented as following, if the speech had been composed with a view of exalting Jewish and Christian monotheism against polytheism. Moreover the narrative bears the stamp of truthfulness in its picture of the local condition of Athens, and also in its representation of St. Paul's attitude to the philosophical surroundings of the place and its schools. "One must be at home in Athens," writes Curtius, "to understand the narrative rightly," and no one has enabled us to realise more fully the historical character and vividness of the scene than Curtius himself in the essay to which reference is made above, of which the concluding words are these, that "he who refuses to accept the historical value of the narrative of Paul in Athens, tears one of the weightiest pages out of the history of humanity" (Gesammelte Abhandlungen, ii., p. 543, "Paulus in Athens": see further, Knabenbauer, pp. 308, 309). The character of the people, the moving life of the Agora, the breadth of view which could comprehend in one short speech the crude errors of the populace and the fallacious theology of the schools, "the heart of the world" too generous to ignore all that was best in men's thoughts of God's providence and of human brotherhood, and yet too loving to forget that all men had sinned, and that after death was the judgment—we recognise them all. If we turn to the speech itself we find abundant evidence of characteristic Pauline thoughts and teaching (cf., e.g., ver. 27 and Rom. i. 19, ii. 14; ver. 26 and Rom. v. 12, 1 Cor. xv. 45; ver. 30 and Rom. iii. 25, etc., Zöckler, p. 268, and instances in notes above, McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 259), and it is worthy of note that Weizsäcker, while rejecting with Baur, Zeller, Schwegler, and Overbeck the account of St. Paul's visit to Athens as unhistorical, fully recognises, after an examination of the Apostle's method of dealing with idolatry and polytheism in Rom. i. 20, that if we compare with the Apostle's own indications the fine survey of the world, and especially of history from a monotheistic standpoint, ascribed to him by the Acts at Lystra, xiv. 15, and afterwards at Athens, xvii. 24, the latter, whatever its source, also gives us a true idea of Paul's method and teaching, Apostolic Age, i., p. 117, E.T. On the whole tone of the speech as incredible as a later composition, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 147 ff., whilst no one perhaps has drawn up more clearly than Wetstein, see on Acts xvii. 25, the consummate skill of the speech addressed to an audience comprising so many varieties of culture and belief. (To the strange attempt of Holtzmann to reproduce at some length the argument of Zeller, who maintains that the scene at Athens was a mere counterpart of the scene of Stephen's encounter with his foes at Jerusalem, a sufficient answer may be found in Spitta, Apostelgeschichte, p. 240.)

If we ask from whom the report of the speech was received, since Luke, Silas, Timothy all were absent, it is possible that a Christian convert like Dionysius the Areopagite may have preserved it (Zöckler); but a speech so full of Pauline thoughts, and so expressive of Athenian life and culture, may well have been received at least in substance from St. Paul himself, although it is quite conceivable that the precise form of it in Acts is due to St. Luke's own editing and arrangement (see for an analysis of the language of the speech Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden der Apostelgeschichte, p. 82). The results of St. Paul's work at Athens were small if measured by the number of converts, although even amongst them it must not be forgotten that it was something to gain the allegiance to the faith of a man holding the position of Dionysius the Areopagite (see further an interesting account of the matter in Expository Times, April, 1898). But in addition to this, it is also important to remember that St. Paul has given us "an invaluable method of missionary preaching" (Lechler, Das Apost. Zeitalter, p. 275), that to the Church at Athens Origen could appeal against Celsus as a proof of the fruits of Christianity (Bethge, p. 116), that its failing faith was revived in time of persecution by its bishop Quadratus, the successor of the martyr-bishop Publius; that in the Christian schools of Athens St. Basil and St. Gregory were trained; and that to an Athenian philosopher, Aristides, a convert to Christ, we owe the earliest Apology which we possess (Athenagoras too was an Athenian philosopher), see Farrar, St. Paul, i., p. 551; Humphry, Commentary on the Acts. It is significant that St. Paul never visited Athens again, and never addressed a letter to the Saints at Athens, although he may well have included them in his salutation to "the Saints which are in the whole of Achaia," 2 Cor. i. 1.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Ver. 1. μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα: in continuation of the narrative, cf. Luke x. 1.—χωρισθεὶς: in i. 4 with ἀπό, and so usually—only here with ἐκ, departure from Athens emphasised, because events had compelled the Apostle to alter his intended plan (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 240, and Blass, in loco), cf. 1 Chron. xii. 8 (A al.); 2 Macc. v. 21, xii. 12, with an accusative of place.—Κόρινθον: Corinth from its position as the capital of the Roman province Achaia was the centre of government and commerce, while Athens was still the great educational centre of Greece. St. Paul, with his keen eye for the most important and prominent stations of Roman government and the meeting points of East and West, might be expected to choose a place from whence the influence of the Gospel could spread over the whole province. Like Ephesus, Corinth lay on the great highway between East and West; like Ephesus it was, as Professor Ramsay terms it, one of the knots on the line of communication, the point of convergence for many subordinate roads. But Corinth, with all its external beauty, its wealth and fame, had become a byword for vice and infamy, cf. Κορινθιάζεσθαι, Κορινθιάζειν, Wetstein, 1 Cor. i. 2, and references in Farrar, St. Paul, i., 557 ff., and it has not been unfairly termed the Vanity Fair of the Roman empire: at once the London and the Paris of the first century after Christ (Farrar, u. s., p. 556). To this infamous notoriety not only the cosmopolitanism of the city contributed, but the open consecration of shameless impurity in its temple service of Venus, see Ramsay, "Corinth," Hastings' B.D.; C. and H., small edition, p. 324 ff.; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 262, and notes below.

Ver. 2. Ἀκύλαν, cf. ver. 18, Rom. xvi. 3, 1 Cor. xvi. 19, 2 Tim. iv. 19: the Latin Aquila in its Greek form; the name may have been assumed, as often the case, in place of the Jewish name. It is altogether unreasonable to suppose that Luke made a mistake and that this Aquila's name was Pontius Aquila, which he bore as a freedman of the Gens Pontia, a distinguished member of which was called by the same two names, Pontius Aquila, Cic., Ad Fam., x., 33; Suet., Jul. Cæs., 78. The fact that another Aquila, who is famous as giving us the earliest version A.D. of the O.T. in Greek, is also described as from Pontus goes far to show that there is nothing improbable in St. Luke's statement (Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 226, E.T.). The name, moreover, was also a slave name (Ramsay, p. 269), as a freedman of Mæcenas was called (C. Cilnius) Aquila. But it is probable that as the greater part of the Jews in Rome were freedmen, Aquila may also have belonged to this class, see Schürer, u. s., p. 234, and also further, Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. xxvii., 418; Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 173.—τῷ γένει: "by race," R.V., cf. iv. 36, of Barnabas, and xviii. 24, of Apollos; the word need not mean more than this.—Ἰουδαῖον: The word has been pressed sometimes to indicate that Aquila was still unconverted to Christianity. But the fact that he is called a Jew may simply refer to the notice which follows "that all Jews," etc. Whether Aquila was a Christian before he met St. Paul is very difficult to determine. He is not spoken of as a disciple, and similarity of employment rather than of Christian belief may account for the Apostle's intercourse with him and Priscilla, Zahn, Einleitung, i., 189. But the suspicion with which most of his countrymen regarded St. Paul rather indicates that Aquila and Priscilla must at least have had some leanings towards the new faith, or they would scarcely have received him into their lodgings. It is quite possible that, as at the great Pentecost Jews from Rome had been present, cf. ii. 10, Christianity may have been carried by this means to the imperial city, and that such tidings may have predisposed Aquila and Priscilla to listen to St. Paul's teaching, even if they were not Christians when they first met him. If they were converted, as has been supposed, by St. Paul at Corinth, it is strange that no mention is made of their conversion. That they were Christians when St. Paul left them at Ephesus seems to be beyond a doubt. Renan describes them as already Christians when they met the Apostle, so too Hilgenfeld, on the ground that their conversion by St. Paul could scarcely have been passed over, see further "Aquila," B.D.[2], and Hastings' B.D.; Wendt, in loco; Lightfoot, Phil., pp. 16 and 17, Hort, Rom. and Ephes., p. 9.—προσφάτως: here only, lit., lately slaughtered or killed; hence recent, fresh; Latin, recens (Grimm). In LXX, Deut. xxiv. 5, Ezek. xi. 3, Jud. iv. 3, 5, 2 Macc. xiv. 36, so too in Polybius, Westcott on Heb. x. 20 πρόσφατος regards all derivations from σφάω (σφάζω) φάω (φένω) φάω (φημί) as unsatisfactory.—Πρίσκιλλαν: in Epistles, Rom. xvi. 3, 1 Cor. xvi. 19, 2 Tim. iv. 9, Prisca, R.V., W.H., Priscilla, perhaps the diminutive, cf. Lucilla, Domitilla. Probably St. Luke used the language of conversation, in which the diminutive forms were usually employed, St. Paul, p. 268. On Bezan text see critical note, Ramsay, u. s., and Church in the Roman Empire, p. 158. In vv. 18 and 26 we have Priscilla mentioned before her husband, and so by πάντας τοὺς Ἰουδαίους ἐκ τῆς Ῥώμης, προσῆλθεν αὐτοῖς· 3.[1] καὶ διὰ τὸ ὁμότεχνον εἶναι, ἔμενε παρ' αὐτοῖς καὶ εἰργάζετο· ἦσαν γὰρ

[1] At the commencement of the verse Syr. Harcl. mg., Flor. (Aug.) add ο δε Π. εγνωσθη τῳ Ακυλᾳ, and before ομοτεχνον Syr. Harcl. mg., Aug. add ομοφυλον και, so Blass in β (cf. Flor. in ver. 2, salutavit eos); see Belser, Beiträge, p. 84, on the bearing of this reading on the conversion of Aquila and Priscilla. For ειργαζετο ℵ*B, Boh. Orig., Tisch,, W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt read ηργαζοντο. τῃ τεχνῃ (for acc.), so ℵABELP, Chrys., Lach., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. D. Gig. (not Flor.) omit the clause ησαν γαρ σκη. τῃ τεχνῃ, and so Blass in β, and see Blass, p. x., and note above on xvii. 18. Ramsay follows Western text in supporting omission, see St. Paul, p. 253, and, on the other hand, Weiss, Codex D, p. 43.

St. Paul, except in 1 Cor. xvi. 19. The reason may be that she was of higher social status, and indeed not a Jewess at all, as this seems the best way of accounting for the curious arrangement of the sentence here, the point being to emphasise the fact that Aquila was a Jew. Her name may indicate some connection with the Priscan Gens; whilst Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. 420, in an interesting discussion find reasons to connect both her (and possibly her husband) with the Acilian Gens. That she was a woman of education is evident from ver. 26, and it is possible that her marriage with Aquila may afford us another proof amongst many of the influence of the Jewish religion over educated women in Rome, Jos., Ant., xviii., 3, 5. But many commentators from St. Chrysostom have referred the precedence of Priscilla not to social rank, but to her greater fervency of spirit or ability of character; or it may be simply due to the fact that she was converted first.—διὰ τὸ διατεταχέναι: St. Luke's statement is fully corroborated by Suet., Claudius, 25: "Judæos impulsore Christo assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit". But Dio Cassius, lx. 6, in referring to what is most probably the same edict, states that the Jews were not expelled, because of the difficulty in carrying such an order into effect on account of their great numbers. Another passage in Suet., Tiberius, 36, gives us the probable explanation: "expulit et mathematicos sed deprecantibus veniam dedit": an instance of a contemplated expulsion, afterwards abandoned. If we thus interpret the meaning of Suetonius with reference to the edict of Claudius by giving the same force to "expulit," it explains the silence of Tacitus and Josephus, who do not mention the edict, while the words of Dio Cassius emphasise the fact that although no expulsion took place the assemblies of the Jews were prohibited, and on that account, we may fairly suppose, that many Jews would leave the city, Schürer, u. s., p. 237. On any view the edict could not have remained in force very long, cf. xxviii. 15, and also the return of Aquila and Priscilla to Rome, Rom. xvi. 3. Ramsay dates the edict at the end of 50 A.D. on the ground that although Orosius, Hist., vii., 6, 15, states that it occurred in the ninth year of Claudius, 49 A.D., the historian here, as elsewhere (e.g., cf. the famine) in connection with the events of this reign, is a year too early. Wendt (1899), p. 59, gives 49-50 as the year of the edict. But it must be remembered that the authority of Orosius is not altogether reliable in this case, as there is no proof that he had any direct reference to Josephus, to whom he appeals for his date; see O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 129; Blass, Proleg., 23, and Turner, "Chronology of the New Testament" Hastings' B.D. McGiffert, p. 362, maintains that as the date of the edict is thus unknown, we cannot base any chronological conclusions upon it, cf. Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 634. Meyer maintained that by Chrestus Suetonius meant a Jewish agitator so called, but it is more probable that the historian confused Christus with Chrestus—an unfamiliar name with one in use among both Greeks and Romans. This Chrestus Suetonius speaks of as actually living, as the historian might have heard enough to lead him to regard the commotions between Jews and Jewish Christians in Rome as instigated by a leader bearing this name, commotions like those excited in the Pisidian Antioch, in Thessalonica, and elsewhere; or it may be that he thus indicates the feverish hopes of the Messiah amongst the Jews resident in Rome, hopes so often raised by some pretentious deliverer. But Lightfoot makes the important remark that even in this case we may fairly suppose that the true Christ held a prominent place in σκηνοποιοὶ τὴν τέχνην. 4. διελέγετο [1] δὲ ἐν τῇ συναγωγῇ κατὰ πᾶν σάββατον, ἔπειθέ τε Ἰουδαίους καὶ Ἕλληνας. 5. Ὡς δὲ κατῆλθον

[1] After διελεγετο (δε) D, Flor. Gig., Vulgcl., Syr. Harcl. mg., Blass in β, so Hilg. add εντιθεις το ονομα του κυριου I. If in contrast to ver. 5 it is difficult to see why omitted, nor does the introduction of the name of Jesus seem likely in itself (interponens, Flor.) to have persuaded both Jews and Greeks, unless we take επειθε as conative only. εντιθημι is not found elsewhere in the N.T. Belser thinks that here εντιθεις means "insinuating" (p. 85), and that the passage in β reminds us of Paul's own description of his preaching in 1 Cor. ii. 3 (so Blass). ου μονον I. αλλα και Ελλ., so D and Flor., Blass in β, supported by Belser, u. s.

these reports, for He must have been not less known at this time than any of the false Christs (Philippians, p. 16, note). Such indifference on the part of a Roman of the period is surely not surprising, and the probability is more generally maintained that this Chrestus was really Christ, the leader of the Christians, see Weiss, Einleitung in das N. T., p. 227; Wendt (1899), in loco; Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 47, 254; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 362, note, but, on the other hand, Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 306.

Ver. 3. διὰ τὸ ὁμότεχνον: the word is peculiar to St. Luke, and although it is found in classical Greek and in Josephus, it is not used in the LXX, and it may be regarded as a technical word used by physicians of one another; the medical profession was called ἡ ἰατρικὴ τέχνη, physicians were ὁμότεχνοι; thus Dioscorides in dedicating his work to Areus speaks of his friendly disposition towards fellow-physicians (ὁμοτέχνους), Hobart, p. 239, Weiss in Meyer's Kommentar, Luke i. 6, and also Vogel, Zur Charakteristik des Lukas, p. 17 (1897). On the dignity of labour as fully recognised by Judaism at the time of the Advent, see Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, chapter xi.; Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, pp. 18, 19, 141 (Taylor, 2nd edit.).—ἔμενε παρ' αὐτοῖς: "In Alexandria the different trades sat in the synagogue arranged into guilds; and St. Paul could have no difficulty in meeting in the bazaar of his trade with the like-minded Aquila and Priscilla (Acts xviii. 2, 3), with whom to find a lodging," Edersheim, u. s., p. 89, and see passage from T. B. Sukkah, 51 b, quoted by Lumby, in loco, and on vi. 9.—ἠργάζετο: "at Corinth St. Paul's first search seems to have been for work," cf. Acts xx. 34, 35, 1 Thess. ii. 9, 2 Thess. iii. 8, 1 Cor. iv. 11, 12, 2 Cor. xi. 9, Phil. iv. 12. In close connection with this passage cf. "St. Paul a Working Man and in Want," An Expositor's Note-Book, pp. 419-438 (the late Dr. Samuel Cox), see also Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 34-36.—σκηνοποιοὶ: only here in N.T. (σκηνοποιεῖν, Symm., Isa. xiii. 20, xxii. 15); much has been said about the word, but there seems no reason to depart from the translation "tent-makers," i.e., σκηνοῤῥάφος, Aelian, V.H., ii., 1, and so St. Paul is called by Chrysostom and Theodoret, although Chrysostom also calls him σκυτοτόμος, 2 Tim. ii., Hom., iv., 5, 3. It is no doubt true that tents were often made of a rough material woven from the hair of the goats in which Cilicia abounded, and that the name κιλίκιον (Lat. cilicium, Fr. cilice, hair-cloth) was given to this material; but the word in the text does not mean "makers of materials for tents". There is no ground for rendering the word with Renan tapissier, or with Michaelis "Kunst-Instrumentenmacher". On the curious notion that St. Paul was a landscape painter, which appears to have arisen from a confusion between σκηνοῤῥάφος and σκηνογράφος, and the fact that he is described as ἡνιοποιός, probably a confusion with σκηνοποιός, see Expository Times, and notes by Ramsay, Nestle, Dec., 1896, Jan. and March, 1897. As it was often enjoined upon a son not to forsake the trade of his father, perhaps from respect, perhaps because a similar trade might be more easily learnt at home, it is likely that Saul followed his father's trade, which both father and son might easily have learnt at Tarsus. Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 44, E.T. In a commercial city like Corinth the material would be easily obtainable, see critical note.

Ver. 4. διελέγετο δὲ . . . ἔπειθέ τε: "and he used to discourse . . . and tried to persuade," so Ramsay, marking the imperfects, see also Hackett's note.—Ἕλληνας: proselytes, since they are represented as in the synagogue, cf. xiv. 1. The heathen are not addressed until ver. 6. McGiffert considers that this notice of work in the synagogue is untrustworthy (p. 268) and at variance with the fact that in St. Paul's own Epistles there is no hint of it, but cf. 1 Cor. ix. 20, words which we may reasonably suppose had a special application to Corinth, or the Apostle would scarcely have so expressed himself. It would have been strange if in such a commercial centre there had been no Jewish synagogue.

Ver. 5. See note on xvii. 15; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 269, recognises this among the striking points of contact between Acts and the Epistles to the Corinthians. Here Silas and Timothy are said to have been with St. Paul in Corinth, cf. St. Paul's own statement in 2 Cor. i. 19, to the fact that the same two names occur in the salutations of 1 and 2 Thess., both of which were written from Corinth, see also Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, iv., 6, 7, and viii. 4.—συνείχετο τῷ πνεύματι: "he was wholly absorbed in preaching," λόγῳ, so Ramsay; "in teaching the word," Grimm-Thayer, cf. Wisdom xvii. 11 (cf. 2 Cor. v. 14). The verb occurs frequently in Luke, six times in his Gospel, three times in Acts, twice in St. Paul, only once elsewhere in N.T., but nowhere as in the particular phrase here. It looks as if St. Paul's preaching in Corinth was specially characterised by "greater concentration of purpose and simplicity of method," cf. 1 Cor. ii. 2. The philosophic style in which he had addressed the Athenians is now abandoned, and so too, at least primarily, the proclamation of the living and true God, and of the coming of His Son to save His people in the day of wrath, with which apparently he had commenced at Thessalonica, 1 Thess. i. 9, 10. Such methods and truths had their place, but in Corinth "Jesus Christ and Him crucified" was to be preached as the power of God and the wisdom of God, and in both his Epistles all that the Apostle says about the duties of the Christian life is brought into relation with this fundamental truth (see McGiffert, u. s., p. 266). Silas and Timothy found him wholly possessed by and engrossed in the word (so the imperfect, Page, Alford, Wendt). On the other hand it has been maintained that the arrival of Silas and Timothy brought St. Paul help from Macedonia, and that on the account, Phil. iv. 15, 2 Cor. xi. 9, he was able to give himself up to preaching, as he was thus relieved from the strain of working for his bread (so Wordsworth, Lewin, Rendall). But 1 Cor. ix. 1 seems to imply that St. Paul still continued to work for his livelihood at Corinth. Blass seems to find in the uniqueness of the phrase a reason for its alteration; see critical note for his view. Plumptre refers the words to the Apostle's desire to see Rome, which the Apostle cherished for many years, and which had been further kindled by finding himself in company with those who came from Rome; and the announcement of a journey to Rome, xix. 21, after the Apostle had been some time in the company of Aquila and Priscilla both at Corinth and Ephesus, is emphasised by Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 255. But on the whole, Ramsay's interpretation is very striking, p. 252, cf. the remarks of McGiffert much to the same effect, Apostolic Age, pp. 263-266.—διαμαρτ., see above on p. 92.—τὸν Χ. Ἰ.: "that the Anointed One is Jesus," cf. xvii. 3, so Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 226. So far the message was evidently for Jews. See critical note for reading in D.

Ver. 6. ἀντιτασσ.: classical use, of an army ranged in hostile array, or of those opposed to each other in opinion, Thuc., iii., 83. So in later Greek, in Polyb.

Both here and in xx. 26 we can scarcely doubt that St. Paul had in mind the words of the prophet, Ezek. xxxiii. 6.—ἐπὶ τὴν κεφ., i.e., upon yourselves, the head being used for the person—for other ideas of the word see Wendt (1888), in loco. De Wette interprets of moral ruin, and others of the eternal ἀπωλεία, but we cannot refine so much upon a figurative phrase. In vv. 5ᵇ and 6 Spitta and Jüngst see the hand of a Reviser, the former holding that the whole passage runs smoothly with these omissions, whilst Jüngst ascribes also the word ἐκεῖθεν, ver. 7, to the Reviser. According to Clemen, 4 and 5ᵇ, the preaching in the synagogue belongs to Redactor Judaicus, the Jewish persecution in ver. 6 to the Redactor Antijudaicus. Hilgenfeld agrees with Spitta in so far that he ascribes 5ᵇ and 6ᵇ to "the author to Theophilus".—καθαρὸς ἐγὼ: scarcely enough to say "I am pure," have discharged my duty with a clear conscience, cf. xx. 26, the same idea here, better to punctuate at ἐγώ, but see Blass, in loco.—ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν: from henceforth, i.e., so far as he is concerned. It is evident that the words did not apply to other places, for in xix. 8 St. Paul goes to the synagogue according to his wont. The phrase is found five times in St. Luke's Gospel, but only here in Acts. It is used once elsewhere in N.T, and there by St. Paul, 2 Cor. v. 16 (cf. John viii. 11). See Friedrich, p. 16, and Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 29.

Ver. 7. μεταβὰς ἐκεῖθεν, i.e., from the synagogue, cf. Luke x. 7, "he removed," Rendall; "he changed his place from the synagogue," Ramsay: the verb is found three times with ἐκεῖθεν in St. Matthew, and in each place "departed" R.V., this gives perfectly good sense: cf. Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 158, and critical note.—Ἰούστου: if the addition Τίτου or Τιτίου is correct, there is no need to discuss the possible identification with the companion of St. Paul in Gal. ii. 1, etc.; see Alford and Page, in loco, and critical note. The identification was adopted by Chrysostom and Grotius, and for a statement of the evidence on either side see Plumptre, in loco. It should be remembered that we have Barsabbas Justus, i. 23, and Jesus Justus, Col. iv. 11, see also Lightfoot "Acts of the Apostles," B.D.², i., 32. The house of a proselyte may have been chosen because it offered easy access to those who wished to come, whether Greeks or Hebrews (see Chrysostom's comment), but in Paul's thus going into the house of a proselyte hard by the synagogue we may see how his spirit had been stirred. But further: this Titus Justus was evidently a Roman citizen, one of the coloni in Corinth, and thus St. Paul would gain access through him to the more educated class in the city, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 256, and "Corinth," Hastings' B.D., i. 480.—συνομοροῦσα: there is no need to suppose that he left his lodgings with Aquila—this house became Paul's place of meeting (so in Ephesus, cf. xix. 9, 10); he had his own synagogue there (Blass); in classics simple verb ὁμορέω, ὁμουρέω; compound only found here; συνόμορος, Eccl. writers.

τῶν Κορινθίων ἀκούοντες ἐπίστευον καὶ ἐβαπτίζοντο. 9. Εἶπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος δι' ὁράματος ἐν νυκτὶ τῷ Παύλῳ, Μὴ φοβοῦ, ἀλλὰ λάλει καὶ μὴ σιωπήσῃς· 10. διότι ἐγώ εἰμι μετὰ σοῦ, καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐπιθήσεταί σοι τοῦ κακῶσαί σε· διότι λαός ἐστί μοι πολὺς ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ.

Ver. 8. Κρίσπος, cf. 1 Cor. i. 14, coincidence with, admitted by McGiffert, p. 269 (so too by Holtzmann), "no reason to doubt that he is the man whose conversion Luke reports," according to tradition he became Bishop of Ægina, Const. Apost., vii., 46. Though a Jew he bore a Latin name, cf. for a parallel case J. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., in loco.—ὁ ἀρχισ., if we cf. ver. 17 it looks as if in the Corinthian synagogue there was only one person bearing this title, and that Sosthenes succeeded Crispus when the latter became a Christian, see "Corinth" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D., i., p. 482, and see also Ramsay, Expositor, April, 1895, and above on xiii. 15: on the reason of St. Paul's baptism of Crispus, Gaius, Stephanas, see B.D.², and Hastings' B.D., u. s. There is certainly no ground for supposing that St. Paul depreciated baptism although he baptised so few in Corinth with his own hands, Speaker's Commentary on 1 Cor. i. 17. It is evident from this notice that St. Paul's preaching had not been without its effect on the Jewish residents, and probably one reason why the feeling against the Apostle was so strong, xx. 3, was because this influence extended to persons of importance in Corinth; the next words show good results among the Gentile population of the city.—σὺν ὅλῳ τῷ οἴκῳ, cf. xvi. 15, 1 Cor. i. 16.—τῶν Κ., not Ἰουδαῖοι, who are always so called, but Ἑλληνες, ver. 4, including for the most part "proselytes of the gate".—ἀκού. ἐπίστευον καὶ ἐβαπτ.: "used to hear, and believe, and receive baptism," imperfects; the spread of the new faith was gradual but continuous. ἀκού. is taken by some to refer to the hearing of the fact that Paul had separated himself from the synagogue (so Wendt, Weiss); see critical note.

Ver. 9. So at other crises in the Apostle's life, cf. xxii. 17, xxvii. 23.—ὁ Κ., i.e., Jesus.—μὴ φοβοῦ, cf. Isa. xlii. 6, xliii. 2, and for the phrase Luke i. 13, ii. 10, v. 10, viii. 50, xii. 7, 32, Acts, in loco, and xxvii. 24, characteristic of the Evangelist; Friedrich, p. 35, and Plummer on Luke i. 13. Cf. xx. 3 for the continued malignity of these Corinthian Jews; the Apostle's apprehension as expressed here is confirmed by the statements in 1 Thess. ii. 15, iii. 7, which describe the Jewish opposition as existing at the time he wrote (see this fully acknowledged by McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 270). Hilgenfeld sees no reason to refer vv. 9 and 10 to the Reviser (with Jüngst). He finds them in his source C of which they are characteristic, cf. xvi. 9, 10; the vision refers not to what had preceded, but to what follows, and explains the stay of Paul at Corinth mentioned in ver. 11.—ἀλλὰ λάλει καὶ μὴ σιωπ., i.e., "continue to speak," "speak on," cf. Isa. lviii. 1, affirmation and negation; solemnity in the double form; see too Jer. i. 6-8, xv. 15-21; on the form of the tenses see Weiss, in loco. In 1 Cor. ii. 3, 4 we have a proof of the effect of this assurance, and of the confidence with which the Apostle was inspired.

Ver. 10. διότι ἐγώ: fundamentum fiduciæ, Bengel.—ἐπιθ.: only here in this sense, but so in LXX, aggrediri, cf. Gen. xliii. 18, Exod. xxi. 14, 2 Chron. xxiii. 13, Jud. xvi. 7.—τοῦ κακῶσαι: infinitive with τοῦ, probably to express conceived or intended result, Burton, p. 157 and also p. 148, i.e., an event indicated by the context not to have actually taken place.—λαός: "qui mei sunt et mei fient": Bengel—even in Corinth, proverbial for its vice, Christ has His "chosen people," and in Cenchreae, where all the vices of a seafaring population found a home, "Christianity wrought its miracle," so Renan, Saint Paul, p. 219, cf. the Apostle's own description, 1 Cor. vi. 9-11: "in Corinth the Gospel had been put to a supreme test, and nowhere had it triumphed more gloriously". No wonder that in facing this stronghold of the powers of darkness St. Paul needed an assurance similar to that which cheered the heart of an Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 18. But whilst the new faith thus gained adherents chiefly from the lowest social grade, cf. also 1 Cor. i. 26, which indicates that there were some in the higher social ranks and some versed in the learning of the schools who welcomed the Gospel; to a Crispus, a Gaius, a Stephanas, we may add Erastus, the public treasurer of the city, Rom. xvi. 23, an office which in a place like Corinth carried with it considerable influence and position (as even Renan admits, although he regards him as the only adherent won from the upper classes), and the readiness with which the Corinthian Church responded to St. Paul's appeal for the poor saints indicates that many of its members had some means at their disposal (cf. the striking account of Paul's work at Corinth by McGiffert, p. 267, and Orr, Some Neglected Factors in Early Christianity, p. 108).

Ver. 11. ἐκάθισε, see critical note, "he dwelt," R.V., cf. Luke xxiv. 49, but not elsewhere in N.T. in this sense, but constantly in LXX, 1 Macc. ii. 1, 29. Rendall renders "he took his seat," i.e., as a teacher, a Rabbi, and see also the remarks of Ramsay on the way in which St. Paul was evidently regarded at Corinth as one of the travelling lecturers on philosophy and morals so common in the Greek world, "Corinth," Hastings' B.D.[1], p. 482. The word may be purposely used here instead of the ordinary μένειν to indicate the quiet and settled work to which the Apostle was directed by the vision which had calmed his troubled spirit, and had taught him that his cherished plan of revisiting Macedonia must be postponed to preaching the Word in Corinth. During this period 1 and 2 Thess. were probably written. The year and a half is taken to include the whole subsequent residence in Corinth, ver. 18, in which vv. 12-17 form an episode. Men attacked him with a view of injuring him, but without success, and his continuous abode in Corinth was a fulfilment of the promise in ver 10 (indicated perhaps more clearly by τε than by δέ in ver. 11). On ἡμέρας ἱκανὰς, ver. 18, see below—the words are taken to mark simply a note of the time spent between the incident of vv. 12-17 and the departure of Paul from the city. In this period the Apostle would have founded the Church at Cenchreae, and his labours seem to have extended still further, for in 2 Cor i. 1 we read of the saints in the whole of Achaia (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 10) and the household of Stephanas is spoken of as the firstfruits not of Corinth but of Achaia.

Ver. 12. ἀνθ., cf. xiii. 7, another proof of St. Luke's accuracy, Achaia from B.C. 27 (when it had been separated from Macedonia, to which it had been united since B.C. 146, and made into a separate province) had been governed by a proconsul. In A.D. 15 Tiberius had reunited it with Macedonia and Mysia, and it was therefore under an imperial legatus as an imperial province, Tac., Ann., i., 76. But a further change occurred when Claudius, A.D. 44, made it again a senatorial province under a proconsul, Suet., Claudius, 25. On subsequent changes in its government see Ramsay, "Achaia," Hastings' B.D. Corinth was the chief city of the province Achaia, and so probably chosen for the residence of the governors.—Γαλλίωνος: we have no direct statement save that of St. Luke that Gallio governed Achaia. Gallio's brother Seneca tells us that Gallio caught fever in Achaia, Ep. Mor., 104, and took a voyage for change of air (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 258) (see also the same reference in Zahn, Einleitung, ii., p. 634, and as against Clemen, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 260), a remark which Ramsay justly regards as a corroboration of St. Luke; on the date see Ramsay St. Paul, p. 258, and Expositor March, 1897, p. 206; "Corinth," Hastings' B.D.[1], p. 481; Turner, "Chronology of the New Testament," ibid. Gallio could not have entered on the proconsulship of Achaia before 44 A.D., and probably not before 49 or 50: Ramsay thinks during the summer of A.D. 52 (Renan and Lightfoot, A.D. 53), whilst recently Schürer (so Wendt, 1899) places the proconsulship of Gallio between 51-55 A.D., Zw. Th., 1898, p. 41 f. (as against O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, who places it before 49 A.D.). The description of Gallio in Acts is quite consistent with what we know of his personal character, and with his attitude as a Roman official.

[1] ουν om. ℵABDE, Chrys., verss., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass. D Flor., Vulg. read ω ανδρες Ιουδ.

Statius, Silv., ii., 7, 32, speaks of him as "dulcis Gallio," and his brother Seneca writes of him: "Nemo mortalium uni tam dulcis est quam hic omnibus," Quæst. Nat., iv., Præf., and see other references and testimonies, Renan, Saint Paul, p. 221, and "Gallio," B.D.². It is quite possible that the Jews took advantage of his easy-going nature and affability, or, if he had recently arrived in the province, of his inexperience. Gallio's Hellenic culture may have led to his selection for the post (Renan, u. s., p. 222). The notion that as a Stoic he was friendly disposed towards the Christians, and on that account rejected the accusations of the Jews, is quite without foundation, see Zöckler, in loco. The name of Junius Gallio was an assumed one; its bearer, whose real name was Marcus Annæus Novatus, had been adopted by the rhetorician, L. Junius Gallio, a friend of his father.—κατεπέστησαν, cf. xvi. 22, verb, only found here. Rendall, in loco, renders "made a set assault upon Paul," expressing the culmination of the Jewish hostility in a set assault (not against, as in A. and R.V.).—ὁμοθ., as in xv. 25.—τὸ βῆμα: of the proconsul, probably erected in some public place, a movable seat o judgment.

Ver. 13. λέγοντες: in the set accusation which follows there is probably an indication that the Jews could not stir up the crowd against Paul as at Philippi and Thessalonica, for already he had gained too good an influence over the common people (Weiss).—ἀναπείθει: only here in N.T., "persuadendo excitare, sollicitare," it is used of evil persuasion in LXX, Jer. xxxvi. (xxix.) 8 and in 1 Macc. i. 11.—παρὰ τὸν νόμον: "contrary to the law": what law? Roman or Jewish? in a certain sense the expression might include both, for as a religio licita the Jewish law was under the protection of the Roman law, and Josephus tells us how leave had been granted to the Jews to worship according to their own law, Ant., xiv., 10, 2 ff. But Paul's teaching was to these Jews the introduction of something illegal, contrary to the religion which they were allowed to practise, and so they sought to bring his teaching under the cognisance of the proconsul (see Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 190). They may therefore have designedly used a phrase which had a double meaning. But whatever their design, Gallio saw through it, and drew a hard and fast distinction between a charge of illegality against the state and of illegality against Jewish, νόμου τοῦ καθ' ὑμᾶς, not Roman law. In this reply Gallio showed that he knew more about the matter than the Jews supposed, and he may have had some intelligence of the Jewish disturbances at Rome about "Chrestus". Both ἀνθρώπους and σέβ. τὸν Θεόν point to the general nature of the charge, as including Paul's efforts to convert not only Jews but proselytes. At least the Jews would try to give their accusation a colour of illegality against the Roman law, for they would themselves have dealt with it if it had been simply connected with their own religious observances, see "Corinth," Hastings B.D., i., 481.

Ver. 14. μέλλοντος: Lucan; see Burton, p. 71, on οὖν, see critical note and Alford, in loco, for its retention.—ἀδίκημα, cf. xxiv. 20, only once elsewhere in N.T., Rev. xviii. 5, here it may perhaps mark a legal wrong, a wrong against the state — the word is used in classical Greek of a breach of law ἀδίκ. τῶν νόμων, Dem., 586, 11, while ῥᾳδιούργημα marks rather the moral wrong. ῥᾳδ., cf. xiii. 10, not elsewhere either in classical Greek or LXX, but cf. Plut., Pyrrh., 6, "if a misdemeanour or a crime": so Ramsay.—κατὰ λόγον: ut par est, merito; cf. use of the phrase in Polyb. and 3 Macc. iii. 14 (παρὰ λ., 2 Macc. iv. 46, 3 Macc. vii. 8).—Ἰουδαῖοι without ἄνδρες perhaps in contempt (so Knabenbauer), but see critical note. — ἠνεσχόμην, cf. Luke ix. 41, and so several times in St. Paul's Epistles, 2 Cor. xi. 1, 4; on the augment and construction see Blass, Gram., pp. 39, 102, Simcox, Language of the New Testament, p. 34, note, and Burton, p. 103.

[4] ℵAB Vulg., Boh., Arm. om. οι Ελληνες, so R.V., W.H., Wendt, Weiss; Blass retains (Flor. om. παντες), so Belser and Hilg. Blass in β reads και ο Γαλλιων προσεποιειτο αυτον μη βλεπειν. Flor. "simulat se non videre" (d); Belser holds that this is original, p. 87. Some later MSS. read Ιουδαιοι.

Ver. 15. If we read the plural ζητήματα we may regard it as expressing contempt: "a parcel of questions," Alford; but if they are questions of word (teaching) not deed (opposite ἔργον, factum) and of names not things, verba, opposite πράγματα (Blass); i.e., the arguments as to whether Jesus could rightly or not claim the title of Messiah, see also Page's note.—νόμου τοῦ καθ' ὑμᾶς: of your law—not Roman law; with the phrase cf. xvii. 28 (xvi. 39 β), xxiv. 22. It is used only once elsewhere in N.T., by St. Paul, Eph. i. 15 (cf. Acts xxvi. 3).—ὄψεσθε αὐτοί, cf. Matt. xxvii. 4, 24; pronoun emphatic, xiii. 18, 19; so in LXX, Num. xiii. 19, Judg. vii. 17, xxi. 21, etc. Blass quotes two passages from Epictetus, ii., 5, 30, and iv., 6, 41.—κριτὴς γὰρ ἐγὼ: omit γάρ; pronoun more emphatic; they could determine their matters according to their own law; so Lysias, xxiii., 29, Festus, xxv., 19.—οὐ βούλομαι: "I am not minded," R.V.; the decision while it testifies to the strength of Gallio's character, since unlike Pilate he would not allow himself to be influenced against his better judgment, expresses at the same time his sovereign contempt for the Jews and their religion; to him as to his brother Seneca the Jews were only sceleratissima gens (Aug., De Civ. Dei, vi., 10). The decision shows no favourable inclination to Christianity itself, but this does not take away from its importance as proving that so far as the Roman authorities were concerned the freedom of speech thus granted would enable the religion of the Christ to make its way through the civilised, i.e., the Roman world; cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 260, who sees in his residence at Corinth an epoch in Paul's life not only as regards his doctrine and his presentation of it but also as regards his aim that Christianity should be spread throughout the empire, an aim made more clear by the imperial policy of which Gallio was the exponent.

Ver. 16. ἀπήλασεν: probably by his lictors who would be commanded to clear the court. This interpretation of the word is in accordance with the next verse, which describes the crowd of Greeks as prepared to follow up the decision of Gallio by similar treatment of a leading Jew on their own account. See critical note.

Ver. 17. ἐπιλαβ. δὲ: of hostile action, xvii. 19, xvi. 19.—οἱ Ἕλληνες, see critical note. If πάντες alone is read it seems clear from the context that only the Jews could be meant, and Weiss supposes that when they had failed so ignominiously they vented their rage on their own leader, Sosthenes, who as head of the synagogue would naturally have been prominent in presenting the complaint to Gallio. Some of the later MSS. insert οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι after πάντες to make the meaning clearer. Probably confusion arose in the MSS. from identifying Sosthenes either rightly or wrongly with the Sosthenes in 1 Cor. i. 1, and therefore οἱ Ἕλληνες was omitted on the supposition that the Jews were allowed to console themselves by beating a Christian. But not only is it difficult to conceive that Gallio would have allowed them to do this, but there is no occasion to suppose that the Sosthenes here is the same as in 1 Cor. i. 1 (for the name was common), and even if so, he may have become a Christian at a later date. It is much more conceivable that the Corinthians in their hatred of the Jews proceeded to second as it were the supercilious treatment dealt out to them by Gallio, and they would naturally fix upon Sosthenes as the leading spirit in the Jewish community. So far as he cared at all, Gallio may have been pleased rather than otherwise at the rough and ready approval of his decision by the populace, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 250, and "Corinth," Hastings' B.D.[1], p. 482; Plumptre, in loco, and Wendt (1899). The whole of the section, vv. 12-17, is regarded by Clemen, p. 126, Jüngst, p. 165, as an interpolation, but Hilgenfeld puts aside their varying grounds of rejection as unconvincing, and finds it very conceivable that the Jews attempted to hinder the preaching of Paul as is here described (1 Thess. ii. 16). With regard to the whole narrative of Paul at Corinth, vv. 1-17, Spitta, p. 244, concludes, as against Weizsäcker's attack on its historical character, that we may regard it as scanty or even one-sided, but that there is no valid reason to regard it as unhistorical.—ἔτυπτον: Hackett interprets the imperfect as showing how thorough a beating Sosthenes received; but "exitus rei quæ depingitur (imperf.) non indicatur, quia nihil gravius secutum est," Blass; the imperfect may simply mean "began to strike".—οὐδὲν . . . ἔμελεν, cf. Luke x. 40, a Gallio has become a proverbial name for one indifferent to religion, but there is nothing in St. Luke's statement to support such a view. All the words show is that Gallio was so little influenced by the accusations of the Jews against Paul that he took no notice of the conduct of the Greeks (?) in beating Sosthenes. And if the beating was administered by the Jews, Gallio might well overlook it, as he would regard it as the outcome of some question which only concerned their religion (Weiss).

Ver. 18. ἔτι προσμείνας: this may be an addition to the year and a half, or may be included in it; on ἔτι see critical note.—ἱκανάς, Lucan, see on viii. 11, etc. the expression shows how little the attack upon the Apostle had injured his prospects of evangelising the city and neighbourhood.—ἀποταξ., Vulgate, valefacio, used by Luke and Paul only, except Mark vi. 46, Luke ix. 61, xiv. 33, Acts, in loco, and ver. 21, 2 Cor. iii. 13; in this sense only in middle voice in N.T., in classical Greek not used in this sense, but ἀσπάζεσθαί τινα (Grimm, sub v.); cf. also its use in Jos., Ant., xi., 6, 8 (so too in Philo), like Latin, renuntio, to forsake (cf. Luke xiv. 33), and in Eccl. writers, Ignatius, Ad Philadelph., xi., 1; Euseb., H.E., ii., 17, 5 (2 Clem., vi., 4, 5).—ἐξέπλει: "he set about the voyage," in xx. 6, aorist, not imperfect as here; "recte impf., nam de perfecta navigatione, ver. 22, demum agitur," Blass.—κειρ. . . . εὐχήν: in the interpretation of this passage it is undoubtedly best to refer the vow to Paul; grammatically it would refer to Aquila, but it is difficult to see what point there would then be in the statement. If it is urged that Aquila's name placed after Priscilla's indicates that he is the subject of the following verb, we have clearly seen that this is not the only occasion on which Priscilla's name preceded her husband's, see above, and ver. 26, and Rom. xvi. 3. The argument that the notice is intended by St. Luke to show that Paul counselled observance of the law, and did not tempt him to break it, as he was afterwards accused of doing, xxi. 21, is still more irrelevant, for so far nothing has been definitely said as to Aquila's conversion. And if the vow involved any obligation to appear at Jerusalem, it is quite evident that Paul and not Aquila went up to the Holy City. A list of the names on either side is given by Alford, Felten, Wendt. Amongst recent writers we may add Wendt, Zöckler, Blass, Jüngst, Matthias as favouring the view that Aquila is the subject, whilst Weiss, Felton, Ramsay, Hort, Rendall, Page, Knabenbauer, Luckock take the opposite view. What then was the nature and occasion of the vow? Those who connect this vow with the journey to Jerusalem, as if the latter was obligatory in the fulfilment of the former, are justified in regarding the vow as a modified form of the Nazirite vow, Num. vi. 1-21. The man under the Nazirite vow was to drink no wine or strong drink, and to let no razor pass over his head or face. At the end of the time during which the vow lasted, his hair was shaven at the door of the Tabernacle (the Temple), and burnt in the fire of the altar as an offering. But it is to be observed that in this passage the word is κειράμενος, whilst of thus completing the Nazirite vow, xxi. 24, the word ξυρήσωνται is used (cf. 1 Cor. xi. 6), and there is evidence (Wordsworth, in loco) that a man who had taken a

[1] After Ακυλας Blass in β reads ος ευχην εχων εν Κεγχρεαις την κεφαλην εκειρατο, following Flor.; see Belser, pp. 89-92, who strongly opposes Blass, and cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 263, and comment.

Nazirite vow in a foreign land was allowed to poll or cut his hair shorter (κείρω), provided that the hair so polled was taken to the Temple and burnt there as an offering together with the hair shorn off at the completion of the vow. That the Jews took upon themselves a modified form of the Nazirite vow is proved from Josephus, B. J., ii., 15, 1, when they were afflicted by disease or any other distress. Possibly therefore the vow followed upon St. Paul's deliverance from an attack of sickness, and the warm praise bestowed upon Phœbe, the deaconess of the Church at Cenchreae (Rom. xvi. 1), for her personal aid to himself may be taken as some confirmation of this. But if we thus place St. Paul's vow here under the category of the vows mentioned by Josephus, the journey to Jerusalem must be immediately connected with it, as the description given by the Jewish historian plainly shows that the vows in question were modified forms of the regular Nazirite vow. It is a very reasonable conjecture that the vow may be connected with St. Paul's danger at Corinth, and with his safe deliverance from it. As one consecrated to the service of the Lord, he would allow his hair to grow until the promise of his safety had been fulfilled and his embarkation from Corinth was assured. The vow was thus analogous to the Nazirite vow, inasmuch as the same idea of consecration lay at the root of each; but it was rather a private vow (Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 91, and Weiss, in loco), and in this case the journey of the Apostle to Jerusalem would not be conditioned by the vow, but by his desire to be present at some great festival, beyond doubt that of the Passover. On the custom amongst other nations to cut off the hair, and to let it grow in votive offering to the gods, see Holtzmann, Apostelgeschichte, p. 395, and Page, in loco. Hilgenfeld ascribes the narrative of the incident to his "author to Theophilus," whether the vow refers to Paul or Aquila, and considers that the story is intended to connect St. Paul as much as possible with Judaism. One of the most curious instances of perverse interpretation is that of Krenkel, who thinks that the κειρ. may be referred to Paul, who shaved his head to counteract the epileptic fits with which he was afflicted, 2 Cor. xiii. 7, see Zöckler's note.—Κεγχρεαῖς, see notices of the place in Renan, Saint Paul, p. 218, and Hastings' B.D., modern Kalaniki (in Thuc. Κεγχρειαί): the eastern harbour of Corinth, about nine miles distant, connecting the trade with Asia; Lechæum, the other port ("bimaris Corinthi," Horace, Odes, i., 7, 2), connecting it with Italy and the West. Τούτῳ μὲν οὖν χρῶνται πρὸς τοὺς ἐκ τῆς Ἀσίας, πρὸς δὲ τοὺς ἐκ τῆς Ἰταλίας τῷ Λεχαίῳ, Strabo, viii., 6, p. 380.

Ver. 19. κατήντησε, see critical note.—εἰς Ἔφεσον: a voyage of two or three days with unfavourable wind. Cicero mentions two occasions when the voyage from Ephesus to Athens took two weeks, Ad Attic., vi., 8, 9; iii., 9, but in both instances extraordinary delays were the cause of the lengthy voyage; on Ephesus see xix. 1.—κἀκείνους κατέλ. αὐτοῦ: Ephesus, famous for its commerce, where they might carry on their trade, although it is perhaps somewhat hazardous to regard the city as the centre of the particular trade in which they were engaged. Lewin quotes two passages in support of this, but they both refer to one event, the presentation of a tent by the Ephesians to Alcibiades, "Ephesus" B.D.².—αὐτὸς δὲ: this does not mean that Paul for his part (in contradiction to Aquila and Priscilla) went into the synagogue; such an interpretation seems unnatural. Others explain that Aquila and Priscilla were left in the town, and that the synagogue was outside the town (so Alford), but this does not seem satisfactory as a full explanation,

[2] After ειπων ℵABE 13, 15, 105, 180, Vulg. (exc. demid.), Sah., Boh., Arm., Aethro. om. δει . . . ιεροσ., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; retained by T.R., so Meyer, after (D)HLP 36, 40, Syrr., demid., Chrys., Oec., Thl., Gig., Wer.; D has την εορτην ημεραν, omitting the second την. Blass, p. xx., thinks D here affected by the corresponding Latin, "sollemnem diem advenientem". The reading may have arisen from a desire to give a reason for St. Paul's urgency in making a brief journey to Jerusalem, a journey to which the αναβας of ver. 22 was regarded as referring (cf. xx. 16). But whether we follow the Bezan text or not, Ramsay holds that the shorter reading of the great MSS. still implies a hurried visit to Jerusalem, which could only be for some great occasion—the Feast of the Passover close at hand (so Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 263). Possibly the performance of his vow may have occasioned this urgent desire (Belser). But in xix. 1 D has a further expansion of the text, and speaks of a purposed but unaccomplished journey of St. Paul to Jerusalem, so that we cannot find in xviii. 22 an intimation of the accomplishment of this journey (cf. Corssen, G. G. A., p. 440, 1896; Hilgenfeld, Zw. Th., 1896, p. 82), and αναβας, xviii. 22, does not refer to a journey to Jerusalem at all on this view. But the reference of β in xix. 1 to the proposed journey in xviii. 21 has been doubted: Paul may have visited Jerusalem, xviii. 22, then travelled through Galatia and Phrygia, ver. 23, and have formed anew an intention to pay another visit to Jerusalem (so Belser, strongly against Blass, Beiträge, p. 97, and also Die Selbstvertheidigung des heiligen Paulus, p. 140 ff., App. I.; the visit in xviii. 22 having been already accomplished for the performance of his vow). But if xix. 1 does refer back to the journey of xviii. 21, Wendt maintains that the original occasion for the addition in that verse may still have been the fact that αναβας was understood of a journey to Jerusalem. For the two additions may proceed from different hands; that in xviii. 21 has much better attestation than that in xix. 1, and may owe its origin to the correct reference of αναβας in ver. 22 to a journey to Jerusalem; whilst the later addition in xix. 1 may have been occasioned by that of xviii. 21, because the reference in ver. 22 to a journey to Jerusalem was no longer recognised (Wendt, 1899, note, p. 306); see further on xix. 1.

especially after xvi. 13. It seems most probable that St. Luke uses the words in an anticipatory way, and passes on to the doings of the chief figure, Paul. In spite of all that he had suffered at the hands of his countrymen, St. Paul is still an Israelite, yearning for the hope of Israel, and desirous that others should participate in his hope, see critical note on β and Wendt (1899), note, p. 305.—διελέχθη: aorist, not imperfect as in ver. 4; "delivered a discourse to the Jews," so Ramsay, in contrast to the continued stay at Corinth marked by the imperfect; so Alford.

Ver. 20. ἐπένευσεν: only here in N.T., but cf. 2 Macc. iv. 10, xi. 15, xiv. 20, frequent in classical Greek. St. Paul must have had some very pressing reason for refusing such an invitation from his own countrymen.

Ver. 21. See critical note. The Feast, as Ramsay maintains, St. Paul, p. 264 (so Ewald, Renan, Zöckler, Rendall, Blass and others), was the Passover, the one which seems most reconcilable with the chronology; others maintain Pentecost, so Anger, Alford, Wieseler, Plumptre—see Alford, in loco, and Turner, Chron. of the N. T., p. 422; Lewin favours Tabernacles.—ἀνακάμψω, cf. xix. 1: used by St. Luke, Luke x. 6, Matt. ii. 12, Heb. xi. 15; used also several times in LXX, Jud. xi. 39 A, 2 Sam. viii. 13, 1 Kings xii. 20, Job xxxix. 4, Sus. 14, and other instances, so in classical Greek, to return to a place, Herod., ii., 8.—τοῦ Θ. θέλ., cf. 1 Cor. iv. 19, xvi. 17, James iv. 15. Not only amongst Jews and Arabs but amongst Greeks and Romans similar phrases were in vogue, see Meyer's note on James iv. 15; see critical note on β.—ἀνήχθη, see above on xiii. 13.

high sea to the coast, the shore, cf. xxvii. 5 (xxi. 3), so in Homer, and also of coming down from the high land to the coast, see Grimm-Thayer, sub v.—ἀναβὰς, i.e., to Jerusalem, the usual expression for a journey to the capital, cf. xi. 2, xv. 2 (b), xxv. 1, 9, Matt. xx. 18, Mark x. 32, see Luke ii. 42, xviii. 31, xix. 28, John ii. 13, vii. 8, Gal. ii. 1; cf. xxiv. 1, 22, xxv. 6, where "to go down" is used of the journey from Jerusalem to Cæsarea. To suppose that the word is used to indicate simply that they landed in the harbour, or because the town lay high up from the shore, or because the place of assembly for the Church was on high ground, is quite arbitrary, and cannot be set against the usage of the term "going up" and "going down" in relation to Jerusalem; see Hort, Ecclesia, p. 96; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 264; so Bengel, Neander, Meyer, Hackett, Zöckler, Rendall, Page, Weiss, Weizsäcker, Spitta, Jüngst, Hilgenfeld, Wendt, Knabenbauer, and Belser, Beiträge, p. 89, who opposes here the position of Blass (and if the T.R. in ver. 21 is retained in β certainly "the going up" to Jerusalem seems naturally to follow). Blass maintains that Cæsarea is meant, but he is evidently led to adopt this view by his desire to retain the reading in D, xix. 1, see Zöckler, in loco, and Ramsay, p. 264, and Belser, u. s., for a criticism of Blass's view. Amongst the more recent critics, Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 343, 350, combats the reasons alleged by Belser, and takes the going up and the Church mentioned to refer to Cæsarea and the Church there, not to Jerusalem. This visit of St. Paul to Jerusalem is disputed by McGiffert, although he does not deny with Weizsäcker the whole journey, but admits that the Apostle went as far as Antioch. So too Wendt is not prepared to follow Weizsäcker entirely, although he holds that as the Apostle went to Syria, Luke concluded that he must have gone up to Jerusalem (so McGiffert). On the other hand, the historical truthfulness of the journey to Jerusalem is stoutly defended by Spitta (pp. 246-248). The silence of the Galatian Epistle is admitted by Wendt to be in itself no proof against its occurrence, and still less objection can be based on the supposed variance at this time between St. Paul and the Jewish Christians of the capital. See Zöckler's note, p. 272, and also Alford, in loco.—τὴν ἐκκ.: the Church at Jerusalem may be fairly regarded as indicated, the ἐκκ. κατ' ἐξοχὴν: "primariam, ex qua propagatæ sunt reliquæ," Bengel. If St. Luke had meant the Christians in Cæsarea, he would probably have said that Paul saluted the brethren or the disciples, cf. xxiv. 7 (see Belser, u. s., p. 90). This visit of St. Paul to Jerusalem would probably be his fourth, ix. 26, xi. 30 (xii. 25), xv. 4, and if he went on this fourth occasion to complete a vow, this fact alone would prove that the visit was not wanting in an object: see however note on ver. 18.—ἀσπασ.: the word indicates a short stay. Blass interprets that the Apostle went up from the harbour to the city of Cæsarea, and then "went down to Antioch". But Ramsay, p. 264, urges that it is impossible to use the term κατέβη of a journey from the coast town Cæsarea to the inland city Antioch; on the contrary, one regularly "goes down" to a coast town, xiii. 4, xiv. 25, xvi. 8, etc. At the Syrian Antioch, the mother of the Gentile churches, St. Paul would find a welcome after his second journey, as after his first—this so far as we know was his last visit to a place which was now no longer an effective centre for the Apostle's work, or for the supervision of his new churches.

Ver. 23. ποιήσας χρόνον τινὰ: St. Paul would naturally have spent some time in a place so associated with the origin of Gentile Christianity, and with his own labours, the starting place of each of his missionary journeys; on the phrase in St. Luke see Friedrich, cf.

Ver. 24. Ἀλεξ., cf. vi. 9, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 226, E.T. At Alexandria the LXX was written and Philo lived; here too was the magnificent mosque of which it was said that he who had not worshipped in it had not witnessed the glory of Israel, Edersheim, History of the Jewish People, pp. 67, 186, 405, 409; on the contact of Jewish and Greek thought in Alexandria, "Alexandria," B.D.[2] (Westcott). What was the exact influence of his Alexandrian training upon Apollos we are not told, but as a cultured Jew of such a centre of Hellenistic influence, it is quite possible that Aquila and Priscilla chose him for the work at Corinth because they thought that his training and learning would attract the attention of a Corinthian audience. Possibly his preaching may have included some Philonian speculations, but the difference between him and St. Paul in their teaching at Corinth may have consisted in outward form and delivery rather than in substance; see Canon Evans, Speaker's Commentary, iii., p. 240. No doubt the subtle Corinthian would admire the eloquence of Apollos and pervert his words, but there is no reason to suppose that Apollos encouraged any such party spirit. On his work at Corinth and the last notice of him, Titus iii. 13, see "Apollos," B. D.[2], and Hastings' B.D., cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 12, for his unambitious and peaceful character, and Plumptre, in loco. The Book of Wisdom was attributed to Apollos by Dean Plumptre, but see on the other hand "Wisdom of Solomon," B.D.[2] (Westcott), and Speaker's Commentary, "Apocrypha," vol. i., p. 413.—λόγιος; "learned," R.V., "eloquent," margin; A.V., "eloquent"; the word may include both learning and eloquence. In classical Greek of a man learned, as, e.g., in history (Herod.), but in Plutarch λογιότης, eloquence, and so λόγιος, eloquent. Meyer rendered the word "eloquent," so Weiss, Zöckler, Page, Alford, Hackett, Felten, Blass (doctus ap. antiquos), δυνατός referring rather to his learning and acquaintance with the Scriptures: "a good speaker and well read in the Scriptures" (Ramsay). Rendall however takes δυνατός as conveying the idea of eloquence, but in vii. 22 the word cannot mean eloquent as applied to Moses, but rather denotes the wise and weighty nature of his utterances, see Lobeck, Phryn., p. 198.

Ver. 25. See critical note on the proposed omission of the verse and reading also in D.—κατηχ., cf. Luke i. 4, "taught by word of mouth," R.V., margin; D. adds ἐν τῇ πατρίδι, and Blass holds that we may learn from this that some form of Gospel teaching had already been known in Egypt. But how far had Apollos been instructed? It is commonly held that he only knew the Baptism of John and nothing further, and that he was imperfectly acquainted with the facts of our Lord's life. But he is said to have taught accurately (ἀκριβῶς) "the things concerning Jesus" (see critical note), and not only so, but, as Blass also points out, the mention of the twelve disciples at Ephesus has previously been taken to mean literally that these men were disciples of the Baptist, and had never heard of Jesus, whereas the words used to describe them, μαθηταί and πιστεύσαντες, are never used except of Christians. What is the conclusion? That whilst Apollos, like these twelve men, was acquainted with no other Baptism than John's, he may have known quite as much of our Lord's words and deeds as was contained in the Gospel of St. Mark in its mutilated form, xvi. 8, which tells us nothing of Christian Baptism. And if we further ask from what source did Apollos gain this accurate information, Blass answers: "videlicet non sine scripto aliquo Evangelio". If, he urges, it had been otherwise, and Apollos had been instructed by some disciple of the Apostles and not through a written Gospel, the position of things in the text would be reversed, and Apollos would have been imperfectly acquainted with our Lord's life and teaching, whilst he could not have failed to know of Christian Baptism as the admission to Christian churches. Blass therefore believes that before the year 50 (he places the Conference in 45 or 46) written Gospels were in existence, and he evidently leans to the belief that St. Mark's Gospel, or some first edition of it, was the Gospel from which Apollos was instructed (see in loco, and cf. also Philology of the Gospels, p. 30). But the word κατηχ. on this view must be taken not to include but to exclude, at all events mainly, a reference to catechetical teaching, and this from the use of the word in the N.T. is most unlikely. In the majority of the cases, as Blass admits, the word denotes oral teaching, although he maintains that this meaning is not always strictly kept. In the N.T. the word is used only by Luke and Paul, altogether eight times, in six of which it is used with reference to oral instruction, according to Mr. Wright: "Apollos: a study in Pre-Pauline Christianity," Expository Times, October, 1897 (but see also in answer, Blass, Philology of the Gospels, p. 31). Mr. Wright suggests that Apollos may have derived his knowledge of "the facts concerning Jesus" from one of the many Catechists who were sent out from Jerusalem, and visited in large numbers the capital of Egypt, and by him Apollos like Theophilus was instructed in the way of the Lord. This view certainly gives an adequate meaning to κατηχ., but still it seems strange that a Catechist, even if his chief business was to catechise or instruct in the facts of the Gospel history, should say nothing about Christian Baptism; surely a Catechist would himself be a baptised member of Christ. It is possible that Apollos may have deliberately decided to abide as he was; he may have said that as the Master Himself had fulfilled all righteousness in John's Baptism, so that Baptism was sufficient for the servant. But on this view one has to suppose that no news of the events of Pentecost had reached Alexandria, although Egyptian Jews had been present at the feast. But the news which Apollos may have received had been imperfect, cf. xix. 2, 3, and he had not therefore abandoned his position as a follower of the Baptist, who accepted the teaching that Jesus was the Messiah without knowing fully how that claim had been fulfilled, who had been baptised with the Baptism of the Baptist unto repentance without knowing the higher blessings conferred by membership in the Body of the Risen and Ascended Lord: see further Expository Times, vol. vii., pp. 564, 565; Hermathena, xxi. (1895); Weiss and Zöckler, in loco.—ἐλάλει καὶ ἐδίδασκεν: Blass prefers D ἀπελάλει, which Wright, u. s., p. 11, renders "repeated by rote".—ζέων τῷ πνεύματι, cf. Rom. xii. 11, this fervency was shown not only in speaking what he knew, but in teaching it to others, cf. ver. 11, where the same word is used of Paul's instructions. We can scarcely take ἐλάλει as privatim, ἐδίδασκεν publice (Bengel).—ἀκριβῶς: "accurately," so often in classics, and as agreeing best here with this verse and the comparative in ver. 26; on the use of the word in medical writers see Hobart, p. 251; Weiss, Meyer's Kommentar, Luke i. 3, also compares the similarity between St. Luke's phrase and Galen's dedication of his work to a friend (he also finds a parallel in Jos., C. Apion, i., 10); see also below on Belser, pp. 87, 88, argues for the value of the β text here, esp. in the addition εν ταις εκκλησιαις, which shows St. Paul had not confined his attention to Corinth. But if original, why omitted? See Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 267; W.H. marg.; Holtzmann, Apostelgeschichte, p. 396. δια της χαριτος om. D 137, Gig., Par., Vulg., Syr. Harcl., so Blass in β.

ABE 13, Vulg., Boh., Aeth., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, so Blass, although in β we might have expected the other order, as characteristic of the Bezan text; see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 268, and see below on verse 2.

The word occurs in Luke twice, Luke i. 3, Acts xviii. 25, and elsewhere in Matt. ii. 8, and twice in St. Paul, 1 Thess. v. 2, Eph. v. 15, whilst ἀκριβέστερον occurs four times in N.T., and each time in Acts, cf. ver. 26, xxiii. 15, 20, xxiv. 22.

Ver. 26. παῤῥησιάζεσθαι, see above on p. 242; whatever was the exact form of the belief of Apollos, he had at all events the courage of his convictions. — ἀκούσαντες showing that Priscilla and Aquila had not separated themselves from their fellow-countrymen.—προσελάβοντο, cf. xvii. 5, i.e., for instruction in private.—ἀκριβέστερον: on its use by St. Luke see above on ver. 25. The word is used by Dioscorides in his preface to his De Materia Medica: see Weiss-Meyer's Kommentar on Luke i. 1, and Vogel, p. 17, as an instance of medical language. — ἐξέθεντο: we are not told whether he was baptised, but xix. 5 makes it probable that he was; see Zöckler's note. Ver. 27. διελθεῖν εἰς, cf. Luke viii. 22, Mark iv. 35, Latin, trajicere.—προτρεψ. . . . ἔγραψαν: "encouraged him and wrote," R.V., so Chrysostom, Erasmus, Grotius, Bengel, Felten, Lumby, Rendall, Knabenbauer: "currentem incitantes" Bengel. But others refer it to the disciples, "wrote exhorting the disciples," i.e., wrote letters of commendation, 2 Cor. iii., so Luther, De Wette, Ewald, Zöckler, Alford, Wendt, Weiss, Nösgen, Hackett. Blass thinks that the word can be referred to neither in the sense of cohortari, and prefers the rendering in accordance with the Syriac anteverterunt, but cf. Wisdom xiv. 18, 2 Macc. xi. 7 for the former sense, so in classical Greek; only here in N.T., classed not only by Hobart, but also by Vogel, as amongst the medical words in St. Luke, u. s., p. 17.—συνεβάλετο: only here in N.T. in middle, with dative of the person, profuit, so often in Greek authors, especially Polybius; Wisdom v. 8, Xen., Cyr., i., 2, 8; cf. 1 Cor. iii. 6, "rigavit A. non plantavit" Bengel.—διὰ τῆς χ.: "helped much through grace them which had believed" R.V., margin. This connection of the words seems preferable, as stress is laid upon the fact that the gifts and eloquence of Apollos were only available when God gave the increase—the position of the words is not against this, as they may have been so placed for emphasis. Blass, who joins the phrase with πεπιστ., adds "quamvis ibi abundat". It does not seem natural to explain the word χάρις here as the Gospel, or to refer it to the grace of the eloquence of Apollos.

Ver. 28. εὐτόνως: "powerfully," only in Luke, cf. Luke xxiii. 10, "vehemently," like Latin, intente, acriter, Josh. vi. (7), 8 (-νος, 2 Macc. xii. 23, 4 Macc. vii. 10, A R); found also in classical Greek, and may be one of the "colloquial" words common to the N.T. and Aristophanes, cf. Plutus, 1096 (Kennedy, p. 78). But as the word is used only by St. Luke, it may be noted that it is very frequently employed by medical writers, opposed to ἄτονος.—διακατηλέγχετο: "powerfully confuted," R.V. The word does not prove that Apollos convinced them (A.V. "mightily convinced"), lit., he argued them down; but to confute is not of necessity to convince. The double compound, a very strong word, is not found elsewhere, but in classical Greek διελέγχω, to refute utterly (in LXX, middle, to dispute), κατελέγχω, to convict of falsehood, to belie. — ἐπιδεικνὺς: only once elsewhere in N.T., Heb. vi. 17, and in classical Greek as in Plato, to prove, to demonstrate.

μενοι οἱ ἀδελφοὶ ἔγραψαν τοῖς μαθηταῖς ἀποδέξασθαι αὐτόν· ὃς παραγενόμενος συνεβάλετο πολὺ τοῖς πεπιστευκόσι διὰ τῆς χάριτος·

Additional note on Acts xviii. 23 (see on xvi. 6).

In a brief attempt to refer to a few difficulties connected with this verse, it is well to bear in mind at the outset that St. Luke never uses the noun Γαλατία (which is twice used by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, Gal. i. 2), but the adjective Γαλατικός, xviii. 23 and xvi. 6, in both cases with the noun χώρα; St. Paul in each case is speaking of the "Churches of Galatia"; St. Luke in each case is speaking of the Apostle's journeys. How may we account for this different phraseology? If St. Luke had meant Galatia proper, we may believe that he would have used the word Γαλατία, but as he says Γαλατικὴ χώρα he speaks as a Greek and indicates the Roman province Galatia, or the Galatic province; a name by which the Greek-speaking natives called it, whilst sometimes they enumerated its parts, e.g., Pontus Galaticus, Phrygia Galatica, Expositor, pp. 126, 127, August, 1898 (Ramsay), and Hastings' B.D., "Galatia" (Ramsay), pp. 87-89, 1899; cf. the form of the derived adjective in -ικός in the pair Λακωνικὴ γῆ and Λακωνία. St. Paul on the other hand, speaking as a Roman citizen, used the word Γαλατία as = the Roman province, for not only is there evidence that Γαλ. could be so employed in current official usage (the contrary hypothesis is now abandoned by Schürer, one of its former staunch supporters, see Expositor, u. s., p. 128, and Hastings' B.D., ii., 86), but it seems beyond all dispute that St. Paul in other cases classified his Churches in accordance with the Roman provinces, Asia, Macedonia, Achaia, Expositor, u. s., p. 125; Zahn, Einleitung, i., 124; Renan, Saint Paul, p. 51; Hausrath, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, iii., p. 135; Clemen, Chron. der Paulinischen Briefe, p. 121. Why then should the Churches of Galatia be interpreted otherwise? Ramsay ("Questions," Expositor, January, 1899) may well appeal to Dr. Hort's decisive acceptance of the view that in 1 Peter i. 1 (First Epistle of St. Peter, pp. 17, 158) the Churches are named according to the provinces of the Roman empire (a point emphasised by Hausrath, u. s., in advocating the South-Galatian theory), and that in provincial Galatia St. Peter included at least the Churches founded by St. Paul in Galatia proper, i.e., in Phrygia and Lycaonia, although it must be remembered that Dr. Hort still followed Lightfoot in maintaining that the Galatians of St. Paul's Epistle were true Galatians, and not the inhabitants of the Roman province. "But if St. Peter, as Hort declares, classed Antioch, Iconium, Derbe and Lystra among the Churches of Galatia, must not Paul have done the same thing? Is it likely that 1 Peter, a letter so penetrated with the Pauline spirit, so much influenced by at least two Pauline Epistles, composed in such close relations with two of Paul's coadjutors, Silas and Mark, should class the Pauline Churches after a method that Paul would not employ?" (Ramsay, Expositor, January, 1899.) The Churches which in this view are thus included in the province Galatia, viz., Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, would be fitly addressed as Galatians by a Roman citizen writing to provincials proud of Roman names and titles (although Wendt (1899) urges this mode of address, Gal. iii. 1, as one of two decisive points against the South Galatian theory). For we must not forget that two of the four Churches in South Galatia were Roman coloniæ, Antioch and Lystra, whilst the two others mentioned in Acts xiv. bore an emperor's name, Claudio-Iconium, Claudio-Derbe. That the title "Galatians" might be so applied to the people of Roman "Galatia" has been sufficiently illustrated by Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 130, and Ramsay, Expositor, August, 1898, cf. Tac., Ann., xiii., 35, xv., 6; Hist., ii., 9; and it is very noteworthy that in Phil. iv. 15 St. Paul in addressing the inhabitants of a Roman colonia addresses them by a Latin and not a Greek form of their name, Φιλιππήσιοι = Latin, Philippenses, so that in addressing the four Churches of South Galatia, so closely connected with Rome as we have seen, St. Paul would naturally address them by the one title common to them all as belonging to a Roman province, Galatæ, Galatians; Ramsay, Expositor, August, 1898; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, pp. 177-179.

St. Paul then uses the term Galatia as a Roman citizen would use it, while St. Luke employs the phraseology common in the Ægean land amongst his contemporaries; he does not speak of Galatia, by which term he would as a Greek mean North Galatia, but of the "Galatic territory" or of the region or regions with which he was concerned; see on this Expositor, August, 1898, pp. 126, 127, and Hastings' B.D., "Galatia". In xvi. 6 he writes of a missionary tour (see on διῆλθον, note, l. c.) through the Phrygo-Galatic region; in xviii. 23 he speaks of a missionary tour through the Galatic region (Derbe and Lystra) and the Phrygian (Iconium and Antioch). It is, moreover, important to note that whether we take Φρυγία, xviii. 23, as an adjective, χώρα being understood, or as a noun, the same sense prevails, for we have evidence from inscriptions of Antioch that Galatic Phrygia was often designated by the noun, "and St. Luke may be allowed to speak as the people of Antioch wrote," Ramsay, Hastings' B.D., ii., p. 90, 1899. See further the same writer's reference to the testimony of Asterius, Bishop of Amasia in Pontus Galaticus, A.D. 400, in favour of the above view, who paraphrases xviii. 23, τὴν Λυκαονίαν καὶ τὰς τῆς Φρυγίας πόλεις, and places the journey through Lycaonia and Phrygia immediately before the visit to Asia, xix. 1; see especially Ramsay, Studia Biblica, iv., p. 16 ff. and p. 90; Hastings' B.D., u. s., as against Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 136.

But further: if the Phrygo-Galatic district thus lay on the road to Ephesus, it is difficult to see how St. Paul could be conceived of as going to a distance of some 300 miles out of his route to Galatia in the narrower ethnical sense of the word; and this is one of the many points which influences Mr. Turner to regard the South Galatia view as almost demonstrably true, Chron. of the N.T.; Hastings' B.D., i., 422 (see also to the same effect, Renan, Saint Paul, p. 52; and Rendall, Acts, p. 275; Salmon, Introd., p. 377). McGiffert (so too Renan, Hausrath) maintains that if the North Galatian theory is correct, and St. Paul is not addressing the Churches founded on his first missionary journey, but only those founded, as we must suppose, during a period of missionary labour in North Galatia, a period inserted without a hint from St. Luke in xvi. 6, it seems incomprehensible why Barnabas should be mentioned in the Galatian Epistle. The Churches in North Galatia could scarcely have known anything about him, especially as ex hypothesi they had been evangelised after the rupture between Paul and Barnabas, Acts xv. 36 ff. If, however, the Churches of the Epistle = the Churches founded in Acts xiii., xiv., then we can at once understand the mention of Barnabas. But Mr. Askwith has lately pointed out with much force (Epistle to the Galatians, p. 77, 1899) that this argument must not be pressed too far. The introduction of Barnabas in the Galatian Epistle does not prove that he was known personally to the Galatians (although it may reasonably warrant the inference that he was known by name) any more than the allusion to him, 1 Cor. ix. 6, proves that he was personally known to the Corinthians, cf. also Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 28.

One more significant and weighty fact deserves mention. In St. Paul's collection for the poor Saints (on the importance of which see xxiv. 17) there is every reason to believe that all the Pauline Churches shared; in 1 Cor. xvi. 1 appeal is made to the Churches of Galatia and Achaia, and the Churches of Macedonia and Asia subsequently contributed to the fund. If by Galatia we understand Galatia proper, and not the Roman province, then the four South Galatian Churches are not included in the list of subscribers, and they are not even asked to contribute. This appears inconceivable; whereas, if we look at the list of delegates, Acts xx. 4, whilst Macedonia and Asia are represented, and Gaius and Timothy represent the Churches of South Galatia, no delegate is mentioned from any North Galatian community (see Rendall: "Pauline collection for the Saints," Expositor, Nov., 1898, and "The Galatians of St. Paul," Expositor, April, 1894; also Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i., 272, E.T., and McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 180, Askwith, Epistle to the Galatians, p. 88 ff. (1899)). For the literature of the question see Ramsay, "Galatia," Hastings' B.D., ii., p. 89, 1899; Zahn, Einleitung, i., pp. 129, 130; Wendt (1899), p. 276, and "Galatians, Epistle to the," Marcus Dods, Hastings' B.D., ii., 94. To the list given in the last reference may be added the names of Wendt, O. Holtzmann, Clemen, V. Weber (Würsburg), Page, Rendall, McGiffert,

See above on xviii. 21, and Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 266—the supposed failure to pay the visit to Jerusalem is explained by the interpolation of the above statement; cf. Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 48, who quotes Ephrem, in loco. The omission of the notice about Apollos is explained by Weiss, Codex D, p. 93, on the ground that it had no meaning for the reviser, but it may have been accidental because of the other changes. in favour of the South Galatian view, and most recently Askwith, Epistle to the Galatians (1899); whilst to the other side may be added Volkmar, Schürer, Holsten, who has examined the whole subject closely in his Das Evangelium des Paulus, p. 35 ff. (chiefly in reply to Hausrath's strong support of the opposing view), Zöckler, Jülicher, Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaft. Theol., p. 186 ff. and p. 353, 1896, Schmiedel, and amongst English writers, Findlay, Epistles of St. Paul, p. 288 ff., and very fully Dr. Chase, Expositor, 1893, 1894.

We can only make a passing allusion to the date or possible date of the Galatian Epistle. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 189 ff., places it at the close of the Apostle's second missionary journey during his stay at Antioch, xviii. 22 (A.D. 55), whilst McGiffert also places it at Antioch, but before the Apostle started on this same journey, not at its close, Apostolic Age, p. 226. Rendall, Expositor, April, 1894, has assigned it an earlier date, 51, 52, and places it amongst the earliest of St. Paul's Epistles, and more recently Zahn has dated it almost equally early in the beginning of 53, and upon somewhat similar grounds, Einleitung, i., p. 139 (the three oldest Epistles of St. Paul according to him being the group of Galatians, 1 Thessalonians, 2 Thessalonians, all written in the same year). But on the other hand, Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 43 ff., and Salmon, Introd., p. 376, not only place the Epistle later than any of the dates suggested above, but assign it a place between 2 Corinthians and Romans, arguing from the similarity of subject and style between the three Epistles. Most of the continental critics would place it in the same group, but as the earliest of the four great Epistles written in the earlier period of the Apostle's long residence at Ephesus, Acts xix. 1.

Lightfoot places it apparently on the journey between Macedonia and Achaia, Acts xx. 2, 2 Corinthians having been previously written during the Apostle's residence in Macedonia (so Zahn), Romans being dated a little later whilst St. Paul stayed in Corinth, Acts xx. 2, 3 (Galatians, pp. 39, 55). Dr. Clemen has since defended at great length his view, first put forward in Chronol. der Paul. Briefe, p. 199 ff., that Romans preceded Galatians, in Studien und Kritiken, 1897, 2, pp. 219-270; but see as against Clemen, Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 142; Zöckler, Die Briefe an die Thess. und Galater, p. 71; Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. xxxviii. Mr. Askwith has recently discussed the points at issue between Ramsay and Lightfoot as to the date of Galatians, and in accepting the latter's position as his own, he has shown that this is not incompatible with a firm recognition of the South Galatian theory, Epistle to the Galatians, p. 98 ff. Harnack, Chronol., p. 239, declines to commit himself to any definite date for Galatians, and perhaps this conclusion is not surprising in relation to an Epistle of which it may be truly said that it has been placed by different critics in the beginning, in the close, and in every intermediate stage of St. Paul's epistolary activity, cf. Dr. Marcus Dods, "Galatians," Hastings' B.D.

CHAPTER XIX.—Ver. 1. See critical note for Bezan reading.—Ἀπολλὼ, cf. xxi. 1; see Blass, Gram., p. 31, and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 95.—τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη: The main road to Ephesus which passed through Colosse and Laodicea was not apparently taken by Paul, but a shorter though less frequented route running through the Cayster valley. This route leads over higher ground than the other, and St. Paul in taking it would be passing through the higher-lying districts of Asia on his way from Pisidian Antioch to Ephesus. According to Col. ii. 1 the Apostle never visited Colosse and Laodicea, which seems to confirm the view taken above (but see Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 94, on Mr. Lewin's view of Col. ii. 1). The expression τὰ ἀνωτ. μέρη is really a description in brief of the same district, "the region of Galatia and Phrygia," mentioned in xviii. 23. If the journey passed through North Galatia, Ramsay contends with great force that the expressions in xviii. 23 καθεξῆς and πάντας τοὺς μαθητάς would be meaningless, as καθ. would apply not to Churches already known to us, but to Churches never mentioned in the book, and if St. Paul did not visit the South Galatian Churches, how could St. Luke mention "all the disciples"? Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte (second edition), in loco, as a supporter of the North Galatian theory, takes the term as the equivalent of the places referred to in xviii. 23, but he does not include in these places as far north as Tavium or Ancyra, and a route through Cappadocia is not thought of; so here Pessinus, Amorion, Synnada, Apameia, Philadelphia, and Sardis would be visited by the Apostle, and from Sardis he would go down to Ephesus; the expression τὰ ἀνωτ. μέρη would thus in Zöckler's view include churches founded on the second missionary journey, but the most northerly are excluded as lying too far away, p. 273; see Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 93; "Ephesus," Hastings' B.D., and Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, ii., 715; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 275. Blass takes the words to mean districts more remote from the sea; Rendall (so Hackett) explains them as referring to the land route through the interior of Asia Minor by way of distinction to the sea route which Paul had before pursued on his way from Ephesus to Jerusalem. Grimm explains as the parts of Asia Minor more remote from the Mediterranean, farther east, and refers only to Hippocrates and Galen for the use of the adjective, which was evidently a very rare one (see Hobart, p. 148); see also Zöckler on xix. 1 and illustrations of Latin expressions similarly used. R.V. renders "the upper country," lit., the upper parts, i.e., inland; A.V., "coasts," i.e., borders, as in Matt. ii. 16, etc., Humphry, Commentary on R. V.—εἰς Ἔφεσον: Ephesus and Athens have aptly been described as two typical cities of heathendom, the latter most Hellenic, the heart and citadel of Greece, the former the home of every Oriental quackery and superstition in combination with its Hellenism; the latter inquisitive, philosophical, courteous, refined, the former fanatical, superstitious, impulsive. And yet Acts portrays to the life the religious and moral atmosphere of the two cities, no less than their local colouring (Lightfoot, "Acts of the Apostles," B.D.[2], p. 36). Under the empire it was a regulation that the Roman governor should land at Ephesus, and from all quarters of the province the system of Roman roads made Ephesus easily accessible. St. Paul with his wonted judgment fixed upon it as a fitting centre for the message and for the spread of the Gospel. Like Corinth, with which close intercourse was maintained, Ephesus is described as one of the great knots in the line of communication between Rome and the East; see further notes in commentary, Ramsay, "Ephesus," Hastings' B.D.; "Ephesus," B.D.[2]; E. Curtius, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, i., 233 ff.

Ver. 2. μαθ. . . . πιστεύσαντες: Blass points out that both these words are used only of Christians. From St. Chrysostom's days the men have often been regarded merely as disciples of the Baptist (so McGiffert, p. 286), and Apollos has been named as the person to whom they owed their conversion, whilst amongst recent writers Mr. Wright, u. s., argues that they had been baptised by the Baptist himself. But if we realise the force of the remark made by Blass on the two words, they were men simply in the same position as Apollos, i.e., "ignorabant illi ea quæ post resurrectionem facta erant" (Blass)—their knowledge was imperfect like that of Apollos. There may have been many who would be called μαθηταί in the same immature stage of knowledge. Much difficulty has arisen in insisting upon a personal connection of these men with Apollos, but St. Luke's words quite admit of the supposition that the twelve men may not have come to Ephesus until after Apollos had left for Corinth, a consideration which might answer the question of Ramsay, p. 270 as to how the Twelve had escaped the notice of Apollos (see Felten, p. 351, note).—εἰ, cf. i. 6.—πιστεύσ.: "when ye became believers," or "when ye believed," R.V., in contrast with A.V.—the question was whether they had received the Holy Ghost at their Baptism, and there is no allusion to any subsequent time. The two aorists, as in R.V., point to one definite occasion.—εἰ Π. Ἅ. ἐστιν: "whether the Holy Ghost was given," R.V. (cf. John vii. 39): (the spirit was not yet given), A.V., but in margin, R.V. follows A.V. in the passage before us: ἐστιν, accipitur, Bengel. There could not be any question as to the existence of the Holy Ghost, for the Baptist had pointed to the future Baptism of the Spirit to be conferred by the Messiah, and the O.T. would have taught the existence of a Holy Spirit—the meaning is that they had not heard whether their promised Baptism of the Spirit by the Messiah had been already fulfilled or not. So δοθέν, ἐκχυνόμενον may be understood. Alford holds that the stress should be laid on ἠκούσαμεν—when we received Baptism we did not even hear of a Holy Ghost.

Ver. 3. οὖν: presupposes that if they had been baptised into the name of Jesus, they would have received the Spirit at Baptism.—εἰς: "to baptise into" (R.V.) may have been suggested by the original practice to baptise by dipping or plunging, see Humphry, Comment. on R. V., in loco.—εἰς τὸ Ἰ. βάπτισμα, i.e., into or unto repentance. For the strange notion that they were baptised into John as the Messiah see Hackett's note.

Ver. 4. εἰς τὸν ἐρχ.: placed first before ἵνα, perhaps for emphasis. The phrase had been a favourite one with the Baptist (cf. Matt. iii. 1). John's own words showed that his Baptism was insufficient. ἵνα may express both the purport and the purpose (so Alford).

Ver. 5. ἀκούσαντες δὲ: neither grammatical nor in accordance with fact can these words be regarded (as by Beza and others) as part of St. Paul's words, as if they meant, "and the people when they heard him," i.e., John.

Ver. 6. καὶ ἐπιθ. αὐτοῖς τοῦ Π. τὰς χ., see above on viii. 16.—ἐλάλουν τε γλ. καὶ προεφ.: the imperfects may mean that they began to speak, or that the exercise of the gifts mentioned continued. The two gifts are discussed in 1 Cor. xii. 10, xiv., in an Epistle which was written probably during this stay at Ephesus—no doubt the gifts are specially mentioned because the bestowal of such gifts distinguished Christian Baptism from that of John. McGiffert, p. 286, while admitting the accuracy of the account as a whole, thinks that its representation is moulded, as in viii., in accordance with the work of Peter and John in Samaria; so too Hilgenfeld refers the account to his "author to Theophilus," who also, in viii. 16, narrates that the baptised Samaritans received the Holy Ghost by the laying on of Peter's hands. This is in some respects not unlike the older view of Baur, who held that the narrative was introduced to parallel Paul's dignity and work with that of Peter in x. 44—the first speaking with tongues in

ii. is narrated in relation to Jews, the second in relation to Gentiles, x., and the third in relation to a kind of middle class, half-believers like the Samaritans! (so Zeller and Schneckenburger). But not only does this require us to identify ii. with x. and xix., the speaking of tongues at Pentecost with subsequent bestowal of the gift, but it seems strange that a narrative should not have been constructed more free from liability to misconception and misinterpretation if the leading purpose of its introduction had been as supposed above.

Ver. 7. ὡσεί, as Weiss admits, excludes any special significance attaching to the number twelve on account of which the narrative would be constructed. See also Knabenbauer, in loco. We know so little about these men that it seems hazardous to attempt to define them more clearly (see Plumptre, in loco).

Ver. 8. The Apostle follows his usual method—to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. διαλεγ., see above; cf. xvii. 2, "reasoning," R.V. ("discoursing," Rendall).

Ver. 9. ἐσκληρύνοντο: only here and in Rom. ix. 18, but four times in Hebrews, three times as a quotation from Ps. xcv. 8, and once in direct reference to that passage, iii. 13, cf. Exodus vii. 3, Deut. ii. 30, etc. In Ecclus. xxx. 12 it is found as here with ἀπειθέω, cf. also Clem. Rom., li., 3, 5.—ἠπείθ.: "were disobedient," R.V., unbelief is manifested in disobedience, Westcott, Hebrews, pp. 87, 97, cf. Ign., Magn., viii., 2; Polyc., Phil., ii., 1.—τὴν ὁδὸν: "the Way," see on ix. 2.—κακολ., Mark ix. 39, used by our Lord of speaking evil of Him, Matt. xv. 4, and Mark vii. 10, as a quotation from Exod. xxi. 17; in LXX five times, and once in same sense in 2 Macc. iv. 1.—ἀποστὰς: as in xviii. 7, at Corinth; verb only in Luke and Paul, except Heb. iii. 12, see Friedrich, p. 7, and above on xv. 38, seven times in N.T. with ἀπό and a genitive as here.—ἀφώρισε: except Matt. xiii. 49, xxv. 32 (2), only in Luke and Paul, cf. Luke vi. 22, Acts xiii. 2, Rom. i. 1, 2 Cor. vi. 17, quotation, Gal. i. 15, ii. 12; cf. Grimm-Thayer for different shades of meaning, both in a good and bad sense, in classical Greek and also in LXX frequently. It is evidently presupposed that as in xviii. 26 there were still disciples who held fast to the common worship of a Jewish community in the synagogue.—καθ' ἡμέραν: on the days when synagogue worship was held, and so the separation was complete.—ἐν σχολῇ Τυράννου τινός, see critical note. We cannot tell whether reference is made to the lecture-hall of some heathen sophist hired by Paul or to the Beth Hammidrash kept by a Jew. Others have thought that Tyrannus, like Titius Justus, xviii. 7, may have been "a proselyte of the gate," but if so, one might expect it to be signified as in the case of Justus. The name was common enough, Jos., Ant., xvi., 10, 3; B. J., i., 26, 3; 2 Macc. iv. 40, and see Plumptre's note, in loco. Overbeck's view is quite possible, that the expression referred to the standing name of the place, so called from its original owner, cf. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 93. Probably, if we take the first-mentioned view, in teaching in such a school or lecture-hall the Apostle himself would appear to the people at large as one of the rhetors or travelling sophists of the time, Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 246, 271 (so McGiffert, p. 285, who regards the notice as taken from a trustworthy source). For instances of the use of σχολή as a school of the philosophers for teaching and lecturing see Wetstein, Τυράννου[1] τινός. 10. τοῦτο δὲ ἐγένετο ἐπὶ ἔτη δύο, ὥστε πάντας τοὺς κατοικοῦντας τὴν Ἀσίαν ἀκοῦσαι τὸν λόγον τοῦ Κυρίου[2] Ἰησοῦ, Ἰουδαίους τε καὶ Ἕλληνας. 11. The addition is accepted by Blass, Belser, Nestle, Zöckler as original, whilst even Wendt sees in it a passage in which D has retained some elements of the original text otherwise lost, p. 313 (1899), and Weiss, Codex D, p. 110, thinks that it may have been added according to an old oral tradition, cf. xii. 10. Ramsay, C. R. E., p. 152, and St. Paul, p. 271, maintains that the tradition is probably true, and he gives proofs from Martial, ix., 68, xii., 57, and Juv., vii., 222-6, that the schools opened at daybreak; so that by eleven o'clock the scholars would be dismissed, and Paul could use the school.

in loco, cf. Latin, auditorium, Zöckler compares St. Augustine's lecture-hall in Rome before his conversion.

Ver. 10. ἐπὶ ἔτη δύο: exclusive of the quarter of a year in ver. 8 and in xx. 31 the Apostle speaks of three years' residence in Ephesus, "in the usual ancient style of reckoning an intermediate period by the superior round number," Turner, "Chron. of N. T.," Hastings' B. D., see also Page and Wendt, in loco.—πάντας: not only the position of Ephesus, but the fact that it was just the place which would be frequented for its famous temple and festivals by crowds of strangers, both Jew and Greek, from all parts of proconsular Asia, "Ephesus," Hastings' B. D., i., 720. Nor must we suppose that St. Paul and his fellow-workers confined themselves literally to Ephesus. The seven Churches of Asia may reasonably be referred for their foundation to this period—all of which were centres of trade, and all within reach of Ephesus. Timothy, moreover, may well have been working at Colosse, since in the Epistle to the Colossians he is mentioned with Paul in the inscription of the letter, although the latter had not been personally known to the Churches of Colosse and Laodicea, Ramsay, "Colossæ," Hastings' B.D., and St. Paul, p. 274.—Ἕλληνας: comprising no doubt Hellenists and Greeks, cf. xi. 20.

Ver. 11. οὐ τὰς τυχ., cf. xxviii. 2, the phrase is peculiar to St. Luke, "not the ordinary," i.e., extra-ordinary, with which the deeds of the Jewish exorcists could not be compared, see Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 52, for the same phrase cf. 3 Macc. iii. 7, and also Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 83; so too in classical Greek.—ἐποίει: "continued to work," or ex more, Blass.

Ver. 12. ὥστε καὶ: so that even to the sick, i.e., to those who could not be reached by the hands of the Apostle.—χρωτὸς: the σουδ. and σιμικ. had been in contact with the body of the Apostle, and thence derived their healing power; so in LXX used for both בָּשָׂר, and עוֹר (twice), see Hatch and Redpath; Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 435, sees in its use here the use of a medical term, so Hobart, p. 242.—σουδάρια: Latin, sudaria, used for wiping off sweat, as the noun indicates, cf. Luke xix. 20, John xix. 44, xx. 7.—σιμικίνθια: Latin, semicinctium, only here in N.T., aprons worn by artisans at their work, cf. Martial, xiv., 153. Oecumenius and Theophylact apparently regarded the word as simply = handkerchiefs, but the meaning given is far more likely both from the etymology of the word and its use in Martial. For other Latinisms see Blass, in loco, and Wetstein.—ἀπαλ. ἀπ᾽ αὐτῶν, cf. Luke xii. 58, Heb. ii. 15, here in connection with sickness, and this use is very frequent in medical writers, Hobart, p. 47; the word is found with ἀπὸ both in classical writers and in the LXX.

τὰ πονηρὰ [1] ἐξέρχεσθαι ἀπ' αὐτῶν. 13. Ἐπεχείρησαν δέ τινες [2] ἀπὸ τῶν περιερχομένων Ἰουδαίων ἐξορκιστῶν ὀνομάζειν ἐπὶ τοὺς ἔχοντας τὰ πνεύματα τὰ πονηρὰ τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ, λέγοντες,

[1] Instead of εξερ. απ' αυτων, (HLP (Sah.), Chrys.), ℵABDE, Tisch., Weiss, Wendt, R.V., W.H., Blass in α and β have one word εκπορευεσθαι.

[2] After τινες ℵABE add και and omit απο, so Tisch., Weiss, Wendt, W.H., R.V., Blass in β. HP have και απο, D 43 εκ, so Hilg. ορκιζω ℵABDE, Vulg., Boh., Arm., Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, R.V., Blass, Hilg.

It should also be noted that here as elsewhere St. Luke distinguishes between natural diseases and the diseases of the demonised, and that he does so more frequently than the other Evangelists, Hobart, pp. 12, 13, so "Demon," Hastings' B.D., i., p. 593, cf. especially Luke vi. 17, viii. 2, xiii. 32, which have no parallels in the other Gospels.—πονηρὰ: is applied to evil spirits by St. Luke three times in his Gospel and four times in this passage, and only once elsewhere, St. Matt. xii. 45, although the word is very frequent in St. Matthew's Gospel and in the Epistles; the word was constantly used by medical writers in connection with disease, Hobart, u. s. Blass quotes as a parallel to the present passage εἰ αἱ νόσοι ἀπαλλαγείησαν ἐκ τῶν σωμάτων (Plat.) Eryx, 401 C.—τά τε πνεύματα . . . Were the aprons brought for the healing of the diseases and the banishing of the demons equally? The τε seems to indicate that this was the case (Weiss, Wendt); Blass on the other hand holds that it is not said that the demons were driven out by the sudaria. According to some interpretations of the verse the carrying of the aprons to the sick is only to be regarded as a result of the wonderful impression made by St. Paul's miraculous power; the writer says nothing of the effect of these aprons, although he places both the healing of the diseases and the expulsion of the demons amongst the δυνάμεις of St. Paul. From this point of view the carrying of the σουδάρια would only illustrate the superstitious practices which showed how often, in the homes of culture, quackery was also found, and the Evangelist gives them no word of commendation, see also note on v. 15. On the other hand we must remember that the miracles are distinctly spoken of as οὐ τὰς τυχ., and even in the means employed we may perhaps see a possible appeal to the populace, who would recognise that these charms and amulets in which they put such confidence had not the same potency as the handkerchiefs and aprons of the Apostle. But in this accommodation to special forms of ignorance we are never allowed to forget that God is the source of all power and might.

Ver. 13. If we read καὶ after ἀπὸ (see critical note), it contrasts the Jewish exorcists who endeavoured to gain this power with those like St. Paul who really possessed it.—περιερχ.: "vagabond," A.V., the word as it is now used colloquially does not express the Greek; R.V. "strolling," Vulgate, circumeuntibus; Blass renders circumvagantes. The word "vagabond" is used only here in N.T.: in the O.T. we have it in Gen. iv. 12, 14, R.V. "wanderer," and in Ps. cix. 10, R.V. "vagabonds," cf. Milton, Paradise Lost, xi., 16.—ἐξορκιστῶν: the word points to a class of Jews who practised exorcisms as a profession, cf. Jos., Ant., viii., 2, 5. The usual method of exorcism was the recitation of some special name or spell, and these Jewish exorcists having seen the power which Paul wielded by his appeal to the name of Jesus endeavoured to avail themselves of the same efficacy. It would be difficult to say how far these Jewish exorcists would employ the incantations so widely in vogue in a place like Ephesus, but there is a notable passage in Justin Martyr in which, whilst admitting that a Jew might exorcise an evil spirit by the God of Abraham, he complains that as a class the Jewish exorcists had adopted the same superstitions and magical aids as the heathen, "Exorcist," B.D.[2], i., 1028. In the Didaché, iii., 4, the use of charms and sorceries is expressly forbidden since they led to idolatry.—ὁρκίζομεν: with double accusative = of the one adjured and of the one by whom he is adjured, cf. Mark v. 7 (1 Thess. v. 27), see Grimm-Thayer, sub v., cf. Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 25 ff., for the constant use of the verb in inscriptions in formulæ of adjuration as here, see further "Demon" and "Exorcist" for examples of such formulæ, Hastings' B.D., i., pp. 593, 812, and for the absurdities involved in them.

Ὁρκίζομεν ὑμᾶς τὸν Ἰησοῦν ὃν ὁ Παῦλος κηρύσσει. 14. ἦσαν δέ τινες[1] υἱοὶ Σκευᾶ Ἰουδαίου ἀρχιερέως ἑπτὰ οἱ τοῦτο ποιοῦντες.

[1] τινες ℵAHLP, Vulg., Syr. H., Chrys., so Alford, but Lach., W.H., Weiss, Blass, Hilg., R.V. after B (D), E 36, 180, Syr. Pesh., Boh., Arm. read τινος (τινες in connection with the following επτα υιοι is very difficult), υιοι om. after τινες, but placed by ℵABE 13, 15, 18, 40, Vulg., Arm., after επτα; Meyer follows T.R. In D, Syr. H. mg. εν οις και υιοι (Syr. H. mg. has υιοι επτα) Σκευα τινος ιερεως ηθελησαν το αυτο ποιησαι, (οι) εθος ειχαν τους τοιουτους εξορκιζειν. Και εισελθοντες προς τον δαιμονιζομενον ηρξαντο επικαλεισθαι το ονομα λεγοντες· παραγγελλομεν σοι εν Ιησου ον Π. κηρυσσει εξελθειν, so Hilg. and so Blass in β, but with αρχοντος, Gig.[2], instead of ιερεως. Blass considers that this was orig. both in α and β, then ιερεως was written over αρχοντος, hence ιερεως D, Syr. H. mg., Gig., and in most αρχιερεως; but why should ιερεως be inserted at all? No doubt the omission of επτα removes much difficulty. Belser thinks that the omis. is orig., and argues strongly in favour of β text, pp. 103, 104, so also Zöckler, and Ramsay, C. R. E., p. 153, speaks of D as giving a reading here which is intelligent, consistent, and possible. Overbeck conjectured δυο (Gig. has δυο) instead of επτα with reference to ver. 16, on the ground that the numerical signs B and Z might be confused, but as Wendt (1888) points out, it is difficult to explain how a mistake so troublesome for the understanding of the passage could be perpetuated. The greatest difficulty is to explain how επτα came in if not original, and it is easy to understand that it might be omitted because of αμφοτερων, ver. 16, see Weiss, Codex D, p. 95.

Ver. 14. See critical note. Σκευᾶ: probably a Latin name adapted to Greek, see Blass, in loco, who gives instances of its occurrence, see also Gram., p. 13, and Winer-Schmeidel, p. 75. Ewald refers it to the Hebrew שְׁכַבְיָה.—ἀρχ.: the description is difficult, as it seems incredible if we take it in its strictest sense; it may have denoted one who had been at the head of one of the twenty-four courses of priests in Jerusalem, or perhaps used loosely to denote one who belonged to the high-priestly families (cf. iv. 6). We cannot connect him with any special sacred office of the Jews in Asia Minor, as Nösgen proposes, for the Jews in the Diaspora had no temple, but synagogues; see reading in D, critical note. Nothing further is known of Sceva, but there is no reason to suppose that he was an impostor in the sense that he pretended to be a high priest.—ἦσαν . . . ποιοῦντες, Lucan, see above on i. 10.

Ver. 15. γινώσκω . . . ἐπίσταμαι: "I know," R.V. for both verbs, but for the former "I recognise," margin, as a distinction is drawn between Paul and Jesus in the formula of adjuration, it is natural to expect a distinction in the reply; γιν. probably denotes a more personal knowledge, ἐπίστ., I know as of a fact. "Jesus I know and about Paul I know," Rendall; Lightfoot would render "Jesus I acknowledge and Paul I know": On a Fresh Revision of N. T., p. 60. Wordsworth also, in loco, holds that ἐπίστ. denotes knowledge of a lower degree such as acquaintance with a fact, and compares the distinction between the two verbs in Jude ver. 10. ἐπίστ. is only once used in the Gospels, Mark xiv. 68. But see also Page, in loco, as to the difficulty in making any precise distinction.—ὑμεῖς placed first here in a depreciatory sense, τίνες indicating contempt.

Ver. 16. ἐφαλλόμενος; only here in N.T.; in LXX, 1 Sam. x. 6, xi. 6, xvi. 13.—κατακυρ.; only here in Luke; Matt. xx. 25, Mark x. 42, 1 Pet. v. 3; frequent in LXX.—αὐτῶν, see critical note. There is no real difficulty if we read ἀμφοτέρων after ἑπτά, ver. 14; St. Luke had mentioned that seven of the sons of Sceva made the attempt to imitate Paul, but the incident which he describes introduces two of them only. ἀμφ. cannot be taken distributively, or with Ewald, neuter, as if = ἀμφοτέρωθεν.—γυμνοὺς: may mean with torn garments, not literally naked, so Grimm-Thayer, sub v., and Alford.—ἐκείνου: the pronoun seems to imply that the writer had a definite place before his eyes, although it is not fully described. But it is surely a mark of truthfulness that the narrative ends where it does; a forger, we may well believe, would have crowned the story by a picture of the man, after baffling the impostors, healed by the word

15. ἀποκριθὲν δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ πονηρὸν εἶπε, Τὸν[1] Ἰησοῦν γινώσκω, καὶ τὸν Παῦλον ἐπίσταμαι· ὑμεῖς δὲ τίνες ἐστέ; 16. καὶ[2] ἐφαλλόμενος ἐπ' αὐτοὺς ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐν ᾧ ἦν τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ πονηρόν, καὶ κατακυριεύσας[3] αὐτῶν, ἴσχυσε κατ' αὐτῶν, ὥστε γυμνοὺς καὶ τετραυματισμένους ἐκφυγεῖν ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου ἐκείνου. 17. τοῦτο δὲ ἐγένετο γνωστὸν πᾶσιν Ἰουδαίοις τε καὶ Ἕλλησι τοῖς κατοικοῦσι τὴν Ἔφεσον, καὶ[4] ἐπέπεσε φόβος ἐπὶ πάντας αὐτούς, καὶ ἐμεγαλύνετο τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ. 18. or touch of Paul (see Plumptre's remarks, in loco). The marked contrast between the New Testament in its description of the demonised and their healing, and the notions and practices which meet us in the Jewish Rabbi, may be seen in Edersheim's valuable appendix, Jesus the Messiah, ii., 770 ff., and the same decisive contrast is also seen between the N.T. and the prevailing ideas of the first century in the cures of the demonised attributed to Apollonius of Tyana in this same city Ephesus and in Athens; Smith and Wace, Dictionary of the Christian Biography, i., 136. Ramsay is very severe on the whole narrative, St. Paul, p. 273, and regards it as a mere piece of current gossip; so, too, very similarly, Wendt (1899), note, p. 313, who refers, as so many have done, to the analogy between the narrative in ver. 11 and that in v. 12, 15; in other words, to the parallel between Peter and Paul (which the writer of Acts is supposed to draw on every possible occasion; see introd.). So too Hilgenfeld ascribes the whole section vv. 11-20 to his "author to Theophilus," and sees in it a story to magnify St. Paul's triumph over sorcery and magic, as St. Peter's over Simon Magus in viii. 13. Clemen with Spitta, Van Manen, and others regard the whole section as interrupting the connection between vv. 10 and 21—but even here, in ver. 14, Clemen sees in addition the hand of his Redactor Antijudaicus, as distinct from the Redactor to whom the whole narrative is otherwise attributed.

Ver. 17. φόβος ἐπέπ.: characteristic phrase in St. Luke; see above on Luke i. 12, and Friedrich, pp. 77, 78.—καὶ ἐμεγαλύνετο: "continued to be magnified," imperfect, as in Luke vii. 16, praise follows upon fear, Luke xxiii. 47; cf. with Matt. xxvii. 54, Friedrich, p. 78.—τὸ ὄνομα Ἰ.: "jam cuncta illa nomina inania irritaque pro Iesu nomine putabantur" (Blass), see on ver. 19.

Ver. 18. πολλοί τε: the τε shows another immediate result in the fact that those who were already believers were now fully convinced of the pre-eminence of the name of Jesus, and were all the more filled with a reverential fear of His holy name: "many also of those who had believed," R.V. So Wendt in latest edition. —ἤρχοντο ultro, Bengel.—ἐξομολ.: Rendall renders "giving thanks" to God for this manifestation of His power. But it is usually taken, not absolutely, but as governing πράξεις, cf. Matt. iii. 6, Mark i. 5, James v. 16; Jos., Ant., viii., 4, 6; B. J., v., 10, 5, so in Plutarch several times, "confessing," cf. also Clem. Rom., Cor., li., 3; Barn., Epist., xix., 12; Kennedy, Sources of N. T. Greek, p. 118, and Mayor on James v. 16; Felten, Apostelgeschichte, p. 361.—πράξεις, cf. Luke xxiii. 51; also in a bad sense. So too in Rom. viii. 13, Col. iii. 9, so often in Polyb. (3 Macc. i. 27). Deissmann Bibelstudien, p. 5, maintains that the passage before us shows acquaintance with the technical terminology of magic, and instances πράξεις as a terminus technicus for a magic prescription; see also Knabenbauer's note in loco.—ἀναγγέλλοντες: instead of continuing secretly practising or approving of the deeds of magic, they declared their wrongdoings. Rendall takes it as meaning that they reported the deeds of those men, i.e., καὶ ἀναγγέλλοντες τὰς πράξεις αὐτῶν. 19. ἱκανοὶ δὲ τῶν τὰ περίεργα πραξάντων, συνενέγκαντες τὰς βίβλους κατέκαιον ἐνώπιον πάντων· καὶ συνεψήφισαν τὰς τιμὰς αὐτῶν, καὶ εὗρον ἀργυρίου μυριάδας πέντε. 20. οὕτω κατὰ κράτος [1] ὁ λόγος τοῦ Κυρίου ηὔξανε καὶ ἴσχυεν.

21. ῾ΩΣ δὲ ἐπληρώθη ταῦτα, ἔθετο ὁ Παῦλος ἐν τῷ πνεύματι, διελθὼν τὴν Μακεδονίαν καὶ Ἀχαΐαν πορεύεσθαι εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ, εἰπών, Ὅτι μετὰ τὸ γενέσθαι με ἐκεῖ, δεῖ με καὶ Ῥώμην ἰδεῖν.

[1] D has after κρατος, ενισχυσεν και η πιστις του Θεου ηυξανε και επληθυνετο. Syr. Pesh. has ενισχυεν et crescebat fides Dei (only). Blass reads ενισχυεν η πιστις του Θεου και (ηυξανεν και) επληθυνετο. Weiss, Codex D, p. 96, objects that Blass omits the και necessary before η πιστ. του Θ., and adds an impossible και after Θεου. Belser defends and points out that ενισχυεν is Lucan, only found in Luke's writings; but on the other hand, whilst no doubt η πιστις is used objectively in Acts, we never have η πιστις του Θεου in Luke's writings.

the magicians; but can the Greek bear this?

Ver. 19. ἱκανοὶ δὲ: to be referred probably to the magicians, as the previous verse refers to their dupes: a Lucan word, see above on viii. 11.—τὰ περίεργα: "curious," Wyclif and A. and R.V. ("magical," R.V., margin), cf. Vulgate, curiosa (Latin, curiosus, inquisitive, prying), of a person who concerns himself with things unnecessary and profitless to the neglect of the duty which lies nearest, cf. 1 Tim. v. 13, 2 Thess. iii. 11, so in classical Greek, Xen., Mem., i., 3, 1. The word is also used of things over and above what is necessary, and so of magical arts, arts in which a man concerns himself with what has not been given him to know, cf. Aristaenetus, Epist., ii., 18, and the striking passage in Plat., Apol., 19 B, where περιεργάζεσθαι is used of Socrates in an accusatory sense (Wendt, Page); the verb is found in Ecclesiast. iii. 23, and περιεργασία, Ecclesiast. xli. 22 S[2], but the adjective does not occur either in LXX or Apocrypha. But see especially Deissmann, Bibelstudien, u. s., who finds here another instance of acquaintance with the terminology of magic, and illustrates from the papyri. The R.V. margin gives best sense, as "curious" in the passive sense as here need not have a bad or depreciatory meaning, cf. for a good parallel for "curious" = "magical," Bacon, Essays, 35; and see "Curious," Hastings' B.D.; Skeat, Glossary of Bible Words.—συνενέγκαντες: only here in N.T. in this sense, elsewhere frequently, as συμφέρει it is expedient, profitable.—τὰς βίβλους: parchments containing the magical formulæ. For these Ephesus, with its Ἐφέσια γράμματα worn as amulets and cherished as charms, was famous; "Ephesus" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D., i., p. 723; Wetstein, in loco; amongst other references, Plut., Sympos., vii., 5; Clement of Alex., Strom., v., 8, 46, and also in Renan, Saint Paul, p. 344; Blass, in loco; C. and H., small edition, p. 371; and see also Deissmann, Bibelstudien, u. s.—κατέκαιον: imperfect, "describes them as throwing book after book into the burning fire," Hackett, see also Blass, in loco. Plumptre recalls a parallel scene when the artists and musicians of Florence brought their ornaments, pictures, dresses, and burnt them in the Piazza of St. Mark at the bidding of Savonarola.—συνεψήφισαν: only here in this sense, not in LXX (cf. i. 26).—ἀργ. μυρ. πέντε, sc., δραχμῶν ἀργ.: the sum is very large, nearly £2000, but probably such books would be expensive, and we must take into account in estimating it the immense trade and rich commerce of Ephesus, and the fact that we need not suppose that all the Christian converts were to be found only amongst the slaves and poorer classes (Nösgen). Such books would certainly fetch a fancy price. It may no doubt be maintained that their measuring all things by money value indicates the Oriental popular tale (Ramsay), but may we not see in the statement the knowledge of a writer who thus hits off the Oriental standard of worth, especially in a chapter otherwise so rich and exact in its description of Ephesian localities and life?

Ver. 20. κατὰ κράτος: adverbial, so only here in N.T., cf. Judg. iv. 3, and Jos., Ant., viii., 11, 3, in classical Greek, Xen., Cyr., i., 4, 23, etc.—ηὔξ. καὶ ἴσ.: in contrast to the empty superstitions and vanities the continuous growth (imperfect) of the Church.

Ver. 21. διελθὼν, see on the force of

22. ἀποστείλας δὲ εἰς τὴν Μακεδονίαν δύο τῶν διακονούντων αὐτῷ, Τιμόθεον καὶ Ἔραστον, αὐτὸς ἐπέσχε χρόνον εἰς τὴν Ἀσίαν. 23. Ἐγένετο δὲ κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν ἐκεῖνον τάραχος οὐκ ὀλίγος περὶ τῆς ὁδοῦ. 24. the word Ramsay, Expositor, May, 1895, and above on xiii. 6. Ramsay regards this as perhaps the most conclusive of the ten cases he cites of the use of the verb as denoting missionary travel. There is no reason to suppose that Paul paid a visit to Corinth during his stay at Ephesus; vv. 9, 10 intimate that he resided at Ephesus through the whole period. Wendt thinks that the notice of this second visit to Corinth was omitted by Luke because it did not fit in with his representation of the ideal development of the Church. But is there any real argument to be found for it in the Epistles? The passages usually quoted are 2 Cor. ii. 1, xii. 14, xiii. 1. But τρίτον τοῦτο ἔρχομαι may well express "I am meaning to come," so that Paul would mean that this was the third time he had purposed to come to them, not that he had come for the third time; and this rendering is borne out by the Apostle's own words, 2 Cor. xii. 14, Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, iv., 11, whilst with regard to 2 Cor. ii. 1 the words may simply mean that he resolves that his new, i.e., his second visit, πάλιν ἐλθεῖν, should not be ἐν λύπῃ, for we are not shut up to the conclusion that πάλιν must be connected with ἐν λύπῃ as if he had already paid one visit in grief; and this interpretation is at all events in harmony with 2 Cor. xiii. 2, R.V. margin, and with i. 23, R.V., see especially "II. Cor." (Dr. A. Robertson) Hastings' B.D., p. 494, and compare "Corinth" (Ramsay), ibid., p. 483; see also Farrar, Messages of the Books, pp. 211, 216; St. Paul, ii. 101, 118; Felten, note, p. 364; Renan, Saint Paul, p. 450, note; and in favour of the second visit to Corinth, McGiffert, p. 310, following Alford, Neander, Weizsäcker (so too in early days St. Chrysostom). In 1 Cor. xvi. 5-9 Paul speaks of his intention to go through Macedonia to Corinth, but previously, 2 Cor. i. 16, he had intended to sail from Ephesus to Corinth, then to go to Macedonia, and afterwards to return to Corinth. Why had he changed his plans? Owing to the bad news from Corinth, 2 Cor. i. 23. But although he did not go to Corinth in person, he determined to write to reprove the Corinthians, and this he did in 1 Cor. It is possible that the Apostle's determination to see Rome—the first notice of the desire so long cherished, Rom. i. 13, xv. 23—may be closely connected with his friendship with Aquila and Priscilla (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 255, and Plumptre, in loco, Hort, Rom. and Ephes., p. 11).

Ver. 22. ἀποστείλας . . . Τιμ. καὶ Ἔρ., cf. 1 Cor. iv. 17, xvi. 10, 11, Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, iii., 3, 4; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 297, note.—διακ. αὐτῷ: for a few instances of διακονεῖν and cognate words used of ministrations rendered to Paul himself, see Hort, Ecclesia, p. 205, cf. Philem., ver. 13.—Ἔραστον: here, as in 2 Tim. iv. 20, the person bearing this name appears as an itinerant companion of St. Paul, and it therefore seems difficult to identify him with the Erastus of Rom. xvi. 23, who is described as "treasurer" of the city, i.e., Corinth, since the tenure of such an office seems to presuppose a fixed residence. That the identification was not impossible is maintained by Wendt as against Meyer, but see "Erastus," Hastings' B.D. The name, as Meyer remarks, Rom. xvi. 23, was very common.—ἐπέσχε χρόνον: verb, only used by Luke and Paul, and only here in this sense. ἑαυτόν: supplied after the verb; LXX, Gen. viii. 10, 12; in classical Greek, Xen., Cyr., v., 4, 38.—εἰς pro ἐν, Blass; but see on the other hand, Alford, in loco. As Asia, not Ephesus, is mentioned, the word may well include work outside Ephesus itself.

Ver. 23. ἐγένετο δὲ: on the frequency of the formula in Luke's writings see Friedrich, p. 13, and above on iv. 5.—τάραχος οὐκ ὀλίγος: the same phrase as in xii. 18, nowhere else in N.T., for οὐκ ὀλίγος as Lucan see above, xii. 18.

25.[1] οὓς συναθροίσας, καὶ τοὺς περὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα ἐργάτας, εἶπεν, Ἄνδρες, ἐπίστασθε ὅτι ἐκ ταύτης τῆς ἐργασίας ἡ εὐπορία ἡμῶν

[1] Blass (so Hilg.) reconstructs in β text, according to Syr. Pesh., ουτος συναθροισας παντας τους τεχνιτας και τους συνεργατας αυτων εφη προς αυτους; this was shortened in α, τεχν. and συνεργ. being combined under one word εργαται, ουτος being still read instead of ους and και omitted; see further Blass, p. vii. and in loco. After ανδρες D, Sah., Syr. H. mg. add συντεχνιται, but if original, it is not easy to see why omitted. For ημων ℵABDE, Vulg., Sah., Boh., Arm., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Hilg. read ημιν.

—τῆς ὁδοῦ: as in ix. 2, xix. 9, xxiv. 22; much better than to refer it with Weiss merely to the method adopted by Paul in ver. 26.

Ver. 24. Δημ.: a sufficiently common name, as St. Luke's words show (Blass). There is no ground for identifying him with the Demetrius in 3 John, ver. 12, except the fact that both came from the neighbourhood of Ephesus; see, however, "Demetrius," Hastings' B.D.—ἀργυροκόπος, LXX, Judg. xvii. 4 (A al.), Jer. vi. 29; on the trade-guilds in Asia Minor cf. Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i., p. 105, and "Ephesus," Hastings' B.D.; Church in the Roman Empire, p. 128; Demetrius may have been master of the guild for the year.—ναοὺς ἀργ. Ἀρτέμιδος: "silver shrines of Diana," R.V., i.e., representing the shrine of Diana (Artemis) with the statue of the goddess within (ὡς κιβώρια μικρά, Chrys.). These miniature temples were bought up by Ephesians and strangers alike, since the worship of the goddess was so widely spread, and since the "shrines" were made sufficiently small to be worn as amulets on journeys, as well as to be placed as ornaments in houses. There is no need to suppose that they were coins with a representation of the temple stamped upon them, and there is no evidence of the existence of such coins; Amm. Marc., xxii., 13, Dio Cass., xxxix., 20, cf. Blass and Wendt, in loco. They were first explained correctly by Curtius, Athenische Mittheilungen, ii., 49. Examples of these ναοί in terra-cotta or marble with dedicatory inscriptions abound in the neighbourhood of Ephesus. No examples in silver have been found, but they were naturally melted down owing to their intrinsic value, "Diana" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D., and Church in the Roman Empire, u. s. On the interesting but apparently groundless hypothesis (as Zöckler calls it, Apostelgeschichte, p. 277, second edition) that Demetrius should be identified with Demetrius, the νεοποιός of an inscription at Ephesus which probably dated from a considerably later time, the very close of the first century, νεοποιός being really a temple warden, the words νεοποιὸς Ἀρτέμιδος being mistaken by the author of Acts and rendered "making silver shrines of Diana," see Zöckler, u. s.; and Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 112 ff.; and Wendt (1899), p. 317. As Ramsay puts it, there is no extant use of such a phrase as νεοπ. Ἀρτ. in any authority about A.D. 57, νεοποιοί simply being the term used in inscriptions found at Ephesus—as Hicks himself allows (Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 122, 123).—παρείχετο, see critical note or reading in Blass. Rendall distinguishes between active voice, xvi. 16, where the slave girl finds work for her masters, whilst here, middle voice, Demetrius finds work for himself and his fellow-craftsmen in their joint employment.—ἐργασίαν "business," R.V., in xvi. 16, 19, "gain"; here the two meanings run into each other, in ver. 25 "business," R.V., is perhaps more in accordance with the context οὐκ ὀλίγην, Lucan, see on ver. 23.—τεχνίταις . . . ἐργάταις: "alii erant τεχνῖται, artifices nobiliores; alii ἐργάται, operarii," so Zöckler and Grimm-Thayer following Bengel. But Blass regards them as the same, cf. reading in D, and Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 128, note. There were no doubt shrines of widely differing value, for the rich of silver made by the richer tradesmen, for the poorer classes of marble and terracotta, so that several trades were no doubt seriously affected, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 278, and "Ephesus," u. s., Church in the Roman Empire, p. 128, and to the same effect Wendt (1899), p. 317. The word ἐργάται occurs in one of the inscriptions at Ephesus, ἐργ. προπυλεῖται πρὸς τῷ Ποσειδῶνι, "Ephesus," u. s., p. 723, note.

Ver. 25. περὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα, cf. Luke x. 40, 41, for a similar use of περί with accusative, but see W. H., l. c., and 2 Macc. xii. 1.—εὐπορία: wealth, or gain, ἐστι· 26. καὶ θεωρεῖτε καὶ ἀκούετε ὅτι οὐ μόνον[1] Ἐφέσου, ἀλλὰ σχεδὸν πάσης τῆς Ἀσίας ὁ Παῦλος οὗτος πείσας μετέστησεν ἱκανὸν ὄχλον, λέγων ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ θεοὶ οἱ διὰ χειρῶν γινόμενοι. 27. οὐ μόνον δὲ τοῦτο κινδυνεύει ἡμῖν τὸ μέρος εἰς ἀπελεγμὸν ἐλθεῖν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ τῆς μεγάλης θεᾶς Ἀρτέμιδος ἱερὸν εἰς οὐδὲν[2] λογισθῆναι, μέλλειν τε καὶ καθαιρεῖσθαι τὴν μεγαλειότητα αὐτῆς, ἣν ὅλη ἡ Ἀσία

[1] Before Εφεσου D prefixes εως, so Blass in β (comparing xxiii. 23), and Hilg. After ουτος D[1] adds τις ποτε, Gig., "nescio quem," so Blass in β, comparing xvii. 7, where we have the same addition in Gig. and β text.

[2] λογισθηναι ℵBHLP, Chrys., so not only T.R., but Alford, R.V., Weiss, Wendt; μελλειν ℵA[2]BD[2]EHLP, Chrys.; τε ℵABEP, Sah., Boh., Syrr., P.H., Arm., in both cases R.V., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, as in T.R. Blass following ADE, Vulg. reads in β, λογισθησεται, and μελλει with A*D*, Vulg. But in D the whole passage is confused. την μεγαλειοτητα, but the gen. in ℵABE 13, 15, 18, 40, R.V., W.H., Weiss, Wendt. In β text Blass reads μελλει τε και καθαιρεισθαι η μεγαλειοτης αυτης ην ολη η A. following Gig., Par., Vulg., "sed et destrui incipiet majestas ejus quam," etc.; D reading "lacunose et corrupte," in the first part: αλλα καθερισθαι μελλει (-ειν D[b]) η ολη A.

only here in N.T., in classical Greek "in different senses in different authorities," Grimm-Thayer; in LXX, 2 Kings xxv. 10, but in a different sense (see Hatch and Redpath's references to its use by Aquila, Symm., and others). Rendall takes it of comfort and well-being, in the old English sense weal.

Ver. 26. οὐ μόνον . . . ἀλλὰ: non modo . . . sed.—σχεδὸν, xiii. 44, we cannot take the genitive with ὄχλον, as Hackett suggests.—Ἀσίας: the Roman province, so Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 278, where he corrects his former interpretation of the word in this passage in Church in the Roman Empire, p. 166; see above on Paul's work outside Ephesus.—οὗτος: contemptuous. — μετέστησεν, cf. Josh. xiv. 8. The testimony thus borne to the wide and effective influence of the Apostles even by their enemies is well commented on by St. Chrys., Hom., xlii., and see also below.

Ver. 27. τοῦτο . . . τὸ μέρος, sc., τῆς ἐργασίας ἡμῶν, ver. 25, Grimm-Thayer—this branch of their trade, which was concerned with the making of the shrines. Others take μέρος = trade, the part assigned to one.—κινδυνεύει: "the most sensitive part of 'civilised' man is his pocket," Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 277, and the opposition thus naturally came not from the priests as instigators of the riot against Paul, but from the fact that trade connected with the Artemis-worship was endangered; so at Philippi, "when the masters saw that the hope of this was gone," xvi. 19; see Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 129 ff., as against Hicks. "See how wherever there is idolatry, in every case we find money at the bottom of it, both in the former instance it was for money, and in the case of this man for money; it was not for their religion, because they thought that in danger; no, it was for their lucrative craft, that it would have nothing to work upon," Chrys., Hom., xlii.—εἰς ἀπελεγμὸν ἐλθεῖν: noun, not found either in classical Greek or in the LXX; the verb ἀπελέγχειν is found in 4 Macc. ii. 11 (cf. Symm., Ps. cxix. 118), and ἐλεγμός is not uncommon in LXX, confutatio, repudiatio (for the phrase cf. Mark v. 26), in contemptum venire, Wetstein; but in redargutionem venire, Vulgate.—ἀλλὰ καὶ: the utilitarian aspect of the appeal stands first, but speciously seconded by an appeal to religious feelings ("non tam pro aris ipsos quam pro focis pugnare," Calvin).—τῆς μεγ. θεᾶς Ἀ.: St. Luke appears to have retained the precise title of the goddess, according to the witness of the inscription; "Diana" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D., p. 605, so Blass, in loco.—τὸ . . . ἱερὸν: the Temple of Artemis was burnt to the ground by the fanatic Herostratus in B.C. 356 on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great, but its restoration was effected with great magnificence, and it was regarded as one of the seven wonders of the world. Its dimensions are given by Pliny, xxxvi., 95. For references, and a description of its worship, see C. and H., p. 422, small edition; Renan, Saint Paul, p. 427; Ramsay, "Diana," u. s.; Wood's Ephesus, pp. 4-

[2] After και, β reads after D[1], Gig., Syr. Pesh. συνεχυθη ολη η πολις (αισχυνης); D reads αισχ., which Blass rejects; apparently for Lat. "confusione," see Blass, p. xx.; "confusio," common rendering of αισχυνη, Harris, Study in Codex Bezæ, p. 106; D prob. conflate; see also Corssen, G. G. A., p. 430, 1896. αισχ. = confusio, Phil. iii. 19, Heb. xii. 12.

45; Greek Inscrip. at British Museum, iii., 1890, and for a complete account of the temple, its structure, and literature relating to its history and site, B.D.[2], "Ephesus". So sumptuous was the magnificence of this sanctuary that it could be said ὁ τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος ναὸς ἐν Ἐφέσῳ μόνος ἐστὶ θεῶν οἶκος, Philo Byz., Spect. Mund., 7, and the sun, so the saying ran, saw nothing in his course more magnificent than Diana's temple.—εἰς οὐδὲν λογ., cf. for a similar phrase LXX, Isa. xl. 17, Wisdom iii. 17 and ix. 6 (εἰς om. S[1]), and Dan. Theod., iv., 32. The verb λογίζομαι is also frequent in St. Paul with εἰς and the accusative.—τε καί, cf. xxi. 28, not correlative, but: "and that she should even," etc., Simcox, Language of the New Testament, p. 163.—τὴν μεγαλειότητα, see critical note, if we read the genitive, "and that she should even be deposed from her magnificence," R.V., cf. Winer-Schmiedel, xxx., 6. Grimm-Thayer regards the genitive as partitive, aliquid de majestate ejus, as if it was inconceivable that all her magnificence should be lost: so Meyer, Zöckler, Weiss, cf. Xen., Hellen., iv., 4, 13; Diod. Sic., iv., 8. But Wendt (as against Meyer) regards τὸ ἱερόν as the subject; cf. 1 Tim. vi. 5. The word is used, Luke ix. 43, of the majesty of God, cf. 2 Pet. i. 16 (Friedrich, p. 30); in LXX, Jer. xl. (xxxiii.) 9; 1 Esd. i. 5, iv. 40, Dan. vii. 27.—ὅλη ἡ Ἀσία: "multitudo errantium non efficit veritatem": Bengel. The temple was built by contributions from the whole of Asia, tota Asia exstruente, Pliny, Nat. Hist., xvi., 40, so that the goddess was evidently held in veneration by the whole province, cf. ibid., xxxvi., 21; Liv., i., 45. According to the testimony of Pausanias, iv., 31, 8; cf. Xen., Anab., v., 3, 4, no deity was more widely worshipped by private persons (Wetstein, Ramsay, Blass), see also Apuleius, 2, quoted by Mr. Page from Wordsworth. For the way in which the imperial government allied itself with the Artemis worship and the revival of paganism in the second century, and the universal honour paid to Artemis by Greek and barbarian alike, cf. Greek Inscriptions of the British Museum (Hicks), iii., pp. 135, 145.—οἰκουμένη, see above on xi. 28. Plumptre points out that the language is almost identical with that of Apuleius (perhaps from this passage): "Diana Ephesia cujus nomen unicum . . . totus veneratur orbis".

Ver. 28. ἔκραζον: "they cried continuously," imperfect, see addition in D. —Μεγάλη ἡ Ἄ.: omitting ἡ we have apparently the popular cry, or rather invocation: Great Artemis! as it was actually used in the cultus—the cry was not an argument against Paul's doctrine, but rather a prayer to the goddess and queen of Ephesus, and so regarded it gives a vividness and naturalness to the scene, Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 135 ff., and "Diana," u. s., p. 105; see D, critical note.

Ver. 29. συγχύσεως: the noun only here in N.T. (συγχέω: only in Luke, see above p. 238), in LXX, Gen. xi. 9, 1 Sam. v. 11, 1 Sam. xiv. 20, used in classical Greek in the sense of confusion, disturbance; τε, the immediate result was that they rushed (Weiss), ὁμοθυμαδὸν, see above i. 14, "with one accord," uno animo, Vulgate (not simul).—τὸ θέατρον: no doubt the great theatre explored by Mr. Wood, Ephesus, pp. 73, 74, App. vi.; Lightfoot, Contemp. Rev., xxxii., p. 293; the theatre was the usual place for public assemblies in most towns, cf. Jos., B. J., vii. 3, 3; Tac., Hist., ii., 80; Blass, in loco, and Wetstein, and also Pseudo-Heraclitus, Letter vii., 47, condemning the Ephesians for submitting grave and weighty matters to the decision of the mobs in the theatre, Die Heraklitischen Briefe, p. 65; Gore, Ephesians, p. 255. The theatre was capable of holding, it is calculated, 24,500 people, its diameter was 495 feet, and it was probably the largest in the world (Renan). Wetstein remarks that the position of the places tended in no small degree to increase and foment the tumult, since the temple was in full view of the theatre.—συναρπάσαντες, cf. vi. 12, i.e., being carried off with them in their rush; we are not told whether they met Gaius and Aristarchus by chance, and seized them as well-known companions of Paul, συνεκδήμους, or whether they searched for them in their lodgings, and seized them when they could not find the Apostle. — Ἀρίσταρχον: a native of Thessalonica, cf. xx. 4; he accompanied Paul on his last journey to Jerusalem, and hence to Rome, xxvii. 2. It is possible, as Lightfoot thinks, that the words "Aristarchus, a Macedonian of Thessalonica, being with us" in the latter passage intimate that Aristarchus accompanied Luke and Paul on the former part of this route because he was on his way home, and that leaving Paul at Myra he may have returned to Thessalonica, Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 35. But however this may be, it is evident from Col. iv. 10, Philem., ver. 24, that he was with the Apostle at Rome, probably sharing his captivity. ὁ συναιχμάλωτός μου, Col., u. s., can hardly refer to this incident at Ephesus, Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 11, "Aristarchus," B.D.[2], or to a captivity in a spiritual sense, as bound and captive to Christ together with Paul; see also Salmon, Introd., p. 383.—Μακεδόνας: nothing was more natural than that devoted Christians from Thessalonica should be among St. Paul's companions in travel when we consider his special affection for the Thessalonian Church. With this reading the Gaius here is of course to be distinguished from the Gaius of xx. 4, of Derbe, and from the Gaius of Rom. xvi. 23, 1 Cor. i. 14, a Corinthian. But if we could read Μακεδόνα, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 280, the Gaius here may be identified with the Gaius of xx. 4. In xx. 4 Blass connects Δερβαῖος with Timothy, making Gaius a Thessalonian with Aristarchus, Secundus, see in loco; but against this we must place the positive statement of xvi. 1, that Timothy was a Lystran.—συνεκδήμους: used only by Luke and Paul, 2 Cor. viii. 19, not in LXX, but in Plut. and Josephus. The word may look forward to xx. 4 (so Ramsay, u. s.), or we may take it with Blass as referring to the part which the two men played as representatives of the Thessalonians, who were carrying with St. Paul the contribution to the Church at Jerusalem (2 Cor. ix. 4). These two men, as Weiss points out, may be our informants for some of the details which follow.

Ver. 30. τοῦ δὲ Π. βουλ.: St. Paul was not the man to leave his comrades in the lurch, and he would have followed them with his life in his hands to face the mob of Ephesus; if we may depend upon the picture of Ephesian life given us in Pseudo-Heraclitus, Letter vii., we can understand the imminent danger in which St. Paul was placed at the mercy of men who were no longer men but beasts, ἐξ ἀνθρώπων θηρία γεγονότες (Die Heraklitischen Briefe, p. 65 (Bernays), and Ramsay, u. s., p. 280).—δῆμον, ver. 33, xii. 22, xvii. 5, so sometimes in classical Greek of the plebs, vulgus—in N.T. only in Acts. Both before and after the riot the passions of the vulgar mob were no doubt a real and serious danger to St. Paul, cf. 1 Cor. xv. 32, xvi. 9, 2 Cor. i. 8-10. In the former passage the word ἐθηριομάχησα is generally referred to this danger in Ephesus, the multitude in its ferocious rage being compared to wild beasts, see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 230, "Ephesus," Hastings' B.D., and Plumptre's note, in loco. With the expression used in 1 Cor. xv. 32 we may compare Ignat., Rom., v., 1, and cf. Ephes., vii., 1; Smyrn., iv., 1; so too Pseudo-Heraclitus, u. s., and Renan, Saint Paul, p. 351, note; Grimm-Thayer, sub v. McGiffert, p. 280 ff., maintains that the word ἐθηριομάχησα refers to an actual conflict with wild beasts in the arena (so Weizsäcker), and that 2 Cor. i. 9 more probably refers to the danger from the riot of Demetrius; but if the literal interpretation of the verb in 1 Cor. is correct, it is strange that St. Paul should have omitted such a terrible encounter from his catalogue of dangers in 2 Cor. xi. 23; see also below at end of chapter.

ἑαυτὸν εἰς τὸ θέατρον. 32. ἄλλοι μὲν οὖν ἄλλο τι ἔκραζον· ἦν γὰρ ἡ ἐκκλησία συγκεχυμένη, καὶ οἱ πλείους οὐκ ᾔδεισαν τίνος ἕνεκεν συνεληλύθεισαν. 33. ἐκ δὲ τοῦ ὄχλου[1] προεβίβασαν Ἀλέξανδρον, προβαλόντων αὐτὸν τῶν Ἰουδαίων· ὁ δὲ Ἀλέξανδρος, κατασείσας

[1] Instead of προεβιβασαν ℵABE, Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, R.V. read συνεβιβασαν, whilst D²HLP, Chrys. have προεβ. (so T.R.). προεβ. adds nothing to προβαλλοντων and the difficulty of συνεβ. might easily lead to change. D* reads κατεβιβασαν, so Blass in both texts, cf. Hilgenfeld, Zw. Th., pp. 364, 366, 1896, and note in comment. Gig., Vulg., "detraxerunt".

Ver. 31. Ἀσιαρχῶν: "the chief officers of Asia," R.V., cf. Γαλατάρχης, Βιθυνιάρχης, Συριάρχης, etc.; Mommsen, Röm. Gesch., v., 318 (Knabenbauer), officers, i.e., of the province of Asia, and so provincial, not merely municipal officers. Each province united in an association for the worship of Rome and the Empire, hence Κοινὸν Ἀσίας, of which the Asiarchs would probably be the high priests. But in addition to their religious office the Asiarchs were called upon to provide games, partly if not solely at their own expense, and to preside over them. These festivals were called Κοινὰ Ἀσίας ἐν Σμύρνῃ, Λαοδικείᾳ, κ.τ.λ. It is doubtful whether the office was annual, or whether it was held for four years; but as an Asiarch still retained his title after his term of office had expired, there may evidently have been in Ephesus several Asiarchs, although only one was actually performing his duties (cf. the title ἀρχιερεῖς amongst the Jews, iv. 6, 23). If there were a sort of Council of Asiarchs, this Council may well have assembled when the Κοινὰ Ἀσίας were being held, and this might have been the case at Ephesus in the narrative before us; such a festival would have brought together a vast crowd of pilgrims and worshippers actuated with zeal for the goddess, and ready to side with Demetrius and his followers. The title was one of great dignity and repute, as is evident from inscriptions which commemorate in various cities the names of those who had held the office. Whether the Asiarchs were in any sense high priests has been disputed, but see Polycarp, Mart., cf. xii. 2 and xxi.; on the whole subject "Asiarch" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D. and B.D.²; St. Ignatius and St. Polycarp, ii., p. 987, Lightfoot; Renan, Saint Paul, p. 353; Wendt, p. 318; O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 102.—φίλοι: not only does the notice show that St. Paul had gained at least the toleration of some of the leading men of the province, but that the attitude of the imperial authorities was not unfriendly. We cannot of course suppose with Zimmermann that the Asiarchs were friendly because the Apostle had been less opposed to the imperial cultus than to that of Diana, and that so far the Asiarchs stood with him on common ground. See Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, on the probable attitude of the priests, and cf. chap. xiv.—δοῦναι ἑαυτὸν: only here in N.T., cf. Polyb., v., 14, 9, the expression involves the thought of danger, so in A. and R.V.

Ver. 32. ἄλλοι μὲν οὖν: μὲν οὖν probably as often in Acts without any opposition expressed, but see Rendall, App., p. 162; the antithesis may be in δὲ of ver. 33.—ἔκραζον: "kept on crying," imperfect.—ἐκκλησία, see below on ver. 39; here of an unlawful tumultuous assembly.—συγκεχ., see above ver. 29.—οἱ πλείους: "sensu vere comparativo" Blass = major pars.

Ver. 33. ἐκ δὲ τοῦ ὄ., sc., τινές, cf. xxi. 16. If we read συνεβίβασαν (see critical note), and render "instructed Alexander," R.V., margin; cf. 1 Cor. ii. 16, and often in LXX, it seems to mean that the Jews instructed Alexander, a fellow-Jew, to come forward and dissociate himself and them from any coalition with Paul and his companions against the Diana worship (ἀπολογεῖσθαι). Erasmus takes the word to mean that the Jews had instructed him beforehand as their advocate. συμβιβάζω in Col. ii. 19, Ephes. iv. 16 = to join together, to knit together, in Acts xvi. 10, to consider, to conclude, so Weiss thinks here that it = concluded that Alexander was the reason why they had come together; but the sentence and the context does not seem to bear out this rendering. Meyer retains T.R., and holds that Alexander was a Jewish Christian who was put forward by the Jews maliciously, hoping that he might be sacrificed to the popular tumult — hence ἀπολογεῖσθαι.

τὴν χεῖρα, ἤθελεν ἀπολογεῖσθαι τῷ δήμῳ. 34. ἐπιγνόντων[1] δὲ ὅτι Ἰουδαῖός ἐστι, φωνὴ ἐγένετο μία ἐκ πάντων, ὡς ἐπὶ ὥρας δύο κραζόντων, Μεγάλη ἡ Ἄρτεμις Ἐφεσίων. 35. Καταστείλας δὲ ὁ γραμματεὺς τὸν ὄχλον, φησίν, Ἄνδρες Ἐφέσιοι, τίς γάρ ἐστιν ἄνθρωπος ὃς οὐ γινώσκει τὴν Ἐφεσίων πόλιν νεωκόρον οὖσαν τῆς μεγάλης[2] θεᾶς

[1] Instead of επιγνοντων, ℵABDEHLP, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Hilg. read επιγνοντες, and instead of κραζοντων (Hilg.), BDEHLP, which Lach., W.H., Blass retain in, Tisch., Weiss, Wendt read κραζοντες, following ℵA.

[2] θεας om. ℵABDE, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Hilg.

This latter view seems to be adopted practically by Blass (so by Knabenbauer), although he reads κατεβίβασαν (Luke x. 15), descendere coegerunt, i.e., into the theatre, as he cannot see that συνεβίβ. is intelligible; in which Grimm-Thayer agrees with him, and renders with R.V., margin, as above (see sub v.).—ὁ δὲ Ἀ.: if ὁ χαλκεὺς in 2 Tim. iv. 14 is taken in a wider sense to mean a worker in any metal, it is, of course, possible that Alexander might be so described as one of the craftsmen of Demetrius. But the name was very common, although the omission of τις may be taken to imply that Alexander in ver. 33 was well known in Ephesus (cf. ver. 9 above). We cannot pass beyond conjecture, especially as the notice in Acts, when compared with 2 Tim., contains no further mark of identification than the similarity of name, although the Alexander in the latter passage was no doubt in some way connected with Ephesus, or the warning to Timothy against him would be without force. Against the identification see Meyer-Weiss, Die Briefe Pauli an Timotheus und Titus, p. 347, and so also Holtzmann, Pastoralbriefe, in loco (who identifies the Alexander in 2 Tim. iv. 14 with the Alexander in 1 Tim. i. 20). Holtzmann's view is that the author of the Pastoral Epistles, whoever he may have been, mistook the notice in Acts, and concluded that the Alexander there mentioned was a Christian, and a treacherous one, who allowed himself to be utilised by the Jews against Paul. The pseudonymous author of 2 Tim. therefore names Alexander χαλκεύς, and refers also to him the βλασφημεῖν of 1 Tim. i. 20.—κατασείσας τὴν χεῖρα, see on xii. 17.—ἀπολ.: peculiar to Luke and Paul, twice in St. Luke's Gospel, and six times in Acts, so in Rom. ii. 15, 2 Cor. xii. 19. In the last-named passage with same construction as here (see for various constructions Grimm-Thayer, sub v.).

Ver. 34. ἐπιγνόντων: "when they recognised" by his dress and his features, "when they perceived," R.V. If we read ἐπιγνόντες, see critical note, φωνὴ ἐγέν. = "anacoluthon luculentissimum" cf. Mark ix. 20 (Blass).—μία ἐκ πάντων: callida junctura, arresting the reader's attention (Hackett). Alexander was thus unable to obtain a hearing because he was a Jew, a fact which sufficiently justifies the apprehension for Paul entertained by his friends.—Μεγάλη κ.τ.λ., see on ver. 28, the cry in B, and β text is doubled, which marks its continuance and its emphatic utterance (Weiss).—ὡς ἐπὶ ὥρας δύο κραζ.: probably they regarded this as in itself an act of worship, cf. 1 Kings xviii. 26, and Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 142, "Diana," Hastings' B.D., p. 605. "A childish understanding indeed! as if they were afraid lest their worship should be extinguished, they shouted without intermission:" Chrys., Hom., xlii.

Ver. 35. καταστείλας: only here in N.T. and in ver. 36, "had quieted," R.V., cf. 2 Macc. iv. 31, 3 Macc. vi. 1, Aquila, Ps. lxiv. (lxv.) 8, also in Josephus and Plutarch.—ὁ γραμματεὺς: "the secretary of the city" Ramsay; Lightfoot was the first to point out the importance of the officer so named—called also ὁ Ἐφεσίων γραμ. or γραμ. τοῦ δήμου; he was the most influential person in Ephesus, for not only were the decrees to be proposed drafted by him and the Strategoi, and money left to the city was committed to his charge, but as the power of the Ecclesia, the public assembly, declined under imperial rule, the importance of the secretary's office was enhanced, because he was in closer touch with the court of the proconsul than the other city magistrates, and acted as a medium of communication between the imperial and municipal government, "Ephesus" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D., p. 723, Cities and

Ἀρτέμιδος καὶ τοῦ Διοπετοῦς; 36. ἀναντιῤῥήτων[1] οὖν ὄντων τούτων, δέον ἐστὶν ὑμᾶς κατεσταλμένους ὑπάρχειν, καὶ μηδὲν προπετὲς πράττειν. 37. ἠγάγετε γὰρ τοὺς ἄνδρας τούτους, οὔτε ἱεροσύλους

[1] αναντιρητων B*L, so W.H. (not Weiss).

Bishoprics of Phrygia, i., 66; St. Paul, pp. 281, 304; Hicks, Greek Inscriptions in the British Museum, iii., p. 154, and Wood's Ephesus, App., p. 49, often with Asiarchs and proconsul; Lightfoot, Contemp. Review, p. 294, 1878. St. Luke's picture therefore of the secretary as a man of influence and keenly alive to his responsibility is strikingly in accordance with what we might have expected. —τίς γάρ ἐστιν ἄνθρωπος: "what man is there then?" etc. Rendall: the γάρ looks back to the action of the speaker in quieting the crowd, as if he would say that there is no need for this excitement, for all that you have said about your goddess is universally acknowledged. — νεωκόρον: "temple-keeper," R.V., "a worshipper," A.V., cultricem, Vulgate, lit., "a temple-sweeper" (on derivation see Grimm-Thayer, sub v.), and so found in classical Greek, a sacristan, a verger, Lat., æditus, cf. Jos., B. J., v., 9, 4, where = worshippers, οὓς ὁ θεὸς ἑαυτῷ νεωκόρους ἦγεν. The title "Warden of the Temple of Ephesus" was a boast of the city, just as other cities boasted of the same title in relation to other deities. It would seem that the title at Ephesus was generally used in connection with the imperial cultus; in the period of this narrative, Ephesus could claim the title as Warden of one Temple of this cultus, and later on she enjoyed the title of δὶς, τρὶς νεωκόρος, as the number of the temples of the imperial cultus increased. But there is ample justification from inscriptions for the mention of the title in the verse before us in connection with the Artemis worship. For references, Ramsay, "Ephesus," Hastings' B.D., p. 722; Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i., 58; Wendt, Blass, in loco; Lightfoot, Cont. Rev., p. 294, 1878; Wood, Ephesus, App., p. 50.—τοῦ Δ., sc., ἄγαλμα: or some such word; the image was believed to have fallen from the sky (heaven, R.V. margin), like that of the Tauric Artemis, cf. Eur., Iph. T., 977, 1384, where we find οὐρανοῦ πέσημα given as the equivalent and explanation of διοπετὲς ἄγαλμα (Herod., i., 11). The worship of Diana of the Ephesians was entirely Asian and not Greek, although the Greek colonists attempted to establish an identification with their own Artemis on account of certain analogies between them. According to Jerome, Præfat. ad Ephesios, the Ephesian Artemis was represented as a figure with many breasts, multimammia ("quam Græci πολύμαστον vocant"), symbolising the reproductive and nutritive powers of Nature which she personified. This description is fully borne out by the common representations of the goddess on coins and statues. No one could say for certain of what the ἄγαλμα was made: according to Petronius it was made of cedar wood, according to Pliny of the wood of the vine, according to Xen. of gold, and according to others of ebony. For a fuller description of the image, and for some account of the wide prevalence of worship of the goddess and its peculiar character, Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, "Diana of the Ephesians," Hastings' B.D., B.D.[2]; Wendt, 1888, in loco; Farrar, St. Paul, ii., p. 13, and references in Wetstein.

Ver. 36. ἀναντιῤῥήτων: only here in N.T., but the adverb in x. 29, not in LXX but Symm., Job xi. 2, xxxiii. 13; Polyb., xxiii., 8, 11; on spelling see critical note.—δέον ἐστὶν, 1 Peter i. 6 (1 Tim. v. 13), cf. Ecclus., Prol., vv. 3, 4, 1 Macc. xii. 11, 2 Macc. xi. 18, also in classical Greek.—προπετὲς: only in Luke and Paul in N.T., 2 Tim. iii. 4, of thoughtless haste (Meyer-Weiss); in LXX of rash talk, cf. Prov. x. 14, xiii. 3, Ecclus. ix. 18, Symm., Eccles. v. 1, Clem. Rom., Cor., i., 1, of persons.—κατεσταλμένους, see also on ver. 35; only in these two verses in N.T.

Ver. 37. γὰρ: "for," i.e., they had done something rash.—τοὺς ἄνδρ. τούτους: Gaius and Aristarchus, ἱεροσύλους, "robbers of temples," R.V., in A.V. "of churches," the word "church" being applied as often in the Elizabethan age to pagan temples. Ramsay however renders "guilty neither in act nor in language of disrespect to our goddess," i.e., to the established religion of our city, ἱεροσυλία = Latin, sacrilegium, and here for emphasis the speaker uses the double term οὔτε ἱεροσ. οὔτε βλασφ., "Churches, Robbers of," Hastings' B.D., Ramsay, and St. Paul, pp. 260, 282, 401.

οὔτε βλασφημοῦντας τὴν[1] θεὰν ὑμῶν. 38. εἰ μὲν οὖν Δημήτριος[2] καὶ οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ τεχνῖται πρός τινα λόγον ἔχουσιν, ἀγοραῖοι ἄγονται, καὶ ἀνθύπατοί εἰσιν· ἐγκαλείτωσαν ἀλλήλοις. 39. εἰ δέ τι περὶ

[1] For την θεαν ℵABD²E*HL, Chrys., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass read την θεον, and for υμων ℵABD, Syr. P., Sah., Arm., Aeth., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt read ημων.

[2] After Δημ. D, Syr. Pesh., Ephr., Blass, Hilg. add ουτος.

In 2 Macc. iv. 42 we have the same word ἱερόσυλος, R.V., "Author of the sacrilege," "Church-robber," A.V., used of Lysimachus, brother of Menelaus the high priest, who perished in a riot which arose from the theft of the sacred vessels by his brother and himself (quoted by Ramsay, u. s.). Canon Gore, Ephesians, p. 41, note, however, points out that the word is used in the former sense of "robbers of temples," in special connection with Ephesus by Strabo, xiv. 1, 22, and Pseudo-Heraclitus, Letter vii., p. 64 (Bernays); cf. Rom. ii. 22. The cognate noun is found in inscriptions at Ephesus, describing a crime involving the heaviest penalties, Wood, Ephesus, vi., 1, p. 14; Lightfoot, Cont. Rev., p. 294, 1878.

Ver. 38. λόγον ἔχουσιν: no exact equivalent elsewhere in N.T., but Grimm (so Kypke) compares Matt. v. 32 (see also Col. iii. 13).—ἀγοραῖοι ἄγονται: "the courts are open," R.V., perhaps best to understand σύνοδοι, "court-meetings are now going on," i.e., for holding trials (in the forum or agora); Vulgate, conventus forenses aguntur, the verb being in the present indicative. Or ἡμέραι may alone be supplied = court days are kept, i.e., at certain intervals, not implying at that particular time, but rather a general statement as in the words that follow: "there are proconsuls," see Page, in loco. For ἄγειν, cf. Luke xxiv. 21, Matt. xiv. 6, 2 Macc. ii. 16, cf. Strabo, xiii., p. 932, Latin, conventus agere. Alford, so Wendt (1888), speaks of the distinction drawn by the old grammarians between ἀγοραῖος and ἀγόραιος as groundless, but see also Winer-Schmiedel, p. 69.—ἀνθύπατοί εἰσιν: the plural is used: "de eo quod nunquam non esse soleat," Bengel (quoted by Blass and Wendt), although strictly there would be only one proconsul at a time. There is no need to understand any assistants of the proconsul, as if the description was meant for them, or, with Lewin, as if there were several persons with proconsular power. It is quite possible that in both clauses the secretary is speaking in a mere colloquial way, as we might say, "There are assizes and there are judges". Lightfoot calls it "a rhetorical plural" Cont. Rev., p. 295, 1878, and quotes Eur., I. T., 1359, κλέπτοντες ἐκ γῆς ξόανα καὶ θυηπόλους, though there was only one image and one priestess.—ἐγκαλείτωσαν ἀλλήλοις: "accuse," R.V. The verb need not have a technical legal sense as is implied by "implead" in A.V. So in LXX it may be used quite generally, or of a criminal charge, and so in classical Greek, cf. Wisd. xii. 12 and Ecclus. xlvi. 19. In the N.T. it is used six times in Acts with reference to judicial process, and only once elsewhere by St. Paul in Rom. viii. 33 in a general sense. The verb only occurs in the second part of Acts in accordance no doubt with the subject-matter; see Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 147, note, and Weiss, Einleitung in das N. T., p. 570, note.

Ver. 39. εἰ δέ τι περὶ ἑτέρων: if we read περαιτέρω, cf. Plato, Phædo, p. 107 B, the meaning is anything further than an accusation against an individual, a public and not a personal matter: if they desired to get any resolution passed with regard to the future conduct of citizens and of resident non-citizens in this matter, see Ramsay, Expositor, February, 1896, reading περαιτ.—ἐπιλυθήσεται (cf. Mark iv. 34), nowhere else in N.T. (the verb is found in LXX, Aquila, Gen. xl. 8, xli. 8, 12; Th., Hos., iii. 4; Philo., Jos.).—τῇ ἐννόμῳ ἐκκλησίᾳ: "the regular assembly," R.V. Mr. Wood, Ephesus, App., p. 38, quotes an inscription in which it was enjoined that a statue of Minerva should be placed in a certain spot, κατὰ πᾶσαν ἔννομον ἐκκλησίαν. But A.V. has "the lawful assembly": which is the better rendering? "regular" seems to restrict us to νόμιμοι ἐκκλησίαι held on stated customary days, and to exclude from the secretary's statement any reference to extraordinary meetings, meetings summoned for special business, whereas he would be likely to use a term which would cover all legal ἑτέρων[1] ἐπιζητεῖτε, ἐν τῇ ἐννόμῳ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐπιλυθήσεται. 40. καὶ γὰρ κινδυνεύομεν[2] ἐγκαλεῖσθαι στάσεως περὶ τῆς σήμερον, μηδενὸς αἰτίου ὑπάρχοντος περὶ οὗ δυνησόμεθα ἀποδοῦναι λόγον τῆς συστροφῆς ταύτης. 41. Καὶ ταῦτα εἰπὼν ἀπέλυσε τὴν ἐκκλησίαν.

[1] περι ετερων, so ℵADHLP, so Tisch., R.V., Hilg., but B (d Gig., Vulg.), so Lach., W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt have περαιτερω, see further Harris, Four Lectures, p. 29, on Ephrem's text. The περι ετερων is the correction of a word not found elsewhere in N.T. (so Wendt, p. 320 (1899)). E has περ ετερον.

[2] D has σημερον εγκαλεισθαι στασεως, argui seditionis hodiernæ, Vulg., accusari quasi seditiosi hodie, Gig., but these look like paraphrases. περι ου ου in W.H. and R.V. is supported by ℵBHLP, Syrr., P.H., Arm., Chrys.; and after λογον the addition of περι is supported by ℵBE, Arm., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. DE omit negative ου, and περι after λογον is omitted by D*HLP d, so T.R. (Meyer and Lach.), Hilg. and Blass in both texts; see Wendt (1899), note p. 321. W.H., see App., p. 97, thinks some primitive error probable, perhaps αιτιοι υπαρχοντες instead of αιτιου υπαρχοντος. D has οντος instead of υπαρ., so Blass in β.

meetings. But on the other hand Blass quotes the phrase given above from the inscriptions, and explains ἔννομοι ἐκκλησίαι sunt, quæ ex lege certis diebus fiebant (so too Wendt, Lightfoot); and if this is correct, "regular" would be the more appropriate rendering, ἔννομος = νόμιμος. But in Ephesus we have to consider how far the old Greek assembly ἐκκλησία was or was not under the control of the imperial government. In considering this with reference to the special incident before us, Ramsay, with whom Wendt agrees, p. 321 (1899), gives good reason for regarding the "regular" as equivalent to the "lawful" assemblies: i.e., extraordinary assemblies which in the Greek period had been legal, but were now so no longer through the jealous desire of Rome to control popular assemblies, abroad as at home. The ἐκκλησία could not be summoned without the leave of the Roman officials, and it was not at all likely that that sanction would be extended beyond a certain fixed and regular number, Ramsay, Expositor, February, 1896: "The Lawful Assembly," and "Ephesus," Hastings' B.D., p. 723.

Ver. 40. ἐγκαλεῖσθαι στάσεως περὶ τῆς σήμερον, A.V., "to be called in question for this day's uproar," but R.V., "to be accused concerning this day's riot," rendering ἐγκαλ., as in ver. 38, and στάσεως, as in Mark xv. 7. θόρυβος being rather the word for uproar or tumult, cf. Vulgate: "argui seditionis hodiernæ". But a further question arises from the marginal rendering of R.V., "to be accused of riot concerning this day": so Page, Meyer-Wendt, Zöckler. But Blass, Weiss, Rendall, so Ramsay: "to be accused of riot concerning this day's assembly," sc., ἐκκλησία, although Blass thinks it still better to omit περὶ τῆς altogether, and to connect σήμερον with ἐγκαλ., cf. iv. 9.—μηδενὸς αἰτίου ὑπάρχοντος: with this punctuation R.V. renders "there being no cause for it," taking αἰτίου as neuter, and closely connecting the phrase with the foregoing, so W.H. Overbeck (so Felten, Rendall) takes αἰτίου as masculine: "there being no man guilty by reason of whom," etc., and Wendt considers that the rendering cannot be altogether excluded. Vulgate has "cum nullus obnoxius sit". But αἰτίου may be strictly a noun neuter from αἴτιον = αἰτία, and not an adjective as the last-mentioned rendering demands, cf. Plummer on Luke xxiii. 4, 14, 22, and nowhere else in N.T., so Moulton and Geden, who give the adjective αἴτιος only in Heb. v. 9.—περὶ οὗ δυνησόμεθα: Ramsay (so Meyer and Zöckler) follows T.R. and Bezan text in omitting the negative οὐ before δυν., but see on the other hand Wendt (1899), p. 322; and critical note. R.V. (introducing negative οὐ, so Weiss and Wendt) renders "and as touching it we shall not be able to give account of this concourse".—συστροφῆς, Polyb., iv., 34, 6, of a seditious meeting or mob. In xxiii. 12 used of a conspiracy; cf. LXX, Ps. lxiii. 2, Amos vii. 10.

Ver. 41. τὴν ἐκκλησίαν: the word may imply, as Ramsay thinks, that the secretary thus recognised the meeting as an ἐκκλησία to shield it, as far as he could, from Roman censure. The attitude of the secretary is that of a man altogether superior to, and almost contemptuous of, the vulgar mob (cf. οὗτος in D, ver. 38), and there is no apparent desire on his part to deny Paul's right to preach, provided that the Apostle respected the laws and institutions of the city.

On the historical character of the incidents narrated at Ephesus, the graphic description and the intimate knowledge of the life of the city, see Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 143, and the same writer "Ephesus," Hastings' B.D. Every detail tends to confirm the faithfulness of the picture drawn of Ephesian society A.D. 57 (cf. Knabenbauer, p. 340). Wendt also is so impressed with the vividness of the scene as it is narrated, that he considers that we are justified in referring the narrative to a source which we owe to an actual companion of St. Paul, and in regarding it as an historical episode, and he refers in justification to Lightfoot, Cont. Rev., p. 292 ff., 1878; see Wendt's edition, 1888, pp. 429, 430, and also edition 1899, p. 316, note. Whilst Baur and Overbeck give an unfavourable verdict as to the historical truthfulness of the Ephesian tumult, a verdict which Wendt condemns, Zeller is constrained to acknowledge the very minute details which tell in favour of the narrative, and for the invention of which there is no apparent reason. Amongst more recent critics, Weizsäcker can only see in the story the historian's defence of Paul and the same tendency to make events issue in the success of his missionary propaganda: 1 Cor. xv. 32 he takes literally, and the tumult recorded in Acts gives us only a faint and shadowy outline of actual reminiscences: nothing is left of the wild beasts except a tumult in the theatre, and the Apostle against whom the violence is mainly directed is himself absent. But as Wendt rightly maintains, 1 Cor. xv. 32 is much rather to be taken as referring figuratively to a struggle with men raging against the Apostle's life; nor are we shut up of necessity to the conclusion that 1 Cor. xv. 32 and Acts xix. 23 ff. refer to one and the same event (so Hilgenfeld, Zöckler), see note on p. 414. McGiffert, whilst taking 1 Cor. xv. 32 literally (although he inclines to identify Acts xix. with 2 Cor. i. 8, so too Hilgenfeld), admits as against Weizsäcker the general trustworthiness of St. Luke's account, since it is too true to life, and is related too vividly to admit any doubt as to its historic reality (p. 282). Hilgenfeld too, Zw. Th., p. 363, 1896, agrees that the whole narrative is related in a way true to life, and refers it with the possible exception of ὡς ἐπὶ ὥρας δύο in ver. 34 to his good source C: it could not possibly have been invented by the "author to Theophilus". Even here Clemen and Jüngst can only see an interpolation, referred by the former to Redactor, i.e., vv. 15-41 with the possible exception of ver. 33 to Redactor Antijudaicus; and by the latter also to his Redactor, i.e., vv. 23-41.

CHAPTER XX.—Ver. 1. μετὰ δὲ τὸ παύσ.: the words may indicate not only the fact of the cessation of the tumult, but that Paul felt that the time for departure had come.—θόρ., cf. Matt. xxvi. 5, xxvii. 24, Mark xiv. 2; three times in Acts, xxi. 34, xxiv. 18, and several times in LXX. In xxi. 34 it is used more as in classics of the confused noise of an assembly (cf. Mark v. 38), but in the text it seems to cover the whole riot, and may be translated "riot". — ἀσπασάμενος: "non solum salutabant osculo advenientes verum etiam discessuri," Wetstein, and references; so in classical Greek, cf. also xxi. 6, 7, 19.

Ver. 2. διελθὼν δὲ, see above on xiii. 6, "and when he had gone through," in a missionary progress τὰ μέρη ἐκεῖνα, i.e., of Macedonia, the places where he had founded Churches, Thessalonica, Berœa, Philippi. From Rom. xv. 19 it would appear that his work continued some time, and that round about even unto Illyricum he fully preached the Gospel.

λόγῳ πολλῷ, ἦλθεν εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα· 3. ποιήσας τε μῆνας τρεῖς, γενομένης αὐτῷ ἐπιβουλῆς ὑπὸ τῶν Ἰουδαίων [1] μέλλοντι ἀνάγεσθαι εἰς

[1] D, Syr. H. mg., Ephr. read after ιουδαιων ηθελησεν αναχθηναι εις Σ., which gives rather a different idea, viz., that a plot of the Jews induced Paul to leave Corinth (so Belser, p. 108; Hilgenfeld also adopts, Zw. Th., 1896, p. 368); but Blass transposes the clauses and reads in β: ποιη. τε μ. τ. ηθελ. αναχθηναι εις Σ. και γενηθεισης αυτω επιβουλης υπο των Ι.; see as against this transposition by Blass, Wendt (1899), p. 50. For εγενετο γνωμης του υπο. D, Syr. H. mg., Gig. read ειπεν δε το πνευμα. Blass omits δε in β, and so the antithesis is not maintained. Weiss, p. 98 (note), condemns Blass for making ειπεν το πν. the equivalent of εγεν. γνωμης, whilst in xix. 1 a distinction is decisively drawn between the ιδια βουλη (= γνωμη) of the Apostle and the guidance of the Spirit. γνωμη, but gen. γνωμης is read by ℵAB*E 13, 15, 18, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt.

On the connection of 2 Cor. with this part of Acts, see "II. Corinthians" (Robertson), Hastings' B.D., i., pp. 493, 495; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 286; and on the coincidence between Acts and Romans, l. c., see Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, ii., 4.—τὴν Ἑλλάδα, i.e., Achaia in its Roman sense (approximately at all events); the stay might have included a visit to Athens, but at all events Corinth was visited. A wider sense of the epithet "Greek" would comprise Macedonia also, and Macedonia and Achaia are thus spoken of in close connection as forming the Greek lands in Europe, cf. xix. 21, and Rom. xv. 26, 2 Cor. ix. 2, 1 Thess. i. 8, "Achaia" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D.

Ver. 3. ποιήσας τε μῆνας τρεῖς, cf. xv. 33, xviii. 23.—ἐπιβουλῆς: only in Acts in N.T., see above on ix. 24; the plot may have been formed in the anticipation that it would be easy to carry it through on a pilgrim ship crowded with Jews of Corinth and Asia, hostile to the Apostle; or it may have been the purpose of the conspirators to kill Paul in a crowded harbour like Cenchreæ before the ship actually started.—μέλλ. ἀνάγ., see on xiii. 13. If we read ἐγέν. γνώμης (genitive) (cf. 2 Peter i. 20), nowhere else in N.T., cf. Thuc., i., 113, ὅσοι τῆς αὐτῆς γνώμης ἦσαν, see also Winer-Schmiedel, p. 269.—τοῦ ὑποσ., i.e., the return journey to Jerusalem (Ramsay), but see also Wendt (1899), p. 323.

Ver. 4. συνείπετο δὲ αὐτῷ: only here in N.T., cf. 2 Macc. xv. 2, 3 Macc. v. 48, vi. 21, but frequent in classics.—ἄχρι τῆς Ἀ.: among more recent writers Rendall has argued strongly for the retention of the words, whilst he maintains, nevertheless, that all the companions of the Apostle named here accompanied him to Jerusalem. In his view the words are an antithesis to Ἀσιανοὶ δέ, so that whilst on the one hand one party, viz., six of the deputies, travel with Paul to Philippi, on the other hand the other party consisting of two, viz., the Asian representatives, waited for them at Troas. At Philippi the six deputies and Paul were joined by St. Luke, who henceforth speaks of the deputation in the first person plural, and identifies himself with its members as a colleague. Then from Troas the whole party proceed to Jerusalem (Acts, pp. 119, 303). In this way οὗτοι in ver. 5 is restricted to Tychicus and Trophimus (see also Ramsay, as below), whereas A. and R.V. refer the pronoun to all the deputies, so too Weiss and Wendt. If this is so, the ἡμᾶς, ver. 5, might refer (but see further below) only to Paul and Luke, as the latter would naturally rejoin Paul at Philippi where we left him, cf. xvi. 17. Ramsay explains (St. Paul, p. 287) that the discovery of the Jewish plot altered St. Paul's plan, and that too at the last moment, when delegates from the Churches had already assembled. The European delegates were to sail from Corinth, and the Asian from Ephesus, but the latter having received word of the change of plan went as far as Troas to meet the others, οὗτοι thus referring to Tychicus and Trophimus alone (but see also Askwith, Epistle to the Galatians (1899), pp. 94, 95).

Wendt also favours retention of ἄχρι τῆς Ἀ. and prefers the reading προσελθόντες, but he takes ἡμᾶς in ver. 5 to exclude St. Paul, and refers it to other friends of the Apostle (as distinct from those who accompanied him through Macedonia "as far as Asia"), viz., the author of the "We" sections and others who only now meet the Apostle and his company at Troas. But this obliges us to make a somewhat artificial distinction between ἡμᾶς in ver. 5 with ἡμεῖς in ver. 6, and ἐξεπ. and ἤλθομεν on the one hand, and διετρίψαμεν, ver. 6, on the other, as the latter must be taken to include St.

τὴν Συρίαν, ἐγένετο γνώμη τοῦ ὑποστρέφειν διὰ Μακεδονίας. 4. συνείπετο δὲ αὐτῷ[1] ἄχρι τῆς Ἀσίας[2] Σώπατρος[3] Βεροιαῖος. Θεσσα-

[1] συνειπετο δε αυτῳ, Blass follows D and also inserts προηρχοντο, whilst D omits verb altogether, Syr. H. mg. reads συνειποντο. Apparently D takes μεχρι της A. with εξιεναι, and the names may have been taken with προηρχοντο if Blass is right in regarding this as original; see his Proleg., p. 27.

[2] αχρι της Ασιας om. ℵB 13, Vulg., Sah., Boh., Aethpp., so Tisch., W.H. text, R.V. marg., Weiss; but retained ADEHLP, Syr. P. and H., Arm., Chrys.; (Gig., Wer.) Blass in β (μεχρι); see also W.H., App., p. 97. Wendt also considers that it is probably to be retained, see note in comment.; cf. προελθ., u. s.

[3] After Σωπατρος ℵABDE, Vulg., Boh., Syr. H. mg., Arm., Origint., so Tisch., Alford, W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass add Πυρρου.

Paul, St. Luke, and the whole company, although Wendt justifies the distinction by pointing out that in ver. 13 ἡμεῖς is used exclusive of Paul (cf. xxi. 12).

Mr. Askwith, u. s., p. 93 ff., has recently argued that ἡμεῖς in ver. 6 includes not only St. Luke and St. Paul, but with them the representatives of Achaia (who are not mentioned by name with the other deputies) who would naturally be with St. Paul on his return from Corinth, vv. 2, 3, and he would not travel through Macedonia unaccompanied. In 2 Cor. viii. St. Luke, "the brother," according to tradition, whose praise in the Gospel was spread through all the Churches, had been sent to Corinth with Titus and another "brother," and so naturally any representatives from Achaia would come along with them, pp. 93, 94. No names are given because St. Luke himself was amongst them, and he never mentions his own name, p. 96. The fact that Timothy and Sopater who had been with the Apostle at Corinth when he wrote to the Romans (chap. xvi. 21, if we may identify Σωσίπατρος with the Σώπατρος Πύρρου Βεροιαῖος, Acts xx. 4) are amongst those who waited at Troas is accounted for on the supposition that Timothy and others might naturally go across to inform the Asiatic delegates of Paul's change of plan, and would then proceed with these Asian representatives to Troas to meet the Apostle (p. 94). The presence of Aristarchus and Secundus at Troas is accounted for on the ground that St. Paul, on his way to Achaia, did not expect to return through Macedonia, and so would naturally arrange for the Macedonian delegates, who were not accompanying him into Greece, to meet him somewhere. And the delegates from Thessalonica would naturally cross to Troas with the intention of proceeding to Ephesus (or Miletus), where St. Paul would have touched even if he had sailed for Palestine from Cenchreæ (cf. Acts xviii. 18, 19), p. 95. But against this it may be fairly urged that there is no reason to assume that the Macedonian delegates did not accompany Paul into Greece; Timothy and Sosipater had evidently done so, and all the delegates mentioned seem to have been together in St. Paul's company, συνείπετο αὐτῷ, ver. 4. In the uncertain state of the text it is difficult to come to any decision on the passage. The words ἄχρι τῆς Ἀσίας may easily have been omitted on account of the supposed difficulty connected with the fact that two at least of St. Paul's companions who are named, Trophimus and Aristarchus, went further than Asia, cf. xxi. 29, xxvii. 2, while on the other hand it is somewhat hard to believe that the words could be inserted by a later hand.

On "The Pauline Collection for the Saints and its importance," and the representatives of the Churches in the different provinces, see Rendall, Expositor, November, 1893; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 287, and "Corinth," Hastings' B.D.; Wendt, p. 325 (1899); Hort, Rom. and Ephes., pp. 39 ff. and 173. Nothing could more clearly show the immense importance which St. Paul attached to this contribution for the poor saints than the fact that he was ready to present in person at Jerusalem the members of the deputation and their joint offerings, and that too at a time when his presence in the capital was full of danger, and after he had been expressly warned of the peril, cf. Acts, xxiv. 17, Rom. xv. 25. On the suggestion for the fund and its consummation see 1 Cor. xvi. 1-8, Acts xx. 16, 2 Cor. viii. 10, ix. 2; A.D. 57-58, Rendall, Lightfoot; 56-57, Ramsay. Such a scheme would not only unite all the Gentile Churches in one holy bond of faith and charity, but it would mark their solidarity with the Mother Church λονικέων δὲ Ἀρίσταρχος καὶ Σέκουνδος,[1] καὶ Γάϊος Δερβαῖος καὶ Τιμόθεος[2]· Ἀσιανοὶ δέ, Τυχικὸς καὶ Τρόφιμος. 5.[3] οὗτοι προελθόντες ἔμενον ἡμᾶς ἐν Τρωάδι· 6. ἡμεῖς δὲ ἐξεπλεύσαμεν μετὰ τὰς ἡμέρας τῶν ἀζύμων ἀπὸ Φιλίππων, καὶ ἤλθομεν πρὸς αὐτοὺς εἰς τὴν Τρωάδα

[1] και Γαιος Δ., Blass reads Δερβαιος δε Τιμοθεος, but against this we have the "insurmountable" statement in xvi. 1, so Ramsay, p. 280, so too Wendt (1899), p. 323.

[2] Ασιανοι, D, Syr. H. mg. read Εφεσιοι, so Blass; Wendt approves; see Ramsay, C. R. E., p. 154.

[3] ουτοι, add δε ℵABE, Boh., Syr. H., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt; omit Blass, with DHLP, Vulg., Gig. προελθοντες, this reading of T.R. is retained by Lach., Tisch., Weiss, R.V., W.H. mg.; Blass in text following B³D; and it corresponds with the omission of αχρι της Α. in ver. 4 and the view that Paul was included in the ημας of ver. 5. If, however, the words αχρι της Α. are retained, Wendt argues that προσελθοντες is quite intelligible, and that this verb, which he regards as best supported, ℵAB*EHLP [so W.H.], becomes thus an indirect confirmation of the former disputed words in ver. 4. According to Wendt's view Paul is not included in the ημας of ver. 5, but the ημας refers to the writer of the "We" sections with one or two companions who had not journeyed with Paul through Macedonia to Asia, but only met him in Troas. But a difficulty connected with Wendt's solution would seem to lie in the fact that he is obliged to refer the ημεις in ver. 6 only to the writer of the "We" sections and those with him, whilst the first person in διετριψαμεν includes Paul and his party who have been hitherto excluded from the ημεις and ημας. After εμενον D reads αυτον, so Blass in β, thus plainly separating Paul from the ουτοι.

at Jerusalem; it would be a splendid fulfilment by their own generous and loyal effort of the truth that if one member of the body suffered all the members suffered with it. We know how this vision which St. Paul had before his eyes of a universal brotherhood throughout the Christian world seemed to tarry; and we may understand something of the joy which filled his heart, even amidst his farewell to the elders at Miletus, as he anticipated without misgiving the accomplishment of this διακονία to the saints, a "ministry" which he had received from the Lord Jesus, Acts xx. 24. On the coincidence between the narrative of the Acts cf. xx. 2, 3, xxiv. 17-19, and the notices in St. Paul's Epistles given above, see especially Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, chap. ii., 1.—Σώπατρος Πύρρου Β., see critical note; whether he is the same as the Sopater of Rom. xvi. 21 who was with St. Paul at Corinth we cannot say—possibly the name of his father may be introduced to distinguish him, but perhaps, as Blass says, added in this one case "quod domi nobilis erat".—Γάϊος Δ. καὶ Τ., see above on p. 414, and Knabenbauer's note as against Blass.—Τυχικὸς: Ephes. vi. 21, Col. iv. 7 show that Timothy was in Rome at the time of St. Paul's first imprisonment. He is spoken of as a beloved and faithful minister, and it would appear that as St. Paul was about to send him to Ephesus, he was presumably the bearer of the Epistle which at all events included the Ephesian Church. In Tit. iii. 12 we have another reference which shows the high place Timothy occupied amongst St. Paul's trusted confidential friends, and from 2 Tim. iv. 12 we learn that he had been a sharer in the Apostle's second and heavier captivity, and had only left him to fulfil another mission to Ephesus.—Τρόφιμος: probably like Tychicus an Ephesian. In xxi. 29 he was with St. Paul at Jerusalem, and from 2 Tim. iv. 20 we learn that he was at a later stage the companion of the Apostle after his release from his first imprisonment, and that he had been left by him at Miletus sick. On the absurd attempt to connect this notice of Miletus in the Pastoral Epistles with Acts xx. 4 see Weiss, Die Briefe Pauli an Timotheus und Titus, p. 354; Salmon, Introd., fifth edition, p. 401.

Ver. 5. προελθόντες, see critical note. If we read προσελ. render as in R.V. (margin), "these came, and were waiting for us at Troas," cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 287, and Rendall, in loco.—ἡμᾶς: the introduction of the word is fatal to the idea that Timothy could have been the author of this "We" section.

ἄχρις[1] ἡμερῶν πέντε, οὗ διετρίψαμεν ἡμέρας ἑπτά. 7. Ἐν δὲ τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων, συνηγμένων[2] τῶν μαθητῶν τοῦ κλάσαι ἄρτον, ὁ Παῦλος διελέγετο αὐτοῖς, μέλλων ἐξιέναι τῇ ἐπαύριον, παρέτεινέ τε τὸν λόγον μέχρι μεσονυκτίου· 8. ἦσαν δὲ[3] λαμπάδες ἱκαναὶ ἐν τῷ ὑπερῴῳ οὗ

[1] D has πεμπταιοι instead of αχ. η. π., so Blass in β. It may be simply explanatory of the difficult αχ. η. π. (Weiss).

[2] των μαθητων, according to ℵABDE, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass ημων.

[3] λαμπαδες, D (not Blass in β) reads υπολαμπαδες. According to Phylarch. ap. Ath. υπολ. seems to be a sort of window or look-out (L. and S., edit. 7). This reading is suggestive, but Blass is of opinion that υπολ. "nusquam exstat".

Ver. 6. μετὰ τὰς ἡμ. τῶν ἀ., cf. xii. 3, i.e., the Passover. 1 Cor. v. 7 shows us how they would "keep the Feast". Ramsay's "fixed date in the life of St. Paul," Expositor, May, 1896, depends partly on the assumption that Paul left Philippi the very first day after the close of the Paschal week, but we cannot be sure of this, see Wendt's criticism on Ramsay's view, p. 326, edition 1899, and also Dr. Robertson "I. Corinthians" Hastings' B.D., p. 485.—ἄχρις ἡμ. πέντε: "in five days," i.e., the journey lasted until the fifth day, so D πεμπταῖοι, cf. δευτεραῖοι, xxviii. 13. In xvi. 11 the journey only lasted two (three?) days, but here probably adverse winds must be taken into account; or the five days may include a delay at Neapolis, the port of Philippi, or the land journey to the port; on ἄχρις see above i. 2.—ἡμέρας ἑπτά, so as to include a whole week, and so the first day of the week, cf. 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13, which shows how reluctantly Paul left Troas on his former visit, but see on the other hand, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 295, who thinks that St. Paul would not have voluntarily stayed seven days at Troas.

Ver. 7. τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σ., "on the first day of the week," μιᾷ being used, the cardinal for the ordinal πρῶτος, like Hebrew אֶחָד, in enumerating the days of the month, see Plummer's note on Luke xxiv. 1 and cf. xviii. 12 (so Blass). We must remember that 1 Cor. had been previously written, and that the reference in 1 Cor. xvi. 2 to "the first day of the week" for the collection of alms naturally connects itself with the statement here in proof that this day had been marked out by the Christian Church as a special day for public worship, and for "the breaking of the bread". On the significance of this selection of the "first day," see Milligan, Resurrection, pp. 67-69; Maclear, Evidential Value of the Lord's Day, "Present Day Tracts" 54; and for other references, Witness of the Epistles, pp. 368, 369; Wendt (1899), p. 326.—μέλλων: Burton, Moods and Tenses, p. 71.—παρέτεινε, see μῦθον, Arist., Poet., xvii., 5, λόγους, and ix. 4, μῦθον.—μεσονυκτίου, cf. xvi. 25.

Ver. 8. λαμπάδες ἱκαναί, see critical note and reading in D. The words have been taken to indicate clearly that the accident was not due to darkness coming on through Paul's lengthy discourse (so Weiss and Wendt), whilst Meyer regards them as introduced to show that the fall of the young man was not perceived at once. Others (so Felten) hold that the words mark the joy at the Sacramental Presence of the Lord and Bridegroom of the Church (Matt. xxv. 1), and Nösgen sees in them a note of joy in the celebration of the Christian Sunday (see also Kuinoel). But it is also allowable to see in this notice the graphic and minute touch of one who was an eye-witness of the scene, and who described it, as he remembered it, in all its vividness (Hackett, Blass). We can scarcely see in the words with Ewald an intention on the part of the narrative to guard against any suspicion attaching to the night meetings of the Christians (so Calvin, Bengel, Lechler); the date, as Nösgen says, is too early (so too Overbeck). Lewin also takes Ewald's view, but with the alternative that the lights may have been mentioned to exclude any suspicion in the reader's mind of any deception with regard to the miracle.

Ver. 9. Εὔτυχος: we are not told what position he occupied, but there is no hint that he was a servant.—ἐπὶ τῆς θυρ.: on the window sill—there were no windows of glass, and the lattice or door was open probably on account of the heat from the lamps, and from the number present—the fact that Eutychus thus sat

ἦσαν συνηγμένοι. 9. καθήμενος δέ τις νεανίας ὀνόματι Εὔτυχος ἐπὶ τῆς θυρίδος, καταφερόμενος ὕπνῳ[1] βαθεῖ, διαλεγομένου τοῦ Παύλου ἐπὶ πλεῖον, κατενεχθεὶς ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕπνου, ἔπεσεν ἀπὸ τοῦ τριστέγου κάτω, καὶ ἤρθη νεκρός. 10. καταβὰς δὲ ὁ Παῦλος ἐπέπεσεν αὐτῷ, καὶ συμπεριλαβὼν εἶπε, Μὴ θορυβεῖσθε· ἡ γὰρ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ ἐστιν. 11. ἀναβὰς δὲ καὶ κλάσας[2] ἄρτον καὶ γευσάμενος, ἐφ' ἱκανόν at the window points to the crowded nature of the assembly, cf. 2 Kings i. 2, where a different word is used in LXX, although θυρίς is also frequently found.—καταφερ. ὕ. β.: the two participles are to be carefully distinguished (but R.V. does not); "who was gradually oppressed," or "becoming oppressed with sleep," present participle; "being borne down by his sleep," i.e., overcome by it, aorist. Rendall takes ἐπὶ πλεῖον with κατενεχθεὶς (so W.H. margin), "and being still more overcome with the sleep," but the words are usually taken with διαλεγ. See Bengel, Nösgen, Alford, Holtzmann, Weiss, Ramsay, Page on the force of the participles: "sedentem somnus occupavit . . . somno oppressus cecidit," Bengel. καταφέρεσθαι: used only in Luke in N.T., and in no corresponding sense in LXX; a medical term, and so much so that it was used more frequently absolutely than with ὕπνος in medical writings, and the two participles thus expressing the different stages of sleep would be quite natural in a medical writer.—βαθεῖ: one of the epithets joined with ὕπνος by the medical writers, see Hobart, pp. 48, 49, and his remarks on Luke xxii. 45, p. 84. The verb is also used in the same sense by other writers as by Aristotle, Josephus, see instances in Wetstein, but Zahn reckons the whole phrase as medical, Einleitung, ii., p. 436.—καὶ ἤρθη νεκρός: the words positively assert that Eutychus was dead—they are not ὡσεὶ νεκρός, cf. Mark ix. 26, and the attempt to show that the words in ver. 10, "his life is in him," indicate apparent death, or that life is still thought of as not having left him (so apparently even Zöckler, whilst he strongly maintains the force of the preceding words), cannot be called satisfactory; see on the other hand Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 290, 291, and Wendt, in loco.

Ver. 10. καταβὰς: by the outside staircase common in Eastern houses.—ἐπέπεσεν αὐτῷ καὶ συμ., cf. 1 Kings xvii. 21, 22; 2 Kings iv. 34; there as here the purport of the act was a restoration to life.—Μὴ θορ.: "make ye no ado," R.V., cf. Mark v. 39 (Mark ix. 23), where the word is used of the loud weeping and wailing of the mourners in the East; see above on ix. 39.—ἡ γὰρ ψ., see above.

Ver. 11. κλάσας ἄρτον: if we read τὸν ἄρ., see critical note, "the bread," so R.V., i.e., of the Eucharist; so Syriac. The words evidently refer back to ver. 7, see Blass, Gram., p. 148.—γευσ.: often taken to refer not to the Eucharist, but to the partaking of the Agape or common meal which followed. If so, it certainly appears as if St. Paul had soon taken steps to prevent the scandals which occurred in Corinth from the Holy Communion being celebrated during or after a common meal, 1 Cor. ix. 23, since here the Eucharist precedes, Luckock, Footprints of the Apostles as traced by St. Luke, ii., 199. Wendt, who still identifies the breaking of the bread with the Agape (so Holtzmann, Weiss), protests against the view of Kuinoel and others that reference is here made to a breakfast which St. Paul took for his coming journey. Dean Plumptre refers to the use of γεύομαι in Heb. vi. 4 as suggesting that here too reference is made to the participation of the Eucharist; but, on the other hand, in Acts x. 10 (see Blass, in loco) the word is used of eating an ordinary meal, and Wendt refers it to the enjoyment of the Agape (cf. also Knabenbauer, in loco). Weiss urges that the meaning of simply "tasting" is to be adopted here, and that τε shows that Paul only "tasted" the meal, i.e., the Agape, and hurried on with his interrupted discourse, whilst Lewin would take γευσ. absolutely here, and refer it to a separate ordinary meal; although he maintains that the previous formula κλάσ. τὸν ἄρτον must refer to the Eucharist. In LXX the verb is τε ὁμιλήσας ἄχρις αὐγῆς, οὕτως ἐξῆλθεν. 12.[1] ἤγαγον δὲ τὸν παῖδα ζῶντα, καὶ παρεκλήθησαν οὐ μετρίως. 13. Ἡμεῖς δὲ[2] προελθόντες ἐπὶ τὸ πλοῖον, ἀνήχθημεν εἰς τὴν Ἄσσον, ἐκεῖθεν μέλλοντες ἀναλαμβάνειν τὸν Παῦλον· οὕτω γὰρ ἦν διατεταγμένος, μέλλων αὐτὸς frequent, but there is no case in which it means definitely more than to taste, although in some cases it might imply eating a meal, e.g., Gen. xxv. 30; for its former sense see, e.g., Jonah iii. 7. In modern Greek γευματίζω = to dine, so γεῦμα = dinner.—ἐφ' ἱκανόν τε ὁμιλ.: on St. Luke's use of ἱκανός with temporal significance see above on p. 215, cf. with this expression 2 Macc. viii. 25. ὁμιλ.: only in Luke in N.T., cf. Luke xxiv. 14, 15, Acts xxiv. 26; here, "talked with them," R.V., as of a familiar meeting, elsewhere "communed," R.V.; so in classical Greek, and in Josephus, and also in modern Greek (Kennedy); in LXX, Dan. i. 19: ὡμίλησεν αὐτοῖς ὁ β., "the king communed with them". In the passage before us the alternative rendering "when he had stayed in their company" is given by Grimm-Thayer, sub v.—ἄχρις αὐγῆς, cf. Polyaen., iv., 18, κατὰ τὴν πρώτην αὐγὴν τῆς ἡμέρας (Wetstein); only here in N.T., found in Isa. lix. 9, 2 Macc. xii. 9, but not in same sense as here.—οὕτως, cf. xx. 7, after a participle, as often in classical Greek, Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 175, see also xxvii. 17, and Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 190 (1893).

[1] Instead of ηγαγον D has ασπαζομενων δε αυτων ηγαγεν τον νεανισκον ζωντα. Blass and Hilgenfeld, however, read ηγαγον in the β text. But Wendt thinks that ηγαγεν may not be a mere error, and that Paul is conceived of in D as himself bringing the boy alive at the scene of departure, and thus conferring comfort, Wendt (1899), p. 327.

[2] προελθοντες ℵB²CL, Tisch., W.H. text, Weiss, Wendt; but προσ- AB*EHP, W.H. marg. D has κατελθοντες. επι for εις ℵABCE, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt.

Ver. 12. ἤγαγον: the subject must be supplied; probably those who had attended to the boy, and who, now that he was sufficiently recovered, brought him back to the room. Rendall thinks that the expression means that they took the lad home after the assembly was over. The comfort is derived from the recovery of the boy, as is indicated by ζῶντα, and it is forced to refer it to the consolation which they received from the boy's presence, as a proof which the Apostle had left behind him of divine and miraculous help (so Wendt, Weiss); see also D, critical note, and Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 291.—ζῶντα: the word is pointless unless on the supposition that the accident had been fatal. It is in fact impossible to deny that a miracle is intended to be narrated; otherwise the introduction of the whole story is meaningless, as Overbeck insists against Baur and Renan. The word νεκρός, the action of Paul, the word ζῶντα all point to an actual death, whilst the vivid details in the narrative also indicate the presence of an eye-witness as an informant. Schneckenburger has shown exhaustively, as Zeller admits, that an actual raising of the dead is intended; but we are asked to see in the narrative only an attempt to set off the raising of Eutychus against the raising of Tabitha at Joppa, a parallel between Paul and Peter; so Baur, and recently Overbeck and Weizsäcker. But the conclusion of Overbeck is disappointing in face of the fact that he dwells (p. 333) most pointedly upon the difference between the narrative here and in ix. 36—how in this latter case we have the expectation of the miracle emphasised, whilst here it is entirely wanting; how too the laudatory description of Tabitha may be contrasted with the simple mention of the name, Eutychus here.—οὐ μετρίως: often in Plutarch, cf. 2 Macc. xv. 38. On Luke's use of οὐ with an adjective, to express the opposite, see Lekebusch, Apostelgeschichte, p. 62; Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 52; and four times in "We" sections (twelve times in rest of Acts, rare in rest of N.T.), xx. 12, xxvii. 14, 20, xxviii. 2; Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 153.

Ver. 13. ἡμεῖς, i.e., without Paul.—Ἄσσον: south of Troas in the Roman province of Asia, and some miles east of Cape Lectum. The opposite coast of Lesbos was about seven miles distant. Its harbour gave it a considerable importance in the coasting trade of former days. A Roman road connected it with πεζεύειν. 14. ὡς δὲ[1] συνέβαλεν ἡμῖν εἰς τὴν Ἄσσον, ἀναλαβόντες αὐτὸν ἤλθομεν εἰς Μιτυλήνην· 15. κἀκεῖθεν ἀποπλεύσαντες, τῇ ἐπιούσῃ κατηντήσαμεν ἀντικρὺ Χίου[2]· τῇ δὲ ἑτέρᾳ παρεβάλομεν εἰς Σάμον·

[1] συνεβαλεν CDH², Blass, Hilg.; this is more fitting to the sense than the imperfect (Wendt), but the latter tense, συνεβαλλεν, is read in ℵABEP 40, 100, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss.

[2] Instead of ετερᾳ B 15, 19, 73, has the remarkable reading εσπερᾳ, which Weiss accepts, W.H. marg. But Wendt (1899), p. 428, discusses and rejects, on the ground that the charge was introduced by a scribe who did not take κατην. αντικρυ Χιου as meaning a station for the night at Chios, and therefore represented the next station as the stopping place for the night of the same day.

Troas and the Troad coast. The sculptures from the Temple of Athena erected on the hill on which Assos itself was built form some of the most important remains of archaic Greek art: most of them are now in Paris. "Assos" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D., B.D.². Steph. Byz. describes Assos as situated ἐφ' ὑψηλοῦ καὶ ὀξέος καὶ δυσανόδου τόπου.—ἀναλαμβάνειν: assumere in navem; cf. Polyb., xxx., 9, 8. The only other instance at all parallel in N.T. is 2 Tim. iv. 11, where we might render "to pick him up on the way," Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 437.—διατεταγ.: with middle significance, cf. vii. 44, xxiv. 23; Winer-Moulton, xxxix., 3.—πεζεύειν: "to go by land," R.V. (margin, "on foot"): "de terrestri (non necessario pedestri) itinere," Blass; a much shorter route than the sea voyage round Cape Lectum. The land journey was about twenty miles, Itin. Anton., B.D.². Probably Paul took the journey in this way for ministerial purposes; others suggest that he did so for the sake of his health, others to avoid the snare of the Jews, or from a desire for solitude. But it may be questioned whether this somewhat lengthy foot journey would be accomplished without any attendant at all. It does not follow, as has been supposed, that the ship was hired by Paul himself, but that he used its putting in at Assos for his own purpose.

Ver. 14. συνέβαλεν, cf. xvii. 18. The verb is peculiar to St. Luke; its meaning here is classical, cf. also Jos., Ant., ii., 7, 5. Rendall thinks that the imperfect (see critical note) may mean that Paul fell in with the ship while still on his way to Assos, and was taken on board at once; he therefore renders "as he came to meet us at Assos".—Μιτυλήνην: the capital of Lesbos, about thirty miles from Assos, and so an easy day's journey; Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 84, cf. Hor., Od., i., 7, 1; Ep., i., 11, 17. Its northern harbour into which the ship would sail is called by Strabo, xiii., 2, μέγας καὶ βαθύς, χώματι σκεπαζόμενος (Wetstein).

Ver. 15. κἀκεῖθεν, see on xvi. 12, xiv. 26.—κατηντήσαμεν, cf. xvi. 1, xviii. 19, 24, "we reached a point on the mainland," Ramsay, ἀντικρὺ Χ. over against, i.e., opposite Chios; often in Greek writers, only here in N.T., but W.H., Weiss, ἄντικρυς, 3 Macc. v. 16 (Neh. xii. 8, see Hatch and Redpath). On καταντᾶν εἰς, and καταντᾶν ἀντ. as here, see on xvi. 1, xviii. 19; Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 49.—Χίου: The island Chios (Scio) in the Ægean was separated from the Asian coast by a channel which at its narrowest was only five miles across. The ship carrying St. Paul would pass through this picturesque channel on its way south from Mitylene. An interesting comparison with the voyage of St. Paul may be found in Herod's voyage by Rhodes, Cos, Chios and Mitylene, towards the Black Sea (Jos., Ant., xvi., 2, 2). Amongst the seven rivals for the honour of being the birthplace of Homer, the claims of Chios are most strongly supported by tradition. On the legendary and historic connections of the places named in this voyage see Plumptre, in loco, and "Chios" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D.—τῇ δὲ ἑτέρᾳ: (see critical note). Wetstein calls attention to the variety of phrases, τῇ ἑτ., τῇ ἐπιούσῃ, τῇ ἐχομ. The phrase before us is found in xxvii. 3, so that it only occurs in the "We" sections and nowhere else in Acts, but the expression "the next day" occurs so much more frequently in the "We" sections than in any other passages of the same length that we might expect a larger variety of phrases to express it, Hawkins, Horæ Synop., pp. 153, 154; and Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 50.—παρεβάλομεν εἰς Σ.: "we struck across to Samos," Ramsay, cf. Thuc., iii., 32, where the verb means "to cross over to Ionia" (see Mr. Page's note, and

[1] και μειναντες εν Τ., so DHLP, Syr. P. H., Sah., Chrys., so Meyer, Alford, Blass in β, and even by Weiss (not by Wendt), Introd., p. 57, and Codex D, p. 109; cf. xxi. 1. Corssen, too, regards favourably, G. G. A., p. 441, 1896, supported by Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 294, Belser and Zöckler. Weiss cannot see any reason for its omission, and therefore retains it. The words may, however, have been omitted because in the text Trogyllium seems to be placed in Samos, but see also Wendt, note, p. 328 (1899). For the omission, ℵABCE, Vulg., Boh., Arm., Aethpp., Tisch., R.V. only in marg., W.H. describe as Western and Syrian; these authorities read in text τῃ δε εχομ. Ramsay's interesting note, C. R. E., p. 155, should also be consulted in favour of the retention of the words. Τρωγιλιᾳ, so Blass in β, see note in loco; Τρωγυλιῳ W.H. and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 47.

[2] κεκρικει is read for εκρινε in ℵAB*DE, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Wendt, Weiss, Blass. Instead of οπως μη γενηται α. χρονοτριβ. D (Gig.) has μηποτε γενηθη αυτῳ κατασχεσις τις—Weiss considers this as a mere explanation of the rare χρονοτριβ. κατασχεσις is used twice in N.T., Acts vii. 5, 45, but not in the sense required here; "mora" in Gig. Blass accepts in β text, and there is much better authority for χρονοτριβ. in classical Greek than for κατασχεσις in the sense of this passage.

[3] ην, but ειη is supported by ℵABCE 13, 15, 18, 36, 180, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. Meyer and Alford regard as gram. corr., but too well supported (Wendt).

the passage quoted also in Wetstein, and L. and S.). On the frequency of this and other nautical terms in Acts cf. Klostermann, u. s., p. 49.—καὶ μείν. ἐν Τρω., see critical note.—Μίλητον: practically the port of Ephesus. The latter city had long gained the pre-eminence once enjoyed by Miletus, the former capital of Ionia, Pliny, N. H., v., 31; cf. Herod., v., 28-36, for the revolt of Miletus against Persia and its disastrous consequences. Miletus had been the mother of some eighty colonies. Here Thales and Anaximander were born. The silting up of the Menander had altered its position even in St. Paul's day, and now it is several miles from the sea; Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 90; Renan, Saint Paul, p. 501; Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 480.

Ver. 16. ἔκρινε (see critical note) . . . παραπλεῦσαι τὴν Ἔ.: "to sail past Ephesus," R.V., i.e., without stopping there. The words have sometimes been interpreted as if St. Paul had control over a ship which he had hired himself, and could stop where he pleased, so Alford, Hackett, Rendall. But if so, there seems no definite reason for his going to Miletus at all, as it would have been shorter for him to have stopped at Ephesus, or to have made his farewell address there. According to Ramsay the probabilities are that Paul experienced at Troas some delay in continuing his journey. In starting from Troas he had therefore to choose a vessel making no break in its voyage except at Miletus, or a vessel intending to stop at Ephesus, perhaps as its destination, perhaps with a previous delay elsewhere. He determined for the former by the shortness of the time, and his desire to reach Jerusalem. He may no doubt have been also influenced to some extent by the thought that it would be difficult to tear himself away from a Church which had so many claims upon him, and by the reflection that hostilities might be aroused against him and his progress further impeded (cf. McGiffert, p. 339, who thinks that the author's reason for St. Paul's desire not to visit Ephesus "is entirely satisfactory"). — χρονοτριβ.: nowhere else in N.T. or in LXX, but in Arist., Plut.—γένηται αὐτῷ, cf. xi. 26 for construction. —ἔσπευδε γὰρ: if the verb expresses as the imperfect intimates the whole character of the journey (Blass, Gram., p. 216), the repeated long delays at first sight seem inexplicable, but we know nothing definitely of the special circumstances which may have occasioned each delay, and we must not lose sight of the fact that the Apostle would have to guard against the constant uncertainty which would be always involved in a coasting voyage. Whether St. Paul reached

17. Ἀπὸ δὲ τῆς Μιλήτου πέμψας εἰς Ἔφεσον, μετεκαλέσατο τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους τῆς ἐκκλησίας. 18. ὡς δὲ παρεγένοντο πρὸς αὐτόν,[1] εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, Ὑμεῖς ἐπίστασθε, ἀπὸ πρώτης ἡμέρας ἀφ᾽ ἧς ἐπέβην εἰς τὴν Ἀσίαν,[2] πῶς μεθ᾽ ὑμῶν τὸν πάντα χρόνον ἐγενόμην, 19. δουλεύων τῷ Κυρίῳ μετὰ πάσης ταπεινοφροσύνης καὶ πολλῶν δακρύων καὶ πειρασμῶν, τῶν συμβάντων μοι ἐν ταῖς ἐπιβουλαῖς τῶν Ἰουδαίων·

[1] After αυτον (A)D (E, Gig., Vulg.) add ομοσε οντων αυτων, so Blass in β text. Harris, Four Lectures, etc., p. 61, thinks conflation here of α and β, so Gig. is double and reads "cum convenissent ad eum simulque essent".

[2] After Ασιαν D adds ως τριετιαν η και πλειον, the form of the phrase does not look original; τριετια occurs in xx. 31 and nowhere else in N.T. Vogel, it may be noted, classes it as one of the medical words in Luke's writings; see on ver. 31. For πως D has ποταπως, nowhere else in N.T.; but ποταπος six times in N.T., twice in Luke, only once in LXX.

Jerusalem in time we are not told. St. Chrysostom maintained that he did, see also Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 296, 297; McGiffert, p. 340 (on the other hand, Weiss, Renan, Felten). Mr. Turner, Chron. of N. T., p. 422, holds that the Apostle probably reached Jerusalem just in time, while Farrar sees in xxiv. 11 an intimation that he arrived on the very eve of the Feast. The Pentacostal Feast was the most crowded, most attended by foreigners, cf. ii. 1.

Ver. 17. Ἀπὸ δὲ τῆς Μ. π.: Apparently the Apostle could reckon on a stay of some days at Miletus. If we take into account the landing, the despatching a messenger to Ephesus, and the summoning and journeying of the elders to Miletus, probably, as Ramsay thinks, the third day of the stay at Miletus would be devoted to the presbyters.—μετεκαλέσατο: "called to him," R.V., cf. ii. 39 (and see on vii. 14, only in Acts), indicating authority or earnestness in the invitation.—τοὺς πρεσβ., see on xii. 25, and also below on ver. 28. For Pauline words and phraseology characterising the addresses, see following notes.

When Spitta remarks (Apostelgeschichte, p. 252 ff.) that the speech at Miletus is inferior to no part of Acts, not even to the description of the voyage in chap. xxvii., in vividness of expression and intensity of feeling, he expresses the opinion of every unbiassed reader. He justly too lays stress upon the fact that while criticism admits the forcible and direct impression derived from the speech, it fails to account for it in the most natural way, viz., by the fact that whilst for the addresses delivered in the Pisidian Antioch and in Athens we are dependent upon a report derived from hearsay, we are here in possession of the testimony of an eyewitness, and of a hearer of the speech (p. 252). Spitta (p. 254) defends the speech against the usual objections. It is disappointing to find that Hilgenfeld is content to regard the whole speech as interpolated by his "author to Theophilus". Clemen refers the whole speech to his R. or to R.A.; thus whilst ver. 19a is referred to R., 19b with its reference to the plots of the Jews is ascribed to R.A. (Redactor Antijudaicus); Jüngst ascribes ver. 19b from the words καὶ δακρύων . . . Ἰουδ. to the Redactor, but the previous part of the chap. xxi. to ταπεινοφροσύνης, ver. 19, to his source A. So ver. 38 with its reference to ver. 25 is referred to the Redactor; whilst Clemen refers ver. 38a to his R.A., 38b to R.

Ver. 18. ὑμεῖς: "ye yourselves," R.V., ipsi, emphatic, cf. x. 37, xv. 7.—ἀπὸ π. ἡ.: to be connected with what follows, although it is quite possible that the word may hold a middle place (Alford), connected partly with ἐπίσ. and partly with ἐγεν.—ἐπέβην: "set foot in Asia," R.V., only in Acts, except Matt. xxi. 5, also with the dative of place, Acts xxv. 1, but the local meaning is doubtful (LXX, Josh. xiv. 9). Rendall renders "I took ship for Asia," but although the expression elsewhere refers to a voyage, cf. xxi. 2, 4, 6, xxvii. 2, it is not always so used, e.g., xxv. 1.—πῶς μεθ᾽ ὑ. . . . ἐγεν., cf. vii. 38 (versor cum), ix. 19, Mark xvi. 10. Bethge points out that the phrase is always used of intimate association and contrasts the less intimate significance of σύν. See also critical note and reading in D.

Ver. 19. δουλεύων: the word occurs

six times in St. Paul's Epistles of serving God, the Lord, Christ, 1 Thess. i. 9, Rom. xii. 11 (R., margin, τῷ καιρῷ), xiv. 18, xvi. 18, Ephes. vi. 7, Col. iii. 24 (once in Matthew and Luke, of serving God, Matt. vi. 24, Luke xvi. 13), and cf. St. Paul's expression δοῦλος of himself, Rom. i. 1, Gal. i. 10, Phil. i. 1, Tit. i. 1.—μετὰ πάσης ταπεινοφ.: this use of πᾶς may be called eminently Pauline, cf. Ephes. i. 3, 8, iv. 2, vi. 18, 2 Cor. viii. 7, xii. 12, 1 Tim. iii. 4; 2 Tim. iv. 2, Tit. ii. 15, iii. 2 (see Hackett's note). ταπειν., a word which may justly be called Pauline, as out of seven places in the N.T. it is used five times by St. Paul in his Epistles, and once in his address in the passage before us; Ephes. iv. 2, Phil. ii. 3, Col. ii. 18, 23, iii. 12 (elsewhere, only in 1 Peter v. 5). It will be noted that it finds a place in three Epistles of the First Captivity, although used once disparagingly, Col. iii. 18. In pagan ethics ταπεινός was for the most part a depreciatory characteristic, although some few notable exceptions may be quoted, Trench, Synonyms, i., 171 ff. In the LXX and Apocrypha it has a high moral significance and is opposed to ὕβρις in all its forms. The noun is not found either in LXX or Apocrypha, and the adjective ταπεινόφρων (1 Peter iii. 8) and the verb ταπεινοφρονεῖν (not in N.T.), although each found in LXX once, the former in Prov. xxix. 23 and the latter in Ps. cxxx. 2 (cf. instances in Aquila and Symmachus, Hatch and Redpath), cannot be traced in classical Greek before the Christian era, and then not in a laudatory sense. The noun occurs in Jos., B. J., iv., 9, 2, but in the sense of pusillanimity, and also in Epictet., Diss., iii., 24, 56, but in a bad sense (Grimm-Thayer). But for St. Paul as for St. Peter the life of Christ had conferred a divine honour upon all forms of lowliness and service, and every Christian was bidden to an imitation of One Who had said: πραΰς εἰμι καὶ ταπεινὸς τῇ καρδίᾳ, Lightfoot on Phil. ii. 3; "Ethics" (T. B. Strong), Hastings' B.D., i., 786; Cremer, Wörterbuch, sub v. ταπεινός.—δακρύων, cf. ver. 31, 2 Cor. ii. 4, Phil. iii. 18. "Lachrymæ sanctæ . . . cum his tamen consistit gaudium": Bengel. St. Paul was no Stoic, for whom ἀπάθεια was a virtue, the accompaniment of wisdom and the passport to perfection; see Rom. xii. 15: "in every age the Christian temper has shivered at the touch of Stoic apathy". Here the word refers not to the Apostle's outward trials which were rather a source of joy, but to his sorrow of heart for his brethren and for the world, ἔπασχε γὰρ ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀπολλυμένων, Chrysostom.—πειρασμῶν, cf. St. Paul's own words, 1 Thess. iii. 3, Phil. i. 27, 2 Cor. i. 6, vi. 4-10, 2 Cor. xi. 26, κινδύνοις ἐκ γενους (Gal. iv. 14). In our Lord's own life and ministry there had been "temptations," Luke iv. 13, xxii. 28; and a beatitude rested upon the man who endured temptation, James i. 12 and 2. The noun is found no less than six times in St. Luke's Gospel, but only here in Acts. It occurs four times in St. Paul's Epistles, and may be fairly classed as Lucan-Pauline (Bethge). On its use in N.T. and LXX see Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, p. 71 ff., and compare Mayor, Epistle of St. James, i., 2.—ἐπιβ. τῶν 'Ι.: evidently classed amongst the πειρασμῶν, Hatch, u. s., although we must not suppose that St. Luke tells us of all the Apostle's dangers, trials and temptations here any more than elsewhere. Nothing of the kind is mentioned in connection definitely with the Ephesian Jews, "sed res minime dubia, xxi. 27," Blass. The noun has not been found in any classical author, but it occurs in Dioscorides, Præf., i., see Grimm, sub v., and several times in LXX, six times in Ecclus. and in 1 Macc. ii. 52.

Ver. 20. ὑπεστειλάμην: "how that I shrank not from declaring unto you anything that was profitable," R.V., cf. ver. 27, where βουλήν follows the same verb ἀναγγέλλειν, here followed by οὐδέν; on the construction see Page's note, in loco. The verb means to draw or shrink back from, out of fear or regard for another. In the same sense in classical Greek with οὐδέν or μηδέν: "locutio Demosthenica." Blass and Wendt, cf. also Jos., B. J., i., 20, 21; Vita, 54; in LXX, Deut. i. 17, Exod. xxiii. 21, Job xiii. 8, Wisd. vi. 7, Hab. ii. 4; see Westcott on Heb. x. 38. It is used once in Gal. ii. 12 by Paul himself. It is possible that the verb may have been used metaphorically by St. Paul from its use in the active voice as a nautical term to reef or lower sail, and there would be perhaps a special appropriateness in the metaphor, as St. Paul had just landed, and the sails of the ship may have been before his eyes in speaking, to say nothing of the fact that the word would become familiar to him day by day on the voyage (see Humphry, Plumptre, Farrar); but it is not well to press this special metaphorical usage too far here, especially as the word is frequently used elsewhere of military rather than nautical matters (see Lightfoot's note on Gal ii. 12, and the use of the verb in Polybius).—τῶν συμφ., cf. 1 Cor. vii. 35, x. 33; Pauline: "the things profitable for their salvation," a message not always agreeable, but which nevertheless the Apostle spoke with the same παῤῥησία (ὑποστέλλεσθαι is the opposite of παῤῥησιάζεσθαι, Page) which characterised him. Blass compares also the whole phrase ὑποστείλασθαι περὶ ὧν ὑμῖν συμφέρειν ἡγοῦμαι, Dem., i., 16.—δημ. καὶ κατ' οἴκους: publice et privatim, another and a further glimpse of the Apostle's work at Ephesus: publicly in the synagogue and in the school of Tyrannus, privately as in the Church in the house of Aquila and Priscilla, 1 Cor. xvi. 19.

Ver. 21. διαμαρτ., see above on p. 92; Lucan - Pauline. — μετάν. καὶ πίστιν, cf. the earliest notes in the preaching of Jesus, Mark i. 15, and these were equally the notes of the preaching of St. Peter and St. Paul alike. Whether Paul was preaching to Jews or Gentiles, to philosophers at Athens or to peasants at Lystra, the substance of his teaching was the same under all varieties of forms, cf. xiv. 15, xvii. 30, xxvi. 20. It is quite arbitrary to refer μετάνοια to the Gentile and πίστις to the Jew.—Ἰουδ. τε καὶ Ἕλλησι, Pauline, cf. Rom. i. 16, ii. 9, 10, iii. 9, 12, 1 Cor. i. 24.

Ver. 22. καὶ νῦν ἰδού: the exact phrase occurs again in ver. 25, and only once elsewhere in words ascribed to Paul, xiii. 11 (ἰδοὺ νῦν, twice in Paul only, 2 Cor. vi. 2).—δεδεμένος τῷ πνεύματι: "bound in the spirit," compulsus animo, Blass; so δέω in classical Greek, Xen., Cyr., viii., 1, 12; Plato, Rep., viii., p. 567 e, cf. xix. 21, xviii. 25, 1 Cor. v. 3. The fact that the Holy Spirit is specifically so called in ver. 23 seems to decide for the above rendering in this verse; but see Weiss on ver. 23; Ramsay also renders "constrained by the Spirit". Possibly πνεῦμα is named as that part of the man in closest union with the Spirit of God, cf. Rom. viii. 16, so that the sense is not affected. If we compare with xix. 21 the expression presents an advance in the Apostle's thought—his purpose becomes plainer, and the obligation more definite, as the Spirit witnesses with his spirit. The expression may mean that the Apostle regarded himself as already bound in the spirit, i.e., although not outwardly bound, he yet knows and feels himself as one bound. For St. Paul's frequent use of πνεῦμα cf. Rom. i. 9, viii. 16, xii. 11, 1 Cor. ii. 11, v. 3, 4, xiv. 14, etc. Oecumenius and Theophylact take πνεύματι with πορεύομαι, i.e., bound, as good as bound, I go by the leading of the Spirit to Jerusalem; but this seems forced. Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, ii., 5, remarks on the undesigned coincidence with Rom. xv. 30.—συναντήσοντά μοι: the verb is found only in Luke in N.T. (except Heb. vii. 10 as a quotation, Gen. xiv. 17), and only here in this sense, cf. Eccles. ii. 14, ix. 11, also Plut., Sulla, 2; Polyb., xx., 7, 14; middle, τὰ συναντώμενα. On the rarity of the future participle in Greek, and its use in this passage "an exception which proves the rule," see Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 126.

Ver. 23. πλὴν ὅτι: The collocation is found nowhere else in N.T. except in Phil. i. 18, only that (so Alford, Lightfoot, W.H., see Lightfoot, l. c., for parallels), i.e., knowing one thing only, etc., "I do not ask to see the distant scene;

But R.V. is supported by Tisch., W.H., Weiss, following ℵ*BCD^2, so Sah., Boh., Syr. P., Arm., Gig., Lucif., Or. See also Field., Ot. Norv., iii., p. 85; Weiss, Codex D, p. 100. ως τελειωσαι, but W.H. (Weiss, Rendall) ως τελειωσω (-σαι W.H. mg.); see comment. Blass in α conjectures ωστε τελειωσαι; τε could easily drop out before the τελ. In β Blass reads του τελειωσαι with D; ωστε E; ως το C. μετα χαρας om. ℵABD 13, 40, 81, Vulg., several verss., Tisch., Blass, W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. After διαμαρτ. D, Sah., Gig., Lucif., Ephr. insert Ιουδαιοις τε και Ελλησι, see ver. 21.

[2] After βασ. ℵABC 13 omit του Θ., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. D, Sah., Hilg. read του Ιησου (Gig., Lucif. domini I.); Blass rejects—contrary to usage of Acts (Weiss).

one step enough for me," so from step to step κατὰ πόλιν, on his journey, St. Paul was warned and guided, cf. xxi. 4, 11.—κατὰ πόλιν, Lucan-Pauline; κατά used several times by Luke, alone amongst the synoptists, in his Gospel and in the Acts with this distributive force in connection with πόλις; Luke viii. 1, 4, xiii. 22, cf. xv. 21; in the text, as also in Titus i. 5; the only other passage in which the collocation occurs in N.T., the phrase is adopted by St. Paul.—δεσμὰ καὶ θλίψεις: δεσμά in St. Luke; Luke viii. 29, Acts xvi. 26, but it is noticeable that the two nouns are found together in Phil. i. 17, and in 2 Cor. i. 8. θλίψις is used of the affliction which befel the Apostle in Asia, including that of public danger, as well as illness and mental distress. On the variation between masculine and neuter in δεσμός and in other nouns see Blass, Gram., p. 28.—μένουσιν: only twice in N.T., with accusative of the person, here and in ver. 5.

Ver. 24. See critical note. "But I hold not my life of any account, as dear unto myself," R.V., reading λόγου for λόγον, omitting οὐδὲ ἔχω and μου. Both verbs ἔχω and ποιοῦμαι are found in similar phrases in LXX, Tobit vi. 16, Job xxii. 4, so also in classical Greek (Wetstein). The former verb is used in N.T. as = habere, æstimare, cf. Luke xiv. 18 and by St. Paul, Phil. ii. 29.—ὡς τελειῶσαι, see critical note. "So that I may accomplish my course," R.V., "in comparison of accomplishing my course," margin. Difficulty has arisen because this is the only case in the N.T. in which ὡς appears in a final clause, Burton, p. 85 (but see W.H., Luke ix. 52, and Viteau, Le Grec du N. T., p. 74 (1893)). The whole phrase is strikingly Pauline, cf. Phil. iii. 12, where the same verb immediately seems to suggest the δρόμος (Alford), Gal. ii. 2, 1 Cor. ix. 24, 2 Tim. iv. 7.—μετὰ χαρᾶς, see critical note, cf. Phil. i. 4, Col. i. 11, Heb. x. 34. The words are strongly defended by Ewald.—τὴν διακονίαν, see above on p. 422 "saepe apud Paulum," cf. Rom. xi. 13. Apostleship is often so designated, Acts i. 17, 25, xxi. 19, 2 Cor. iv. 1, and other instances in Hort, Ecclesia, p. 204.—διαμαρτ., cf. vi. 4, where the διακ. τοῦ λόγου is the highest function of the Apostles.

Ver. 25. καὶ νῦν, see on ver. 22.—οἶδα: no infallible presentiment or prophetic inspiration, but a personal conviction based on human probabilities, which was overruled by subsequent events. The word cannot fairly be taken to mean more than this, for in the same context the Apostle himself had distinctly disclaimed a full knowledge of the future, ver. 23. And if οἶδα is to be pressed here into a claim of infallible knowledge, it is difficult to see why it should not be also so pressed in Phil. i. 25, where the Apostle expresses his sure conviction πεποιθὼς οἶδα of a release from his Roman imprisonment, cf. xxvi. 27 where Paul uses the same verb in expressing his firm persuasion of Agrippa's belief, but surely not any infallible knowledge of Agrippa's heart. see amongst recent writers Steinmetz, Die zweite römische Gefangenschaft des Apostels Paulus, p. 14 ff. (1897); Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 436.—οὐκέτι ὄψεσθε: "shall no longer see," see Rendall, whereas A. and R.V. rendering "no more," οὐκέτι, give the impression that St. Paul definitely affirms that he would never return. Rendall compares Rom. xv. 23, but on the other hand Acts viii. 39 seems to justify the usual rendering. The Apostle's increasing anxiety is quite natural when we remember how even in Corinth he had thought of his journey to Jerusalem with apprehension, Rom xv. 30, Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, ii., 5. On the inference drawn by Blass from this passage as to the early date of Acts, see his remarks in loco, and Proleg., p. 3, and to the same effect, Salmon, Introd., p. 407, fifth edition.—διῆλθον: the word taken in the sense of a missionary tour, see xiii. 6, indicates that representatives not only of Ephesus but of other Churches were present, hence ὑμεῖς πάντες, διῆλθον κηρύσσων, coalescing into a single idea; the Apostle could not say διῆλθον ὑμᾶς, and so we have ἐν ὑμῖν substituted. If the word is Lucan it is also Pauline, and that too in this particular sense, cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 5.—κηρ. τὴν βασ.: if Lucan, also Pauline—cf. Col. iv. 11. As our Lord had sent His first disciples to preach (κηρύσσειν) the kingdom of God, and as He Himself had done the same, Luke viii. 1, ix. 2, we cannot doubt that St. Paul would lay claim to the same duty and privilege; in his first Epistle, 1 Thess. ii. 12, as in his latest, 2 Tim. iv. 18, the kingdom of God, its present and its future realisation, is present to his thoughts; in his first journey, xiv. 22, no less than in his third it finds a place in his teaching and exhortation; in his first Epistle, 1 Thess. ii. 9, as in his latest, 2 Tim. i. 11, iv. 17, he does the work of a herald, κῆρυξ. No less than five times in 1 Corinthians, one of the Epistles written during his stay at Ephesus, the phrase βασιλεία Θεοῦ occurs (it is not found at all in 2 Corinthians).

Ver. 26. If we read διότι, critical note, we have a word which is not used by the other Evangelists, but three times in Luke's Gospel and five times in Acts; in each passage in Acts it is referred to Paul, xiii. 35, xviii. 10 (2), xx. 26, xxii. 18, and it occurs nine or ten times in Paul's Epistles. On account of the Apostle's approaching departure, such a reckoning is demanded.—μαρτύρομαι: only in Luke and Paul, and in both cases in Acts referred to Paul, here and in xxvi. 22, Gal. v. 3, Ephes. iv. 17, 1 Thess. ii. 12, "I protest," properly "I call to witness," but never = μαρτυρῶ in classical Greek; in Judith vii. 28 we have the fuller construction, of which this use of the dative here is a remnant, Lightfoot, Gal., v., 3. The verb occurs once more in 1 Macc. ii. 56 S (but AR, al.).—ἐν τῇ σήμερον ἡμέρᾳ: Attic, τήμερον, i.e., ἡμ. with pronom. prefix (cf. Matt. xxviii. 15 but ἡμέρας [W. H.]), the very day of my departure; the exact phrase occurs twice elsewhere, but both times in Paul's writings, 2 Cor. iii. 14, W. H., Rom. xi. 8 (quotation); "Hoc magnam declarandi vim habet," Bengel. Several times in LXX, cf. Jos., Ant., xiii., 2, 3, found frequently in classical Greek.—καθαρὸς ἀπὸ, cf. xvii. 6, where a similar phrase is used by St. Paul; the adjective is found seven times in St. Paul's Epistles, but only here and in xvii. 6 in Luke's writings. In LXX, cf. Job xiv. 4, Prov. xx. 9, Tobit iii. 14, Susannah, ver. 46; in Psalms of Solomon, xvii. 41, and, for the thought, Ezek. iii. 18-20. In classics for the most part with genitive, but in later Greek with ἀπό, see however Blass, Gram., p. 104, and instances from Demosthenes; and Deissmann for instances from papyri, Neue Bibelstudien, pp. 24, 48; Ramsay, "Greek of the Early Church," etc.; Expository Times, December, 1898, p. 108. [1] του Θεου, so ℵB 68, Vulg., Syr. H. (Syr. Pesh. MSS.), Epiph., Bas., Ps.-Ath., Theod.-Mops., Cyr.-Al.: του κυριου AC*DE, 13, 15, 36, 40, 69, 110, 118 (eight others), Gig., Sah., Boh., Syr. H. mg., Arm., Ir[int]., Const., Ath., Did., Chrys., Jer., Lucif. Here W.H., Weiss have Θεου, so Bengel, Alford in later editions; Tisch., R.V. marg., Blass, Wendt, Hilg. κυριου; του κυριου και Θεου C[3]HLP, most mins., Slavonic, Theophl.; and there are other variations. Against Θεου it is objected that St. Paul would not apply the word to Christ, although we have in Clem. Rom., Cor., ii., 1; Ignat., Ephes., i., 1; Rom., vi., 3; Tert., Ad Uxor., ii., 3; Clem. Alex., Quis dives salv., xxxiv., similar language; but there are also passages in the N.T., e.g., Rom. ix. 5, Tit. ii. 13, in which there is at least a very considerable amount of evidence for referring Θεος to Jesus, "and when it is objected that these are disputed passages, it is just to remind the objector that this will exclude his original statement as well as the rebuttal of it" (Warfield). The evidence in its favour comes to us afforded by a strong combination (cf. too the intrinsic evidence in its favour from Ps. lxxiv. 2, W.H., App., 99); so far from the unusual nature of the phrase being regarded as fatal to its genuineness, it might be fairly maintained that Θεου as it is the more difficult reading is also on that very ground recommended to our confidence. We should also give weight to the fact that the words εκκλησια του θ., which find a place in this address full of Pauline expressions, are found no less than eleven times in St. Paul's Epistles, but that εκκ. του κυριου is not found at all in the N.T. (we have αιμα του Κ. once in 1 Cor. xi. 27). Weiss endeavours to solve the difficulty by taking ιδιου, masc., the blood of his own; cf. Rom. viii. 32. But while disagreeing with this solution, Hort, in W.H., App., 99, thinks it by no means impossible that υιου dropped out after του ιδιου (its insertion solves every difficulty (so too Rendall)). Hort, reading δια του αιματος του ιδιου, renders "through the blood that was His own," i.e., His Son's, following ℵABCDE 13, 36, 40, Vulg., so too Weiss, R.V.; cf. the language which finds repeated expression in the Apost. Const., and embodies a conception familiar to us in one of our Ember Collects (1662). See further W.H., u. s.; Dr. Ezra Abbot, Bibliotheca Sacra, p. 313 ff. (1876); Page, in loco; Wendt (1899), p. 335; Warfield, Textual Criticism, pp. 184-189, 5th edit. Mr. Page, Classical Review, p. 317, 1897, warmly approves of the note of Dr. Blass on Acts xx. 28, and of his support of the reading Κυριου, on the ground that Θεος would be easily substituted for it in days when "moris factum erat ut Θεος Jesus diceretur"; but is this explanation so certain? Dr. Hort indicates that the prevalent instinct would be to change του Θεου into του κ., and not vice versâ, as the fear of sanctioning "Monarchian," or (in later times) "Monophysite" language would outweigh any other doctrinal impulse.

could say this with fitness; we could not dare to say it, Chrys., Hom., xliv.

Ver. 27. ὑπεστ., see above on ver. 20.—τὴν β. τοῦ Θεοῦ, see on ii. 23, and cf. especially Ephes. i. 11 for the phrase, and iii. 4 for the thought. No Epistle excels that to the Ephesians in the richness of its thoughts, and in its conception of a divine purpose running through the ages; no Epistle dwells more fully upon the conception of the Church as the Body of Christ, or exhorts more touchingly to diligence in keeping the unity of the Spirit, or insists more practically upon the sanctifying power of the One Spirit, and the sense of a divine membership in every sphere of human life. The rich and full teaching of the Epistle is addressed to men who are able to understand the Apostle's knowledge of the mystery of Christ; in other words, to those to whom he had announced more fully than to others the counsel of God. The Ephesian Epistle may have been an encyclical letter, but it was addressed principally to the Ephesians as the representatives of the leading Church of the province of Asia. See amongst recent writers Gore, Ephesians, pp. 42, 43; and Lock, "Ephesians," Hastings' B.D., p. 718.—ὑμῖν: emphatically at the end, W.H.; this revelation had been made to the presbyters before him, and the responsibility would rest with them of communicating it to others when their spiritual father had left them.

Ver. 28. προσέχετε . . . ἑαυτοῖς (cf. 1 Tim. iv. 16), Luke xvii. 3, xxi. 34, Acts v. 35, viii. 6. In LXX with ἐμαυτῷ, Gen. xxiv. 6, Exod. x. 28, Deut. iv. 9. "Non tantum jubet eos gregi attendere, sed primum sibi ipsis; neque enim aliorum salutem sedulo unquam curabit, qui suam negliget . . . cum sit ipse pars gregis," Calvin, in loco, and also Chrys. (Bethge, p. 144).—ποιμνίῳ: the figure was common in the O.T. and it is found in St. Luke, xii. 32, in St. John, in St. Peter, but it is said that St. Paul does not use it, cf. however Ephes. iv. 11, where, and nowhere else, he writes καὶ αὐτὸς ἔδωκε . . . τοὺς δὲ ποιμένας.—ἐν ᾧ: "in the which," R.V., not "over which".—ὑμᾶς is again emphatic, but the presbyters were still part of the flock, see Calvin, u. s.—ἔθετο, cf. 1 Cor. xii. 28, 1 Tim. i. 12, ii. 7, 2 Tim. i. 11. There is no ground whatever for supposing that the ἐπισκόποι here mentioned were not ordained, as the words τὸ Π. τὸ Ἅγ. ἔθετο may be used without any reference whatever to the actual mode of appointment. Dr. Hort allows that here the precedent of vi. 3-6 may have been followed, and the appointment of the elders may have been sealed, so to speak, by the Apostle's prayers and laying-on-of-hands, Ecclesia, pp. 99, 100. The thought of appointment by the Holy Spirit, although not excluding the ordination of Apostles, may well be emphasised here for the sake of solemnly reminding the Presbyters of their responsibility to a divine Person, and that they stand in danger of losing the divine gifts imparted to them in so far as they are unfaithful to their office.—ποιμαίνειν: "to tend" as distinct from βόσκειν "to feed," although the act of feeding as well as of governing is associated also with the former word; see on John xxi. 16. The figurative pastoral language in this passage was probably not unknown as applied to Jewish elders, Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 282; Hort, Ecclesia, p. 101.—ἐπισκόπους: the word, which occurs five times in the N.T., is applied four times to officers of the Christian Church: in this passage, again at Ephesus in 1 Tim. iii. 2, at Philippi in Phil. i. 1, at Crete in Titus i. 7; and once to our Lord Himself, 1 Peter ii. 25 (cf. the significant passage, Wisdom i. 6, where it is applied to God). In the LXX it is used in various senses, e.g., of the overseers of Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12, 17; of taskmasters or exactors, Isa. lx. 17; of minor officers, Neh. xi. 9, 14; of officers over the house of the Lord, 2 Kings xi. 18; and in 1 Macc. i. 51 of overseers or local commissioners of Antiochus Epiphanes to enforce idolatry, cf. Jos., Ant., xii., 5, 4. In classical Greek the word is also used with varied associations. Thus in Attic Greek it was used of a commissioner sent to regulate a new colony or subject city like a Spartan "harmost," cf. Arist., Av., 1032, and Boeckh, Inscr., 73 (in the Roman period ἐπίμεληταί); but it was by no means confined to Attic usage. In another inscription found at Thera in the Macedonian period mention is made of two ἐπίσκοποι receiving money and putting it out at interest, and again at Rhodes, in the second century B.C., ἐπίσ. are mentioned in inscriptions, but we do not know their functions, although Deissmann claims that in one inscription, I. M. A. e., 731, the title is used of a sacred office in the Temple of Apollo, but he declines to commit himself to any statement as to the duties of the office: cf. also Loening, Die Gemeindeverfassung des Urchristenthums, pp. 21, 22; Gibson, "Bishop," B.D.[2]; Gwatkin, "Bishop," Hastings' B.D.; Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 57; Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 95. M. Waddington has collected several instances of the title in inscriptions found in the Haurân, i.e., the south-eastern district of the ancient Bashan (see the references to Le Bas-Waddington in Loening, u. s., p. 22, note, and Gore, Church and the Ministry, p. 402), but none of these give us precise and definite information as to the functions of the ἐπίσκοποι. But it is important to note that M. Waddington is of opinion that the comparative frequency of the title in the Haurân points to the derivation of the Christian use of the word from Syria or Palestine rather than from the organisation of the Greek municipality (Expositor, p. 99, 1887). It has been urged that the officers of administration and finance in the contemporary non-Christian associations, the clubs and guilds so common in the Roman empire, were chiefly known by one or other of two names, ἐπιμελητής or ἐπίσκοπος, Hatch, B.L., p. 36, and hence the inference has been drawn that the primary function of the primitive ἐπίσκοποι in the Christian Church was

the administration of finance; but Dr. Hatch himself has denied that he laid any special stress upon the financial character of the ἐπίσκοποι, although he still apparently retained the description of them as "officers of administration and finance," see Expositor, u. s., p. 99, note, thus adopting a position like that of Professor Harnack, who would extend the administration duties beyond finance to all the functions of the community. But however this may be (see below), there is certainly no ground for believing that the title ἐπίσκοπος in the Christian Church was ever limited to the care of finance (see the judgment of Loening on this view, u. s., p. 22), or that such a limitation was justified by the secular use of the term. If indeed we can point to any definite influence which connects itself with the introduction of the title into the Christian Church, it is at least as likely, one might say more likely when we consider that the Apostles were above all things Jews, that the influence lies in the previous use in the LXX of ἐπίσκοπος and ἐπισκοπή, and the direct appeal of St. Clement of Rome, Cor., xlii., 5, to Isaiah (LXX) lx. 17 in support of the Christian offices of ἐπίσκοποι and διάκονοι may be fairly quoted as pointing to such an influence. But whatever influences were at work in the adoption of the term by the early believers, it became, as it were, baptised into the Christian Church, and received a Christian and a higher spiritual meaning. This one passage in Acts xx. 28 is sufficient to show that those who bore the name were responsible for the spiritual care of the Church of Christ, and that they were to feed His flock with the bread of life (see the striking and impressive remarks of Dr. Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 266). This one passage is also sufficient to show that the "presbyter" and "bishop" were at first practically identical, cf. vv. 17 and 28, Steinmetz, Die zweite römische Gefangenschaft des Apostels Paulus, p. 173, 1897, and that there is no room for the separation made by Harnack between the two, see his Analecta zu Hatch, p. 231, or for his division between the "patriarchal" office of the πρεσβύτεροι and the "administrative" office of the ἐπίσκοποι (Loening, u. s., pp. 23-27; Sanday, Expositor, u. s., pp. 12, 104; Gwatkin, u. s., p. 302). In the Pastoral Epistles the identity between the two is even more clearly marked, although Harnack cannot accept Tit. i. 5-7 as a valid proof, because he believes that vv. 7-9 were interpolated into the received text by a redactor; cf. also for proof of the same 1 Tim. iii. 1-7, 8-13, v. 17-19; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2, although in this last passage Harnack rejects the reading ἐπισκοποῦντες (and it must be admitted that it is not found in ℵB, and that it is omitted by Tisch. and W. H.), whilst he still relegates the passages in the Pastoral Epistles relating to bishops, deacons and Church organisation to the second quarter of the second century, Chron., i., p. 483, note. In St. Clement of Rome, Cor., xlii., 4, xliv., 1, 4, 5, the terms are still synonymous, and by implication in Didaché, xv., 1 (Gwatkin, u. s., p. 302, and Gore, u. s., p. 409, note). But if we may say with Bishop Lightfoot that a new phraseology began with the opening of a new century, and that in St. Ignatius the two terms are used in their more modern sense, it should be borne in mind that the transition period between Acts and St. Ignatius is exactly marked by the Pastoral Epistles, and that this fact is in itself no small proof of their genuineness. In these Epistles Timothy and Titus exercise not only the functions of the ordinary presbyteral office, but also functions which are pre-eminent over those of the ordinary presbyter, although there is no trace of any special title for these Apostolic delegates, as they may be fairly called. The circumstances may have been temporary or tentative, but it is sufficiently plain that Timothy and Titus were to exercise not only a general discipline, but also a jurisdiction over the other ministers of the Church, and that to them was committed not only the selection, but also the ordination of presbyters (Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 151 ff.; Bright, Some Aspects of Primitive Church Life, p. 28 ff., 1898; Church Quarterly Review, xlii., pp. 265-302).—τὴν ἐκκ. τοῦ Θεοῦ, see critical note.—περιεποιήσατο, cf. Psalm lxxiv. 2. It has been thought that St. Paul adopts and adapts the language of this Psalm; in comparing his language with that of the LXX we can see how by the use of the word ἐκκλησία instead of συναγωγή in the Psalm he connects the new Christian Society with the ancient ἐκκλησία of Israel, whilst in employing περιεποιήσατο instead of ἐκτήσω (LXX), and retaining the force of ἐλυτρώσω, LXX, by reference to the λύτρον of the new Covenant, a deeper significance is given to the Psalmist's language: a greater redemption than that of Israel from the old Egyptian bondage had been wrought for the Christian Ecclesia (Hort, Ecclesia, pp. 14 and 102). The verb περιποιεῖσθαι only in St. Luke and St. Paul in N.T., but in a different sense in the former, Luke xvii. 33. In 1 Tim. iii. 13 (1 Macc. vi. 44) it is found in the sense of "gaining for oneself," so in classical Greek. But it is to be noted that the cognate noun περιποίησις is associated by St. Paul in his Ephesian letter with the thought of redemption, εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιποίησεως "unto the redemption of God's own possession," R.V.—τοῦ ἰδ. τοῦ αἵμ., see critical note.

Ver. 29. ἐγὼ γὰρ οἶδα, see critical note. Baur and Zeller could only see in this assertion a vaticinium post eventum—the heresiarchs are portrayed in the general expressions in vogue in the second century; so too Renan thinks that the writer gives us the ideas of a later date, although he does not carry us further than 75-80 A.D. But if we accept the early date of the Didaché, that document is quite sufficient to show us that similar phraseology to that in the address before us was current in the Church at an earlier date than Baur and Zeller supposed. If St. Paul had been engaged all his life in struggling with false teachers, it would have been inconceivably short-sighted if he had thought that such dangers would cease after his departure, and still more inconceivable if with such presentiments he had neglected to warn the Church. The vagueness of the description of the heretical teachers is in itself a proof of genuineness, and a writer of a later date would have made it far less general, and more easily to be identified with some current error. It has been further objected by Zeller and Overbeck, and even by Wendt, that it is strange that with present opponents before him, 1 Cor. xvi. 8, 9, St. Paul should speak only of the future; but whilst he had himself been present among them he had been their protector against their enemies, but now that he was about to withdraw from them nothing was more natural than that he should warn them against the subtle attacks which might be more easily made when his own careful superintendence was no more.—εἰσελεύσονται: so men outside the fold—the when of their entrance is not specified precisely, but the words were amply fufilled in the presence of the emissaries of the Judaisers, creeping in from the Jewish communities into the Churches of Asia, as they had slunk into the Churches of Galatia, cf. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 130-146, on the teaching of the Judaisers and its evil influence in the Pastoral Epistles. There is at all events no need to refer the words with Grotius to outward persecution, such as that of Nero.—ἄφιξιν, i.e., his departure from amongst them (not necessarily including his death), not arrival, although the latter meaning attaches to the word in classical Greek, so too 3 Macc. vii. 18; Jos., Ant., iv., 8, 47 (but see both Alford and Blass, in loco).—λύκοι: continuing the imagery of ver. 28, cf. Matt. vii. 15, Luke x. 3, John x. 12; so in the O.T. λύκοι of presumptuous and cruel rulers and judges, Ezek. xxii. 27, Zeph. iii. 3. The similar kind of language used by Ignat., Philadelph., ii., 1, 2; Justin Martyr, Apol., i., 58; Iren., Adv. Hær., i., Præf. 2, may well have been borrowed from this, not vice versâ as Zeller maintained; but such imagery would no doubt be widely known from its employment in O. and N.T. alike.—βαρεῖς, cf. for the sense of the adjective, Hom., Il., i., 89; Xen., Ages., xi., 12; so too Diog. Laert., i., 72.—μὴ φειδ.: litotes, cf. John x. 12. The verb occurs six times in St. Paul's Epistles, twice in Romans and four times in the Corinthian Epistles (only twice elsewhere in N.T. in 2 Pet.).

Ver. 30. καὶ ἐξ ὑμῶν αὐτῶν: αὐτῶν adds emphasis, "from your own selves". The Pastoral Epistles afford abundant evidence of the fulfilment of the words, cf. 1 Tim. i. 20, 2 Tim. i. 15, ii. 17, iii. 8, 13. To some extent the Apostolic warning was effectual at all events in Ephesus itself, cf. Rev. ii. 2; Ignat., Ephes., vi., 2.—ἀναστήσονται: common word in Acts, see on v. 17, used here perhaps as in v. 36.—διεστραμμένα, cf. LXX, Deut. xxxii. 5. The verb is found twice in Luke ix. 41 (Matt. xvii. 17), xxiii. 2, three times in Acts xiii. 8, 10, and once again by St. Paul, Phil. ii. 15, in a similar sense, cf. Arist., Pol., iii., 16, 5, viii., 7, 7; Arrian, Epict., iii., 6, 8.—ἀποσπᾷν τοὺς μαθητάς: "the disciples," R.V. with art. meaning that they would try and draw away those that were already Christians, μαθ. always so used in Acts. ἀποσ. to tear away from that to which one is already attached; used by St. Matt. xxvi. 51, and elsewhere only by St. Luke xxii. 41, Acts xxi. 1; compare with the genitive of purpose after ἀνίστημι, 2 Chron. xx. 23.—ὀπίσω αὐτῶν, "after themselves," cf. v. 37, not after Christ, Matt. iv. 19.

Ver. 31. γρηγ.: the pastoral metaphor continued; verb used four times by St. Paul, and it may well have passed into familiar use in the early Church by the solemn injunction of our Lord on the Mount of Olives to watch, cf. also Luke xii. 37, 1 Pet. v. 8, Rev. iii. 2, 3, xvi. 15, and the names Gregory, Vigilantius, amongst the early converts.—τριετίαν: the three years may be used summarily i.e., as speaking in round numbers, or literally. It would have seemed out of place in such an appeal to say "two years and three months," or whatever the exact time may have been. The intention was to give a practical turn to this watchfulness: triennium celeste, Bengel. The word is regarded by Vogel as a decided employment of a medical term by Luke from Dioscorides, see also to the same effect Meyer-Weiss, Evangelium des Lukas, note on i., 1. The word is found only here in N.T., not at all in LXX, but used by Theophr., Plut., Artem.—νύκτα: perhaps placed first because it corresponded more closely to the idea of watching against attacks, or perhaps because it emphasised the ceaselessness of the Apostle's labours, cf. xxvi. 7, 1 Thess. ii. 9, iii. 10, 1 Tim. v. 5, 2 Tim. i. 3.—μετὰ δακρύων, cf. 2 Cor. ii. 4, Chrys., Hom., xliv. "Quod cor tamen saxatum, ut hisce lacrimis non emolliatur? qui non fleat flente Paulo?" Corn. à Lapide; see also Farrar, St. Paul, ii., 283.—νουθετῶν: only here in Acts, but seven times in St. Paul's Epistles, but nowhere else in N.T., "admonish," R.V. In classical Greek it is joined both with παρακαλεῖν and κολάζειν; St. Paul too used it in gentleness, or "with a rod". In LXX, Job iv. 3; Wisd. xi. 10, xii. 2.—ἕνα ἕκαστον, 2 Cor. xi. 29 and John x. 3; εἷς ἕκαστος twice in St. Luke's Gospel, iv. 40, xvi. 5, six times in Acts, five times in St. Paul's Epistles (only once elsewhere in N.T., Matt. xxvi. 22, but not in T.R.).

Ver. 32. καὶ τὰ νῦν, see above on iv. 29.—παρατίθ., cf. xiv. 23.—τῷ λόγῳ τῆς χ. αὐτοῦ: as in the fourth Gospel, John i. 14-17, so here and in the Epistle to the Ephesians, we find great stress laid on χάρις, but we cannot conclude with Stier and others that in the word λόγος we have any reference here to the Word of St. John's Gospel, although the similarity between St. John's doctrine of the Word and St. Paul's conception of our Lord's Person is very close elsewhere; the thought here is however closely akin to that of St. James i. 21 (Heb. iv. 12). In his earliest Epistle the Apostle had spoken of the Word, 1 Thess. ii. 13, ὃς καὶ ἐνεργεῖται ἐν ὑμῖν. The Word here is able to build up and to give, etc., which certainly seems to ascribe to it a quasi-personal character, even more so than in 2 Tim. iii. 15, where the Apostle uses a somewhat similar phrase of the O.T. Scriptures, τὰ δυνάμενά (the same verb as here) σε σοφίσαι εἰς σωτηρίαν κ.τ.λ. The same phrase as here occurs in Acts xiv. 3, which points to its derivation from one imbued with Paul's words and habits of thought, if not from the Apostle himself (Alford). Weiss and others refer τῷ δυν. to τῷ Θεῷ (Κυρίῳ, see critical note), cf. Rom. xvi. 25, Ephes. iii. 20, Gal. iii. 21, on the ground that although ἐποικοδομῆσαι (οἰκοδ.) may refer to λόγος, yet the λόγος cannot be said δοῦναι κληρ. To the latter phrase Bethge, p. 158, strives to find some Scriptural analogies in the work attributed to ὁ λόγος, cf. 1 Cor. i. 18, John xii. 48. But it is best and simplest on the whole to regard the entire phrase τῷ Θ. καὶ τῷ λ. as one, "quasi una notio sunt; agit enim Deus per verbum suum," Blass; so Page.—ἐποικοδ., Ephes. ii. 20, in the passive, see critical note. Whether we read the compound or the simple verb, the metaphor of building is prominent in the Ephesian Epistle ii. 21, iv. 12, 16, 29, as also in 1 Cor., cf. iii. 10 (2), 12, 14; iii. 9, xiv. 3, 5, 12, 26, and cf. 2 Cor. v. 1, x. 8, xii. 19, xiii. 10. See note above on ix. 31. τὴν κληρ., vii. 5, see note; nowhere else in Acts, cf. for the thought Ephes. iii. 18, i. 11; and words elsewhere spoken by St. Paul, Acts xxvi. 18; the word itself occurs three times in Ephesians, i. 14, 18, v. 5. In Ephes. iii. 18 we have closely conjoined with κληρ. the ἡ βασιλ. τοῦ χ., cf. St. Paul's words ver. 25 above. The word is frequent in Psalms of Solomon, cf. xiv. 6, 7, where the inheritance of the saints is contrasted with the inheritance of sinners in the Messianic consummation, and also xv. 11, 12, xvii. 26; see further on the word, Kennedy, p. 100.

Ver. 33. Cf. 1 Sam. xii. 3, ἱματ., frequent in LXX, in N.T. only in Luke and Paul (except John xix. 24, quotation); Luke vii. 25, ix. 29, 1 Tim. ii. 9. In 1 Macc. xi. 24 we have silver, gold and raiment, joined together as in this verse, describing Eastern riches, cf. James v. 2, 3.—ἐπεθ., "he takes away that which is the root of all evil, the love of money"; he says not "I have not taken," but "not even coveted," Chrys., Hom., xlv.

Ver. 34. αὐτοὶ: placed first for emphasis, so too emphasised in ii. 22, xvi. 37, xviii. 15. In 1 Cor. iv. 12 we may see an undesigned coincidence, and cf. the word κοπιῶντας in ver. 35, Paley, H.P., iii., 6.—ταῖς χρείαις μου καὶ τοῖς οὖσι μετ' ἐμοῦ: so the work of the Christian convert ἐργαζ. τὸ ἀγ. ταῖς χερσίν is to be done ἵνα ἔχῃ μεταδιδόναι τῷ χρείαν ἔχοντι, Ephes. iv. 28, and for the word χρεία as used by St. Paul elsewhere in same sense, cf. Rom. xii. 13, Phil. ii. 25, iv. 16, Tit. iii. 14.—ὑπηρέτησαν: only in Acts xiii. 36, used by Paul, xxiv. 23, used of Paul (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 1); Wisd. xvi. 24.—αὗται: "callosæ, ut videtis," Bengel, so Blass; quite in Paul's manner, cf. xxvi. 29, xxviii. 20; so also πάντα, 1 Cor. ix. 25, x. 33, xi. 2, Ephes. iv. 15. Paul pursued his trade at Ephesus probably with Aquila and Priscilla, possibly with Philemon, Philem. ver. 17.

Ver. 35. πάντα ὑπέδ.: "in all things I gave you an example," R.V., see also critical note. The verb and the cognate noun are both used in Greek in accordance with this sense, Xen., Oec., xii., 18, Isocr., v., 27, see Plummer on Luke iii. 7, etc., so ὑπόδειγμα, Xen., De re eq., ii., 2, and for other instances of the similar use of the word see Westcott on Heb. viii. 5, Ecclus. xliv. 16, 2 Macc. vi. 28, 31, 4 Macc. xvii. 23, cf. also Clem. Rom., Cor., v., 1, xlvi., 1. οὕτως, i.e., as I have done, cf. Phil. iii. 17.—κοπιῶντας: not of spiritual labours, but of manual, as the context requires. No doubt the verb is used in the former sense, 1 Cor. xvi. 16, Rom. xvi. 12, 1 Thess. v. 12, but also in the latter, 1 Cor. iv. 12, Ephes. iv. 28, 2 Tim. ii. 6 (so also κόπος by Paul). In St. Paul's writings it occurs no less than fourteen times, in St. Luke only twice, Luke v. 5 (xii. 27). In classical Greek, so in Josephus, it has the meaning of growing weary or tired, but in LXX and N.T. alone, laboro viribus intentis (Grimm).—δεῖ, see above on p. 63.—ἀντιλαμβ.: only in Luke and Paul, Luke i. 54, 1 Tim. vi. 2, cf. 1 Cor. xii. 28. The verb = to take another's part, to succour (so too cognate noun), in LXX, Isa. xli. 9, Ecclus. ii. 6, iii. 12, xxix. 9, 20, of helping the poor, cf. also Psalms of Solomon, xvi. 3, 5, vii. 9, see further Psalms of Solomon, Ryle and James edit., p. 73; on ἀντίληψις, H. and R., sub. v. In classical Greek used in middle voice with genitive as here.—τῶν ἀσθενούν., cf. 1 Thess. v. 14, for a similar precept. The adjective need not be limited to those who sought relief owing to physical weakness or poverty, but may include all those who could claim the presbyters' support and care, bodily or spiritual, cf. Rom. xii. 13. The usage of the gospels points to those who are weak through disease and therefore needing help, cf., e.g., Matt. x. 8, Mark vi. 56, Luke ix. 2, John v. 3, so also by St. Paul, Phil. ii. 26, 27, 2 Tim. iv. 20, although there are instances in LXX where the word is used of moral rather than of physical weakness. When the word is used of moral or spiritual weakness in the N.T., such a meaning is for the most part either determined by the context, or by some addition, e.g., τῇ πίστει, Rom. xiv. 1.—μνημονεύειν τε: the verb is used seven times by St. Paul in his Epistles, once by St. Luke in his Gospel, Luke xvii. 32, and twice in Acts in the words of St. Paul, cf. ver. 31. Twice in the Epistle of St. Clement of Rome we find a similar exhortation in similar words, chap. xiii. 1 and xlvi. 7, and in each case the word may refer to a free combination of our Lord's words (cf. Luke vi. 30, xiv. 14), so too in St. Polycarp, Epist., ii., 3. From what source St. Paul obtained this, the only saying of our Lord, definitely so described, outside the four Gospels which the N.T. contains, we cannot tell, but the command to "remember" shows that the words must have been familiar words, like those from St. Clement and St. Polycarp, which are very similar to the utterances of the Sermon on the Mount. From whatever source they were derived the references given by Resch, Agrapha, pp. 100, 150, show how deep an impression they made upon the mind of the Church, Clem. Rom., Cor., ii., 1, Did., i., 5, Const. Ap., iv., 3, 1; cf. also Ropes, Die Sprüche Jesus, p. 136. In thus appealing to the words of the Lord Jesus, St. Paul's manner in his address is very similar to that employed in his Epistles, where he is apparently able to quote the words of the Lord in support of his judgment on some religious and moral question, cf. 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11, 12, 25, and the distinction between his own opinion, γνώμη, and the command of Christ, ἐπιταγή (Witness of the Epistles, p. 319). τε: Weiss (so Bethge) holds that the word closely connects the two clauses, and that the meaning is that only thus could the weak be rightly maintained, viz., by remembering, etc., ὅτι being causal. But however this may be, in this reference, ὅτι αὐτὸς εἶπεν, "how he himself said," R.V. (thus implying that the fact was beyond all doubt), we may note one distinctive feature in Christian philanthropy, that it is based upon allegiance to a divine Person, and upon a reference to His commands. The emphatic personal pronoun seems to forbid the view that the Apostle is simply giving the sense of some of our Lord's sayings (see above). Similar sayings may be quoted from pagan and Jewish sources, but in Aristotle, Eth. Nicom., iv., 1, it is the part τοῦ ἐλευθερίου to give when and where and as much as he pleases, but only because it is beautiful to give; even in friendship, generosity and benevolence spring from the reflection that such conduct is decorous and worthy of a noble man, Eth. Nicom., ix., 8. In Plato's Republic there would have been no place for the ἀσθενεῖς. Even in Seneca who sometimes approaches very nearly to the Christian precept, when he declares, e.g., that even if we lose we must still give, we cannot forget that pity is regarded as something unworthy of a wise man; the wise man will help him in tears, but he will not weep with him; he helps the poor not with compassion, but with an impassive calm.—μακάριον: emphatic in position, see critical note. Bengel quotes from an old poet, cf. Athenæus, viii., 5, μακάριος, εἴπερ μεταδίδωσι μηδενί . . . ἀνόητος ὁ διδούς, εὐτυχὴς δ' ὁ λαμβάνων. The lines are by no means to be regarded as the best expression of pagan ethics, but the μακάρ., which occurs more than thirty times on the lips of our Lord, bids us aim at something altogether higher and deeper and fuller than happiness—blessedness. In Judaism, whilst compassion for the poor and distressed is characteristic of a righteous Israelite, we must still bear in mind that such compassion was limited by legality and nationality; the universality of the Christian precept is wanting, Uhlhorn, Christian Charity, pp. 1-56, E.T., instances in Wetstein, and Bethge and Page, in loco.

Ver. 36. θεὶς τὰ γόν., see above on p. 203.

Ver. 37. ἱκανὸς, cf. viii. 13.—ἐπιπεσόντες: an exact parallel only in Luke xv. 22 (cf. also κατεφίλησεν in same verse), cf. above on ἐπιπίπτειν and in LXX, Gen. xxxiii. 4, xlv. 14, xlvi. 29, Tobit xi. 8, 3 Macc. v. 49.—κατεφίλουν, imperfect, i.e., repeatedly and tenderly. The verb occurs three times in St. Luke's Gospel, vii. 38, 45, xv. 20, and once in Matthew and Mark of the kiss of Judas, cf. Xen., Mem., ii., 6, 33.

Ver. 38. ὀδυνώμενοι: common in Luke and Acts, only three times elsewhere in N.T., Luke ii. 48, xvi. 24, 25.—θεωρεῖν, Lucan, cf. xvii. 16, 22, "to behold," R.V., to gaze with reverence upon his face.—μέλλουσι, see above p. 157.—προέπεμπον δὲ αὐτὸν: "and they brought him on his way," R.V., cf. xv. 3 (see note), xxi. 5; the harbour was some little distance from the town.

Chapter XXI.—Ver. 1. ἀναχθῆναι, see above on xiii. 13.—ἀποσ., cf. xx. 30, "were parted from them," R.V. The word expresses a separation difficult and painful; it adds to the pathos of the scene, and marks the close affection which could not bear the thought of a parting, "divulsi ab eorum complexu," Blass (see Chrys., comment. in loco).—εὐθυδ., see on xvi. 11.—Κῶν, Stanchio or Stanko, an island of great trading importance off the coast of Caria, south of Miletus and Samos, and north of Rhodes. Historically it had several points of connection with the Jews, cf. 1 Macc. xv. 23, Jos., Ant., xiv., 7, 2, and 10, 15, B. J., i., 21, 11, and owing to its commerce it became one of the centres of Jewish life in the Ægean. It lay about forty nautical miles from Miletus, and it was famous as the birthplace not only of Hippocrates, but of Apelles, and as being one of the great medical schools of the ancient world. See further "Cos" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D., and B.D.²; Farrar, Saint Paul, ii., 284; Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 96; cf. Strabo, xiv., 2, Hor., Od., iv., 13, 13, Tac., Ann., xii., 61. C. and H. think that the chief town of the same name at the east of the island is referred to in the narrative before us. The place must have had, as C. and H. note, a special interest for St. Luke.—Ῥόδον: off the south coast of Caria. According to the proverb the sun shone every day on Rhodes, and it might well be called the sunny island of roses. Her coins, stamped on one side with Apollo's head radiated, and on the other with the rose-flower, bear their witness to the brightness and fertility of the island. Moreover, it was a seat not only of commerce but of learning. St. Paul does not appear to have landed, but only to have touched at the island. The great Colossus representing the sun, counted as one of the wonders of the world, lay prostrate, having been broken down by an earthquake, Pliny, N. H., xxxiv., 18; Strabo, xiv., 2. In the time of the Peloponnesian War Rhodes had been famous for its strong navy, as its timber was abundant. A notice of Jewish residents in Rhodes meets us in 1 Macc. xv. 23. On subsequent history see the excellent account in C. and H., small edit., p. 357; Farrar, Saint Paul, ii., p. 285.—Πάταρα: a seaport on the Lycian coast, now in ruins, but probably a place of some importance and splendour. C. and H. say that Patara was to the city Xanthus what the Piræus was to Athens. On the modern discoveries in Patara see C. and H., small edit., note p. 560, cf. Herod., i., 182, Hor., Od., iii., 4, 64, Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 99, O. Holtzmann, *Neutest. Wendt thinks that it may be original, p. 338 (1899), so Corssen, G. G. A., p. 441. Weiss, Codex D, p. 109, while accepting D in xx. 15, finds here assimilation to xxvii. 5. dreds of ships took every year," Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 297, and cf. the illustrations from Roman history in C. and H., p. 560 note.

Ver. 2. They went at Patara on board a ship about to start on the direct Syrian course, ἐπιβ., cf. xx. 18.

Ver. 3. ἀναφ.: "when we had come in sight of," R.V., Doric form of 1st aorist active, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 112, here a technical word (only in Luke, cf. Luke xix. 11, but in a different sense), i.e., after we had rendered Cyprus visible (to us) = facere ut appareat (Blass); Virgil, Æneid, iii., 275, 291, see also Rendall's note in loco (for the opposite idiom, ἀποκρύπτειν, cf. Thuc., v., 65).—καταλιπόντες αὐτὴν εὐώ.: sailing south-east they would have passed close to Paphos in Cyprus.—ἐπλέομεν: "imperf. cursum, aorist. κατήλθομεν finem denotat" (Blass).—εἰς Τύρον: now a free town of the R. province of Syria, Strabo, xvi., 2, in honour of its ancient greatness; it is still a place of considerable commerce and consequence, still famous for its fabrics and its architecture. At present it numbers amongst its five thousand inhabitants a few Jews, the rest being Mohammedans and Christians. Besides O.T. references, see 1 Macc. xi. 59, 2 Macc. iv. 18, 44, and further for its history, C. H., small edit., p. 563, Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 7, 998, Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopædia, iv., "Tyre".—ἐκεῖσε: the adverb may be used here with something of its proper force, but in xxii. 5, the only other place in which it occurs in N.T., simply = ἐκεῖ, Simcox, Language of the New Testament, p. 179. Page (in loco) renders "for there the ship was unlading her cargo," ἐκεῖσε being used because of the idea of movement and carrying into the town contained in the "unloading".—ἦν ἀποφ.: taken sometimes as the present for the future, Burton, p. 59, but see also Winer-Moulton, xlv., 5, and Wendt (1888) in loco (Philo, De Præm. et Pæn., 5; and Athenæus, ii., 5, of lightening a ship in a storm).—γόμον (γέμω): so in classical Greek, Herod., Dem., etc., in LXX of the load of a beast of burden, Exod. xxiii. 5, 2 Kings v. 17; in N.T. only elsewhere in Rev. xviii. 11, of any merchandise.

Ver. 4. ἀνευρόντες τοὺς μ.: more than simply to find, quærendo reperire, Blass; "having found out," as colloquially "having looked up"; only in Luke, cf. Luke ii. 16, but in middle, 4 Macc. iii. 14.—τοὺς μαθ.: W. H. The article indicates that the existence of the disciples was known, but it was difficult to find out their whereabouts in a great town, cf. xv. 3, 41.—ἐπεμείναμεν, see on x. 48.—ἡμέρας ἑπτά: the period would at all events enable Paul to enjoy a first day of the week with the Church. Apparently he and his went on in the same ship, ver. 6, evidently it was a trading vessel of the larger size, as it took this time to unload; on the genuineness of the narration here see Salmon, Introd., p. 300.—διὰ τοῦ Π.: there is no contradiction between this statement and St. Paul's assertion that he was proceeding to Jerusalem under the same divine guidance. That the prophets at Tyre should foresee the Apostle's danger was only in accordance with his own words in xx. 23, and their affectionate regard for him might well prompt them to dissuade him from such perilous risks. There is therefore no occasion to suppose that the clause has been interpolated into the "We" source. Hilgenfeld refers οἵτινες . . . Ἱερ. (ver. 4), as also the whole of ver. 9, τούτῳ δὲ . . . προφ. to his "author to Theophilus," on the ground that this writer had already spoken of Paul's tribulations as awaiting him in city by city, xx. 23, and that the notices in vv. 4 and 9 here are added by him in confirmation. But Hilgenfeld (with Clemen and Jüngst) retains vv. 10-14, the episode of Agabus, as belonging to the "We" source, and sees a fitness in the prophecy of Agabus foretelling, after the manner of the O.T. prophets, in the last station before Jerusalem, the imprisonment of the Apostle, whilst Paul in spite of all entreaties is unmoved in his determination. But (1) it is quite arbitrary to refer the whole speech at Miletus (see above, chap. xx.) to the "author to Theophilus," and (2) although it was quite fitting that the warning of danger should be more vivid on its approach, yet one fails to see why the more definite symbolical act of Agabus should exclude previous intimations of danger on the part of affectionate friends speaking of the Holy Ghost. In ver. 9 nothing is said as to the prophecies of the daughter of Philip and Paul's imprisonment, but see below.

Ἱερουσαλήμ. 5. ὅτε δὲ ἐγένετο[1] ἡμᾶς ἐξαρτίσαι τὰς ἡμέρας, ἐξελθόντες ἐπορευόμεθα, προπεμπόντων ἡμᾶς πάντων σὺν γυναιξὶ καὶ τέκνοις ἕως ἔξω τῆς πόλεως, καὶ θέντες τὰ γόνατα ἐπὶ τὸν αἰγιαλὸν προσηυξάμεθα. 6. καὶ[2] ἀσπασάμενοι ἀλλήλους, ἐπέβημεν εἰς τὸ

Ver. 5. ἐξαρτίσαι: here in the sense of accomplishing the days, i.e., finishing the time, the seven days during which we had to remain for the cargo to be unloaded or for other business = ἀπαρτίζειν (and cf. Luke xiv. 28), Vulgate, "expletis diebus," Chrys., πληρῶσαι, so Oecum., Theoph. The verb is only used once elsewhere in N.T., and there by St. Paul, 2 Tim. iii. 17 = furnishing, completing, so Jos., Ant., iii., 2, 2, where the verb is used as in 2 Tim., l. c., and some have thought that here the verb means that the ship was completely prepared for the continuance of her voyage. So Rendall who takes ἡμᾶς (reading ἐξαρ. ἡμᾶς) as the object, and renders "and when it proved that the days furnished us"; on St. Paul's stay and its reason see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 300, and for other explanations, Nösgen and Weiss, in loco. There is no reason to interpret the words as meaning that the Apostle found that his desire, xx. 16, could not be fulfilled, and that so he was content to remain the seven days.—προπεμ., see above: πάντων. The clause has been taken (Wendt) to intimate that the number of disciples at Tyre was small; this was probably the case, but it is not clear from the words here. σὺν γυν. καὶ τέκ., a descriptive touch of an eyewitness (Zöckler); on this local use of ἕως as characteristic of Luke, cf. Friedrich, p. 20.—θέντες . . . αἰγ., see xx. 36. αἰγ., a smooth shore in distinction to one precipitous and rocky, xxvii. 39, also found in Matt. xiii. 2, 48, John xxi. 4. In LXX, Judg. v. 17, Ecclus. xxiv. 14 (S² al., and cf. note in Speaker's Commentary, in loco). See Hackett's note on this accurate description of the beach on both sides of the site of the ancient Tyre, and also a parallel to the scene described in this passage from modern missionary life.

Ver. 6. R.V. ἀπησπασάμεθα ἀλλ. "bade each other farewell," see critical note. ἀπασπάζομαι: only here in N.T., in Tobit x. 13 S (AR al.); Himerius, p. 194; here of salutations at departure as simple verb in ver. 7, of salutations on arrival (1 Macc. xii. 17).—τὸ πλοῖον: article indicates that it was the same ship (ver. 2 without the article) which πλοῖον, ἐκεῖνοι δὲ ὑπέστρεψαν εἰς τὰ ἴδια. 7. Ἡμεῖς δὲ τὸν πλοῦν διανύσαντες ἀπὸ Τύρου κατηντήσαμεν εἰς Πτολεμαΐδα, καὶ ἀσπασάμενοι τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς ἐμείναμεν ἡμέραν μίαν παρ' αὐτοῖς. 8. τῇ δὲ ἐπαύριον ἐξελθόντες [1] οἱ περὶ τὸν Παῦλον ἤλθομεν εἰς Καισάρειαν· καὶ εἰσελθόντες εἰς τὸν οἶκον Φιλίππου τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ, τοῦ ὄντος ἐκ was going on to Ptolemais.—εἰς τὰ ἴδια, cf. John xvi. 32, xix. 27, cf. β text v. 18, xiv. 18 (τὰ ἴδια not in Synoptists, but cf. Luke xviii. 28), in LXX, Esther v. 10, vi. 12, 3 Macc. vi. 27, 37, vii. 8.

Ver. 7. διανύσαντες: "and when we had finished the voyage from Tyre we arrived at Ptolemais," R.V. (so in effect A.V.), but Page (so Wendt) renders "but we having (thereby) completed our voyage (i.e., from Macedonia, xx. 6), came from Tyre to Ptolemais," on the ground that διανύω would not be used of the short journey to Ptolemais from Tyre.—Πτολεμαΐδα: the ancient Accho and the modern Acre, Arab. Akka; St. Jean d'Acre, mentioned here for the last time in Scripture. About thirty miles south of Tyre. In Judg. i. 31 it was assigned to Asher, but it was never taken by Israel, and was always reckoned as belonging to the Philistine towns, and later by the Greeks as belonging to Phœnicia. In its stormy history it was held in succession by Babylonians and Persians (Strabo, xvi., 2, 25), and on the first division of Alexander's kingdom it was assigned to Ptolemy Soter (Ptolemy I.), from whom it may have derived its name (so Hamburger). Schürer however refers the name to Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus), and others to Ptolemy Lathurus. In the Syro-Egyptian wars its importance as a military station was manifested, since the power which held it could close the road down the Syrian coast to Egypt. To the Jews it was always hostile, 1 Macc. v. 15, Jos., Ant., xii., 8, 2, 1 Macc. xii. 45, Jos., Ant., xiii., 6, 2, and later in history when the Jewish War broke out against Rome, the Jews, two thousand in number, were slaughtered in Ptolemais, Jos., B.J., ii., 18, 5. After falling to the Parthians, it finally passed under the dominion of Rome, but although it was called colonia Ptolemais under the Emperor Claudius, Pliny, v., 19, it does not seem to have possessed the actual privileges of a colony (Schürer). See on its earlier and modern history, Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, i., 1, p. 41; "Acco," Hastings' B.D., "Accho," B.D.[2]; Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 90, E.T. It was only separated from Tyre by a short day's voyage, if the wind was favourable. Here Herod landed on his return from Italy to Syria, Jos., Ant., xiv., 15, 1.—τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς: a Christian Church at Ptolemais; founded perhaps by Philip the Evangelist. It is also very possible that a Church may have existed there ever since the dispersion after the death of St. Stephen, Acts xi. 19. On the times which St. Paul probably visited it see "Ptolemais" B.D.[1].

Ver. 8. Φ. τοῦ εὐαγγ.: the title, as Wendt and Hilgenfeld think, may have been given to Philip on account of his evangelising work, cf. viii., 12, 40; "the Evangelist": the honourable title gained by some signal service to the Gospel; and the two incidents noted in his career, his preaching to the Samaritans, and to the Ethiopian eunuch, each mark an advance in the free development of the Church (Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 299). He had originally been set apart for other work, vi. 2, but both he and St. Stephen had been called to higher duties, and it is not sufficient to say that he was called an "evangelist" to distinguish him from Philip the Apostle, for that would have been done sufficiently by calling him "one of the Seven". The word only occurs twice elsewhere in the N.T., Ephes. iv. 11, 2 Tim. iv. 5. In the former passage the Evangelists are placed between the Apostles and Prophets on the one hand, and the Pastors and Teachers on the other. The latter two offices suggested those who were attached to a settled community, whilst the Apostles and Prophets were non-local. Between the two pairs stood the Evangelists, whose work like that of Philip was to preach the Word. But it is to be carefully noted that as the title is used of the work of Philip, "one of the Seven," and of that of Timothy, an Apostolic delegate, 2 Tim. iv. 5, it may have denoted an employment rather than an office, "a work rather than an order," and it might be truly said that every Apostle was an Evangelist, but that not every Evangelist was an Apostle. At the same time their work may well have been more restricted locally than that of the Apostles, cf. Theodoret on Ephes. iv. 11, and also Eusebius, H.E., ii., 3, iii. 37, itinerant work of an Evangelist, "Evangelist," B.D.[2]. The title is not found in the Apostolic Fathers or in the Didaché, and the latter omission Harnack would explain on the ground that the "Apostles" in the Didaché were just Evangelists; but it would seem, if we admit the reference to 2 Tim. iv. 5, that the title was already in general use, and that it was not limited to Apostles. Meyer sees in the Evangelists those who transmitted orally the facts of our Lord's life and teaching, before the existence of written Gospels; but however tempting this view may be, we can scarcely define the Evangelists' work so precisely, and still less thus distinguish it from that of the Apostles; but see, however, as favouring Meyer's view, "Evangelist," Hastings' B.D. Ewald's remarks on Philip as an Evangelist are still of interest, Die drei ersten Evangelien, i., 48 ff.; on the mistake which confused this Philip with Philip the Apostle, see Salmon, Introd., 313.—εἰς Κ.: on two occasions St. Paul had already visited Cæsarea, ix. 30, xviii. 22, and he would probably have met Philip previously; but we have no knowledge of any previous meeting between St. Luke and Philip. We can conceive something of the importance of such a meeting when we remember the advantage which the latter's knowledge of the events in the early history of the Church would possess for the future historian. Philip's presence in Cæsarea at once connects itself with the notice in viii. 40, and thus indicates a unity of authorship in the whole book.—ὄντος ἐκ τῶν ἑπτά: the notice shows us how the early part of the book is taken for granted by the writer of the latter part (so Lightfoot and Salmon). This is surely more intelligible and satisfactory than to refer the words to the "author to Theophilus," or to regard it with Clemen as a later addition perhaps by his R., who already betrayed, xiv. 8, a knowledge of the sources of the first part of the book, or perhaps by R.J., who then connected Historia Petri and Historia Pauli. Jüngst refers the notice in viii. 40 to a Reviser who thus seeks to connect the Philip of chap. viii. with Cæsarea, and so to identify him with the Philip here.

Ver. 9. παρθένοι: an unwedded life might enable them to wait on the Lord without distraction, and thus to be more free for the exercise of their gift of prophecy, but nothing is said of any separate order, or anything to lead us to suppose that they did not share the home life of their father, or that they had devoted themselves to God by any special vow (see however in support of this latter view Felten, Knabenbauer, Plumptre, C. and H.). St. Jerome, Epist., v., 8, cviii., 8, in relating the story of Paula mentions how she saw at Cæsarea the house of Cornelius now turned into a Christian church, and the humble abode of Philip, and the chambers of his daughters, the four virgins "which did prophesy".—προφητεύουσαι, cf. Joel ii. 28, 29, Acts ii. 17, xix. 6, 1 Cor. xi. 5, xiv. 24, although nothing is said of their possessing the power of prediction, or foretelling anything concerning Paul. Since women were forbidden to teach it would seem that the prophet as such was not a teacher; Bigg, Doctrine of the Twelve Apostles, p. 29. But whilst there is no reason to suppose that they prophesied in the church, although even Felten supposes that in Churches not founded by Paul different rules might have prevailed, they would be able to speak and to teach in private or at home especially amongst the women both Jews and Gentiles, to whom in the East men would have had no access (Luckock, Footprints of the Apostles as traced by St. Luke, ii., p. 214). This verse is regarded by Hilgenfeld as an addition made by the "author to Theophilus" (so Renan). Spitta however thinks that something ought to have been said as to the nature of the prophecies uttered by the four daughters, but that instead of this we have the notice of Agabus in ver. 10. He therefore believes that the "We" section was interrupted at ver. 10, and that the verses following are interpolated from his inferior source B. The reference to weeping in ver. 13 is much more natural if we presuppose the presence of women, so he therefore reads

[1] Instead of τε αυτου ℵABCDE, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Wendt read εαυτου (HLP αὑτοῦ, others αὐτοῦ), see W.H., App., p. 151.

[2] ℵABC*E, Tisch., W.H. (omit ο). ℵAE add και ειπεν, so Tisch. (Wendt perhaps); but om., W.H., R.V., Weiss, after BCHLP, Bas., Chrys., D has ειπεν δε προς ημας ο Π., so Blass and Hilg. Instead of συνθ. D has θορυβουντες; D also reads δεθηναι βουλομαι, but not Blass.

"they prophesied with tears over the fate of Paul" (p. 339); so somewhat similarly Jüngst (p. 177).

Ver. 10. ἡμέρας πλείους: "many days," R.V., "some" margin; literally "more days," the phrase is used vaguely with what Ramsay calls Luke's usual defective sense of time, cf. xiii. 31, xxv. 14. The phrase is also found in xxvii. 20, so that it occurs twice in the "We" sections and twice in the rest of Acts, but nowhere else in N.T., see Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 151, Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 53. Often in LXX. Weiss thinks that the phrase here, cf. ver. 4, shows that Paul had given up all idea of reaching Jerusalem for Pentecost; but see on the other hand Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 297, and Salmon, Introd., p. 300: probably the Apostle had several days to spare when he reached Cæsarea, and he would naturally calculate his time differently when he had made a prosperous voyage, so that there is no contradiction with xx. 16.—προφ. ὀνόμ. ῞Α.: probably the same who is mentioned in xi. 25, since he too came from Jerusalem. It has seemed strange to Blass and to others that St. Luke mentions Agabus here so indefinitely, but in this "We" section it would seem that St. Luke refers to Agabus in this vague way because this was the first time that he had seen the prophet (unless we accept D in xi. 28). It is therefore quite unnecessary to regard the mention of his name in xi. 28 as an interpolation. Agabus is evidently enabled not only to declare the will of God, but also to predict the future.

Ver. 11. ἄρας τὴν ζώνην: the symbolic action by Agabus reminds us of the O.T. prophets, cf. 1 Kings xxii. 11, Isa. xx. 2, Jer. xiii. 1, Ezek. iv. and v. Agabus as a dweller in Jerusalem would know something of that bitter feeling against Paul, and would wish to warn him.—παραδώσ. εἰς χ., cf. the words of our Lord, Luke ix. 44, xxiv. 7; phrase frequent in LXX both in Psalms and Prophets, cf. Ecclus. iv. 19, xi. 6; 1 Macc. iv. 30.

Ver. 12. παρεκ. ἡμεῖς: St. Luke joins in the entreaty.—ἐντόπ., i.e., the Christians of Cæsarea, including of course the inmates of Philip's house; not in LXX or Apocr., but in classical Greek.—τοῦ μὴ ἀναβ., Burton, p. 159.

Ver. 13. τί ποιεῖτε κλαί.: what do ye, weeping? (as we might say "what are you about?" etc.), cf. Mark xi. 5 (Acts xiv. 15).—συνθ.: in Attic Greek, to break, to break in pieces, and so ἀποθρύπτω is used of (1) breaking in pieces, (2) breaking in spirit, enervating τὰς ψυχάς, cf. Plat., Rep., 495 E.; here συνθ. means to weaken the Apostle's purpose rather than to break his heart in sorrow. —ἐγὼ, emphatic, I for my part.—οὐ μόνον in N.T., rather than μὴ μόνον with the infinitive, Burton, p. 183.—ἑτοίμως ἔχω: the exact phrase only once elsewhere in N.T., and there used by St. Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 14 (cf. 1 Pet. iv. 5): "qui paratus est, ei leve onus est," Bengel. Ewald compares this firm determination and courage of St. Paul with our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem, cf. Luke ix. 51.

Ver. 14. ἡσυχάσαμεν: only in Luke and Paul, cf. Luke xiv. 3, Acts xi. 18. In LXX, Job xxxii. 6, Neh. v. 8.—τὸ θέλ. τοῦ Κ., cf. Matt. vi. 10, Luke xxii. 42, and also St. Paul's own expression in ἑτοίμως ἔχω ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ. 14. μὴ πειθομένου δὲ αὐτοῦ, ἡσυχάσαμεν εἰπόντες, Τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Κυρίου γενέσθω.

15. Μετὰ δὲ τὰς ἡμέρας ταύτας [1] ἀποσκευασάμενοι ἀνεβαίνομεν εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ. 16. συνῆλθον δὲ καὶ τῶν μαθητῶν ἀπὸ Καισαρείας σὺν ἡμῖν,[2] ἄγοντες παρ᾽ ᾧ ξενισθῶμεν, Μνάσωνί τινι Κυπρίῳ, ἀρχαίῳ μαθητῇ.

[1] Instead of αποσ. ℵABELP, Tisch., Wendt, Weiss, R.V., W.H. read επισ. D has αποταξαμενοι, so Blass in β, and Hilg. Blass proposed απασπασαμενοι, but did not put in text; see Ramsay's criticism of Blass on this passage, Expositor, March, 1895.

[2] Instead of αγοντες κ.τ.λ. Blass in β text (following D, Syr. H. mg.) ουτοι δε ηγον ημας προς ους ξενισθωμεν, και παραγενομενοι εις τινα κωμην εγενομεθα παρα Μνασονι Κ. μαθητῃ αρχ. κακειθεν εξιοντες ηλθομεν εις I. From the trans. given in comment. it would appear that the Cæsarean disciples accompanied Paul on a journey of no less than sixty-four miles to Jerusalem to introduce him to Mnason, who lived in the Holy City. But the improbability of this has been justly urged by Blass, Philology of the Gospels, p. 128 (so too Salmon, Hermathena, xxi., p. 239; Zahn, Einleitung, ii., p. 343), not only on account of the long distance, too long for one day, but also because Paul might presumably have relied upon the hospitality of private friends, already known in Jerusalem, to say nothing of the brethren referred to in ver. 17. But the β text makes Paul rest at the house of Mnason, not at Jerusalem, but at some village on the way, and the Cæsarean disciples might naturally accompany Paul to a village known to them, but not to Paul, where their fellow-disciple (Mnason) dwelt. The originality of the β text is supported not only by Belser and Zöckler, but by Holtzmann, Th. Zz., p. 81, 1896, and Hilgenfeld; but, on the other hand, see Corssen, G. G. A., p. 438, 1896, and Weiss, Codex D, p. 101; Page, Classical Review, pp. 318, 319 (1897), Wendt (1899), p. 342, and Schmiedel, u. s. Wendt cannot see why, if β text was original, it could have been altered into T.R., whereas if we note that the arrival of Paul at Jerusalem is only notified in ver. 17, the lodging with Mnason might well have been placed previously at some village on the route. But if we give the proper force to ανεβαινομεν, ver. 15, the α text properly understood (as Zahn admits) implies the same fact as is brought out in β, viz., that Mnason entertained the company, not at Jerusalem, but on the evening of the first day of their journey thither; ver. 15, they set about the journey; ver. 16, they lodged with Mnason on the introduction of the Cæsarean disciples; ver. 17, they came to Jerusalem, see especially Ramsay, Expositor, March, 1895, and his preference for the "Eastern" as against the "Western" reading (although Zöckler is still unpersuaded by Ramsay's arguments, Greifswalder Studien, p. 138).

xviii. 21, 1 Cor. iv. 19, xvi. 7 (Heb. vi. 3), cf. Mayor's note on James iv. 15 for similar phrases amongst Greeks and Romans, as also amongst Jews and Arabians, Taylor's Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, pp. 29, 95, 128, 2nd edit.

Ver. 15. ἀποσ.: A.V., "took up our carriages," but the latter word is not used now in a passive sense for luggage or impedimenta, as in O.T., Judg. xviii. 21, 1 Sam. xvii. 22, Isa. x. 18, cf. Shakes., Tempest, v. 1, 3: "Time goes upright with his carriage" (burden); see also Plumptre's interesting note on the word. R.V., reading ἐπισ., renders "we took up our baggage," margin "made ready our baggage," τὰ πρὸς τὴν ὁδοιπορίαν λαβόντες, Chrys., Ramsay renders "having equipped horses," Xen., Hell., v., 3, 1, and see St. Paul, p. 302: the journey on foot, some sixty-four miles, was scarcely probable for Paul, especially if, as it would seem from D, it was accomplished in two days. Grotius took it as = "sarcinas jumentis imponere," as if ὑποζύγια, Xen., Hell., vii., 2, 18. Hackett and Rendall refer the word to the packing up of the valuable alms which St. Paul was carrying to Jerusalem, but this interpretation seems fanciful, although Hackett supposes that the contribution might have consisted in part of raiment or provisions. Belser still more curiously refers it to getting change in the current money of Palestine for the alms collected in the coin of various lands.—ἀνεβ.: imperfect,

17. to denote the start on the journey (cf. viii. 25: ὑπέστρεφον, R.V.). Both A. and R.V. here render "went up," but it should be rendered "we set about the journey to Jerusalem," end of third m. j.

Ver. 16. ἄγοντες παρ' ᾧ ξενισ.: A. and R.V. render "bringing with them Mnason with whom we should lodge," but Meyer-Wendt, so Page and Rendall, render "bringing us to the house of Mnason," etc., cf. also Spitta, Apostelgeschichte, p. 234. This is more in accordance with Codex D, on which see critical note = ἄγ. πρὸς Μνάσ. ἵνα ξενισθῶμεν παρ' αὐτῷ κ.τ.λ., see Blass, Gram., pp. 171, 213, and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 229. Vulgate (so Erasmus, Calvin) renders "adducentes secum apud quem hospitaremur Mnasonem," but harsh, and presupposes that Mnason was at Cæsarea.—Μνάσωνι, Att. Μνήσων, in late MS., Νάσων and Ἰάσων, a name common among the Greeks, and Mnason was probably a Hellenist.—ἀρχαίῳ, cf. xv. 7, may mean that he was an early disciple, R.V., or even from the beginning, the great Pentecost, xi. 15 (Humphrey), see also Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 303; he may have been converted by his fellow-countryman Barnabas. If Blass is right in β, Acts xi. 2, he may have been a convert instructed by St. Peter (and in this sense ἀρχαῖος).

Ver. 17. There is no good reason to doubt that they were in time for the Feast; it is a legitimate inference from their tarrying at Cæsarea that they were easily able to reach Jerusalem: possibly the presence of Jews from Asia may be taken, as Rendall points out, to indicate that the time of the Feast was near at hand.—ἀσμένως: only here, significantly; omitted in ii. 41 (R.V., W.H.); 2 Macc. iv. 12, x. 33 A, 3 Macc. iii. 15, v. 21, so in classical Greek. Even if the welcome only came, as Wendt supposes, from those who were comparatively few amongst many in Jerusalem, St. Paul found himself a brother amongst brethren.—ἐδέξ., see on xviii. 27, ἀποδέχομαι.

Ver. 18. τῇ ἐπιούσῃ, three times in "We" sections, twice in rest of Acts; nowhere else in N.T. (in vii. 26 with ἡμέρᾳ), Hawkins, u. s.—σὺν ἡμῖν: the writer thus again claims to be an eye-witness of what passed; it may well have been the occasion for the reception of the alms collected from the Churches.—Ἰάκωβον: on the authoritative position of St. James as further shown here see Hort, Ecclesia, p. 105, and Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 147. Nothing is said of the Apostles, and they may have been absent from Jerusalem on missionary work, or at least the chief of them. They would scarcely have been included under the term πρεσβ. as Wendt supposes.

Ver. 19. ἀσπαζ.: used of farewell greetings, xx. 1, xxi. 6, and of greetings on arrival, xviii. 22, xxi. 7, for its use here cf. 1 Macc. xi. 6.—ἐξηγ., see on x. 8, etc.—καθ' ἓν ἕκαστον: "one by one," R.V., cf. Ephes. v. 33.—διακονίας, see note on vi. 1, 2.

Ver. 20. ἐδόξ.: "recte imperf. quia finis verbo εἶπαν indicatur," Blass.—θεωρεῖς: the word seems to imply that Paul had already become cognisant of the fact by his own observations in his ministerial work.—ἀδελφέ: St. Paul is recognised as an ἀδελφός not only by St. James but by the assembled elders (see also Weiss, in loco).—Ἰουδ., see critical note.—μυριάδες, cf. Luke xii. 1, of a large but indefinite number (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 15), referring to the number of believers not only in Jerusalem but in Judæa present in large numbers for the Feast. The word cannot refer to Jewish Christians in a wider sense, as Overbeck took it, because they would not need to be informed of Paul's teaching relative to the Mosaic law.—ζηλωταὶ τοῦ ν., cf. Gal. i. 14, Tit. ii. 14, 1 Pet. iii. 13 (2 Macc. iv. 2, we have the same phrase, cf. 4 Macc. xviii. 12). The extreme party of the Pharisees prided themselves on the title "zealots of the law, zealots of God"; it was a title which St. Paul himself had claimed, Lightfoot, Gal. i. 14.

Ver. 21. κατηχήθησαν: the word seems to imply definite instruction, not merely audierunt, Vulgate. Hort refers to the term as implying here assiduous talking and lecturing, Judaistic Christianity, p. 107.—ἀποστασίαν, cf. 1 Macc. ii. 15 (S ἀπόστασιν) when the officers of Antiochus Epiphanes, in the time of Mattathias, tried to compel the people of Modin to forsake the law and to sacrifice upon the idol altar.—μὴ περιτέμνειν: these words and those which follow were an entire perversion of St. Paul's teaching, just as his enemies gave a perverted view of the Apostle's supposed intrusion with Trophimus into the temple, ver. 29. The exemption from the Mosaic law was confined to Jewish converts, xvi. 3, 1 Cor. vii. 18.—τοῖς ἔθεσι, cf. vi. 14, xv. 1. —περιπατεῖν: only here in Luke, but often in the Epistles in this sense, cf. Mark vii. 5.

Ver. 22. τί οὖν ἐστι; cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 15, 26, cf. vi. 3 in β text.—δεῖ πλῆθος συνελθεῖν, see critical note.—ἀκούσονται, i.e., the Judaising Christians referred to in κατηχήθησαν, ver. 26. The words refer, not to an assembly of the whole Church, or to a tumultuary assembly, ver. 27, but to an assembly of the Judaising Christians as above.

Ver. 23. εἰσὶν ἡμῖν, cf. xviii. 10. The four men certainly seem to have been members of the Church at Jerusalem, i.e., Jewish Christians.—εὐχὴν ἔχοντες: a temporary Nazirite vow, Num. vi. 1 ff. The length of time was optional, but thirty days seems to have been the shortest time, Jos., B.J., ii., 15, 1.—ἐφ' ἑαυτῶν, see critical note, the Nazirite vow lies upon them as an unfulfilled obligation. If we read ἀφ' it would mean him to affirm that the vow had been taken by them of their own will, on their own initiation, cf. Luke xii. 57, 2 Cor. iii. 5, John v. 19, 30, etc., see further Grimm-Thayer, sub v. ἀπό, ii., 2 d, aa; and Rendall, in loco. Blass however renders ἐφ' "quia votum in se receperunt," so that it is difficult to distinguish very definitely.

Ver. 24. παραλαβὼν, cf. ver. 26, xv. 39 (xvi. 33): take in a friendly way, associate thyself with them as a companion.—ἁγνίσθητι σὺν αὐτοῖς: the advice is characteristic of the Apostle who had lived as St. James had lived, Eusebius, H.E., ii., 23, and it certainly seems to demand that St. Paul should place himself on a level with the four men and take upon himself the Nazirite vow, cf. Num. vi. 3. The σὺν αὐτοῖς can hardly be explained otherwise. But how far the obligation of the vow extended in such a case is not clear (Edersheim, Temple and its Services, p. 326), and the time specified does not seem to allow for the commencement and completion of a vow on the part of the Apostle, although we cannot satisfactorily explain such expressions as the one before us, cf. ἡγνισμένον, xxiv. 18, on the supposition that St. Paul only associated himself with the company of the four votaries and incurred the expenses of their sacrifices. Dr. Hort suggests that the Apostle may have been himself about to offer sacrifices in the Temple in connection with some previous vow, or that in connection with the Gentile offerings which he had brought to Jerusalem and safely delivered (as it would seem) he may have proposed to offer a solemn peace-offering in the Temple, cf. καὶ προσφοράς, xxiv. 17, and Rom. xv. 16, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 109, 110; on the verb ἁγνίζω see also Hort's First Epistle of St. Peter, p. 87.—δαπάνησον ἐπ' αὐτοῖς: "be at charges for them," R.V., spend money upon them. It was considered a meritorious act thus to defray the expenses of their sacrifices for poor Nazirites; Josephus, Ant., xix., 6, 1, how King Agrippa on his arrival at Jerusalem acted thus with a view to conciliate popular favour, Edersheim, u. s., p. 326, Renan, Saint Paul, p. 519, Kypke, Observ., ii., 113; cf. Mishna, Nazir, ii., 6. J. Weiss supposed that the money would have been furnished out of the contributions brought by Paul, and that such employed for the poor members of the Jerusalem Church would have been quite in accordance with the objects for which the contributions were made; but on the other hand, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 310.—ἵνα ξυρήσ., see critical note; at the conclusion of their vow, Num. vi. 18, when the sacrifice was offered by the Nazirites, Num. vi. 14.—On the future indicative with ἵνα in N.T. in pure final clauses see Burton, p. 86, if we adopt R.V. If we read γνώσονται, see critical note, the future is not dependent on ἵνα, "and all shall know," R.V., viz., by this act of thine. On this independent future see Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 81 (1893).—καὶ αὐτὸς, i.e., as well as other Jewish Christians.—στοιχεῖς: a neutral word, as the walk might be right or wrong, but here to be taken with φυλάσσων, "so walkest as to keep the law," Grimm-Thayer, sub v., no need for "orderly".

Ver. 25. ἡμεῖς, cf. reading in β text, but in any case ἡμεῖς is emphatic, intimating that St. James and the Church at Jerusalem could not condemn St. Paul's attitude towards Gentile Christians, since they had themselves consented to place these Gentile Christians on a different footing from that of the born Jews who became Christians.—ἐπεστείλαμεν, see critical note, cf. xv. 20 (Zöckler).—μηδὲν τοιοῦτον τηρ., see critical note.—Wendt with Schürer objects to the whole reference to the Apostolic Conference, and sees in the verse the hand of a Redactor, as in xvi. 4 (see note, p. 346, edit. 1899). But the reference may well imply that St. James on his part was quite prepared to adhere to the compact entered into at the Conference with regard to Gentile Christians, and that he expects St. Paul on his side to show that he has no desire to disparage the law in the eyes of Jewish Christians.

Ver. 26. τότε ὁ Παῦλος: St. Paul's conduct was another illustration of the rule laid down for himself when writing to Corinth, cf. 1 Cor. ix. 20. This is in itself an answer to the captious criticism which doubts the truth of his action on this occasion, so amongst recent writers Hilgenfeld (1896). The vow of Acts xviii. 18 is sufficient to show us that there is no reason to suppose that the Apostle was merely acting a part in following the advice of St. James. McGiffert discusses the question at length, p. 340 ff., and concludes that the Apostle may well have done just what he is reported to have done; and further, that as a simpler explanation of Paul's arrest would have answered every purpose, the explanation given may fairly be assumed to be the true one. Renan, Saint Paul, p. 517, also accepts the narrative as an illustration of St. Paul's own principle referred to above in 1 Cor. ix. 20, so too Wendt, J. Weiss, Pfleiderer. It seems strange that Wesley should have gone so far in the opposite direction as to believe that the Apostle actually suffered for his compliance with the wishes of James, ver. 33, cf. Speaker's Commentary, in loco.—τῇ ἐχομ. ἡμέρᾳ, taken either with παραλ. or with σὺν αὐτοῖς ἁγν., so R.V.; only in Luke, cf. Luke xiii. 33, Acts xx. 15, without ἡμέρᾳ (so in Polybius); cf. xiii. 44, W. H. margin. In LXX 1 Chron. x. 8; 2 Macc. xii. 39 (1 Macc. iv. 28).—εἰσῄει: according to our interpretation of the passage, the word means that Paul entered into the Temple, and stayed there for seven days with the four poor men until the period of their vow was fulfilled, Renan, Saint Paul, p. 520; but the expression need not mean more than that he entered into the Temple to give notice, or rather, giving notice, for the convenience of the priests of the day when the vow would be ended, and the necessary offerings brought.—διαγγέλλων: "declaring," R.V., i.e., to the priests, not omnibus edicens (Grotius, so Grimm), "to signify" as in A.V., makes the participle future; verb only used by St. Luke in N.T. (Rom. xi. 17, quotation from LXX), 2 Macc. i. 33 (cf. its use in the sense of publication, Ps. ii. 7, lviii. 13, cf. 2 Macc. i. 33, iii. 34, Ecclesiast. xliii. 2).—τὴν ἐκπ. τῶν ἡ. τοῦ ἁγ., i.e., the seven days, ver. 27, which remained until the period of the vow was fulfilled, when the sacrifice was offered. Others however take ἕως οὗ with εἰσῄει, "he entered in . . . (and remained) until the offering," etc.—ὑπὲρ ἑνὸς ἑκάστου αὐτῶν: there is no need to suppose with Nösgen that these words mean that the period of the full accomplishment of the vow was different in each of the four cases—at all events the whole period of "purification" did not extend over more than seven days.

Ver. 27. αἱ ἑπτὰ ἡμέραι: it does not appear that the seven days were enjoined by the law—not even in Num. vi. 9; indeed it would appear from Jos., B.J., ii., 15, that a period of thirty days was customary before the sacrifice could be offered. The seven days cannot therefore include the whole period of the vow, although they might well include the period of the Apostle's partnership with the four men. Wendt and Weiss suppose that a reference is here made to a rule that the interval between the announcement to the priest and the conclusion of the Nazirite vow should include a period of seven days, but as there is admittedly no reference to any such ordinance elsewhere, it is precarious to depend too much upon it. It seems impossible to refer the expression to the seven days observed as the Feast of Pentecost; the article before ἑπτὰ ἡμ. refers to the "days of purification" just mentioned, see further critical note and Knabenbauer for summary of different views.—οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἀ. Ἰ.: "the Jews from Asia," R.V., cf. vi. 9, where we read of the Jews of Cilicia, etc., who disputed with Stephen.—θεασάμ., cf. xxiv. 18, where St. Paul tells us how these Jews had found him in the Temple purified, i.e., with the Nazirite vow upon him, and in the act of presenting offerings—not of creating a disturbance, as his enemies alleged. These Jews, who were of course not believers, may have come from Ephesus, and were full of enmity against the Apostle for escaping them there, cf. xx. 3—they had come up to worship at Pentecost.—συνέχεον, see on ix. 22.—ἐπέβ. τὰς χ., cf. xii. 1.

Ver. 28. Ἄνδρες Ἰσ.: the title which would remind them of the special dignity and glory of their nation, of its hopes and obligations.—βοηθεῖτε: as if against some outrage, or perhaps as if to apprehend Paul, or to attack him—in doing anything to admit the Gentiles, ἔθνη, to God's fold, St. Paul was exposing himself to the hatred of these unbelievers amongst his countrymen, 1 Thess. ii. 16, Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 107.—οὗτός: contemptuous.—κατὰ τοῦ λαοῦ: the name for Israel, see on iv. 25, the same charge in almost the same words had been brought against St. Stephen, vi. 13; "before the Jewish authorities blasphemy was alleged, before the Roman, sedition".—πάντας πανταχοῦ, πανταχῇ or -ῇ, W.H., cf. xvii. 30, 1 Cor. iv. 17.—πανταχῇ: only here. The three words show the exaggerated nature of the charge; on St. Luke's characteristic use of πᾶς and kindred words see p. 51.—ἔτι τε καὶ, connecting thus closely the alleged act of introducing Gentiles into the Temple with the foregoing, as an illustration that Paul did not confine himself to preaching against the Holy Place, but had proceeded to defile it by his action; but cf. Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 163, "and further hath brought Greeks also," cf. xix. 27.—Ἕλληνας: only one man, Trophimus, had been actually seen with Paul, so that we again note the exaggerated charge, and even with regard to Trophimus, ἐνόμιζον, they only conjectured—they had no positive proof.—κεκοίνωκε: perfect, "sed manet pollutio," Blass, in loco, see also Gram., p. 194.

Ver. 29. τὸν Ἐφέσ.: if some of these Jews, as is very probable, came from Ephesus, they would have recognised Trophimus. The latter had not only come "as far as Asia," xx. 4, but had evidently accompanied Paul to Jerusalem; on the statement and its bearing upon 2 Tim. iv. 20, see Salmon, Introd., p. 401, and Weiss, Die Briefe Pauli an Timotheus und Titus, p. 354.—προεωρακότες: antea videre; in classical Greek nowhere as here, but referring to future, or space, not to past time; Blass, in loco, compares 1 Thess. ii. 2, Rom. iii. 9, for πρό.—εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν, i.e., from the Court of the Gentiles (into which the uncircumcised Greeks like Trophimus and others might enter) into the inner Court, open to Jews only. The punishment for such transgression by a Gentile was death, even if he was a Roman citizen, Jos., B.J., vi., 2, 4. At the foot of the stair by which "the Court" in the strict sense of the word was approached there was a railing bearing notice in Greek and Latin with the prohibition and the punishment due to its violation. For one of these inscriptions discovered and published in 1871 by Clermont-Ganneau see Revue archéologique, xxiii., 1872, Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 74, and div. ii., vol. i., p. 266. The ἀνέβη seems to indicate that the writer was well acquainted with the locality. Stier supposes that a report was brought to the Roman authorities by the Christians, or the word may refer to an official report. The troops would be in readiness as always during the Festivals in case of riot, Jos., Ant., xx., 5, 3, B.J., v., 5, 8, etc. φάσις: only here in N.T. Blass and Grimm derive it from φαίνω (in classical Greek, especially of information against smugglers, and also quite generally), but in Susannah ver. 55 (Theod.) φάσις is derived by some from φημί, see Speaker's Commentary, in loco, while Grimm classes it there also under the same derivation as here.—τῷ χιλ.: "military tribune," R.V. margin; his thousand men consisted of 760 infantry and 240 cavalry, cf. xxiii. 23, Blass, in loco. This officer who was evidently in command at Fort Antonia is called by Josephus φρούραρχος, Ant., xv., 11, 4, xviii., 4, 3; Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 55, E.T.—τῆς σπείρης, cf. x. 1, "cohort," R.V. margin.—συγκέχυται, see p. 238, and also critical note, "was in confusion," R.V., lit. (so Rhem.).

Ver. 32. ἐξαυτῆς, cf. x. 33.—παραλ. στρ. καὶ ἑκατοντ., indicating that he thought the tumult considerable.—κατέδραμεν ἐπ' αὐτούς, "ran down upon them" from Antonia, so R.V. vividly; verb found only here in N.T. In Job xvi. 10 (11) A we have the verb with accusative and ἐπί.—ἐπαύσαντο τύπτοντες after παύομαι: the act or state desisted from, indicated by the addition of a present participle, frequent in Luke, cf. Luke v. 4, Acts v. 42, vi. 13, xiii. 10, xx. 31; cf. also Ephes. i. 16, Col. i. 9, so in LXX, Grimm, sub v., Winer-Moulton, xlv. 4.

Ver. 33. ἐπελ. αὐτοῦ: with a hostile intention, see xvii. 19.—δεθ. ἁλύσεσι δυσί: as a malefactor and seditious person, ver. 38, to be guarded securely as the cause of the tumult, cf. xii. 6.—τίς ἂν εἴη, καὶ τί ἐστι πεποιηκώς: the difference in the moods in dependent sentences after τις may be noted: the centurion had no clear idea as to who Paul was, but he feels sure that he had committed some crime, Winer-Moulton, xli., 4c, Weiss, Wendt, in loco, on the other hand Page. On Luke's thus mingling the optative obliqua with direct narrative alone among the N.T. writers, Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 225 (1893).

Ver. 34. ἐβόων: if we read ἐπεφώνουν, see critical note, a verb peculiar to St. Luke, Luke xxiii. 21, Acts xii. 22, xxii. 24 = "shouted," R.V., cf. xix. 31.—μὴ δυνάμ., see critical note.—τὸ ἀσφαλὲς: adjective, three times in St. Luke with this same shade of meaning, xxii. 30, xxv. 26 (cf. ii. 36, and Wisd. xviii. 6, ἀσφαλῶς).—παρεμ.: the word may mean an army, Heb. xi. 34, or καὶ ἐπυνθάνετο τίς[1] ἂν εἴη, καὶ τί ἐστι πεποιηκώς. 34. ἄλλοι δὲ ἄλλο τι[2] ἐβόων ἐν τῷ ὄχλῳ· μὴ δυνάμενος δὲ γνῶναι τὸ ἀσφαλὲς διὰ τὸν θόρυβον, ἐκέλευσεν ἄγεσθαι αὐτὸν εἰς τὴν παρεμβολήν. 35. ὅτε δὲ ἐγένετο[3] ἐπὶ τοὺς ἀναβαθμούς, συνέβη βαστάζεσθαι αὐτὸν ὑπὸ τῶν στρατιωτῶν διὰ τὴν βίαν τοῦ ὄχλου. 36. ἠκολούθει γὰρ τὸ πλῆθος τοῦ λαοῦ[4] κράζον,[5] Αἶρε αὐτόν.

37. Μέλλων τε εἰσάγεσθαι εἰς τὴν παρεμβολὴν ὁ Παῦλος λέγει τῷ χιλιάρχῳ, Εἰ ἔξεστί μοι εἰπεῖν τι πρὸς σέ; ὁ δὲ ἔφη, Ἑλληνιστὶ the camp which it occupies (so in LXX = Heb. מַחֲנֶה Judg. iv. 16, viii. 10, 1 Macc. v. 28). In this passage may = the castle itself, as A. and R.V., or perhaps the barracks in the castle. A Macedonian word according to Phryn., but see Kennedy, Sources of N.T. Greek, pp. 15, 16, and also for its meaning here, Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 55, E.T.

Ver. 35. ἐγέν. ἐπὶ, cf. ver. 17, and Luke xxiv. 22, Grimm, sub γίν., 5, g. ἀναβ.: the steps which led up to the fortress from the Temple area. B.J., v., 5, 8, describes the surroundings of the scene vividly, and the καταβάσεις which led down from Antonia to the Temple; see above on ver. 31, and O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 138.—συνέβη βαστάζ.: the σύν is not superfluous (see Meyer-Wendt and Hackett), it indicates the peril of the situation; the pressure of the people became increasingly violent as they saw that St. Paul would escape them, and compelled the soldiers to carry him, that he might not be torn from them altogether, so that the carrying was not merely "propter angustias loci". βαστάζ., cf. iii. 2, see Schürer, u. s.

Ver. 36. ἠκολούθει, imperfect, "kept following".—Αἶρε αὐτόν: the cry was continuous; it was the same cry which had been raised against another and a greater prisoner Who had been delivered to the Romans as a malefactor, cf. Luke xxiii. 18, John xix. 15, and also Polycarp, Martyr, iii., 19.

Ver. 37. παρεμβ., see on ver. 34.—εἰ, cf. i. 6.—Ἑλλη. γινώσκεις; no need to supply λαλεῖν, cf. Xen., Cyr., vii., 5, 31; so in Latin, Græcè nescire, Cic., Pro Flacco, iv., Vulgate, literally, Græcè nosti?

Ver. 38. οὐκ ἄρα σὺ εἶ: mirantis est, cf. Arist., Av., 280 (Blass). Vulgate, Eras. render Nonne tu es . . . ? but emphasis on οὐκ "Thou art not then" (as I supposed). No doubt the false prophet to whom reference is made by Josephus. Whilst Felix was governor he gathered the people around him on the Mount of Olives to the number of 30,000, and foretold that at his word the walls of the city would fall. But Felix attacked him and the impostor fled although the majority (πλεῖστοι) of his followers were captured or slain, Jos., B.J., ii., 13, 5. In another account, Ant., xx., 8, 6, Josephus states that 400 were killed and 200 wounded, so that he evidently contradicts himself and his numbers are untrustworthy. For the various attempts to reconcile these different notices, cf. Krenkel, Josephus und Lukas, p. 243. But apart from this, there is no positive discrepancy with St. Luke. It is possible that the chiliarch as a soldier only reckoned those who were armed, whilst Josephus spoke of the whole crowd of followers. Evidently the Roman officer thought that the Egyptian had returned after his flight, and that he γινώσκεις; 38. οὐκ ἄρα σὺ εἶ ὁ Αἰγύπτιος ὁ πρὸ τούτων τῶν ἡμερῶν ἀναστατώσας καὶ ἐξαγαγὼν εἰς τὴν ἔρημον τοὺς τετρακισχιλίους ἄνδρας τῶν σικαρίων; 39. εἶπε δὲ ὁ Παῦλος, Ἐγὼ ἄνθρωπος μέν εἰμι Ἰουδαῖος[1] Ταρσεύς, τῆς Κιλικίας οὐκ ἀσήμου πόλεως πολίτης· δέομαι δέ σου, ἐπίτρεψόν μοι λαλῆσαι πρὸς τὸν λαόν.

was now set upon by the people as an impostor (so also Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 180, note, E.T.). There is no sign whatever that St. Luke was dependent upon Josephus, as Krenkel maintains, but it is of course quite possible that both writers followed a different tradition of the same event. But St. Luke differs from Josephus in his numbers, there is no connection in the Jewish historian, as in St. Luke, between the Egyptian and the Sicarii, and whilst Josephus mentions the Mount of Olives, St. Luke speaks of the wilderness; Belser, Theol. Quartalschrift, pp. 68, 69, Heft i., 1896, "Egyptian, The" (A. C. Headlam), Hastings' B.D.—ὁ . . . ἀναστ. καὶ ἐξαγ.: "stirred up to sedition and led out," R.V., this rendering makes the first verb (used only in Luke and Paul) also active, as in other cases in N.T. where it occurs, Acts xviii. 6, Gal. v. 12. The verb is not known in classical writers, but cf. LXX, Dan. vii. 23, and also in the O.T. fragments, Aquila and Symm., Ps. x. 1, lviii. 11, Isa. xxii. 3 (Grimm-Thayer).—τοὺς: "the 4000," R.V., as of some well-known number.—τῶν σικαρίων: "of the Assassins," R.V. The word sicarius is the common designation of a number, A.V., cf., e.g., the law passed under Sulla against murderers, "Lex Cornelia de Sicariis et Veneficis"; so in the Mishna in this general sense, but here it is used of the Sicarii or fanatical Jewish faction (and we note that the writer is evidently aware of their existence as a political party) which arose in Judæa after Felix had rid the country of the robbers of whom Josephus speaks, Ant., xx., 8, 5, B.J., ii., 13, 2, so called from the short daggers, sicæ, which they wore under their clothes. They mingled with the crowds at the Festivals, stabbed their political opponents unobserved, and drew suspicion from themselves by apparent indignation at such crimes, "Assassin" (A. C. Headlam), Hastings' B.D., Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 178, E.T.

Ver. 39. Ἐγὼ ἄνθρωπος μέν εἰμι Ἰ. . . . δέομαι δέ . . .: there is no strict antithesis, "I am indeed a Jew of Tarsus" (and therefore free from your suspicion); but without speaking further of this, and proceeding perhaps to demand a legal process, the Apostle adds "but I pray you," etc. Mr. Page explains, from the position of μέν: "I (ἐγώ) as regards your question to me, am a man (ἄνθρωπος μέν), etc., but, as regards my question to you, I ask (δέομαι δέ . . .)," see reading in β. On St. Paul's citizenship see note below on xxii. 28. St. Paul uses ἄνθρωπος here, but ἀνήρ, the more dignified term, xxii. 3, in addressing his fellow-countrymen; but according to Blass, "vix recte distinguitur quasi illud (ἄνθρωπος) ut ap. att. sit humilius," cf. Matt. xviii. 23, and xxii. 2.—λαλῆσαι: Blass has a striking note on Paul's hopefulness for his people, and the proof apparent here of a man "qui populi sui summo amore imbutus nunquam de eo desperare potuit," Rom. ix.-xi.—Ἰουδ. not only Ταρ., which would have distinguished him from Αἰγ., but Ἰουδ., otherwise the chiliarch from his speaking Greek might have regarded him as no Jew, and so guilty of death for profaning the Temple.—οὐκ ἀσήμου πόλεως: litotes, xx. 29, on Tarsus see ix. 11. The city had on its coins the titles μητρόπολις αὐτόνομος. For ἄσημος, cf. 3 Macc. iii. 1, and in classical Greek, Eurip., Ion., 8. οὐκ ἄσ. Ἑλλήνων πόλις, i.e., Athens (Wetstein), see further xxii. 27. Hobart (so too Zahn) mentions ἄσημος as one of the words which show that Luke, when dealing with unprofessional subjects, shows a leaning to the use of professional language; ἄσημος is the technical term for "a disease without distinctive symptoms," and Hippocrates, just as Luke, says, μία πόλεων οὐκ ἄσημος, Epis., 1273. So again in xxiii. 13, ἀναδιδόναι, a word applied to the distribution of nourishment throughout the body, or of blood throughout the veins, is used by Hippocrates, as by

40. Ἐπιτρέψαντος δὲ αὐτοῦ, ὁ Παῦλος ἑστὼς ἐπὶ τῶν ἀναβαθμῶν κατέσεισε[1] τῇ χειρὶ τῷ λαῷ· πολλῆς δὲ σιγῆς γενομένης, προσεφώνησε

[1] D has και σεισας instead of κατεσεισε, not Blass; so D has ησυχιας instead of σιγης, see note in comment.

Luke, l.c., of a messenger delivering a letter, Epis., 1275 (see Hobart and Zahn); but it must be admitted that the same phrase is found in Polybius and Plutarch. Still the fact remains that the phraseology of St. Luke is here illustrated by a use of two similar expressions in Hippocrates, and it should be also remembered that the verb with which St. Luke opens his Gospel, ἐπιχειρεῖν, was frequently used by medical men, and that too in its secondary sense, just as by St. Luke, e.g., Hippocrates begins his treatise De Prisca Med., ὁκόσοι ἐπειχείρησαν περὶ ἰατρικῆς λέγειν ἢ γράφειν (see J. Weiss on Luke i. 1); so too Galen uses the word similarly, although it must be admitted that the same use is found in classical Greek and in Josephus, c. Apion., 2.

Ver. 40. ἐπιτρέψ.: because he no doubt saw that Paul's purpose was to inform and pacify the people, so that there is nothing strange in such permission to speak.—κατέσεισε, see on xii. 17. "What nobler spectacle than that of Paul at this moment! There he stands bound with two chains, ready to make his defence to the people. The Roman commander sits by to enforce order by his presence. An enraged populace look up to him from below. Yet in the midst of so many dangers, how self-possessed is he, how tranquil!" Chrys., Hom, xlvii. —πολλῆς δὲ σιγῆς γεν., cf. Virg., Aen., i., 148-152, ii., 1; but probably the phrase means not "a great silence," but rather "aliquantum silentii" (Blass), xxii. 2, cf. Xen., Cyr., vii., 1, 25.—Ἑβραΐδι: in W.H. Ἐβ., see Introd., 408; so as to gain the attention, and if possible the hearts, of the people, by using the language of the people, the Aramaic dialect of Palestine (Grimm-Thayer however points out that this is not rightly described as Syro-Chaldaic, it was rather Chaldee): see also Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., E.T., pp. 47, 48.

Chapter XXII.—Ver. 1. ἄνδρες ἀ. καὶ π., cf. vii. 2. So St. Stephen had addressed a similar assembly, in which had been Saul of Tarsus, who was now charged with a like offence as had been laid to the charge of the first Martyr. Those whom he addressed were his brethren according to the flesh, and his fathers, as the representatives of his nation, whether as Sanhedrists, or priests, or Rabbis. The mode of address was quite natural, since St. Paul's object was conciliatory: τοῦτο τιμῆς, ἐκεῖνο γνησιότητος, Chrys., Hom., xlvii.—ἀκούσατε: "hear from me," cf. John xii. 47, a double genitive of the person and thing, as in classical Greek, or "hear my defence," cf. 2 Tim. iv. 16.—ἀπολογίας: five times in St. Paul's Epistles, once elsewhere in Acts xxv. 16, in a strictly legal sense (cf. 1 Peter iii. 15). Used with the verb ἀπολογέομαι of defending oneself against a charge, Wisd. vi. 10, Xen., Mem., iv., 8, 5. In 2 Macc. xiii. 26 the verb is also used of Lysias ascending the rostrum and addressing the people in defence.

Ver. 2. προσεφώνει: only in Luke and Paul, except Matt. xi. 16, cf. Luke vi. 13, vii. 32, xiii. 12, xxiii. 20, xxi. 40, see Friedrich, p. 29, for the frequency of other compounds of φωνεῖν in Luke.—μᾶλλον παρ. ἡσυχ: the phrase is used similarly in Plut., Coriol., 18, Dion Hal., ii., 32, and LXX, Job xxxiv. 29; on the fondness of St. Luke for σιγή, σιγᾶν, ἡσυχάζειν, and the characteristic way in which silence results from his words and speeches, or before or during the speech, see Friedrich, p. 26, cf. Luke xiv. 4, xv. 26, Acts xi. 18, xv. 12, Acts xii. 17, xxi. 40, and for ἡσυχάζειν, 1 Thess. iv. 11, Luke xiv. 4, Acts xi. 18, xxi. 14, so too παρέχειν with accusative of the thing offered by any one, xix. 24, xxviii. 2 (xvi. 16). The verb is used only in Matt. xxvi. 10, and parallel, Mark xiv. 6, except in Luke and Paul, Luke vi. 29, vii. 4, xi. 7, xviii. 5, Acts xvi. 16, xvii. 31, and as above, and five times in St. Paul's Epistles.

Ver. 3. γεγενν. ἐν Τ., see above p. 202.—ἀνατεθ. δὲ: although by birth a foreign Jew, yet brought up in Jerusalem, and so belonging to his hearers. It was important for the Apostle to emphasise this, as his close association with Jerusalem had a significant bearing on his future life.. The comma best after Γαμ., so that each clause begins with a participle, but Weiss places comma after

[2] προσεφωνει ℵABP, most verss., Tisch., R.V., W.H., Wendt, Weiss; L, Syr. Harcl. have προσεφωνησεν; whilst DEH προσφωνει, so Blass in β, and Hilg.

[3] μεν om. ℵABDE, Vulg., Sah., Arm., Tisch., Weiss, Wendt, W.H., Blass, R.V.; Meyer retains with HLP, Boh., Syr. H., Aeth^utr., but it may have been added after xxi. 39. The punctuation of the verse varies considerably; W.H. have ανατεθ. . . . Γαμ., πεπαιδ. . . . νομου, ζηλ. . . . σημερον·; Blass has ανατεθ. . . . ταυτῃ, παρα . . . ακριβειαν, του πατ. νομου ζηλ. (του Θεου); and Tisch. has ανατεθ. . . . ταυτῃ, παρα . . . νομου, ζηλωτης . . . σημερον·. T.R. = W.H., except comma after Θεου.

ταύτῃ (so De Wette, Hackett). Probably Paul went to Jerusalem not later than thirteen, possibly at eleven, for his training as a teacher of the law. ἀνατεθ.: only in Luke, cf. Acts vii. 20, 21, Luke iv. 16 (W.H. margin), "educated," so in classical Greek, 4 Macc. x. 2, xi. 15, but in latter passage AR τραφ. In Wisd. vii. 4 we have ἐν σπαργάνοις ἀνετράφην (A ἀνεστρ.).—παρὰ τοὺς πόδας: the more usual attitude for teacher and taught according to the N.T. and the Talmud; according to later Talmudic tradition the sitting on the ground was not customary until after the death of Gamaliel I., J. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., on Luke ii. 46; cf. also Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. 1, p. 326, E.T., and Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, pp. 14, 15, 2nd edit.; even if the later tradition was true, the scholar standing would still be at the feet of his teacher on his raised seat.—κατὰ ἀκρίβειαν: noun only here in N.T., but cf. xxvi. 5, "according to the strict manner of the law of our fathers," R.V., and so practically A.V. For a comment on the words cf. Jos., Ant., xvii., 2, 4, Vita, 38, and B.J., ii., 8, 18. Φαρισαῖοι οἱ δοκοῦντες μετὰ ἀκριβείας ἐξηγεῖσθαι τὰ νόμιμα: Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii., 314, note on ἀκρίβεια as used by Josephus and St. Paul, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 54, E.T. Whether therefore τοῦ πατ. νόμου (3 Macc. i. 23) included anything besides the Mosaic law or not, the words before us at least refer to the strictness upon which the Pharisees prided themselves in the observance of the law. In Gal. i. 14 St. Paul speaks of being a zealot of the traditions handed down from his fathers, πατρικῶν, where the traditions are apparently distinguished from the written law, Jos., Ant., xiii., 16, 2, and 10, 6; but the "oral law" which the scribes developed was apparently equally binding with the written Thorah in the eyes of the Pharisees, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., pp. 10, 11, E.T., but cf. also Lightfoot, u. s. The word πατρῴου would appeal to the hearts of the people, who loved the Thorah as the chief good, but St. Chrysostom's words are also to be remembered: "all this seems indeed to be spoken on their side, but in fact it told against them, since he, knowing the law, forsook it" Hom., xlvii.—ζηλωτὴς ὑπάρ. τοῦ Θεοῦ: St. Paul might have called himself a zealot of the law, or a zealot of God (Lightfoot, u. s.), cf. 2 Macc. iv. 2, ζηλ. τῶν νόμων, sued of Phinehas, 4 Macc. xviii. 12.—καθὼς πάντες . . . σήμερον: he recognises that their present zeal was a zeal for God, as his own had been, ἀλλ' οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν, Rom. x. 2: argumentum concilians, Bengel.

Ver. 4. ταύτην τὴν ὁδὸν, see above ix. 2.—ἄχρι θανάτου: sometimes taken to mean not that he prosecuted the Christians "unto death" (for if this was the meaning the following participles would sound feeble), but that this was his aim; ver. 20 and xxvi. 10, however, seem fully to justify the former meaning.—φυλακὰς:

ἄνδρας τε καὶ γυναῖκας, 5. ὡς καὶ ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς[1] μαρτυρεῖ μοι, καὶ πᾶν τὸ πρεσβυτέριον· παρ᾽ ὧν καὶ ἐπιστολὰς δεξάμενος πρὸς τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς εἰς Δαμασκὸν ἐπορευόμην, ἄξων καὶ τοὺς ἐκεῖσε ὄντας δεδεμένους εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ, ἵνα τιμωρηθῶσιν. 6. ἐγένετο δέ μοι πορευομένῳ καὶ ἐγγίζοντι τῇ Δαμασκῷ περὶ μεσημβρίαν ἐξαίφνης ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ περιαστράψαι φῶς ἱκανὸν περὶ ἐμέ· 7.[2] ἔπεσόν τε εἰς τὸ ἔδαφος, καὶ ἤκουσα φωνῆς λεγούσης μοι, Σαούλ, Σαούλ, τί με διώκεις; 8. ἐγὼ δὲ ἀπεκρίθην, Τίς εἶ, Κύριε; εἶπέ τε πρός με, Ἐγώ εἰμι Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος ὃν σὺ διώκεις. 9. οἱ δὲ σὺν ἐμοὶ ὄντες τὸ μὲν φῶς ἐθεάσαντο,[3] καὶ ἔμφοβοι ἐγένοντο· τὴν δὲ φωνὴν οὐκ ἤκουσαν τοῦ λαλοῦντός μοι. 10. εἶπον δέ, Τί ποιήσω, Κύριε; ὁ δὲ Κύριος εἶπε πρός με, Ἀναστὰς πορεύου εἰς Δαμασκόν· κἀκεῖ σοι λαληθήσεται περὶ πάντων ὧν τέτακταί σοι ποιῆσαι. 11. ὡς δὲ[4] οὐκ ἐνέβλεπον ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης τοῦ φωτὸς ἐκείνου, χειραγωγούμενος ὑπὸ

[1] D has μαρτυρησει, so Blass in β, and Hilg.; B has εμαρτυρει (but Weiss and W.H. reject).

[2] For επεσον ℵABEHP have επεσα, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, but Blass in β has επεσον with DL, so Hilg.

[3] ℵABH, Syr. P., Boh., Arm. om. και εμφ. εγενοντο, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, but the reading is retained by DELP, Sah., Syr. H., Gig., so Blass in β, and Hilg.; on εμφ. εγεν. see x. 40. See Alford's note (he brackets the words).

[4] Blass reads ως δε ανεστην ουκ εβλ. with d, Syr. H. mg., Gig. ουκ ενεβλεπον, but B has ουδεν εβλεπον, so W.H. marg., Blass in β; εμβλεπειν not used absolutely elsewhere, B may therefore be original (Wendt).

plural, perhaps in relation to xxvi. 11, where Paul's persecuting fury extends to strange cities; usually singular.

Ver. 5. ὡς καὶ ὁ ἀρχ.: not the high priest at the time he was speaking, for that was Ananias, xxiii. 2, but rather to the high priest Caiaphas who gave him his commission to Damascus, and who may have been still alive, hence μαρτυρεῖ, present.—τοὺς ἀδελ.: the word was used by the Jews of each other, Exod. ii. 14, Deut. xv. 3, and St. Paul uses it here to show that he regarded the Jews as still his brethren, cf. Rom. ix. 3.—τοὺς ἐκεῖσε ὄντας, cf. xxi. 3, the adverb may imply those who had come thither only, so that refugees, not residents in Damascus, are meant, but the word may simply = ἐκεῖ, see on xxi. 3, and Winer-Moulton, liv. 7. In Hipp., Vict. San., ii., 2, p. 35, we have οἱ ἐκεῖσε οἰκέοντες.—τιμωρηθῶσιν: only here and in xxvi. 11 in N.T.: used as here in classical Greek, but in this sense more frequent in middle.

Ver. 6. περὶ μεσημ., cf. xxvi. 12, not mentioned in ix., note of a personal recollection.—ἐξαίφνης: only here in Acts and in ix. 3, see note; twice in Luke's Gospel, only once elsewhere in N.T.; see further on xxvi. 12 note, on the three accounts of St. Paul's Conversion.—περιαστράψαι: so also in ix. 3, nowhere else in N.T., see note above, cf. xxvi. 13, περιλάμπειν (note); the supernatural brightness of the light is implied here in δόξης, ver. 11.

Ver. 7. ἔπεσον: on the form ἔπεσα W.H. see Kennedy, Sources of N.T. Greek, p. 159, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 111.—ἔδαφος: only here in N.T. (in LXX, 1 Kings vi. 15, Wisd. xi. 5, etc., and in 4 Macc. vi. 7, πίπτων εἰς τὸ ἔδ.), but the verb ἐδαφίζειν is found in Luke xix. 44, and there only in N.T.—ἤκουσα φωνῆς, see on ix. 4 and 7, cf. Dan. x. 6-9.—Σαοὺλ, Σαοὺλ, as in ix. 4, see note on xxvi. 14 (and cf. reading in β text).

Vv. 8 and 9. See on ix. 5 and ix. 4, 7, 9.—ἔμφ. ἐγέν., see critical note.

Ver. 11. οὐκ ἐνέβλεπον, cf. Xen., Mem., iii., 11, 10, here absolute, Grimm-Thayer, sub v.: chap. ix., 8, gives the fact of the blindness, here we have its cause as from St. Paul's personal reminiscence.—δόξης: Heb. כָּבוֹד cf. 1 Cor. xv. 40, 2 Cor. iii. 7, and Luke ix. 31.

Ver. 12. Ἀναν., ix. 10. The description is added, ἀνὴρ εὐ. Ἰ., manifestly fitting before a Jewish audience, and a proof that the brother who came to Saul was no law-breaker, Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 146. On the reading εὐλαβής, cf. ii. 5.—τῶν κατοικ.: seems to imply that Ananias had dwelt for some time in Damascus, ix.

Ver. 13. ἐπιστὰς: "standing over one," used frequently in Acts of the appearance of an angel, or of the intervention of a friend (or of an enemy), see Luke ii. 9, iv. 39, x. 40, xii. 7, xxiv. 4, only found in Luke and Paul, Friedrich, p. 42, see above xii. 7. μαρτ., vi. 3. ἀδελφέ, ix. 17.—ἀνάβλεψον . . . ἀνέβλ. εἰς αὐτόν: "receive thy sight, and in that very hour I recovered my sight and looked upon him," R.V. margin. ἀναβλέπειν may mean (1) to recover sight, ix. 17, 18, or (2) to look up, Luke xix. 5, but used frequently as if combining both meanings, Humphry on R.V., and Page, in loco. Meyer and Zöckler render "to look up" in both clauses.—αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ, see note on xvi. 18.

Ver. 14. ὁ Θεὸς τῶν πατ. ἡμῶν: again a conciliatory phrase, cf. vii. 32, so St. Peter in iii. 13, v. 30.—προεχειρ.: "hath appointed," only in Acts in N.T., iii. 20, and in xxvi. 16, again used by Paul in narrating his conversion and call. In LXX, cf. Exod. iv. 13, Josh. iii. 12, 2 Macc. iii. 7, viii. 9, always with the notion of some one selected for an important duty (Lumby): to which may be added Dan., LXX, iii. 22 (see H. and R.), cf. note on iii. 20.—τὸν δίκαιον, see on iii. 14, and vii. 52.—φ. ἐκ τοῦ στ.: "a voice from his mouth," R.V., so Rhem., as the Apostle heard it at his conversion. στ. is often used in phrases of a Hebraistic character, so here fitly by Ananias, cf. xv. 7.

Ver. 15. μάρτυς αὐτῷ: "a witness for him," R.V., cf. i. 8.—πάντας ἀνθ.: we may see another evidence of the Apostle's tact in that he does not yet employ the word ἔθνη.—ὧν ἑώρακας καὶ ἤκουσας, Blass well compares for the former verb the Apostle's own words, 1 Cor. ix. 1; perfect tense, marks what was essential in giving him enduring consecration as an Apostle, cf. Blass, Gram., p. 237.

Ver. 16. καὶ νῦν: so by St. Paul in xx. 22, 25, xxvi. 6, xvi. 37, xiii. 11; also found in iii. 17, x. 5, but no instances in Luke's Gospel of καὶ νῦν beginning a sentence, Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 145.—τί μέλλεις: only here in this sense in N.T., cf. 4 Macc. vi. 23, ix. 1, and so often in classical Greek, Aesch., Prom., 36, etc.—ἀναστὰς, see v. 17.—βάπτισαι: middle voice (so perhaps in 1 Cor. x. 2, W.H. text, but passive in margin, as Blass), as a rule naturally in the passive, "to be baptised," cf. ix. 18, but the convert in "getting baptised" was conceived as doing something for himself, not merely as receiving something (Simcox, Language of the N.T., pp. 97, 98), so apparently Blass, Gram., p. 182, or the middle may mean that he submitted himself to Christian Baptism, Bethge, p. 197, and Alford.—ἀπόλουσαι: also middle, cf. ii. 38, and 1 Cor. vi. 11, the result of the submission to Baptism, Tit. iii. 5, Ephes. v. 26.—ἐπικαλ., cf. p. 81, on the significance of the phrase. This calling upon the name of Christ, thus closely connected with Baptism and preceding it, necessarily involved belief in Him, Rom. x. 14. There is no contradiction in the fact that the commission to the Apostleship here and in ix. comes from Ananias, whilst in xxvi. he is not mentioned at all, and the commission comes directly from the mouth of the Lord. It might be sufficient simply to say "quod quis per alium facit id ipse fecisse putatur," but before the Roman governor it was likely enough that the Apostle should omit the name of Ananias and combine with the revelation at his conversion and with that made by Ananias other and subsequent revelations, cf. xxvi. 16-18. Festus might have treated the vision to Ananias with ridicule, Agrippa would not have been influenced by the name of a Jew living in obscurity at Damascus (Speaker's Commentary).

Ver. 17. ἐγέν. δέ μοι ὑποσ.: refers to the first visit of St. Paul to Jerusalem after his Conversion, Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 84, 93, 125. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 60, refers it to the second visit, (1) because the reason for Paul's departure from Jerusalem is given differently here and in ix. 29. But may not St. Luke be describing the occurrence in relation to the Jews and the Church, and St. Paul in relation to his own private personal history, St. Luke giving us the outward impulse, St. Paul the inner motive (Hackett), so that two causes, the one natural, the other supernatural, are mentioned side by side? cf. Acts xiii. 2-4 (so Lightfoot, Felten, Lumby). (2) Ramsay's second reason is that Paul does not go at once to the Gentiles, but spends many years of quiet work in Cilicia and Antioch, and so the command of the vision in vv. 20, 21. is not suitable to the first visit. But the command to go to the Gentiles dates from the Apostle's Conversion, quite apart from the vision in the Temple, cf. ix. 15, xxvi. 17, and the same commission is plainly implied in xxii. 15; the words of the command may well express the ultimate and not the immediate issue of the Apostle's labours. On ἐγέν. δέ, Luke seventeen times, Acts twenty-one, and ἐγέν. followed by infinitive, see Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 30, and Plummer's St. Luke, p. 45. For the reading in xii. 25, ὑπέστ. εἰς Ἰ., and its bearing on the present passage see Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 63, 64, and also above, xi. 29, xii. 25.—προσευχ. . . . τῷ ἱερῷ: there was a special reason for the mention of the fact before St. Paul's present audience; it showed that the Temple was still for him the place of prayer and worship, and it should have shown the Jews that he who thus prayed in the Temple could not so have profaned it, Lewin, St. Paul, ii., p. 146.—ἐν ἐκστάσει, x. 10. For the construction see Burton, p. 175, Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 58, Blass, Gram., p. 247.

Ver. 18. σπεῦσον καὶ ἔξ.: implying danger, cf. ix. 29.—σου μαρτ.: grounded upon the occurrence before Damascus, and so a striking testimony.

Ver. 19. Κύριε, ix. 5.—αὐτοὶ ἐπίσ.: Paul seems as it were to plead with his Lord that men cannot but receive testimony from one who had previously been an enemy of Jesus of Nazareth; the words αὐτόν. 21. καὶ εἶπε πρός με, Πορεύου, ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰς ἔθνη μακρὰν ἐξαποστελῶ[1] σε.

22. Ἤκουον δὲ αὐτοῦ ἄχρι τούτου τοῦ λόγου, καὶ ἐπῆραν τὴν φωνὴν αὐτῶν λέγοντες, Αἶρε ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς τὸν τοιοῦτον· οὐ γὰρ καθῆκον[2] αὐτὸν ζῆν. 23. κραυγαζόντων δὲ[3] αὐτῶν, καὶ ῥιπτούντων too are directed to his hearers, so that they may impress them with the strength of the testimony thus given by one who had imprisoned the Christians.—δέρων: on the power of the Sanhedrim outside Jerusalem see on p. 151.—κατὰ τὰς συν., cf. viii. 3, xx. 20, and for such punishments in the synagogues cf. Matt. x. 17, xxiii. 34, Mark xiii. 9, Luke xxi. 12, cf. Luke xii. 11, Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation, p. 374.

Ver. 20. τοῦ μ. σου: he identifies himself with Stephen, his testimony like that of the martyr is borne to Christ; on the word see p. 67; the term is here in a transition stage from "witness" to "martyr," cf. also Rev. xvii. 6: Hackett quotes the Christians of Lyons, towards the close of the second century, refusing to be called "martyrs" because such an honourable name only belonged to the true and faithful Witness, or to those who had sealed their testimony by constancy to the end, and they feared lest they should waver: Euseb., Hist., v., 2.—καὶ αὐτὸς, cf. viii. 13, xv. 32, xxi. 24, xxiv. 15, 16, xxv. 22, xxvii. 36, here it is placed in sharp contrast to the preceding words about Stephen (with whose witness he was now identified). On καὶ αὐτὸς as characteristic of Luke in his Gospel and Acts see Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 33, as compared with its employment by the other Synoptists, sometimes it is inserted with emphasis, Plummer on Luke i. 16.—συνευδ., see note on viii. 1.

Ver. 21. εἰς ἔθνη: the mere mention of the Gentiles roused their fury, and they saw in it a justification of the charge in xxi. 28; the scene closely resembled the tumultuous outburst which led to the murder of St. Stephen.

Ver. 22. ἐπῆραν τὴν φ., see on ii. 14. —αἶρε, cf. xxi. 36, emphasised here by ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς; present tense, a continuous cry.—καθῆκον: only used by St. Paul elsewhere in N.T., cf. Rom. i. 28. The imperfect, καθῆκεν, see critical note, implies that long ago he ought to have been put to death "for it was not fit," etc., non debebat (or debuerat) vivere, Winer-Moulton, xli. 2. καθ- = προσῆκον Att. In LXX, Deut. xxi. 17, Ezek. xxi. 27 (32), and other passages, also several times in Books of Macc. (see H. and R.). For construction cf. Burton, p. 15.

Ver. 23. κραυγαζόντων δὲ (τε, Weiss, Wendt, W.H.), only here in Acts (cf. Luke iv. 41, but doubtful: W.H. read κράζοντα), six times in St. John, and four times in his narrative of the Passion of the cries of the Jewish multitude, cf. especially xix. 15, so too in 2 Esdras iii. 13, in classical Greek rare (Dem.), used by Epict., Diss., iii., 4, 4, of the shouts in the theatres.—ῥιπτ. τὰ ἱμάτια: not throwing off their garments as if preparing to stone Paul (for which Zöckler compares vii. 58, and see Plato, Rep., 474 A), for the fact that the Apostle was in the custody of the Romans would have prevented any such purpose. The verb may be used as a frequentative, ῥιπτεῖν, jactare, ῥίπτειν, jacere, while some of the old grammarians associate with it a suggestion of earnestness or effort, others of contempt, Grimm-Thayer, sub v. (for the form in LXX cf. Dan., Theod., ix., 18, 20). The word here rather means "tossing about their garments," a manifestation of excitement and uncontrollable rage, cf. Ovid, Am., iii., 2, 74, and also instances in Wetstein, cf. Chrys., who explains ῥιπτάζοντες, ἐκτινάσσοντες. Dean Farrar refers to Pal. Expln. Fund, 1879, p, 77, for instances of the sudden excitability of Oriental crowds, and for similar illustrations see Hackett, in loco.—κονιορτὸν βαλλ.: best taken as τὰ ἱμάτια, καὶ κονιορτὸν βαλλόντων εἰς τὸν[1] ἀέρα, 24. ἐκέλευσεν αὐτὸν ὁ χιλίαρχος ἄγεσθαι εἰς τὴν παρεμβολήν, εἰπὼν μάστιξιν ἀνετάζεσθαι αὐτάν, ἵνα ἐπιγνῷ δι' ἣν αἰτίαν οὕτως ἐπεφώνουν αὐτῷ. 25. ὡς δὲ[2] προέτεινεν αὐτὸν τοῖς ἱμᾶσιν, εἶπε πρὸς τὸν ἑστῶτα ἑκατόνταρχον ὁ Παῦλος, Εἰ ἄνθρωπον Ῥωμαῖον καὶ ἀκατάκριτον ἔξεστιν ὑμῖν μαστίζειν; 26. ἀκούσας δὲ ὁ ἑκατόνταρχος, προσελθὼν ἀπήγγειλε τῷ χιλιάρχῳ λέγων,[3] Ὅρα τί μέλλεις ποιεῖν· ὁ γὰρ ἄνθρωπος οὗτος Ῥωμαῖός ἐστι. 27. προσελθὼν δὲ ὁ χιλίαρχος

another sign of the same rage and fury, a similar demonstration; this is preferable to the supposition that they threw dust into the air to signify that they would throw stones if they could. εἰς τὸν ἀέρα seems to imply the interpretation adopted; the dust could scarcely have been aimed at Paul, for he was out of reach; but see 2 Sam. xvi. 13.

Ver. 24. ὁ χιλ., see xxi. 31.—παρεμ., xxi. 34.—εἰπὼν: whether the chiliarch understood Paul's words or not, he evidently saw from the outcries of the mob that the Apostle was regarded as a dangerous person, and he probably thought to obtain some definite information from the prisoner himself by torture.—μάστιξιν, cf. 2 Macc. vii. 1, 4 Macc. vi. 3, ix. 12, etc., and 1 Kings xii. 11, Prov. xxvi. 3, and in N.T., Heb. xi. 36; the Roman scourging was a terrible punishment; for its description cf., e.g., Keim, Geschichte Jesu, iii., p. 390 (for Jewish scougings see Farrar, St. Paul, ii., Excurs., xi.).—ἀνετάζεσθαι: not found in classical Greek, but ἐξετάζεσθαι used specially of examination by torture. It is found in the active voice in Judg. vi. 29 A, and Susannah, ver. 14.—ἐπεφ.: "shouted against him," R.V., see on xxi. 34, and 3 Macc. vii. 13—only here with dative.

Ver. 25. προέτειναν: "and when they had tied him up with the thongs," R.V., i.e., with the ligatures which kept the body extended and fixed while under flogging; Vulgate, "cum astrinxissent eum loris"; but προέ. is rather "stretched him forward with the thongs," i.e., bound him to a pillar or post in a tense posture for receiving the blows, see critical note. Blass takes προέτειναν as an imperfect, cf. xxviii. 2.—τοῖς ἱμᾶσιν: referring to the thongs usually employed for so binding, and this seems borne out by ver. 29 δεδεκώς: not "for the thongs," as in R.V. margin, so Lewin, Blass, Weiss and others, as if = μάστιξ. Grimm admits that the word may be used either of the leathern thongs with which a person was bound or was beaten, but here he prefers the latter.—τὸν ἑστῶτα ἑκατόν.: the centurion who presided over the scourging, just as a centurion was appointed to be in charge over the execution of our Lord; on the form ἑκατόν., only here in Acts, see Simcox, Lauguage of the N.T., p. 30, and see Moulton and Geden, sub v. -άρχης, and above on x. 1.—εἰ: "interrogatio subironica est, confidentiæ plena," Blass (so Wendt).—καὶ: "and that too," δύο τὰ ἐγκλήματα· καὶ τὸ ἄνευ λόγου καὶ τὸ Ῥωμαῖον ὄντα, Chrys., cf. xvi. 37. The torture was illegal in the case of a Roman citizen, although it might be employed in the case of slaves and foreigners: Digest. Leg. 48, tit. 18, c. 1. "Et non esse a tormentis incipiendum Div. Augustus constituit." At Philippi St. Paul had probably not been heard in his protests on account of the din and tumult: "nunc quia illi negotium est cum Romanis militibus, qui modestius et gravius se gerebant, occasione utitur" Calvin.

Ver. 26. ὅρα, see critical note.—τί μέλλεις ποιεῖν, cf. 2 Macc. vii. 2 R, τί μέλλεις ἐρωτᾶν;—ὁ γὰρ ἄν. οὗτος, on St. Luke's fondness for οὗτος in similar phrases, Friedrich, pp. 10, 89.

Ver. 28. πολλοῦ κεφ., cf. LXX, Lev.

εἶπεν αὐτῷ, Λέγε μοι,[1] εἰ σὺ Ῥωμαῖος εἶ; ὁ δὲ ἔφη, Ναί. 28. ἀπεκρίθη[2] τε ὁ χιλίαρχος, Ἐγὼ πολλοῦ κεφαλαίου τὴν πολιτείαν ταύτην ἐκτησάμην. ὁ δὲ Παῦλος ἔφη, Ἐγὼ δὲ καὶ γεγέννημαι. 29. εὐθέως οὖν ἀπέστησαν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ οἱ μέλλοντες αὐτὸν ἀνετάζειν. καὶ ὁ χιλίαρχος δὲ ἐφοβήθη, ἐπιγνοὺς ὅτι Ῥωμαῖός ἐστι, καὶ ὅτι ἦν αὐτὸν[3] δεδεκώς.

[2] In ver. 28 D reads και αποκριθεις ο χ. ειπεν· εγω οιδα ποσου κεφ., so Blass in β, with Bede, so Hilg. (adding γαρ after εγω). Alford thinks possibly original, πολλου being a gloss. After ειπεν above, Blass in β adds (before εγω γαρ οιδα) ουτως ευχερως Ρωμαιον σεαυτον λεγεις; on the authority of Bede tam facile dicis civ. R. esse? Cod. Dubl. (Berger) quam facile, so Boh. (Tisch.); Belser, p. 126, defends for vividness and clearness, but neither ευχερως or ευχερης occur in N.T although both are classical, and each occurs in LXX.

[3] After δεδ. 137, Syr. H. mg., Sah. add και παραχρημα ελυσεν αυτον, so Blass and Hilg. (but see Wendt, p. 51 (1899), regards as secondary).

v. 24 (vi. 4), Num. v. 7; Jos., Ant., xii., 2, 3 (used by Plato of capital (caput) as opposed to interest). Mr. Page compares the making of baronets by James I. as a means of filling the exchequer.—τὴν πολιτείαν ταύτην: "this citizenship," R.V., jus civitatis, cf. 3 Macc. iii., 21, 23, so in classical Greek. Probably A.V. renders "freedom" quite as we might speak of the freedom of the city being conferred upon any one. On the advantages of the rights of Roman citizenship see Schürer, div. ii., vol. ii., pp. 277, 278, E.T., and "Citizenship," Hastings' B.D. —ἐκτησάμην: Dio Cassius, lx., 17, tells us how Messalina the wife of Claudius and the freedmen sold the Roman citizenship, and how at one time it might be purchased for one or two cracked drinking-cups (see passage in full in Wetstein, and also Cic., Ad Fam., xii., 36). Very probably the Chiliarch was a Greek, Lysias, xxiii. 26, who had taken the Roman name Claudius on his purchase of the citizenship under the emperor of that name.—ἐγὼ δὲ καὶ γεγέννημαι: "but I am a Roman even from birth": "item breviter et cum dignitate," Blass. St. Paul's citizenship of Tarsus did not make him a Roman citizen, otherwise his answer in xxi. 39 would have been sufficient to have saved him from the present indignity. Tarsus was an urbs libera, not a colonia or municipium, and the distinction made in Acts between the Roman and Tarsian citizenship of Paul is in itself an additional proof of the truthfulness of the narrative. How his father obtained the Roman citizenship we are not told; it may have been by manumission, Philo Leg. ad C., 23, or for some service rendered to the state, Jos., Vita, 76, or by purchase, but on this last supposition the contrast here implied would be rendered less forcible. However the right was obtained, it is quite certain that there is nothing strange in St. Paul's enjoyment of it. As early as the first century B.C. there were many thousands of Roman citizens living in Asia Minor; and the doubts raised by Renan and Overbeck are pronounced by Schürer as much too weak in face of the fact that it is precisely in the most trustworthy portion of Acts that the matter is vouched for.

Ver. 29. καὶ . . . δέ, cf. iii. 24, Luke ii. 35, Matt. x. 18, xvi. 18, John vi. 51, xv. 27, Rom. xi. 23, 2 Tim. iii. 12, and other instances, Grimm-Thayer, sub v., δέ, 9. —ἐφοβήθη, cf. xvi. 38, and the magistrates of Philippi. He seems to have broken two laws, the Lex Porcia and the law mentioned above, ver. 26.—ἐπιγ. ὅτι Ῥωμαῖός ἐστι: the punishment for pretending to be a Roman citizen was death, and therefore St. Paul's own avowal would have been sufficient, Suet., Claudius, 25.—ὅτι ἦν αὐτὸν δεδεκώς: on the construction usual in Luke see i. 10. The words may be best referred to the binding in ver. 25 like a slave; this is more natural than to refer them to xxi. 33. If this latter view is correct, it seems strange that Paul should have remained bound until the next day, ver. 30. No doubt it is quite possible that the Apostle's bonds were less severe after the chiliarch was aware of his Roman citizenship, and that the later notices, xxiii. 18, xxiv. 27, xxvi. 29, xxvii. 42, may contrast favourably with xxi. 33.

Ver. 30. τὸ τί κατηγ. παρὰ τῶν Ἰ.: epexegetical of τὸ ἀσφαλὲς, cf. iv. 21 for the article, and Luke i. 62, ix. 46, xix. 48, xxii. 2, 4, 23, 24, 37, also 1 Thess. iv. 1, Rom. viii. 26, Matt. xix. 18, Mark ix. 10, 23. The usage therefore is more characteristic of St. Luke than of the other Evangelists, Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 67 (1893), Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 38.—παρὰ, if retained, cf. Winer-Moulton, xlvii., 5 b, who takes it to mean "on the part of the Jews," i.e., they had not as yet presented any accusation.—ἔλυσεν αὐτὸν: according to ver. 29 it looks as if the chiliarch immediately he knew of St. Paul's Roman citizenship released him from his severe bondage. Overbeck, Weiss, Holtzmann therefore refer τῇ ἐπαύριον only to βουλ. γνῶναι, and not to ἔλυσεν and ἐκέλευσεν, but the order of the words cannot be said to favour this, and Wendt (1899) rejects this interpretation. The words may possibly mean that he was released from the custodia militaris in which he had been placed as a Roman citizen, although he had been at once released from the chains, cf. xxi. 33. In ver. 10 of the next chapter he apparently stands before the Council not in any way as a prisoner, but as one who stood on common ground with his accusers.—καταγ., i.e., from Antonia. — συν(ελθεῖν) . . . τὸ συν. Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 190, E.T., contends that the Council probably met upon the Temple Mount itself; it could not have been within the Temple, or we could not account for the presence of Lysias and his soldiers (see also Schürer, u. s., p. 191, note), but cf. on the other hand for the place of meeting, O. Holtzman, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 176, and also the remarks of Edersheim, Hist. of the Jewish Nation, p. 131. Hilgenfeld, Zw. Th., p. 517 ff. (1896), so Wendt, Clemen, Jüngst, J. Weiss and Spitta regard the whole scene before the Sanhedrim as an interpolation extending from xx. 30-xxiii. 10. But most of the objections to the passage may be classed as somewhat captious, e.g., objection is taken to the fact that on the second night of his imprisonment St. Paul is assured by Christ that he should testify at Rome, xxiii. 11; why should such a communication be delayed to the second night of the imprisonment? it belongs to the first night, just as we reckon dreams significant which occur in the first night of a new dwelling-place! So again it is urged that the vision of the Lord would have had a meaning after the tumult of the people in xxii., but not after the sitting of the Sanhedrim in xxiii. But if ver. 10 is retained there was every reason for Paul to receive a fresh assurance of safety. In xxiii. 12-35 we have again Hilgenfeld's source C, and in this too Hilgenfeld finds a denial of the preceding narrative before the Sanhedrim, on the ground that Paul's trial is not represented as having taken place, but as only now in prospect. But vv. 15, 20 may fairly be interpreted as presupposing a previous inquiry, unless we are to believe, as is actually suggested, that ἀκριβέστερον may have prompted the author of Acts to introduce the account of a preceding hearing.

Chapter XXIII.—Ver. 1. ἀτενίσας, see on chap. i. 10, "looking stedfastly," R.V. The word denotes the fixed stedfast gaze which may be fairly called a characteristic of St. Paul. On this occasion the Apostle may well have gazed stedfastly on the Council which condemned Stephen, and although many new faces met his gaze, some of his audience were probably familiar to him. There is no need to suppose that the word implied weakness of sight (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 38).—ἄνδ. ἀδελ.: the omission of πατέρες suggests that he addressed the assembly not as judges but as fellow-countrymen. On ἀδελ. see on i. 15. It is of course possible, as Chrysostom observes, that he did not wish to appear εὐκαταφρόνητος before the chiliarch.—συνειδήσει: the word occurs no less than thirty times in N.T., R.V., so also in John viii. 9, but 1 Cor. viii. 7, συνηθείᾳ, R.V., and of these no less than twenty times in St. Paul's Epistles, twice in Acts, on both occasions by St. Paul, three times in 1 Peter, and five times in Hebrews. It may therefore be almost reckoned as a Pauline word. It does not occur at all in the Gospels (but cf. John viii. 9), but it need hardly be said that our Lord distinctly appeals to its sanction, although the word is never uttered by Him. The N.T. writers found the word ready to their use. In Wisd. xvii. 10 (11) we have the nearest anticipation of the Christian use of the word, whilst it must not be forgotten that it first appears at least in philosophical importance amongst the Stoics. (In Eccles. x. 20 it is used but in a different sense, and in Ecclus. xlii. 18, but in the latter case the reading is doubtful, and if the word is retained, it is only used in the same sense as in Eccles. x. 20.) It is used by Chrysippus of Soli, or Tarsus, in Cilicia, Diog. Laert., vii., 8, but not perhaps with any higher meaning than self-consciousness. For the alleged earlier use of the word by Bias and Periander, and the remarkable parallel expression ἀγαθὴ συνείδησις attributed to the latter, see W. Schmidt, Das Gewissen, p. 6 (1889), and for two quotations of its use by Menander, Grimm-Thayer, sub v.; cf. also Davison, The Christian Conscience (Fernley Lectures), 1888, sec. ii. and vi.; Cremer, Wörterbuch, sub v.; Sanday and Headlam, Rom. ii. 15, and for literature "Conscience," Hastings' B.D. For the scriptural idea of the word cf. also Westcott, additional note, on Heb. ix. 9.—πεπολ.: however loosely the word may have been used at a later date, it seems that when St. Paul spoke, and when he wrote to the Philippians, it embraced the public duties incumbent on men as members of a body, Hort, Ecclesia, p. 137, Lightfoot on Phil. i. 27 (iii. 20), cf. Jos., Vita, ii. St. Paul was a covenant member of a divine πολιτεία, the commonwealth of God, the laws of which he claims to have respected and observed. The word is also found in LXX, Es. viii. 13 (H. and R.), 2 Macc. vi. 1, xi. 25, and four times in 4 Macc. Lightfoot, u. s., parallels the use of the verb in Phil. by St. Paul from Clem. Rom., Cor., xxi., 1, and Polycarp, Phil., v., 5. But Clem. Rom., u. s., vi., 1, has the phrase τοῖς ἀνδράσιν ὁσίως πολιτευσαμένοις, referring to the O.T. Saints, and so St. Peter and St. Paul. To this latter expression Deissmann, Bibelstudien, i., p. 211, finds a parallel in the fragment of a letter dating about 164 B.C. (Pap., Par., 63, coll. 8 and 9), τοῖς θεοῖς πρὸς οὓς ὁσίως καὶ . . . δικαίως (πολι)τευσάμενος.—τῷ Θεῷ: in another moment of danger at the close of his career, 2 Tim. i. 3, the Apostle again appeals to a higher tribunal than that of the Sanhedrim or of Caesar. For the dative of the object cf. Rom. xiv. 18, Gal. ii. 19.—ἄχρι ταύτης τῆς ἡμ., emphatic, because the Apostle wished to affirm that he was still in his present work for Christ a true member of the theocracy, cf. Rom. ix. 1 ff.

Ver. 2. Ἀναν.: not the Ananias of iv. 7, Luke iii. 2, John xviii. 13, but the son of Nebedæus, appointed to his office by Herod of Chalcis, high priest from c. 47-59. He was sent to Rome on account of the complaints of the Samaritans against the Jews, but the Jewish cause prevailed, and there is no reason to suppose that Ananias lost his office. The probabilities are that he retained it until he was deposed shortly before the departure of Felix. Josephus gives us a terrible picture of his violent and unscrupulous conduct, Ant., xx., 9, 2. But his Roman sympathisers made him an object of hatred to the nationalists, and in A.D. 66, in the days of the last great revolt against the Romans, he was dragged from a sewer in which he had hidden, and was murdered by the weapons of the assassins whom in his own period of power he had not scrupled to employ, Jos., B.J., ii., 17, 9, "Ananias," B.D.², and Hastings' B.D., O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, pp. 130, 146.—τύπτειν: because Paul had forgotten that he was before his judges, and ought not to have spoken before being asked, cf. Luke vi. 29, John xviii. 22, 2 Cor. xi. 20, 1 Tim. iii. 3, Titus i. 7. The act was illegal and peculiarly offensive to a Jew at the hands of a Jew, Farrar, St. Paul, ii., p. 323.

Ver. 3. Wetstein sees in the words the customary formula of malediction among the Jews. But we need not regard Paul's words as an imprecation of evil on the high priest, but only an expression of the firm belief that such conduct would meet with punishment, cf. Knabenbauer, in loco. The terrible death of Ananias was a fulfilment of the words. On the paronomasia and other instances of the same figure see Blass, Gram., p. 292.—τοῖχε κεκον., cf. Matt. xxiii. 27, Luke xi. 44, the expression may have been proverbial, in LXX, cf. Prov. xxi. 9. A contrast has been drawn between St. Paul's conduct and that of our Lord under provocation, as, e.g., by St. Jerome, Adv. Pelag., iii., 1, but there were occasions when Christ spoke with righteous indignation, and never more severely than when He was condemning the same sin which St. Paul censured—hypocrisy. —καὶ σύ, emphatic, cf. Mark iv. 13, Luke x. 29. καὶ at the commencement of a question expressing indignation or astonishment (Page).—κάθῃ κρίνων, later form for κάθησαι, cf. for the phrase Luke xxii. 30.—παρανομῶν : only here in N.T., but cf. LXX, Ps. lxxv. 4, cxviii. 51; the verb also occurs several times in 4 Macc.

Ver. 4. τὸν ἀρχ. τοῦ Θεοῦ: of God, emphatic, i.e., sitting on the judgment-seat as God's representative, cf. Deut. xvii. 8 ff., and also the name Elohim, by which the priestly and other judges were sometimes known, Exod. xxi. 6, xxii. 8, 9, Psalm lxxxi. 1.

Ver. 5. οὐκ ᾔδειν: the subject of ἐστιν is not expressed as in A. and R.V., in the Greek it is simply "I wist not that it was the high priest (who spoke)". If it be said that St. Paul could scarcely have been ignorant that Ananias was high priest, we must bear in mind that not even the high priest wore a distinctive dress when not engaged in actual service (Edersheim, Temple and its Services, p. 67, with reference to this same passage), if we are not prepared to accept the view of Chrysostom and Oecumenius amongst others, that the Apostle, owing to his long absence from Jerusalem, did not know the high priest by sight, or to suppose that his weakness of eyesight might have prevented him from seeing clearly (so Lewin, Plumptre). The interpretation that St. Paul spoke ironically, or by way of protest, as if such behaviour as that of Ananias on his nomination to office by Herod of Chalcis was in itself sufficient to prevent his recognition as high priest, is somewhat out of harmony with the Apostle's quotation of Scripture in his reply, nor are the attempts to translate οὐκ ᾔδειν as = non agnosco or non reputabam successful. See further Zöckler's summary of the different views, Apostelgeschichte, 2nd edition, in loco.—ἀδελφοί: the word indicates St. Paul's quick recovery from his moment of just anger to a conciliatory tone.—γέγ. γὰρ: in this appeal to the law, St. Paul showed not only his acquaintance with it, but his reverence for it—another proof of his wisdom and tact. —ἄρχοντα τοῦ λαοῦ σου κ.τ.λ.: LXX, Exod. xxii. 28, the Apostle apparently only quotes the latter part of the verse; in the Hebrew we have "thou shalt not revile God (margin, the judges), nor curse a ruler of thy people". Cf. the ruling principle of the Apostle's conduct Rom. xiii. 1-7 (1 Pet. ii. 13-17).

Ver. 6. γνοὺς . . . τὸ ἓν . . . τὸ δὲ ἕτερον. On ἓν . . . ἕτερον: see Simcox Language of the N.T., pp. 71, 72. That Pharisees and Sadducees alike had seats in the Sanhedrim during this period is borne out not only by the N. T., but by Jos., Ant., xx., 9, 1, B.J., ii., 17, 3, Vita, 38, 39. It is possible that the Pharisees might have attracted the attention of the Apostle by their protest against the be-σου οὐκ ἐρεῖς κακῶς". 6. Γνοὺς δὲ ὁ Παῦλος ὅτι τὸ ἓν μέρος ἐστὶ Σαδδουκαίων, τὸ δὲ ἕτερον Φαρισαίων,[1] ἔκραξεν ἐν τῷ συνεδρίῳ, Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, ἐγὼ Φαρισαῖός εἰμι, υἱὸς Φαρισαίου· περὶ ἐλπίδος

Pesh., Tert., and other authorities as above, with Blass also, perhaps altered into sing., because one only thought of the relation of father and son (Wendt). B, Sah. haviour of Ananias and their acceptance of the words of apology (so Felten, Zöckler), but it is equally probable that in St. Luke's apparently condensed account the appeal to the Pharisees was not made on a sudden impulse (see below), but was based upon some manifestation of sympathy with his utterances. In ver. 9 it is evidently implied that the story of Paul's conversion on the road to Damascus had been narrated, and his acceptance of the Messiahship of the Risen Jesus carried with it his belief in a resurrection.—ἔκραξεν: the word may here as sometimes elsewhere, cf. John vii. 37, xii. 44, indicate no isolated cry, but a reference to something previously said, and it is probable that St. Luke may have passed over here as elsewhere some portions of the Apostle's speech, which were less intimately connected with the development and issue of events. It must however be noted that the verb may mean that the Apostle cried aloud so that all might hear him amidst the rising confusion.—ἐγὼ Φαρι. εἰμι κ.τ.λ.: the words have been severely criticised, but in a very real sense they truthfully expressed the Apostle's convictions. Before Felix St. Paul made practically the same assertion, although he did not use the word Φαρ. (cf. also xxvi. 5), Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 111. Moreover it is difficult to see why the Apostle should not describe himself as a Pharisee in face of the statement, xv. 5, that many members of the sect were also members of the Christian Church. They, like St. Paul, must have acknowledged that Jesus was the Messiah. But that Messiahship was attested by the avowal of the resurrection of Jesus, and the resurrection was a prominent article of the Pharisees' creed. In the acceptance of this latter doctrine St. Paul was at one not only with the "Pharisees who believed," but with the whole sect, and that he used the title in this limited way, viz., with relation to the hope of the resurrection, is plain from the context, which fixes the limitation by the Apostle's own words. But because the declaration shows the tact of St. Paul, because it is an instance of his acting upon the maxim Divide et impera, has it no higher side in relation to his character and purpose? May we not even say that to the Pharisees he became as a Pharisee in order to save some, to lead them to see the crown and fulfilment of the hope in which he and they were at one, in the Person of Jesus, the Resurrection and the Life? That the Apostle's action met with Divine approval seems evident, ver. 11. See "Paul" (Dr. Llewellyn Davies), B.D.[1], iii., 754, 755, and amongst recent writers, Luckock, but on the other hand Gilbert, Student's Life of Paul, p. 187 ff. Bethge attributes to the Apostle an apologetic aim, viz., to show the chiliarch that Christianity should be protected by the State, since it was no new religion, but really proceeded from Judaism; and in support he refers to the words of Lysias, xxiii. 29; but although the Apostle's appeal may have helped Lysias to form his judgment, it seems somewhat strained to attribute to the Apostle the motive assigned by Bethge. —υἱὸς Φαρ.: "a son of Pharisees," R.V. plural, which is the best reading, i.e., his ancestors, 2 Tim. i. 3, Phil. iii. 5, possibly including his teachers by a familiar Hebraism.—περὶ ἐλπίδος καὶ ἀνασ.: generally taken as a hendiadys (so Page), "hope of a resurrection of the dead" (see, however, Winer-Moulton, lxvi. 7). In xxvi. 6 ἐλπίς is used of the hope of a future Messianic salvation—the hope of Israel—but in xxiv. 15 St. Paul distinctly makes mention of the hope of a resurrection of the dead, and his own words again in xxiv. 21 seem to exclude anything beyond that question as under discussion on the present occasion.

in supposing that this dissension took place in the Assembly; it may have been no sudden result, because the Apostle had evidently said much more than is mentioned in the preceding verse (see above), and there is good evidence that one of the fundamental differences between the two sects was concerned with the question which St. Paul had raised, Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i., 315; Jos., Ant., xviii., 1, 4; B.J., ii., 8, 14.—ἐσχίσθη τὸ πλ., Æn., ii., 39, and instances in Wetstein.

spoken to him, or an angel?" R.V. reading after ἄγγελος a mark of interrogation. Often explained as aposiopesis (so Weiss), cf. W.H. reading—John vi. 62, Rom. ix. 22, but see Blass, Gram., p. 288, Burton, pp. 109-110. The words may have been followed by a significant gesture or look towards the Sadducees, or by some such words as St. Chrysostom suggests: ποῖον ἔγκλημα! or, without any real aposiopesis, the words may have been interrupted by the tumult, Winer-Moulton, lxiv., ii. πνεῦμα: the word evidently refers back to St. Paul's own statements, xxii. 6, 7, while at the same time it indicates that the Pharisees were far from accepting Paul's account of the scene before Damascus as an appearance of Jesus of Nazareth.

Ver. 10. εὐλ., see critical note.—μὴ: after verbs of fear and danger in classical Greek, with subjunctive after primary tenses, with optative (more usually) after secondary tenses, but in N.T. only the subjunctive, Burton, p. 95, and Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 83 (1893), Acts xxvii. 17, 2 Cor. xi. 3, xii. 20, Heb. iv. 1.—διασπασθῇ, cf. LXX, Hos. xiii. 8, for use in same sense as here, to tear like a wild beast tears its prey in pieces (elsewhere in N.T., Mark v. 4, cf. LXX, Jer. ii. 20), cf. in classical Greek, Herod., iii., 13, Dem., 58, 8.—καταβὰν from Antonia.—ἁρπάσαι ἄγειν τε = ἁρπάσαν ἄγειν (Blass), see critical note.

Ver. 11. τῇ ἐπι. νυκτί, see Knabenbauer's note, p. 385, on Hilgenfeld's strictures; and below on the need and fitness of the appearance of the Lord on this night.—ἐπιστὰς, cf. xii. 7, and xviii. 9.—ὁ κ., evidently Jesus, as the context implies.—θάρσει: only in the imperative in N.T. (seven times); the word on the lips of Christ had brought cheer to the sick and diseased, Matt. ix. 2, 22, Mark x. 49; to the disciples sailing on the sea, Matt. xiv. 27, Mark v. 50; to the same disciples in an hour of deeper need, John xvi. 33, cf. its use in LXX as a message of encouragement (elsewhere we have the verb θαρρεῖν, so in Paul and Heb., but cf. Apoc. of Peter, v., Blass, Gram., p. 24). The Apostle might well stand in need of an assurance after the events of the day that his labours would not be cut short before his great desire was fulfilled. The words of the Lord as given to us by St. Luke intimate that the Evangelist regarded Paul's visit to Rome as apex Evangelii, so far as his present work was concerned.—διεμαρτύρω: the word seems to imply the thoroughness of the Apostle's testimony, and to show that his method of bearing it was approved by his Lord, see on ii. 40.

Ver. 12. συστροφήν, xix. 40.—ἀνεθεμάτισαν ἑαυτούς: literally "they placed themselves under an anathema," i.e., declared themselves liable to the direst punishments of God unless, etc. In N.T. the verb is only used in this passage, cf.

μήτε φαγεῖν μήτε πιεῖν ἕως οὗ ἀποκτείνωσι τὸν Παῦλον· 13. ἦσαν δὲ πλείους τεσσαράκοντα οἱ ταύτην τὴν συνωμοσίαν[1] πεποιηκότες· 14. οἵτινες προσελθόντες τοῖς ἀρχιερεῦσι[2] καὶ τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις εἶπον, Ἀναθέματι ἀνεθεματίσαμεν ἑαυτούς, μηδενὸς γεύσασθαι[3] ἕως οὗ ἀποκτείνωμεν τὸν Παῦλον. 15. νῦν οὖν ὑμεῖς ἐμφανίσατε τῷ χιλιάρχῳ σὺν τῷ συνεδρίῳ, ὅπως[4] αὔριον αὐτὸν καταγάγῃ πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ὡς μέλλοντας διαγινώσκειν ἀκριβέστερον τὰ περὶ αὐτοῦ· ἡμεῖς δέ,

[2] Blass in β brackets και τοις πρεσβ. Lucif. "recte ut videtur" (Blass).

[3] After γευσ. Blass in β (Flor., Gig.) adds καθολου.

[4] αυριον om. ℵABCE 18, 36, 61, verss., and authorities above, so Hilg. ℵABE 61 have εις, so R.V. and as above.

14, 21, and once by St. Mark, xiv. 71, cf. the use of the verb in LXX, Josh. vi. 21, 1 Macc. v. 5. In N.T. the noun ἀνάθεμα is only found in Luke and Paul, see Lightfoot on Gal. i. 8, Sanday and Headlam on Rom. ix. 3. For instances of similar bindings by oath, Jos., Vita, liii., and a similar combination of ten men to murder Herod, Ant., xv., 8, 3, 4. Of whom the band consisted we are not told, although probably Ananias would not have scrupled to employ the Sicarii, Jos., Ant., ix. 2. The conspirators seem to have affected to be Sadducees, ver. 14, but Edersheim evidently holds that they were Pharisees, and he points out that the latter as a fraternity or "guild," or some of their kindred guilds, would have furnished material at hand for such a band of conspirators, Jewish Social Life, p. 227 ff.—πεποι. see critical note, ἕως οὗ, cf. Matt. v. 25, xiii. 33, John ix. 18; Burton, p. 128.

Ver. 14. τοῖς ἀρχ., cf. iv. 23, see critical note on reading in β (Blass).—ἀναθέματι ἀνεθεμ.: "we have bound ourselves under a great curse," thus representing the emphatic Hebrew idiom, cf. v. 28, and for the same phrase cf. Deut. xiii. 15, xx. 17. The conspirators may have been instigated by the knowledge that the Sanhedrim could no longer inflict capital punishment, and from despair of obtaining the sanction of the Roman authorities for violence against Paul. It is quite certain that sentence of death must at all events be ratified by the procurator. Another serious restriction of the Jewish powers lay in the fact that the Roman authorities could step in at any moment and take the initiative, as in the case of Paul. Moreover the incidents before us illustrate the strange fact that even the chiliarch of the Roman force stationed in Jerusalem seems to be able to summon the Sanhedrim for the purpose of submitting to it any question upon which the Jewish law had to be learnt, cf. xxii. 30, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 188 ff., with which, however, should be compared O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, pp. 175, 176.—γεύσασθαι: "to taste nothing," R.V. "Hoc certe tam præposterum concilium nunquam probassent sacerdotes, si qua in illis fuisset gutta pii rectique affectus, imo sensus humani," Calvin. Edersheim quotes a curious illustration of the rash vow before us, which shows how easily absolution from its consequences could be obtained, Jewish Social Life, p. 229, J. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.

Ver. 15. νῦν οὖν: only in Acts in N.T., where it occurs four times, frequent in LXX.—ἐμφανίσατε: "signify" in A. and R.V.; this rendering apparently conveys a wrong idea, for it implies that the Council had the authority, whereas this lay with the Roman officer, cf. xxiv. 1, xxv. 2, 15. In LXX, Esther ii. 22, 2 Macc. iii. 7, xi. 29.—σὺν τῷ συν.: with the whole Council, including both those who had previously inclined to favour Paul as well as his opponents; the former could not object to the pretext that further inquiries were to be made into Paul's position, especially when the Sadducees urged such an inquiry.—ὅπως, Burton, p. 87.—ὡς μέλλοντας: this use of ὡς with the participle expressing the pretext alleged by another, often in Luke, cf. Luke xvi. 1, xxiii. 14, Acts xxiii. 20, xxvii. 30, Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 189 (1893), but we may also πρὸ τοῦ ἐγγίσαι αὐτόν, ἕτοιμοί[1] ἐσμεν τοῦ ἀνελεῖν αὐτόν. 16. ἀκούσας δὲ ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀδελφῆς Παύλου τὴν ἐνέδραν, παραγενόμενος καὶ εἰσελθὼν εἰς τὴν παρεμβολὴν ἀπήγγειλε τῷ Παύλῳ. 17. προσκαλεσάμενος δὲ ὁ Παῦλος ἕνα τῶν ἑκατοντάρχων, ἔφη, Τὸν νεανίαν τοῦτον ἀπάγαγε πρὸς τὸν χιλίαρχον· ἔχει γάρ τι ἀπαγγεῖλαι αὐτῷ. 18. ὁ μὲν οὖν παραλαβὼν αὐτὸν ἤγαγε πρὸς τὸν χιλίαρχον, καί φησιν, Ὁ δέσμιος Παῦλος προσκαλεσάμενός με ἠρώτησε τοῦτον τὸν νεανίαν ἀγαγεῖν πρὸς σέ, ἔχοντά τι λαλῆσαί σοι. 19. ἐπιλαβόμενος δὲ τῆς χειρὸς αὐτοῦ ὁ χιλίαρχος, καὶ ἀναχωρήσας κατ᾿ ἰδίαν, ἐπυνcompare 1 Cor. iv. 18 (Burton).—διαγ.: "as though ye would judge of his case more exactly," R.V., accurate cognoscere; the word need not be used here in the forensic sense as in xxiv. 22 (xxv. 21), Grimm, Blass; the "inquiry" is expressed by the usual word in ver. 20. The verb is used in 2 Macc. ix. 15.—πρὸ τοῦ ἐγγίσαι: so that the crime could not be imputed to the priests.—ἕτοιμοί ἐσμεν τοῦ: for genitive of the infinitive after a noun or an adjective, in Luke and Paul (1 Pet. iv. 17), (Viteau, u. s., p. 169, Burton, p. 158. In LXX, cf. Mich. vi. 8, Ezek. xxi. 10, 11 (15, 16), 1 Macc. iii. 58, v. 39, xiii. 37.—ἀνελεῖν αὐτὸν, cf. Hackett's note, which gives a formal justification from Philo for the assassination of apostates.

Ver. 16. ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀδελφῆς: whether he and his mother lived in Jerusalem, as Ewald conjectured, we are not told. Probably not, as the mother is not otherwise mentioned. Paul's nephew may have been a student in Jerusalem, as the Apostle had been in his earlier days. Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 227, gives an interesting account of the way in which the young man as a member of the Pharisaic "Chabura," or guild, might have gained his knowledge of the conspiracy. At the same time nothing is told us in the text, and we cannot wonder at the comment "quis is fuerit, unde rescierit, ignoratur" (Blass).—παραγεν.: "having come in upon them," R.V. margin, "and he entered into the castle," etc. παραγεν. is thoroughly Lucan, and often gives a graphic touch to the narrative, but it is doubtful whether we can press it as above, although the rendering is tempting.—ἀπήγγειλε τῷ Π.: evidently Paul's friends were allowed access to him, and amongst them we may well suppose that St. Luke himself would have been included. On the different kinds of Roman custody see below, xxiv. 23, note.

Ver. 17. τὸν νεανίαν τοῦτον, see on vii. 58 and previous note above. The narrative gives the impression that he was quite a young man, if we look at his reception by the chiliarch and the charge given to him.

Ver. 18. ὁ δέσμιος Π.: used by Paul five times of himself in his Epistles, here for the first time in Acts with reference to him.

Ver. 19. ἐπιλαβ.: "ut fiduciam adolescentis confirmaret," Bengel, so Knabenbauer; on ἐπιλ. see note, xvii. 19.—τῆς χειρὸς αὐτοῦ, cf. Luke viii. 54, Winer-Moulton, xxx. 8 d; see Calvin's note on the humanitas (as he calls it) of the centurion in thus receiving the young man.—ἀναχ.: used also in xxvi. 31, but not by Luke in his Gospel, although found in the other Evangelists.—κατ᾿ ἰδίαν ἐπυν.: "asked him privately," R.V., as suggested by the order of the Greek.

Ver. 20. συνέθεντο, Luke xxii. 5, John ix. 22, so in classical Greek in middle, cf. 1 Sam. xxii. 13, Dan. (Th.) ii. 9.—τοῦ ἐρωτῆσαι: the word certainly points to a certain equality with the person asked (not αἰτέω), see above on ver. 15—but still a request, not a demand.—μέλλοντες, see critical note; if plural, the clause intimates the pretext put forward by the conspirators; if singular, it is perhaps more in accordance with the deference of the youth, who would refer the control of the proceedings to the chiliarch.

Ver. 21. ἐνεδρ.: only in Luke in N.T., Luke xi. 54, with the accusative also in classical Greek, and several times in LXX, 1 Macc. v. 4, Jos., Ant., v., 2, 12.—καὶ νῦν, see on xx. 22.—προσδεχ.:

θάνετο, Τί ἐστιν ὃ ἔχεις ἀπαγγεῖλαί μοι; 20. εἶπε δέ, Ὅτι οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι συνέθεντο τοῦ ἐρωτῆσαί σε, ὅπως αὔριον εἰς τὸ συνέδριον καταγάγῃς τὸν Παῦλον, ὡς μέλλοντές[1] τι ἀκριβέστερον πυνθάνεσθαι περὶ αὐτοῦ. 21. σὺ οὖν μὴ πεισθῇς αὐτοῖς· ἐνεδρεύουσι γὰρ αὐτὸν ἐξ αὐτῶν ἄνδρες πλείους τεσσαράκοντα, οἵτινες ἀνεθεμάτισαν ἑαυτοὺς μήτε φαγεῖν μήτε πιεῖν ἕως οὗ ἀνέλωσιν αὐτόν· καὶ νῦν ἕτοιμοί εἰσι προσδεχόμενοι τὴν ἀπὸ σοῦ ἐπαγγελίαν. 22. ὁ μὲν οὖν χιλίαρχος ἀπέλυσε τὸν νεανίαν, παραγγείλας μηδενὶ ἐκλαλῆσαι ὅτι ταῦτα ἐνεφάνισας πρός με. 23. καὶ προσκαλεσάμενος[2] δύο τινὰς τῶν ἑκατοντάρχων εἶπεν, Ἑτοιμάσατε στρατιώτας διακοσίους, ὅπως πορευθῶσιν ἕως Καισαρείας, καὶ ἱππεῖς ἑβδομήκοντα, καὶ δεξιολάβους

[1] μελλοντες minscl. verss., so Blass, Hilg., with Gig., Flor. (as in ver. 15); μελλων ABE, Boh., Aeth., Tisch., W.H., Weiss; μελλον, so Wendt, with ℵ* 13, sc. το συνεδρ.

[2] ℵB 13, 61, Tisch., W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt read τινας before δυο. Blass (so Flor.) brackets διακ. and και before ιππεις, and instead of εβδομηκοντα he reads εκατον with 137, Flor., Syr. H. mg., Sah., so Hilg.

only once elsewhere in Acts, xxiv. 15, probably in same sense as here, so R.V. text. In the Gospels, the word is found once in Mark xv. 43 (= Luke xxiii. 51), and five times in Luke, four times translated in R.V. as here; Luke ii. 25, 38, xii. 36, xxiii. 51, cf. also Tit. ii. 13, Jude ver. 21, and Wisd. xviii. 7, 2 Macc. viii. 11. In classical Greek two meanings as in N.T.: (1) to accept, receive favourably, (2) to wish for or expect a thing.—ἐπαγγελίαν: only here in N.T. of a human promise, see above on i. 4, cf. 1 Esd. i. 7, Esther iv. 7, 1 Macc. x. 15.

Ver. 22. ἐκλαλῆσαι, Judith xi. 9 (but S al.), "to divulge," here only in N.T., but in classical Greek, and in Philo. As in i. 4, transition to oratio recta, cf. Luke v. 14, Mark vi. 9, etc., very common in Greek prose, Winer-Moulton, lxiii., ii., 2, Blass, Gram., p. 280.

Ver. 23. See critical note; if we place τινάς before δύο, Blass, Weiss, Knabenbauer take it of two centurions whom he could specially trust, see their notes in loco, and Blass, Gram., p. 174. In Luke vii. 19 the order is different, Blass compares Herman, Vis., i., 4, 3, δύο τινὲς ἄνδρες (but see on the other hand Page's note, and Wendt, edit. 1899).—ἑτοιμάσατε: here only in Acts, but frequent in Luke's Gospel, more so than in Matthew or Mark, in John only twice. On the aorist imperfect see Winer-Moulton, xliii., 3, "have immediately . . . in readiness to march".—στρατ. διακ.: milites gravis armaturæ. Blass brackets the first διακ., and καὶ before ἱππεῖς, so that στρατ. includes under it both ἱππεῖς and δεξιολάβους, see critical note.—δεξιολ.: apparently a special class of light-armed soldiers (javelin-throwers, Livy, xxii., 21, or slingers), Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 56, E.T., who says that this much only is certain. The word only occurs elsewhere twice, and that in later Greek literature of the seventh and tenth century (see references in Grimm-Thayer, sub v., and Meyer-Wendt, in loco), where they are distinguished from the τοξοφόροι and πελτασταί. Probably from δεξιός and λαμβάνω, grasping their weapons by the right hand, so here of those who carried their light weapon, a lance, in their right hand, Vulgate, lancearios. This is more probable than the derivation from λαβή, a sword-hilt, as if the word referred to spiculatores cum lanceis, who wore their swords fastened not on the left but on the right (so Ewald). Still more fanciful is the derivation of Egli who accented thus δεξιολάβοι, and took the word to refer to those who were unable to use the right hand, Judg. iii. 15, xx. 16, so "left-handed" slingers. Others interpret as if the word meant military lictors who guarded captives bound by the right hand, but their large number here seems to conflict with such an interpretation (Grimm-Thayer), see the full notes of Meyer-Wendt, 1888, 1899, and cf. Renan, διακοσίους, ἀπὸ τρίτης ὥρας τῆς νυκτός· 24.[1] κτήνη τε παραστῆσαι, ἵνα ἐπιβιβάσαντες τὸν Παῦλον διασώσωσι πρὸς Φήλικα, τὸν ἡγεμόνα· 25. γράψας ἐπιστολὴν[2] περιέχουσαν τὸν τύπον τοῦτον· 26. Κλαύδιος Λυσίας τῷ κρατίστῳ ἡγεμόνι Φήλικι, χαίρειν. 27. τὸν ἄνδρα τοῦτον συλληφθέντα ὑπὸ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, καὶ μέλλοντα ἀναιρεῖσθαι ὑπ' αὐτῶν, ἐπιστὰς σὺν τῷ στρατεύματι[3] ἐξειλόμην αὐτόν, μαθὼν ὅτι Ῥωμαῖός

[1] In β text Blass reads κτηνος, Par.², Syrr. P. and H., Prov., and before διασωσωσι the words δια νυκτος, so Flor., Syr. H. mg. Belser approves as precise notes of exact information. Blass adds (so Hilg.) after τον ηγεμονα the words εις Καισ. with 137, and continues εφοβηθη γαρ, μηποτε αρπασαντες αυτον οι Ιουδαιοι αποκτεινωσιν, και αυτος μεταξυ εγκλημα εχῃ ως χρηματα ειληφως, 137, Gig., Wer., Par.², Vulgcl., Syr. H. mg.

[2] περιεχουσαν, so Meyer, Blass, Hilgenfeld, with AHLP; but εχουσαν ℵBE 61, 137, so R.V., and other authorities as above.

[3] εξειλαμην ℵABE, Tisch., W.H., Blass, Weiss. Instead of μαθων Blass in β reads (Gig.) βοωντα και λεγοντα εαυτον ειναι Ρωμαιον.

Saint Paul, p. 532, Overbeck for various interpretations, and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 69. A reads δεξιοβόλους (Syr. Pesh. jaculantes dextra, Arᵉ jaculatores), which would be a correct interpretation if we understood the word of javelin-throwers or slingers.—ἀπὸ τρίτης ὥρας: about nine in the evening; the journey was to commence from that time, so that by daybreak Paul would be in safety, cf. x. 30. The number of the escort was meant to guard against surprise.

Ver. 24. παραστῆσαι: depending on ειπεν, ver. 23; a change to indirect speech, cf. references in ver. 22.—κτήνη (κτάομαι): jumenta, Vulgate, almost always in plural, property in general, herds or flocks, cattle; in LXX, where it is very frequent, and in N.T. it is used of beasts of burden or for riding, cf. Luke x. 34, Rev. xviii. 13, sometimes quite generally in LXX, as in 1 Cor. xv. 39.—ἐπιβ.: only in Luke and Acts in N.T., Luke x. 34, xix. 35, in each case in same sense; so in classical Greek and LXX. The reason why the plural κτήνη is used vix satis perspicitur (Blass); the word has sometimes been taken to apply to the soldiers, as if they were all mounted, but taking the word in relation to Paul, one or more beasts might be required for relays or for baggage, so Weiss, Wendt, Hackett, or, as the prisoner was chained to a soldier, another κτῆνος would be required (Kuinoel, Felten).—διασώσωσι: five times in Acts, once in Luke's Gospel, only twice elsewhere in N.T., "ut P. salvum perducerent," Vulgate, frequent in LXX, cf. its use in Polyb. and Jos., see further on xxvii. 44.—Φήλικα, see on xxiv. 3.—τὸν ἡγεμόνα: used of a leader of any kind, or of an emperor or king; in N.T. of the procurator, of Pilate, Felix, Festus, so by Josephus of Pilate, Ant., xviii., 3, 1, of governors more generally, Luke xxi. 12, 1 Pet. ii. 14, etc.

Ver. 25. περιέχουσαν, see critical note above.—τύπον: "form," R.V., a précis or summary of the contents of a letter, 3 Macc. iii. 30. Such a letter would be called elogium, Alford, in loco, Renan, Saint Paul, p. 532. It is quite true that τύπος does not demand that the letter should have been given verbally, and in an oft-quoted passage, Plato, Polit., 3, p. 414, ἐν τύπῳ is contrasted with δι' ἀκριβείας, but the letter bears the marks of genuineness, e.g., the part which Lysias claims to have played, and the expression "questions of their law" (see below). Moreover St. Luke might have easily learnt its contents, as there is reason for supposing that the letter would have been read in open court before Felix, as containing the preliminary inquiry, and that a copy may have been given to Paul after his appeal, see Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden Apostelgeschichte, p. 226.

Ver. 26. κρατίστῳ, see note on i. 1.—χαίρειν (λεγει or κελεύει), cf. xv. 23.

Ver. 27. ἄνδρα, not ἄνθρωπον: Bengel and Wendt take the word to indicate a certain degree of respect.—συλλ.: used in various senses, but in all four Gospels of the capture of Jesus, and in Luke, where the word is frequent, often of the capture of prisoners, Acts i. 16, xii. 3, xxvi. 21, Luke xxii. 54 (Plummer) so in LXX.—μέλλοντα ἀναι.: "was about to be killed," R.V.—ἐπιστὰς: the word seems ἐστι. 28. βουλόμενος δὲ[1] γνῶναι τὴν αἰτίαν δι' ἣν ἐνεκάλουν αὐτῷ, κατήγαγον αὐτὸν εἰς τὸ συνέδριον αὐτῶν· 29. ὃν εὗρον ἐγκαλούμενον περὶ[2] ζητημάτων τοῦ νόμου αὐτῶν, μηδὲν δὲ ἄξιον θανάτου ἢ δεσμῶν ἔγκλημα ἔχοντα. 30. μηνυθείσης δέ μοι ἐπιβουλῆς εἰς τὸν ἄνδρα μέλλειν[3] ἔσεσθαι ὑπὸ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, ἐξαυτῆς ἔπεμψα πρὸς σέ, παραγγείλας καὶ τοῖς κατηγόροις λέγειν[4] τὰ πρὸς αὐτὸν ἐπὶ σοῦ.[5] Ἔῤῥωσο.

[1] επιγνωναι ℵAB 13, other authorities as in ver. 27, so also in R.V. and Wendt. κατηγαγον . . . αυτων B* 61 om. [W.H.], R.V. marg. om.

[2] ζητηματων, Blass in β om. (Gig.); περι του νομου Μωυσεως και Ιησου τινος, so Blass in β, with 137, Gig., Syr. H. mg.; β text continues: μηδεν δε αξιον θανατου πρασσοντα (Gig.), εξηγαγον αυτον μολις τῃ βιᾳ, 137, Syr. H. mg. (Gig.), so Hilgenfeld.

[3] μελλειν om. ℵABE, so R.V., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, Blass. υπο των Ι. om. ℵABE, and other authorities as above. εξαυτης BHLP, Syr. Pesh., Sah., Boh., so W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt; but Lach., Tisch. read εξ αυτων with ℵAE, Syr. H., Arm.

[4] τα προς αυτον, om. τα B, Syr. Pesh., Arm., so W.H., R.V., Weiss. For the three words Lach., Tisch., with ℵA 13, 40, Vulg., read αυτους, whilst EHP insert τα before προς αυτον (not seeing that the phrase was taken as in xix. 38); see Weiss, Apostelgeschichte, p. 37. Blass in β text (Gig.) reads (instead of λεγειν . . . σου) εκει ερχεσθαι προς την σην διαγνωσιν.

[5] ερρωσο om. AB 13, Sah., Boh., Aeth$^{ro.}$, Gig., Tisch., W.H., Weiss, R.V. in text; Blass brackets in β; ℵEL d, Syrr. P. H., Arm., Aeth$^{pp.}$ retain, so Hilg.; HP read ερρωσθε, xv. 29.

to intimate that he was ready at the right moment to rescue the prisoner.—τῷ στρατ.: "with the soldiers," R.V., those under his command.—ἐξειλόμην, vii. 10.—μαθὼν ὅτι Ῥ.: "qua ratione id compererit, tacere satius erat," Blass. The chiliarch wishes to put the best interpretation on his own conduct after his hastiness in xxi. 33, xxii. 24, see reading in β text. Overbeck and Wendt (and even Zöckler) defend the chiliarch from a crafty misrepresentation, and compare the condensed explanation of the letter and the facts given in the narrative to the different accounts of Saul's conversion, but the chiliarch had a motive for dissembling his real part in the transaction, viz., fear of punishment.

Ver. 28. δέ: if we read τε Weiss regards it as closely connecting the wish of the chiliarch with the previous rescue affected by him, and as hoping to veil his conduct in the interim which was so open to censure.—ἐνεκάλουν αὐτῷ, xix. 38, with dative of the person as here, and in classical Greek, cf. Ecclus. xlvi. 19. In N.T. only in Luke and Paul, cf. Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 148.—In the letter of Lysias Hilgenfeld omits vv. 28, 29, as an addition of the "author to Theophilus". Vv. 26, 30, are quite sufficient, he thinks, for "military brevity," whilst ver. 28 could not have been written by Lysias since he would have written an untruth. But it is quite conceivable that the Roman would not only try to conceal his previous hastiness, but to commend himself to the governor as the protector of a fellow-citizen. Spitta omits ver. 28 in the letter, and Jüngst also ver. 29. But Jüngst equally with Hilgenfeld declines to omit the whole letter as Clemen proposes.

Ver. 29. ζητημάτων, cf. xviii. 14, 15, "a contemptuous plural" (Page).—ἔγκλημα ἔχοντα: phrase only here in N.T., criminis reum esse, accusari, as in classical Greek, cf. Thuc., i., 26; the noun occurs again in xxv. 16, but not elsewhere in N.T., not found in LXX.

Ver. 30. A mingling of two constructions, Blass, Gram., p. 247, Winer-Moulton, lxiii., 1, 1. ἔσεσθαι: on the future infinitive denoting time relatively to the time of the principal verb see Burton, pp. 48, 52.—ἔπεμψα: epistolary aorist, cf. 1 Cor. v. 11, Phil. ii. 28, Ephes. vi. 22, Col. iv. 8, Philem., ver. 11; Burton, p. 21. ἐξαυτῆς, see critical note.—λέγειν τὰ πρὸς αὐτὸν, cf. xix. 38, omitting τὰ, see critical note.—ἐπὶ σοῦ: coram, cf. xxiv. 20, 21, xxv. 9, 26, xxvi. 2, 1 Cor. vi. 1 (1 Tim. vi. 13), Winer-Moulton, xlvii.

31. Οἱ μὲν οὖν στρατιῶται, κατὰ τὸ διατεταγμένον αὐτοῖς, ἀναλαβόντες τὸν Παῦλον ἤγαγον διὰ [1] τῆς νυκτὸς εἰς τὴν Ἀντιπατρίδα. 32.[2] τῇ δὲ ἐπαύριον ἐάσαντες τοὺς ἱππεῖς πορεύεσθαι σὺν αὐτῷ, ὑπέστρεψαν εἰς τὴν παρεμβολήν· 33. οἵτινες εἰσελθόντες εἰς τὴν Καισάρειαν, καὶ ἀναδόντες τὴν ἐπιστολὴν τῷ ἡγεμόνι, παρέστησαν καὶ τὸν Παῦλον αὐτῷ. 34. ἀναγνοὺς δὲ [3] ὁ ἡγεμών, καὶ ἐπερωτήσας ἐκ ποίας [4] ἐπαρχίας ἐστί, καὶ πυθόμενος ὅτι ἀπὸ Κιλικίας, 35.[5] Διακούσομαί σου, ἔφη, ὅταν καὶ οἱ κατήγοροί σου παραγένωνται. ἐκέλευσέ τε αὐτὸν ἐν τῷ πραιτωρίῳ τοῦ Ἡρώδου φυλάσσεσθαι.

[1] ℵABE om. art. before νυκτος, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, R.V.

[2] At the beginning of the verse Blass in β reads (Gig.) τῃ δε επαυριον εασαντες τους στρατιωτας (υποστρεφειν) εις την παρεμβολην μετα μονων των ιππεων ηλθον εις την K. Instead of πορευεσθαι ℵABE, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. read απερχεσθαι.

[3] ο ηγεμων om. ℵABE; other authorities above.

[4] επαρχειας ℵAB*, so W.H., Weiss, Wendt; Blass has -ιας, so Hilg.

[5] ακουσ., so Blass in β for διακ. with other, but slight variations, after 137, Syr. H. mg. For T.R., R.V. reads παραγενωνται· κελευσας, so ℵcABE 40, 61 (ℵ* κελευσαντος), so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Hilg. After φυλασσ. ℵABE add αυτον, so R.V., and other authorities above.

Ver. 31. οἱ μὲν οὖν . . . τῇ δὲ ἐπαύριον: Rendall, appendix on μὲν οὖν, p. 162. Page finds the antithesis in μετὰ δὲ, xxiv. 1, referring the five days there not to Paul's arrival in Cæsarea, but to his despatch from Jerusalem by Lysias, "so then the soldiers, etc. . . . but after five days . . ." (see also note below).—ἀναλαβόντες, cf. xx. 13.—διὰ (τῆς) νυκτὸς: "by night," this use of διά with genitive of time passed through (cf. i. 3) is comparatively rare, Luke v. 5, Heb. ii. 15, except in almost adverbial phrases as here, cf. v. 19, xvi. 9, xvii. 10, Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 140.—εἰς τὴν Ἀντιπατρίδα: founded by Herod the Great, on the road from Jerusalem to Cæsarea, not apparently as a fortress but as a pleasant residence, giving it its name in honour of his father, most probably on the site now called Rás el 'Ain, "the spring-head," and not where Robinson placed it, on the site of the present Kefr Saba. The more modern site, the discovery of which is due to Conder, is more in accordance with the abundant supply of water referred to by Josephus. It is to be noted that while Josephus in one passage identifies Antipatris with Kefr Saba, in another his description is more general, and he places it in the Plain of Kefr Saba (for notices cf. Ant., xiii., 15, 1, xvi. 5, 2, B.J., i., 21, 9). They were now more than half way to Cæsarea, and the road traversed the open plain so that they were no longer in danger of surprise, G. A. Smith, Historical Geography, p. 165, B.D.², Hastings' B.D. (Conder). On the Greek article in notices of stations on journeys, peculiar to Acts, see Blass, Gram., p. 149, cf. xvii. 1, xx. 13, xxi. 1, 3 (but xx. 14 no article).

Ver. 32. τῇ δὲ ἐπ.: not necessarily the morrow after they left Jerusalem, but the morrow after they arrived at Antipatris. In this interpretation διὰ νυκτὸς might be taken to mean by night in distinction to by day, so that they may have occupied two nights on the road, see Hackett's note, in loco.—ἐάσαντες, Lucan, see xxvii. 32, 40; xxviii. 4.—εἰς τὴν παρεμβολήν, here "to the castle" A. and R.V., the barracks in Antonia.—ὑπέστρεψαν, Lucan (Friedrich, p. 8), cf. i. 12.

Ver. 33. οἵτινες: "and they when they . . ." R.V., sc. ἱππεῖς.—ἀναδόντες: not elsewhere in N.T., or in LXX in this sense, of delivering a letter. Zahn, following Hobart, sees in the phrase ἀναδ. τὴν ἐπιστολήν a phrase characteristic of a medical man, since Hippocrates, Epis., 1275, uses the verb instead of διδόναι or ἀποδιδόναι of a messenger delivering a letter, and thus shows a leaning common to the Greek medical writers of employing a verb already familiar to them in a professional way; but it must be remembered that both Polybius and Plutarch use the verb in a similar sense.

XXIV. 1. ΜΕΤΑ δὲ πέντε ἡμέρας κατέβη ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς Ἀνανίας μετὰ [1] τῶν πρεσβυτέρων καὶ ῥήτορος Τερτύλλου τινός, οἵτινες ἐνεφάνι-

Ver. 34. ἀναγνοὺς, see reading in β text. ποίας: of what kind of province, imperial or senatorial, as the governor desired to complete the report, cf. ver. 27. Blass takes it as simply = τίνος, as in iv. 7.—It appears that during the first century, although perhaps with variations from time to time, Cilicia formed part of the great Roman province Syria-Cilicia-Phœnice, cf. "Cilicia" (Ramsay), Hastings' B.D. A procurator of Judæa like Felix was only subordinate to the governor of Syria inasmuch as the latter could bring his supreme power to bear in cases of necessity. The military command and the independent jurisdiction of the procurator gave him practically sole power in all ordinary transactions, but the governor could take the superior command if he had reason to fear revolutionary or other serious difficulties. Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 44 ff., E.T.—ἐπαρχίας: the word is used to describe either a larger province, or an appendage to a larger province, as Judæa was to that of Syria, see Schürer, u. s., and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.

Ver. 35. διακούσομαί σου: "I will hear thy cause," R.V., the word implies a judicial hearing (cf. LXX, Deut. i. 16 (Job ix. 33)), and so in classical Greek of hearing thoroughly. The word is used of a judicial hearing, Dio Cassius, xxxvi., 53 (36), and Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 57, gives examples of similar usages on Egyptian papyri, 2nd to 3rd century A.D. — πραιτωρίῳ: "palace," R.V., Herod's palace at Cæsarea, where the procurator resided; it was not only a palace but also a fortress, and would contain a guard-room in which Paul would be confined. The word "palace" might well express its meaning in all the passages in which it occurs in the Gospels and Acts (but on Phil. i. 13 see Lightfoot, in loco). The Romans thus appropriated palaces already existing, and formerly dwelt in by kings or princes, cf. Cicero, Verr., ii., 5, 12, 30, Grimm-Thayer, sub v., and Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision of N.T., p. 49. It seems from the context that the place could not have been far from the quarters occupied by Felix, since Paul could be easily sent for.—φυλάσσεσθαι: the kind of custodia depended on the procurator, and no doubt the elogium had its effect; custodia satis levis (Blass).

CHAPTER XXIV.—Ver. 1. πέντε ἡμέρας: most probably to be reckoned from the arrival of St. Paul at Cæsarea, not from his apprehension in Jerusalem, or from his start from Jerusalem on the way to Cæsarea. This latter view is that of Mr. Page, who takes οἱ μὲν οὖν, xxiii. 31, as answered by the δέ in this verse. But δέ, xxiii. 32, seems quite sufficiently to answer to μέν in the previous verse. Wendt reckons the days from the arrival of Paul at Cæsarea, and regards the day of the arrival of the high priest as the fifth day, cf. Mark viii. 31. μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας = Matt. xvi. 21, Luke ix. 22, τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμ., see below, ver. 11. On the truthfulness of the narrative see also on same verse.—κατέβη: "came down," R.V., i.e., from the capital.—Ἀνανίας, see on xxiii. 2. If we read πρεσ. τινῶν, see critical note, "with certain elders," R.V., i.e., a deputation of the Sanhedrim.—ῥήτορος Τ. τινὸς: "an orator, one Tertullus," R.V., ῥη. here = causidicus, a barrister; here the prosecuting counsel συνήγορος (as opposed to σύνδικος the defendant's advocate), see note, Blass, in loco. Τερτ.: a common name, diminutive of Tertius; but it does not follow from the name that he was a Roman, as both Greeks and Jews often bore Roman names. Blass speaks of him as a Jew "erat Judæus et ipse" (so Ewald, Bethge), whilst Wendt (1899) inclines against this view, although if the words in ver. 6, κατὰ τὸν ἡμετερον νόμον, are retained, he admits that it would be correct; in addition to this the expression ἔθνος τοῦτο, ver. 3, seems in Wendt's view to indicate that the speaker was not a Jew (so too Wetstein). Tertullus was apparently one of the class of hired pleaders, often employed in the provinces by those who were themselves ignorant of Roman law. The trial may have been conducted in Greek, Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 684, Felten, in loco. —ἐνεφάνισαν, cf. xxv. 2, 15, the verb appears to be used in these passages as σαν τῷ ἡγεμόνι κατὰ τοῦ Παύλου. 2. κληθέντος δὲ [1] αὐτοῦ, ἤρξατο κατηγορεῖν ὁ Τέρτυλλος, λέγων, 3. Πολλῆς εἰρήνης τυγχάνοντες διὰ σοῦ, καὶ [2] κατορθωμάτων γινομένων τῷ ἔθνει τούτῳ διὰ τῆς σῆς προνοίας πάντῃ τε καὶ πανταχοῦ, ἀποδεχόμεθα, κράτιστε Φῆλιξ, μετὰ πάσης εὐχαριστίας. 4. ἵνα δὲ μὴ ἐπὶ πλεῖόν σε [3] ἐγκόπτω,

[1] αυτου om. B, so Weiss [W.H.], Wendt perhaps.

[2] κατορθ. HLP; διορθ. ℵABE 13, 61, 137, 180; Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.

[3] For εγκοπτω ℵAB¹E have ενκοπτω, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, Hilgenfeld (see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 54), Blass reads κοπτω (fatigans, Syr^utr.; molestus sim, Sah., Boh.), A* 13, 19, 31.

a kind of technical term to indicate laying formal information before a judge, cf. Jos., Ant., xiv., 10, 8, in LXX, Esther, ii., 22. Blass takes it here = χάρτην ἔδωκαν, see also Wetstein.

Ver. 2. ἤρξατο: he began with a captatio benevolentiæ after the usual oratorical style, cf. Cicero, De Oratore, ii., 78, 79, on the exordium and its rules.—If obtaining such artificial support was not as Calvin calls it "signum malæ conscientiæ," it may well indicate the weakness of the Jews' cause, and their determination to leave nothing untried against Paul.

Ver. 3. πολλῆς εἰρ. τυγχ.: the governors specially prided themselves on keeping peace in their provinces (Wetstein). On the phrase see 2 Macc. iv. 6, xiv. 10.—κατορθωμάτων: "very worthy deeds," A.V., the word might mean "successes," cf. Polyb., i., 19, 12, or it might mean recte facta, cf. Cic., De Fin., iii., 14 (see also in Wetstein; the word is found in 3 Macc. iii. 23, R); but διορθώματα, see critical note, in Arist., Plut. = corrections, reforms (cf. R.V.), so διόρθωσις in Polyb., Vulgate, multa corrigantur. In LXX διορθοῦν is used of amending, Jer. vii. 3, 5.—προνοίας: foresight, cf. Rom. xiii. 14, nowhere else in N.T.; cf. for a close parallel to its use here 2 Macc. iv. 6, referred to above (Lumby). It is possible that the word may be a further proof of the sycophancy of the orator; twice the Latin providentia, A. and R.V. "providence," was used of the emperors on coins, and also of the gods (Humphry on R.V.), "hoc vocabulum sæpe diis tribuerunt," Bengel, in loco.—πάντῃ τε καὶ πανταχοῦ ἀποδεχ., so A. and R.V., "non in os solum laudamus" (Wetstein); but Meyer joins πάν. τε κ. παντ. with what precedes (Lach.), and in this he is followed by Weiss, Wendt, Page and Blass. For similar phrases in Plato, Artistotle, Philo, Josephus, see Wetstein. πάντῃ: only here in N.T., but cf. Ecclus. l. 22, 3 Macc. iv. 1, cf. Friedrich, p. 5, on Luke's fondness for πᾶς and kindred words.—τῷ ἔθνει τούτῳ, see above on ver. 1 and also ver. 10. If he had been a Jew Wetstein thinks that he would have said τῷ ἔθνει τῷ ἡμετέρῳ, but see Blass, in loco, on ἔθνος "in sermone elegantiore et coram alienigenis".—ἀποδ.: only in Luke and Acts; for its meaning here cf. ii. 41, 1 Macc. ix. 71 (S al.), so in classical Greek.—εὐχ.: except Rev. iv. 9, vii. 12, elsewhere in N.T. only in St. Paul's Epistles (frequent); the word is also found in Esth. (LXX) viii. 13, Ecclus. xxxvii. 11, Wisd. xvi. 28, 2 Macc. ii. 27, and for other references see Kennedy, Sources of N.T. Greek, p. 73, and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.—There was very little, if anything, to praise in the administration of Felix, but Tertullus fastened on the fact of his suppression of the bands of robbers who had infested the country, Jos., B.J., ii., 13, 2, Ant., xx., 8, 5, "ipse tamen his omnibus erat nocentior" (Wetstein). His severity and cruelty was so great that he only added fuel to the flame of outrage and sedition, Jos., Ant., xx., 8, 6, B.J., ii., 13, 6, whilst he did not hesitate to employ the Sicarii to get rid of Jonathan the high priest who urged him to be more worthy of his office. In the rule of Felix Schürer sees the turning-point in the drama which opened with the death of Herod and terminated with the bloody conflict of A.D. 70. The uprisings of the people under his predecessors had been isolated and occasional; under him rebellion became permanent. And no wonder when we consider the picture of the public and private life of the man drawn by the hand of the Roman historian, and the fact that παρακαλῶ ἀκοῦσαί σε ἡμῶν συντόμως τῇ σῇ ἐπιεικείᾳ. 5. εὑρόντες γὰρ τὸν ἄνδρα τοῦτον λοιμόν, καὶ κινοῦντα στάσιν[1] πᾶσι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις τοῖς κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην, πρωτοστάτην τε τῆς τῶν Ναζωραίων αἱρέσεως, 6. ὃς καὶ τὸ ἱερὸν ἐπείρασε βεβηλῶσαι· ὃν καὶ ἐκρατήσαμεν trading upon the influence of his infamous brother Pallas he allowed himself a free hand to indulge in every licence and excess, Tac., Hist., v., 9, and Ann., xii., 54, Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 177-181, E.T.

[1] The plural στασεις for στασιν is supported by ℵABE 13, 40, 61, 68, Vulg., Boh., Chrys., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. Blass in β text with Gig. adds ου μονον τῳ γενει ημων αλλα σχεδον παση τη οικουμενη.

Ver. 4. δέ: autem, "innuit plura dici potuisse in laudem Felicis," Bengel.—ἐγκόπτω, impedire, as if Felix was so busy in his reforms that Tertullus would not interrupt him, but see critical note, cf. Rom. xv. 22, Gal. v. 7.—ἐπὶ πλεῖον, cf. iv. 17, xx. 9; in 2 Tim. ii. 16, iii. 9, with the opposite verb προκόπτω.—συντόμως: so in classical Greek, with λέγειν, εἰπεῖν; in Jos., c. Apion., i., 1, 6, with γράψαι and διδάσκειν, see Wetstein on Rom. ix. 28, cf. 2 Macc. ii. 31, for the adjective and for the adverb, Prov. xiii. 23, 3 Macc. v. 25; "est hæc communis oratorum promissio" (Blass).—ἐπιεικείᾳ: only in Luke and Paul, see 2 Cor. x. 1, "pro tua clementia," Vulgate, derived from εἴκω, cedo, it properly might be rendered yieldingness; equity as opposed to strict law; so Aristotle sets the ἐπιεικής against the ἀκριβοδίκαιος, Eth. Nic., v., 10, 6. It is often joined with φιλανθρωπία, πραότης. Its architype and pattern is to be found in God, cf. Wisd. xii. 18, 2 Macc. ii. 22, x. 4 R., Ps. lxxxv. 5, and so also in Psalms of Solomon, v., 14. The word also occurs, Baruch ii. 27, Song of the Three Children, ver. 19 (Dan., LXX and Theod. iii. 42), where it is used of God, also in Wisd. ii. 19, 3 Macc. iii. 15, vii. 6. For a valuable account of the word see Trench, Synonyms, i., p. 176 ff.

Ver. 5. εὑρόντες γὰρ τὸν ἄνδρα . . . ὃς καὶ . . . ὃν καὶ ἐκρατ.: on the anacolouthon, Blass, Gram. des N.G., p. 277, Winer-Moulton, xlv., 6 b. Blass remarks that Luke gives no address so carelessly as that of Tertullus, but may not the anacolouthon here be the exact expression of the orator's invective? see critical note.—λοιμόν: 1 Sam. ii. 12, x. 27, xxv. 17, 25, Ps. i. 1 (plural), 1 Macc. xv. 21; 1 Macc. x. 61, xv. 3 R, ἄνδρες λοιμοί (cf. Prov. xxiv. 9, xxix. 8 A). So in classical Greek Dem., and in Latin pestis, Ter., Cic., Sallust. In 1 Macc. x. 6 A, ἄνδρες παράνομοι is a further description of "the pestilent fellows" (so 1 Sam. ii. 12, υἱοὶ λοιμοί = ἀνὴρ ὁ παράνομος, 2 Sam. xvi. 7).—κινοῦντα στάσιν, cf. Jos., B.J., ii., 9, 4. κιν. ταραχήν.: not against the Romans but amongst the Jews themselves—such a charge would be specially obnoxious to Felix, who prided himself on keeping order.—τὴν οἰκ.: the Roman empire, see on p. 270, cf. xvii. 6, and xxi. 28; see addition in β text.—πρωτοστάτην: the τε closely connecting the thought that the prisoner does all this as the leader, etc., literally one who stands in the front rank, so often in classical Greek, in LXX, Job xv. 24, AB.—τῶν Ναζ.: "the disciple is not above his Master," and the term is applied as a term of contempt to the followers of Jesus, as it had been to Jesus Himself, Who was stamped in the eyes of the Jews as a false Messiah by His reputed origin from Nazareth, John i. 46, vii. 41, 42; see for the modern employment of the name amongst Jews and Mohammedans Plumptre, in loco, and further, Harnack, History of Dogma, i., 301, E.T. Blass compares the contemptuous term used by the Greeks, Χρηστιανοί, xi. 26.—αἱρέσεως, see above on v. 17, all references to the question of law, xxiii. 6, 29, were purposely kept in the background, and stress laid upon all which threatened to destroy the boasted "peace" (Weiss).

Ver. 6. ἐπείρασε: the charge could not be proved, cf. xxi. 28, but the verb here used is an aggravation not a modification of the surmise (ἐνόμιζον, ver. 29) of the Jews.—βεβ., cf. Matt. xii. 5 (βαίνω, βηλός, threshold), Judith ix. 8, 1 Macc. ii. 12, iv. 38, 44, 54, 2 Macc. x. 5, etc., and frequent in LXX, cf. Psalms of Solomon i. 8, and βέβηλος four, βεβήλωσις three times.—Probably Tertullus wanted to insinuate that the prisoner was punishable even according to Roman law, see above on xxi. 29; but Trophimus as a Greek and not Paul would have been exposed to the death penalty, καὶ[1] κατὰ τὸν ἡμέτερον νόμον ἠθελήσαμεν κρίνειν, 7. παρελθὼν δὲ Λυσίας ὁ χιλίαρχος μετὰ πολλῆς βίας ἐκ τῶν χειρῶν ἡμῶν ἀπήγαγε, 8. κελεύσας τοὺς κατηγόρους αὐτοῦ ἔρχεσθαι ἐπὶ σέ· παρ' οὗ δυνήσῃ αὐτὸς ἀνακρίνας περὶ πάντων τούτων ἐπιγνῶναι ὧν ἡμεῖς κατηγοροῦμεν αὐτοῦ. 9.[2] συνέθεντο δὲ καὶ οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, φάσκοντες ταῦτα οὕτως ἔχειν.

[1] T.R. και . . . επι σε (ver. 8) is supported by E, Vulg., Gig., Syr. P. and H.; Blass retains, R.V. marg. But the whole is omit. by ℵABHLP 61 (many others), Sah., Boh., so Lach., Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt; Alford places in dark brackets. The words, however, have been recently defended by Zöckler, H. Holtzmann, Hilgenfeld, and Belser, following Blass in his two texts. It is possible that the abruptness of εκρατησαμεν may have prompted a desire for additions and completeness, and it is difficult to understand the omission of the disputed words if they were original. If we retain them, παρ' ου refers to Lysias, but not only is it somewhat strange that a professional orator should throw blame upon the Roman chiliarch, but it is also difficult to see how Lysias could in any way bear testimony against Paul in relation to accusations with regard to which he had professed himself ignorant, and after the hearing of which he had concluded that the prisoner had done nothing worthy of death or bonds. Moreover, the omission of any reference on Paul's part to Lysias in ver. 20 raises another difficulty, if Tertullus had appealed to the evidence which the Roman could give (Wendt, 1899). On the other hand the decision of Felix in ver. 22, and the postponement for the arrival of Lysias, have been held to prove the genuineness of the doubtful words. It is possible that there may be some antecedent corruption or abridgment in the text. For further variations see W.H., App., p. 100.

to say nothing of the fact that the charge was only one of suspicion. Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 74, note, and references in chap. xxi., ver. 29.—ἐκρατήσαμεν: the word could be used "de conatu vel mero vel efficaci," and so Bengel adds "aptum igitur ad calumniam". The orator identifies himself with his clients, and ascribes to the hierarchy the seizing of Paul, as if it was a legal act, whereas it was primarily the action of the mob violence of the people, xxi. 30; frequently used in same sense as here by Matthew and Mark, but not at all by St. John, and only in this passage by Luke, cf. Rev. xx. 2, LXX, Ps. lv., tit., Judg. viii. 12, xvi. 21 (A al.).—καὶ κατὰ . . . ἐπὶ σέ, ver. 8, see critical note, omitted by R.V. in text, retained by Blass and Knabenbauer, so in Vulgate. Zöckler amongst others has recently supported Blass, and for the same reason, viz., because if the words are retained the judge is asked to inquire of Paul, and thus the Apostle becomes a witness as well as a prisoner. But, on the other hand, Paul though still a prisoner is allowed to speak for himself before both Felix and Festus. If the words are retained, παρ' οὗ would refer to Lysias, and this would be in agreement with the remarks of Felix in ver. 22. Certainly ἐκρατήσαμεν seems very bald without any sequel, and this may have caused the insertion of the words; but the insertion was a bold one, although we can understand that the Jews would have been incensed against Lysias, who had twice protected Paul from their violence. The omission of the words if they formed part of the original text is no doubt difficult to explain.—ἠθελ. κρίνειν, cf. xxi. 31, 36, xxii. 22, xxiii. 12, passages which give us a very different idea of the wishes of the Jews.

Ver. 7. μετὰ π. βίας: another statement directly at variance with the facts, xxi. 32.

Ver. 8. ἀνακ.: not an examination by torture, which could not be legally applied either to Paul or to Lysias as Roman citizens, but in the sense of a judicial investigation—in this sense peculiar to Luke, cf. iv. 9, and Plummer on Luke xxiii. 14, cf. xxv. 26 below. A.V., "by examining of whom thyself," etc., which is quite misleading whether we retain the words omitted above in R.V. or not, because this rendering reads as if Felix was to examine the accusers, whereas the relative pronoun is in the singular, παρ' οὗ.

Ver. 9. συνέθεντο: in R.V. συνεπεθ.,

10. Ἀπεκρίθη δὲ ὁ Παῦλος, νεύσαντος αὐτῷ τοῦ ἡγεμόνος λέγειν, Ἐκ πολλῶν ἐτῶν ὄντα σε κριτὴν τῷ ἔθνει τούτῳ ἐπιστάμενος,[1] εὐθυμό-

The verb is found elsewhere, Gen. xxvi. 20, 2 Macc. xiv. 27, 32, 3 Macc. iii. 7.

Ver. 10. On the language of the speech see Bethge, p. 229.—This short apology before Felix is not without its traces of Paul's phraseology, e.g., ἐλπίδα ἔχων, ver. 15, with which we may compare Rom. xv. 4, 2 Cor. iii. 12, x. 15, Ephes. ii. 12, 1 Thess. iv. 13, in all of which we have the phrase ἐλπ. ἔχειν (only once elsewhere in N.T., 1 John iii. 3); προσδέχονται in ver. 15, with which we may compare Tit. ii. 13; προσφοράς, ver. 17, cf. Rom. xv. 16; δι' ἐτῶν, ver. 17, with Gal. ii. 1 (διά with genitive of time, only once elsewhere in N.T., Mark ii. 1), and more especially ἀπρόσκοπον συνειδ., cf. 1 Cor. x. 32, Phil. i. 10, and for συνείδησις, see xxiii. 1 (cf. Nösgen, Apostelgeschichte, p. 54, and Alford, Acts, Introd., p. 14). Wendt regards the whole speech as a free composition of the author of Acts, and even this view contrasts favourably with what Wendt himself calls the wilful attempts to refer different words and phrases in the speech to various Redactors, see for illustrations of this arbitrariness his note on p. 369 (1899).—νεύσαντος: in N.T., elsewhere only John xiii. 24. Friedrich draws attention to the frequent mention of beckoning, or making signs, as characteristic of Luke's writings, p. 29, cf. Luke i. 22 and 62 (διανεύω, ἐννεύω), v. 7 (κατανεύω); Acts xiii. 16, xxvi. 1, xxiv. 10, etc.—Ἐκ πολλῶν ἐτῶν: in view of the constant change of procurators a period of five to seven years would quite justify St. Paul's words. Ewald argued for ten years from the statement, Tac., Ann., xii., 54, that Felix had been joint procurator with Cumanus before he had been appointed sole procurator of Judæa, Samaria, Galilee, Peræa. But no mention is made of this by Jos., Ant., xx., 7, 1. If, however, so it is argued, Felix had occupied a position of importance in Samaria in the time of the rule of Cumanus without being himself actually joint procurator, this would perhaps account for Jonathan the high priest asking that he might be appointed procurator after the departure of Cumanus (Jos., Ant., xx., 8, 5, B.J., ii., 12, 6); such a request is difficult to understand unless Jonathan had some ground for supposing that Felix would be acceptable to the Jews. But the description of Tacitus, l.c., is also difficult to understand, since we naturally ask what was the relative rank of Felix and Cumanus? or were there two procuratorial districts? and the statement of Josephus seems clearly to intimate that Felix was first appointed to the province after the deposition of Cumanus, and that he went to Palestine as his successor, B.J., ii., 12, 6, cf. Ant., xx., 8, 5, Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 173 ff., and "Felix," Hastings' B.D.—Both Tacitus and Josephus are taken to imply that Felix succeeded Cumanus in 52 A.D. as procurator, Ann., xii., 54, Jos., Ant., xx., 7, 1. But if O. Holtzmann and McGiffert are right in placing St. Paul's imprisonment in Cæsarea in 53-55 A.D., it seems scarcely intelligible that St. Paul should speak of the "many years" of the rule of Felix, unless on the supposition that Tacitus is right and that Felix had ruled in Samaria and Judæa whilst Cumanus had ruled in Galilee. Harnack, Chron., i., 236, following Eusebius, assigns the eleventh year of Claudius, 51 A.D., as the year in which Felix entered upon office, and thinks that a procuratorship lasting from 51-54 might be described in St. Paul's words, but, as Wendt justly points out (1899), the expression πολλὰ ἔτη is much more fitting if spoken some years later. Schürer follows Josephus, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 173 ff., and so more recently Dr. A. Robertson, "Felix," Hastings' B.D., and Dr. Zahn, Einleitung, ii., p. 635 (so also article, Biblical World, Nov., 1897), whilst Wendt, p. 58 (1899), would appear to incline to the same view.—But it is to be noted that St. Paul speaks of Felix as κριτής, and in this expression it may be possible to find a point of reconciliation between the divergencies resulting from a comparision of Josephus and Tacitus. Felix may have held an office during the procuratorship of Cumanus which may have given him some judicial authority, although of course subordinate to the procurator, whilst on the other hand his tenure of such an office may well have prompted Jonathan's request to the emperor that Felix should be sent as procurator (a request upon which both Schürer and Zahn lay such stress). The phrase πόλλα ἔτη may thus be further extended to include the tenure of this judicial office which Felix held earlier than 52 A.D., see also Turner, "Chronology," Hastings' B.D., i., 418, 419, McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 358, O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 128, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 313, Gilbert, Student's Life of Paul, p. 249 ff., 1899.—κριτὴν, see above, p. 480; on the addition δίκαιον, defended by St. Chrysostom (so E, Syr. H.), Blass remarks "continet adulationem quæ Paulum parum deceat, quidquid dicit Chrysostomus".—τῷ ἔθνει τούτῳ: St. Paul is speaking of the Jews as a nation in their political relationship, in addressing a Roman governor, not as God's people, λαός.—εὐθυμότερον: adverb only here in N.T., not in LXX, but in classical Greek, for the adjective see xxvii. 36 (2 Macc. xi. 26), and the verb εὐθυμεῖν, ver. 22.—St. Paul also begins with a captatio benevolentiæ, but one which contains nothing but the strict truth; he might fairly appeal to the judicial experience of Felix for the due understanding of his case.—τὰ περὶ ἐμαυτοῦ: for the phrase τὰ περί τινος as characteristic of St. Luke, three times in Gospel, eight times in Acts (six times in St. Paul's Epistles and not in other Gospels, except Mark v. 27, R.V.), cf. Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 38, Friedrich, p. 10 (so Lekebusch and Zeller).—ἀπολογοῦμαι: only in Luke and Paul, Luke xii. 11, xxi. 14, Acts xix. 33, xxv. 8, xxvi. 1, 2, 24; Rom. ii. 15, 2 Cor. xii. 19, each time in Acts, except xix. 38, with reference to Paul: R.V. "I make my defence"; see Grimm-Thayer, sub v., for the construction of the verb, in classical Greek as here, Thuc., iii., 62, Plat., Phædo, 69 D. In LXX, cf. Jer. xii. 1, 2 Macc. xiii. 26.

τερον τὰ περὶ ἐμαυτοῦ ἀπολογοῦμαι· 11. δυναμένου σου[1] γνῶναι ὅτι οὐ πλείους εἰσί μοι ἡμέραι ἢ δεκαδύο, ἀφ' ἧς ἀνέβην προσκυνήσων

[1] For γνωναι ℵABE, Tisch., W.H., and other authorities in ver. 10 read επιγνωναι. η om. with all better authorities, cf. iv. 22. δωδεκα (instead of δεκαδυο) ℵABE, and other authorities above. εις for εν ℵABEH, and other authorities, as above.

Ver. 11. δυν. σοῦ γνῶναι: "seeing that thou canst take knowledge" (ἐπιγ.), R.V., the shortness of the time would enable Felix to gain accurate knowledge of the events which had transpired, and the Apostle may also imply that the time was too short for exciting a multitude to sedition.—οὐ πλείους εἰσί μοι ἡμ. ἢ δεκαδύο: on οὐ πλείους see ver. 1 and critical note.—The number is evidently not a mere round number, as Overbeck thinks, but indicates that Paul laid stress upon the shortness of the period, and would not have included incomplete days in his reckoning. It is not necessary therefore to include the day of the arrival in Jerusalem (ἀφ' ἧς points to the day as something past, Bethge), or the day of the present trial; probably the arrival in Jerusalem was in the evening, as it is not until the next day that Paul seeks out James (Wendt). The first day of the twelve would therefore be the entry in to James, the second the commencement of the Nazirite vow, the sixth that of the apprehension of Paul towards the close of the seven days, xxi. 27; the seventh the day before the Sanhedrim, the eighth the information of the plot and (in the evening) Paul's start for Cæsarea, the ninth the arrival in Cæsarea; and, reckoning from the ninth five days inclusively, the day of the speech of Tertullus before Felix would be the thirteenth day, i.e., twelve full days; cf. xx. 6, where in the seven days are reckoned the day of arrival and the day of departure (Wendt, in loco). Meyer on the other hand reckons the day of St. Paul's arrival in Jerusalem as the first day, and the five days of xxiv. 1 from his departure from Jerusalem for Cæsarea. For other modes of reckoning see Wendt's note, Farrar, St. Paul, ii., 338, Alford, Rendall, and Lumby, in loco. Weiss points out that it is simplest to add the seven days of xxi. 27 and the five days of xxiv. 1, but we cannot by any means be sure that xxi. 27 implies a space of full seven days: "varie numerum computant; sed simplicissimum est sine dubio, e septem diebus, xxi. 27, et quinque, xxiv. 1, eum colligere," so Blass, but see his note on the passage.—προσκυνήσων, cf. xx. 16, the purpose was in itself an answer to each accusation—reverence not insurrection, conformity not heresy, worship not profanity. "To worship I came, so far was I from raising sedition," Chrys. There were other reasons no doubt for St. Paul's journey, as he himself states, ver. 17, cf. Rom. xv. 25, but he naturally places first the reason which would be a defence in the procurator's eyes. Overbeck and Wendt contend that the statement is not genuine, and that it is placed by the author of Acts in St. Paul's mouth, but see on the other hand Weiss, in loco. It seems quite captious to demand that Paul should explain to the procurator all the reasons for his journey, or that the fact that he came to worship should exclude the fact that he also came to offer alms.

[1] For επισυστασιν HLP, Chrys. (Meyer), ℵABE 13, 40, and other authorities as above read επιστασιν.

[2] For ουτε ℵB 61 read ουδε; R.V. with other authorities as above, but not Hilgenfeld. For νυν ℵAB read νυνι, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Blass, Hilgenfeld.

Ver. 12. οὔτε ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ . . . οὔτε . . . οὔτε: step by step he refutes the charge.—οὔτε εὗρον, cf. ver. 5, εὑρόντες, a flat denial to the allegation of Tertullus; R.V. reads more plainly: both acts, the disputing and the exciting a tumult, are denied with reference to the Temple, the synagogue, the city. In διαλ. there would have been nothing censurable, but even from this the Apostle had refrained.—ἢ ἐπισύστασιν ποι. ὄχ.: R.V. reads ἐπίστασιν; the Apostle had been accused as κινοῦντα στάσεις, ver. 5; here is his answer to the charge, they had not found him "stirring up a crowd," R.V. This rendering however seems to make ἐπίστασις almost = ἐπισύστασις, a stronger word, cf. Numb. xxvi. 9, 1 Esdras v. 73, conjuratio. In 2 Macc. vi. 3 we have ἐπίστασις τῆς κακίας, incursio malorum, Vulgate, but its meaning here would seem to be rather concursus, in the sense of a concourse, an assembly, not an onset or attack; and the phrase expresses that the Apostle had not been guilty of even the least disturbance; not even of causing the assembling of a crowd (see Wendt and Weiss, in loco), "aut concursum facientem turbæ," Vulgate.—In 2 Cor. xi. 28 it is possible that ἐπισύστασις may be used of the presence of a multitude, almost like ἐπίστασις, see Grimm-Thayer.—συναγωγαῖς: plural, because so many in Jerusalem, cf. vi. 9.—κατὰ τὴν πόλιν: Alford renders "up and down the streets," cf. Luke viii. 39, xv. 14.

Ver. 13. οὔτε: οὐδέ, R.V. (so Blass, Gram., p. 260, Simcox, Z. N. T., p. 165); the Apostle after denying the specific charges made against him in Jerusalem, now proceeds further to a general denial of the charge that he had been an agitator amongst the Jews throughout the empire.—παραστῆσαι: argumentis probare, only here in N.T. in this sense, but in classical Greek, Philo, Jos., Epictet.—νῦν, see critical note.

Ver. 14. ὁμολ.: "verbum forense idemque sacrum," Bengel. "Unum crimen confitetur," viz., that of belonging to the sect of the Nazarenes, "sed crimen non esse docet".—κατὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ἣν λέγ. αἵρεσιν: "according to the way which they call a sect," R.V. For ὁδὸν see ix. 2, and for the reading in β text critical note. αἵρεσιν: a word of neutral significance, which Tertullus had used in a bad sense. For St. Paul Christianity was not αἵρεσις, a separation from the Jewish religion, but was rather πλήρωσις, cf. xiii. 32.—τῷ πατρ. Θεῷ, cf. xxii. 3. The Apostle may have used the expression here as a classical one which the Roman might appreciate, cf. θεοὶ πατρῷοι, Thuc., ii., 71; Æn., ix., 247, and instances in Wetstein. κός, Gal. i. 14, see Syn., Grimm-Thayer.) Moreover St. Paul could appeal to the fact that liberty had been given to the Jews by the Romans themselves to worship the God of their fathers (see Alford's note, in loco).—λατρεύω: "so serve I," R.V., see on vii. 42; if it is true that the word always describes a divine service like λατρεία, and that this idea appears to spring from the conception of complete devotion of powers to a master which lies in the root of the word (Westcott), no verb could more appropriately describe the service of one who called himself δοῦλος of God and of Christ.—πᾶσι τοῖς κατὰ τὸν ν. κ.τ.λ.: "all things which are according to the law," R.V., "iterum refutat Tertullum, ver. 6," Bengel; "and which are written in the prophets," R.V. The mention of the prophets as well as of the law shows that a reference to the Messianic hopes is intended.

Ver. 15. ἐλπίδα ἔχων, cf. xxiii. 6: St. Paul speaks of the hope as a present possession, "habens id plus quam προσδ. expectant," Bengel; in LXX very frequent with ἐπί, but for εἰς cf. Isa. li. 5, Ps. cxviii. 114 S[1], so here, a hope supporting itself upon God.—καὶ αὐτοὶ οὗτοι: the Apostle makes no distinction between Sadducees and Pharisees, but regards the Jews who were present as representing the nation.—προσδ., xxiii. 21, cf. St. Paul's words in Tit. ii. 13, Gal. v. 5.—μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι, see above on xi. 28, and cf. xxvii. 10, future infinitive with μέλλειν only in this one phrase in N.T.—ἀνάστασιν . . . δικ. τε καὶ ἀδίκων: the belief was firmly held in all circles where the teaching of the Pharisees prevailed. But was this belief a belief in the resurrection of Israelites only? Was it a belief in the resurrection of the righteous only? The book of Daniel plainly implies a resurrection of the just and the unjust, xii. 2, but we cannot say that this became the prevailing belief, e.g., in Psalms of Solomon, although iii. 16 may probably be based upon the passage in Daniel, yet in ver. 13 there is no thought of the resurrection of the sinner (cf. 2 Macc. vii. 14, σοὶ μὲν γὰρ ἀνάστασις εἰς ζωὴν οὐκ ἔσται, addressed to Antiochus Epiphanes). So Josephus, in giving an account of the ordinary Pharisaic doctrine, speaks only of the virtuous reviving and living again, Ant., xviii., 1, 3. So too in the Talmudic literature the resurrection of the dead is a privilege of Israel, and of righteous Israelites only—there is no resurrection of the heathen. On the other hand there are passages in the Book of Enoch where a resurrection of all Israelites is spoken of, cf. xxii., with the exception of one class of sinners, i.-xxxvi., xxxvii.-lxx., lxxxiii.-xc., Apocalypse of Baruch l.-li. 6, but in Enoch xli.-liv. we have a resurrection of the righteous Israelites only, cf. Apoc. of Baruch xxx. 1 (cf. with this verse in Acts). See further Charles, Book of Enoch, pp. 139, 262, and Apocalypse of Baruch, l.c., Psalms of Solomon, Ryle and James, Introd., li., pp. 37, 38, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 179, Weber, Jüdische Theol., p. 390 ff. (1897). Enoch xci.-civ. is placed by Charles at 104-95 B.C., and Baruch xxx. is ascribed to B[2], written after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ver. 16. ἐν τούτῳ: "herein" is rather ambiguous, A. and R.V.; the expression may be used as = propterea, as the result of the confession of faith in vv. 14, 15, cf. John xvi. 30 (Xen., Cyr., i., 3, 14). Rendall takes it = meanwhile (so apparently Wetstein), sc. χρόνῳ, i.e., in this earthly life; "hanc spem dum habeo," Bengel. If we read καί, not δέ, perhaps best explained "non minus quam illi," Blass, "I also exercise myself," R.V., ἀσκῶ, cf. 2 Macc. xv. 4; ἄσκησις, 4 Macc. xiii. 22; ἀσκητής, 4 Macc. xii. 11; so in classical Greek, laborare, studere, Soph., Elect., 1024.—ἀπρόσκοπον: only by Paul ἀνθρώπους διαπαντός. 17. δι' ἐτῶν δὲ πλειόνων[1] παρεγενόμην ἐλεημοσύνας ποιήσων εἰς τὸ ἔθνος μου καὶ προσφοράς· 18.[2] ἐν οἷς εὗρόν με ἡγνισμένον ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, οὐ μετὰ ὄχλου οὐδὲ μετὰ

[1] R.V. transposes παρεγ., placing it after μου, with ℵ*BC, Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Blass (but not Hilg.), who places it after προσφορας; A omits.

[2] εν οις HLP, so Blass, but εν αις ℵABCE, Blass in β text, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. οις may have been changed into αις on account of the immediately preceding προσφοραις; but the fem. may also have been changed into οις, because no definite reference is made to offerings in xxi. 27, where the tumult took place, and the expression εν οις would express a more general reference to ver. 17. See note below, and also Winer-Schmiedel, pp. 193, 228; Wendt (1899), note, in loco.

in N. T., cf. 1 Cor. x. 32, where used actively, and cf. Ecclus. xxxii. (xxxv.) 21, 3 Macc. iii. 8. In Phil. i. 10 Lightfoot points out that the word may be taken either transitively or intransitively, although he prefers the latter. Mr. Page in his note on the word in this passage commends A.V. "void of offence" as including the two images, not offending, upright, ἀπροσ. πρὸς τὸν Θεόν; not causing offence, ἀπροσ. πρὸς τοὺς ἀνθρώπους. "Ad Deum et homines congruit quod sequitur eleemosynas et oblationes," Bengel.—διὰ παντός, see Plummer on Luke xxiv. 53, cf. Acts ii. 25, x. 2, Matt. xviii. 10, Mark v. 5, Heb. ii. 15, emphatic here at the end of sentence, implying that the Apostle's whole aim in life should free him from the suspicion of such charges as had been brought against him.

Ver. 17. πλειόνων: "many," R.V., but margin, "some," so Rendall: if xviii. 22 refers to a visit to Jerusalem (see note) at the close of the Apostle's second missionary journey, the number expressed by πλειόνων would not exceed four or five.—ἐλεημοσύνας ποιήσων, see above on collection for the Saints at Jerusalem. ἐλεη.: not elsewhere used by Paul, who speaks of κοινωνία, διακονία εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους, see on x. 2.—παρεγενόμην, Lucan, but cf. also 1 Cor. xvi. 3, for the word again used by St. Paul.—εἰς τὸ ἔθνος μου: quite natural for St. Paul to speak thus of the Jewish nation, for the Jewish-Christian Church naturally consisted of Jews, cf. Rom. ix. 3. For this allusion in Acts to the great work of the collection, and its evidential value, as corroborating the notices in the Epistles, see above on p. 422, and Paley, H.P., chap. ii., 1. On this use of εἰς cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2 Cor. viii. 4, ix. 1, 13, Rom. xv. 26, and see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 113.—καὶ προσφοράς: no mention is made of offerings as part of the purpose of St. Paul's visit to Jerusalem, but we know that he came up to Jerusalem to worship, ver. 11, and to be present at the Feast of Pentecost, xx. 16, and even if he did not present some offering in connection with that Feast (a thank-offering as Bethge supposes), Dr. Hort's view may well commend itself that the Apostle wished to make some offering on his own account, or it may be a solemn peace-offering in connection with the Gentile contribution for the Jewish Christians, and its acceptance, see on xxi. 26, and also Weiss, in loco. The position of προσφ. seems against the supposition that we can take it simply with ἐλεη., and in combination with it, as if both words referred to the collection for the Saints. Jüngst would omit the words καὶ προσφ. . . . ἱερῷ altogether, whilst even Hilgenfeld regards vv. 17-21 as an addition of his "Author to Theophilus".

Ver. 18. ἐν οἷς, see critical note. If we read ἐν αἷς = "amidst which," R.V., "in presenting which," margin, with reference to προσφοράς, including not only the offerings in connection with the Apostle's association of himself with the poor men in the Nazirite vow, but also offerings such as those referred to in ver. 17. ἐν οἷς = inter quæ (Winer-Schmiedel, pp. 193, 228), i.e., in reference to these matters generally, cf. xxvi. 12.—εὗρον, cf. ver. 5: "they found me," indeed, as they have said, but οὐ μετὰ ὄχλου κ.τ.λ.; a direct answer to the charge of profaning the Temple: he had gone there for worship and sacrifice, "then how did I profane it?" Chrys., Hom., L.—ἡγνισμένον: the expression is generally taken to refer to the offerings involved in the association with the vow, xxi. 26, but it may also include other acts of worship and purification in the Temple.

θορύβου, τινὲς[1] ἀπὸ τῆς Ἀσίας Ἰουδαῖοι, 19. οὓς ἔδει ἐπὶ σοῦ παρεῖναι καὶ κατηγορεῖν εἴ τι ἔχοιεν πρός με. 20. ἢ αὐτοὶ οὗτοι εἰπάτωσαν,[2] εἴ τι εὗρον ἐν ἐμοὶ ἀδίκημα, στάντος μου ἐπὶ τοῦ συνεδρίου· 21. ἢ περὶ μιᾶς ταύτης φωνῆς, ἧς[3] ἔκραξα ἑστὼς ἐν αὐτοῖς, Ὅτι περὶ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν ἐγὼ κρίνομαι σήμερον[4] ὑφ᾽ ὑμῶν.

[1] After τινες ℵABCE 13, 40, 61, Sah., Boh., Syr. H.; Tisch., W.H., Weiss, R.V., Wendt [Blass] add δε; omitted by HLP.

[2] Instead of τι ευρ. W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, T.R. has ει τι ευρ. with very slight attestation; cf. ver. 19. εν εμοι om. ℵAB 13, 40, 61, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, but not Hilg.

[3] For εκραξα (Lach., Hilgenfeld) the form εκεκραξα is found in ℵABC 13, 40, 61, Chrys., Tisch.; W.H., Blass, Weiss; redupl. form only here in N.T., but often in LXX; see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 104.

[4] Instead of υφ᾽ ABC 13, 40, 61, Syr. Pesh., Aeth utr. read εφ᾽, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass in β; υφ᾽ is supported by ℵEHLP, Chrys. (so Vulg., Gig., Boh., Syr. H., a vobis, and Hilg.).

—τινὲς: in A.V. the word is simply referred to εὗρον and there is no difficulty; but if we insert δέ after it (see critical note). R.V. renders "but there were certain Jews from Asia," etc. The sentence breaks off, and the speaker makes no direct reference to xxi. 27, but implies that these Asiatic Jews should have been present to accuse him if they had any accusation to make—their absence was in the prisoner's favour; "the passage as it stands (i.e., with this break) is instinct with life, and seems to exhibit the abruptness so characteristic of the Pauline Epistles," cf. xxvi. 9, see Page's note in loco. Others take δέ though less forcibly as more strictly in opposition to the preceding words, meaning that his accusers had not found him as they alleged, and as Tertullus alleged, ver. 5, but that certain Jews of Asia had found him. Hackett retains δέ, and sees in the words a retort of the charge of riot upon the true authors of it: "but certain Jews from Asia"—it is they who excited a tumult, not I; the verb could be omitted, a true picture of the Apostle's earnestness, because so readily suggested from θορύβου, but this interpretation seems hardly borne out by the context.

Ver. 19. ἔδει without ἄν, cf. Luke xi. 42, xv. 32; on the force of this imperfect, see Burton, p. 14, Winer-Moulton, xli. 2.—εἴ τι ἔχοιεν πρός με: the optative of subjective possibility, representing the subjective view of the agent—if they had anything against me (in their own belief), Winer-Moulton, xli. b 2, Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 111 (1893), Burton, p. 106.—κατηγορεῖν: "to make accusation," R.V., cf. ver. 2.

Ver. 20. ἢ αὐτοὶ οὗτοι: "quandoquidem absunt illi, hi dicant," Blass; as the Jews from Asia are not present as accusers, he appeals to those Jews who are—he cannot demand speech from the absent, but he claims it from the present (Weiss): "or else let these men themselves say," R.V., since they are the only accusers present. Kuinoel refers the words to the Sadducees, and thinks this proved from the next verse, but the context does not require this reference, nor can the words be referred with Ewald to the Asiatic Jews, since στάντος μου ἐπὶ τοῦ συν. is against such an interpretation.—τι, see critical note.

Ver. 21. ἢ = ἄλλο ἢ after ἀδίκημα (Rendall); St. Paul, of course, uses the word (ἀδίκημα) of his accusers. St. Paul is taken by some to speak ironically . . . strange ἀδίκημα, a question of belief with regard to which the Jews themselves were at variance, and which the procurator would regard as an idle contention! Weiss renders "or let them say, if in other respects they have found nothing wrong, concerning this one utterance," etc.—"in what respect they regard it as an ἀδίκημα," supplying εἰπάτωσαν from the previous verse. On the whole verse see further Blass, Gram., p. 168, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 187; and also p. 225 on ἧς ἔκραξα—ἧς probably not for ἣ (cf. Matt. xxvii. 50), but here φωνή is used in the sense of a loud cry, so that the construction resolves itself into φωνὴν κράζειν, cf. Rev. vi. 10, v. l. (and for the expression in LXX.

Ver. 22. ἀνεβάλετο: ampliavit eos, a technical expression, only here in N. T., the judges were wont to say Amplius in cases where it was not possible to pass at once a judgment of condemnation or acquittal before further inquiry, Cic., In Verr., i., 29.—ἀκριβ.: "having more exact knowledge concerning the Way" than to be deceived by the misrepresentation of the Jews; he may have learnt some details of the Christian sect during his years of office from his wife Drusilla, or possibly during his residence in Cæsarea, where there was a Christian community and the home of Philip the Evangelist, and where Cornelius had been converted. This knowledge, the writer indicates, was the real reason: the reason which Felix alleged was that he required the evidence of Lysias in person. Wendt, Zöckler, Bethge, Nösgen take the words to mean that the address of Paul had offended Felix's more accurate knowledge, and on this account he put off any decision. On the comparative see Blass, Gram., p. 139.—τὰ περὶ: characteristic of Luke and Paul, see p. 481.—διαγ. τὰ καθ' ὑμᾶς: "I will determine your matter," R.V., cf. xxv. 21, and see above on xxiii. 15. τὰ καθ' ὑμᾶς: probably refers to both accusers and accused. On τὰ before κατά characteristic of Luke see instance in Moulton and Geden, and Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 38.

Ver. 23. τηρεῖσθαι: that he should be kept in charge as a prisoner; not middle as in A.V.—ἔχειν τε ἄνεσιν: "and should have indulgence," R.V., not "liberty," A.V., word only elsewhere in Paul in N.T., 2 Cor. ii. 13, vii. 5, viii. 13, 2 Thess. i. 7, cf. also Ecclus. xxvi. 10, 1 Esd. iv. 62. From ver. 27 it appears that the prisoner was still bound, but the indulgence involved a custodia liberior, and extended to food, and the visits of friends, and remission from the severer form of custody, cf. Jos., Ant., xviii., 6, 7, 10, where Agrippa has similar indulgence in his imprisonment at Rome, but is still chained.—μηδένα κωλύειν τῶν ἰδίων, cf. iv. 23, Luke, Aristarchus, perhaps Trophimus, cf. Jos., Ant., xviii., u. s., for the same indulgence; change of subject to centurion in κωλύειν.—ὑπηρετεῖν, xiii. 36, xx. 34.

Ver. 24. Δρουσίλλῃ: of the three daughters of Agrippa I. Drusilla was the youngest, her sisters being Bernice (see below) and Mariamne. Married, when about fourteen, to Azizus king of Emeza, she had been seduced from her husband by Felix, who had employed for his evil purpose a certain impostor and magician, Simon by name, Jos., Ant., xx., 7, 2. The account in Josephus implies that she was unhappy in her marriage with Azizus, and asserts that she was exposed on account of her beauty to the envious ill-treatment of her sister Bernice. She married Felix ("trium reginarum mari-

(omit. αὐτοῦ) perhaps to emphasise that Drusilla, though a Jewess, was the wife of Felix, or it may point to the private and informal character of the interview, due to the request of Drusilla. Possibly both ἰδίᾳ and αὐτοῦ were additions to intimate that Drusilla was really the wife of Felix, but the article before γυναικί would have been sufficient to indicate this.—οὔσῃ Ἰουδαίᾳ, cf. β text, which states how Felix acted thus to gratify Drusilla, who as a Jewess wished to hear Paul, as her brother Agrippa afterwards, cf. xxv. 22, see Knabenbauer, in loco.—μετεπέμψατο, see on x. 5.—Χριστὸν, see critical note.

Ver. 25. περὶ δικαι.: Paul does not gratify the curiosity of Felix and Drusilla, but goes straight to the enforcement of those great moral conditions without which, both for Jew and Greek, what he had to say of the Messiahship of Jesus was unintelligible; how grievously Felix had failed in righteousness the events of his period of government proved, cf. Tac., Ann., xii., 54, "cuncta malefacta sibi impune ratus," through the evil influence of Pallas, Tac., Hist., v., 9.—ἐγκρατ.: R.V. margin "self-control," Latin, temperantia, Vulgate, castitate. The presence of Drusilla by his side was in itself a proof how Felix had failed in this virtue also, ἐγκρ. being specially applicable to continence from sensual pleasures (Wetstein); opposed to it is ἀκρασία, 1 Cor. vii. 5 (= ἀκράτεια), "incontinence," Arist., Eth., vii., 4, 2. In N.T., Gal. v. 23, 2 Pet. i. 6 (bis), cf. Tit. i. 8. The word is found in Ecclesiast. xviii. 15 S, 30, 4 Macc. v. 34. St. Paul gives a double proof of his courage in reasoning thus not only before Felix but before his wife, for like another Herodias her resentment was to be feared.—τοῦ κρίματος τοῦ μέλλ.: "the judgment to come," R.V., preserving the force of the article omitted in all E.V. except Rhem.: "ubi etiam illi, qui nunc judices sedent, judicandi erunt" (Wetstein).—ἐμφ. γεν., see on x. 4, cf. the attitude of Antipas with regard to the Baptist, Mark vi. 30.—Τὸ νῦν ἔχον, cf. Tob. vii. 11 (B[1] ἔχων), and for instances in Greek writers see Wetstein.—καιρὸν δὲ μεταλ., cf. Polyb., ii., 16, 15. μεταλαβόντες καιρ. ἁρμόττοντα (Alford, Blass). by them see further Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 187 (1893).—χρήματα: the mention of "alms," ver. 17, had perhaps suggested the thought that Paul was in a position to purchase his freedom with money, and it was also evident to Felix that the prisoner was not without personal friends, ver. 23. Spitta, Apostelgeschichte, p. 280, points to ver. 17, and to the fact that Felix could not be unaware that Paul was a man of wide influence and supported by many friends, as a sufficient answer to the supposed improbability urged by Pfleiderer that Felix could hope for money from a poor tent-maker and missionary. Spitta thinks that Philippians may have been written from Cæsarea, and that therefore (Phil. iv. 10) Felix had double cause to suppose that the poor missionary had command of money; but without endorsing this view as to the place of writing of Philippians, it may be suggested that St. Paul's friends at Philippi might have helped to provide financial help for the expenses of his trial: Lydia, e.g., was not only ready with large-hearted hospitality, but her trade in itself required a considerable capital: see on the other hand the view of Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 312. It is urged, moreover, that a poor man would never have received such attention or aroused such interest. But St. Luke himself has told us how Herod desired to see the Son of Man, Who had not where to lay His head, and the same feeling which prompted Herod, the feeling of curiosity, the hope perhaps of seeing some new thing, may have prompted the desire of an Agrippa or a Drusilla to see and to hear Paul.—ἐλπιζ. . . . δοθ.: "sic thesaurum evangelii omisit infelix Felix," Bengel. When Overbeck expresses surprise that Felix did not deliver Paul to the Jews for money, he forgets that Paul's Roman citizenship would make such an action much more dangerous than his detention.—διὸ καὶ: characteristic of Luke and Paul, and common to Luke's Gospel and Acts, cf. Luke i. 35, Acts x. 29, Rom. iv. 22, xv. 22, 2 Cor. i. 20, iv. 13, v. 9, Phil. ii. 9, only twice elsewhere in N.T., Heb. xi. 12, xiii. 12; "ut illiceret eum ad se pecunia temptandum," Blass, Knabenbauer.—πυκνότερον, cf. Luke v. 33, 1 Tim. v. 23; and LXX, Esther viii. 13, 2 Macc. viii. 8, 3 Macc. iv. 12. The comparative here is "verus comparativus": quo sæpius, Blass. Nothing could more plainly show the corruption of the Roman government than the conduct of Felix in face of the law: "Lex Julia de repetundis præcepit, ne quis ob hominem in vincula publice conjiciendum, vinciendum, vincirive jubendum, exve vinculis dimittendum; neve quis ob hominem condemnandum, absolvenduum . . . aliquid acceperit," Digest., xl., 11, 3 (Wetstein); see further on ver. 3.—ὡμίλει: only in Luke, see above xx. 11; imperfect denoting frequent occurrence.

Ver. 27. διετίας δὲ πληρ.: on the question of chronology see below, cf. xx. 30, and for τριετία, xx. 31; on διετία in inscriptions see two instances in Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 86. πληρ.: perhaps indicating that two full years are meant. Weizsäcker throws doubt upon the historical character of this imprisonment, and thinks that the episode is merely introduced by the writer of Acts, who in his ignorance of the name of the procurator doubles the incident before Felix and Festus; but Wendt declines to value so lightly the definite notices and accounts in Acts, and adds that the delay of the trial under a procurator devoid of a sense of duty was no improbable event. The recall of Felix has been assigned to very varying dates, Lightfoot naming 60, Wendt (1899) 61, Schürer, at the earliest 58, at the latest 61, probably 60, Ramsay 59, whilst McGiffert, following the Chronology recently advocated by O. Holtzmann (with a few earlier writers), places it as early as 55 (Harnack 55-56, following Eusebius, whilst Blass has also defended the Eusebian date). Both McGiffert and Holtzmann fix upon 55 because before the end of this year Pallas, the brother of Felix, was in disgrace; and yet, according to Josephus, Felix escaped the accusations brought against him by shielding himself behind his brother Pallas, whom Nero was then holding in special honour, Jos., Ant., xx., 8, 9, Tac., Ann., xiii., 14. "Either Josephus is in error," says O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 128, "or Festus went to Palestine in 55". But there is good reason for thinking that Josephus was in error in stating that Felix escaped by his brother's influence, then at its height, Jos., u. s. It is no doubt true that the influence of Pallas may have been very substantial long after his fall from court favour; but if the intervention of Pallas was subsequent to his fall, what becomes of the synchronism between his disgrace and the recall of Felix? But further, Pallas, according to the statement of Tacitus, Ann., xiii., 14, was disgraced before the fourteenth birthday of Britannicus, in Feb. 55, but, if so, how could Felix have reached Rome at such an early period of that year? Nero came to the throne on 13th Oct., 54, and we have to suppose that the order for recall was sent and the return journey of Felix to the capital accomplished in spite of the winter season which made a sea voyage impossible (Ramsay, Zahn, Bacon); "one can therefore no longer base the chronology of an Apostle's life upon the dismissal of a court favourite". But are there no chronological data available? Albinus, the successor of Festus, was already procurator in 62. How long he had been in office we cannot say, but he was certainly procurator in the summer of that year (Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 188, E.T.; Biblical World, p. 357, 1897). From Jos., Ant., xx., 9, 1, we learn that there was an interval of some few months full of disturbance and anarchy between the death of Festus and the arrival of Albinus in Jerusalem, so that we seem justified in inferring that Festus died probably in the winter of 61-62; and whilst the events of his procuratorship can scarcely have extended over five years (as would be demanded by the earlier chronology)—for in this case Josephus would surely have given us more information about them—it seems equally difficult to suppose that the events which Josephus does record could have been crowded into less than a year, or portions of two (Schürer). The entrance of Festus upon his office might thus be carried back to 59-60, and St. Paul's departure for Rome would fall probably in 60. But a further contribution to the subject has been made by Mr. Turner, "Chronology of the N.T.," Hastings' B.D., pp. 418, 419, and he argues for the exclusion of a date as late as 60 for the accession of Festus, and for placing the recall of Felix in 57-59, i.e., between the earlier and later dates mentioned above; or, more definitely still, in 58, cf. p. 420. With this date Dr. Gilbert agrees, Student's Life of Paul, p. 252, 1899. See further Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 634; Wendt (1899), p. 56; Expositor, March, 1897, Feb., 1898; "Festus" (A. Robertson), Hastings' B.D. and B.D.².—ἔλαβε διάδοχον, Ecclus. xlvi. 1, xlviii. 8. In 2 Macc. iv. 29, xiv. 26, the meaning of successor is doubtful, and it would seem that the title rather denoted a high office about the court of the Ptolemies, cf. Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 111. In classical Greek it is used as here for successor, cf. Jos., Ant., xx., 8, 9, so successorem accepit, Plin., Epist., ix., 13.—Φῆστον: we know nothing of him except from the N.T. and Josephus. The latter, however, contrasts him favourably with his successor Albinus: "et Albinum cum ei dissimillimum fuisse tradit, scelestum hominem, simul illum laudat" (Blass). So far as our information goes, Festus also contrasts favourably with his predecessor; he acted with promptness to rid the country of robbers and sicarii, and amongst them of one impostor whose promises were specially seductive, Ant., xx., 8, 9, 10, and B.J., ii., 14, 1. But although, as Schürer says, he was disposed to act righteously, he found himself unable to undo the mischief wrought by his predecessor, and after a short administration death prevented him from coping further with the evils which infested the province. For his attitude towards St. Paul as his prisoner see notes below. Two other events marked his procuratorship: (1) the quarrel between the priests and Agrippa, because the latter built on to his palace so as to overlook the Temple, and the priests retaliated by building so as to shut off his view. Festus sided with Agrippa, but allowed the priests to appeal to Rome. (2) The decision of the emperor in favour of the Syrian against the Jewish inhabitants of Cæsarea, which caused a bitterness provoking in A.D. 66 the disturbances in which Josephus marked the beginnings of the great War, Ant., xx., 8, 9.—θέλων τε χάριτας καταθέσθαι τοῖς Ἰ.: "desiring to gain favour with the Jews," R.V., literally to lay down or deposit a favour with the Jews as a deposit for which a due return might be expected, cf. 1 Macc. x. 23 R.; Jos., Ant., xi., 6, 5, so too in classical Greek, Thuc., i., 33, 128; Herod., vi., 41, etc. The policy of Felix was to gain popularity with the Jews in view of the accusations which followed him on his return to Rome, Jos., Ant., xx., 8, 9. That the pursuit of such a policy was not alien to the character of Roman officials see Jos., Ant., xx., 9, 5, where we learn that Albinus, desiring to gain the gratitude of the Jews, took money of all those in prison for some trifling fault, by which means the prisons indeed were emptied, but the country was full of robbers. In B.J., ii., 14, 1, we learn that the same system was pursued by Albinus, the successor of Festus, until no one was left in the prisons but those who gave him nothing. According to β text Felix leaves Paul in prison to please his wife, but, as Blass points out, both reasons may be true.—χάριτα (W.H., R.V.) only (in N.T.) in Jude, ver. 4, cf. xxv. 9 A; found in classics, though rarer than χάριν, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 88; in LXX, Zech. vi. 14.—δεδεμ.: this does not at all imply that Paul had been quite free, and was now rebound, cf. ver. 23. ἄνεσις did not mean perfect freedom, and the custodia militaris might still continue. Nösgen thinks that the word in its position at the end of the verse indicates a severer form of custody, but this is by no means necessary, although as the last word of the episode, and as the result of all the intercourse with Felix, it has a dramatic force and pathos. Zeller, Acts, ii., p. 83, E.T., although he thinks it remarkable that Felix and Festus are represented as acting from the same motive, as Pilate for a similar reason had consented to the execution of Jesus, is constrained to admit that conduct such as that of the two procurators is too natural for its repetition to be surprising; unscrupulous officials are always ready by complaisance at the expense of others to appease those to whom they have given just cause for complaint.

Φῆστον[1]· θέλων τε χάριτας καταθέσθαι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις ὁ Φῆλιξ, κατέλιπε τὸν Παῦλον δεδεμένον.

[1] Instead of θελων τε χαρ. Blass in β text with 137, Syr. H. mg. reads τον δε Παυλον ειασεν εν τηρησει δια Δρουσιλλαν, so Zöckler, Belser, Hilg., and J. Weiss, who thinks that T.R. is simply conformed to xxv. 9; but see on the other hand Schmiedel, Enc. Bibl., i., 53.

CHAPTER XXV.—Ver. 1. ἐπιβὰς: "having come into the province," A. and R.V., or, "having entered upon his province," R.V. margin. If we read τῇ ἐπαρχείῳ with Weiss and W.H. margin, the word is an adjective of two terminations, sc. ἐξουσίᾳ, i.e., having entered on his duties as governor of the province (see Weiss, Apostelgeschichte, p. 8), and cf. xxiii. 34. For the adjective in inscriptions see Blass, in loco.—μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμ.: "sat cito," Bengel.—ἀνέβη: went up to Jerusalem officially as the capital; the visit had nothing necessarily to do with St. Paul, but the close-connecting τε may indicate that the action of the priests in again bringing up their case was to be expected.

Ver. 2. ἐνεφάνισαν, cf. xxiii. 15, xxiv. 1: here the context evidently implies that legal and formal information was laid against Paul.—If we read οἱ ἀρχ., cf. iv. 5. οἱ πρῶτοι: sometimes taken as = πρεσβ. in ver. 15, cf. xxiii. 14, xxiv. 1, but in Luke xix. 47 we have οἱ ἀρχ. καὶ οἱ γράμμ. καὶ οἱ πρῶτοι τοῦ λαοῦ. The difference of designation seems to indicate that they were not identical with the πρεσβ., although perhaps including them, or possibly as their chief representatives: see also Plummer on Luke, l. c. Blass seems to identify πρῶτοι with ἀρχιερεῖς, cf. iv. 5, ἄρχοντες.—παρέκαλουν: the word and the tense mark their importunity.

T. Syr. H. mg. adds a distinct reference to the forty conspirators previously mentioned, xxiii. 12, but Blass omits in β text—doubtless, as he says, there were many others ready for the deed at the service of the Sanhedrim.

Ver. 4. μὲν οὖν: no antithesis expressed; but Rendall, Appendix on μὲν οὖν, Acts, p. 162, holds that two phases of events are here contrasted: Festus refused to bring Paul away from Cæsarea, but he undertook to hear the charges of the Jews there.—ἐν Και., see critical note, perhaps here εἰς simply = ἐν, so Blass, and Simcox, cf. Mark xiii. 9, Acts xix. 22. On the other hand cf. Weiss on the frequent force of εἰς peculiar to Acts, viii. 40, ix. 21 (where he reads εἰς), intimating that Paul had been brought to Cæsarea with the purpose that he should be kept there. The Jews had asked Festus ὅπως μεταπέμψ. α. εἰς Ἰ., but Festus intimates that the prisoner was in custody at Cæsarea, and that as he was himself going there, the prisoner's accusers should go there also; in other words, he returns a refusal to their request, cf. ver. 16.—ἐν τάχει, Luke xviii. 8, and three times in Acts, xii. 7, xxii. 18, not in the other Evangelists; Rom. xvi. 20, 1 Tim. iii. 14, Rev. i. 1, xxii. 6.—ἐκπορ.: for the verb used absolutely as here cf. Luke iii. 7.

Ver. 5. φησί: change to the oratio recta, cf. i. 4. For other instances of the insertion of the single words ἔφη or φησίν, rare in N. T., see Simcox, Language of the New Testament, p. 200; cf. xxiii. 35, xxvi. 25, 1 Cor. vi. 16, 2 Cor. x. 10, Heb. viii. 5.—οἱ . . . δυνατοί: "Let them therefore, saith he, which are of power among you," R.V.; not simply "which are able," A.V., "qui in vobis potentes sunt," Vulgate. The word may be used by Festus, because he was not acquainted with the Jewish official terms, or it may be used in a general way as in 1 Cor. i. 26. In Jos., B.J., i., 12, 5, we have the expression, ἧκον Ἰουδαίων οἱ δυνατοί, cf. Thuc. i. 89, Polyb., ix., 23, 4; but in addition to this general use of the word Jos. frequently conjoins the ἀρχιερεῖς with the δυνατοί as members of the Sanhedrim, Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 178, E.T. This interpretation of the word is more natural than that adopted by Bengel: "qui valent ad iter faciendum: ἦθος urbanum Festi respondentis Judæis molestiam viae causantibus;" for other explanations see Wendt-Meyer, in loco.—συγκαταβάντες: "go down with me," R.V., mecum; only here in N. T., in LXX, Ps. xlviii. 17, Wisd. x. 13, Dan. iii. 49 (Theod. iii. 49) = Song of the Three Children, ver. 26.—ἄτοπον, see critical note, and further on xxviii. 6.

Ver. 6. ἡμέρας πλ., see critical note, "not more than eight or ten days," R.V., i.e., the whole period of Festus'

[1] ℵABCL, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Blass, Hilg. read αυτον after περιεστησαν; E has αυτῳ; Meyer follows T.R.

[2] For αιτιαματα ℵABCEHLP, so Tisch. and authorities above read αιτιωματα, a word which does not occur elsewhere, although Eustath. has αιτιωσις for αιτιασις. ℵABC 13, 40, 61, so Tisch. and authorities above read καταφεροντες instead of φεροντες κατα τον Π.

stay ἐν αὐτοῖς. Blass sees in the words an indication of the vigour of action characterising Festus. The expression may, however, be used from the standpoint of Paul and his friends at Cæsarea, who did not know how much of his absence Festus had spent in Jerusalem, or how much on the journey (so Weiss and Wendt).—τῇ ἐπαύριον: ten times in Acts, but nowhere in Luke's Gospel, cf., however, ἐπὶ τὴν αὔριον, Luke x. 35 and Acts iv. 5 only (Hawkins). This evidently implies that the accusers had come down with Festus, and it may again indicate his promptness, cf. ver. 17. There does not seem any indication that this immediate action shows that he had been prejudiced against Paul in Jerusalem (Chrys.).—ἐπὶ τοῦ βήματος, xii. 21, xviii. 12, and ver. 10 below: seven times in Acts in this sense (Matt. xxvii. 19, John xix. 13), but nowhere in Luke's Gospel; twice by St. Paul, Rom. xiv. 10, 2 Cor. v. 10.—καθ. ἐπὶ τοῦ β.: a necessary formality, otherwise no legal effect would be given to the decision, cf. Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 15, E.T., for this and other instances.—ἀχθῆναι, cf. προσάγεσθαι, Polyc., Mart., ix., 1 and 2.

Ver. 7. περιέστησαν: if we add αὐτόν, see critical note, "stood round about him," i.e., Paul, R.V., "periculum intentantes," Bengel. (Cf. John xi. 42, Judith v. 22, omit S[1].)—πολλὰ καὶ βαρέα: "many and (indeed) heavy," etc., Winer-Moulton, lix., 3, perhaps as in Matt. xxiii. 23, weighty, of great moment.—αἰτιάματα φέρ., see critical note. αἰτίαμ. in Æschylus and Thucydides. For καταφέροντες, xxvi. 10, cf. Deut. xxii. 14.

Ver. 8. Evidently the charges classed as before under three heads, (1) the Law, (2) the Temple, (3) the Empire. In this verse Hilgenfeld ascribes ὅτι . . . ἥμαρτον to his "author to Theophilus" (Jüngst, too, omits the words). But, not content with this, he concludes that the whole narrative which follows about Agrippa is to ratify the innocence of Paul before a crowned head of Judaism, cf. ix. 15, where υἱῶν τε Ἰσ. is also ascribed to the "author to Theophilus," and perhaps also τε καὶ βασιλέων; we are therefore to refer to this unknown writer the whole section xxv. 13-xxvi. 32.—ἥμαρτον with εἰς only here in Acts, three times in Luke's Gospel, three times in 1 Cor., only once elsewhere in N.T., Matt. xviii. 21.

Ver. 9. χάριν καταθέσθαι, xxiv. 27.—τοῖς Ἰ., best placed emphatically before χάριν κατ. (W.H.), so as to show that it was the compliance of Festus to the Jews which caused the turn which things took (Weiss).—θέλεις εἰς Ἱ.: "injustum videbatur condemnare, incommodum absolvere," Blass.—ἐκεῖ: he makes himself the same proposal to the prisoner which had previously been suggested by the accusers, ver. 3.—ἐπ' ἐμοῦ: "me præsente," for the Sanhedrists would be the judges; otherwise, where would be the favour to the Jews? Felix may have added the words speciose, so as to reassure Paul and to obtain his acquiescence to the proposal; in ver. 20 omitted, but evidently from their close connection with περὶ τούτ. κρίν. they indicate that Festus would play some judicial part in the matter; cf. xxiv. 21 and 1 Cor. vi. 1. But Paul's answer plainly shows that he thought from the words of Felix that a Jewish and not a Roman tribunal awaited him: ἐπ' ἐμοῦ would therefore seem to mean that the

[1] For κρινεσθαι ℵABCE, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Hilg. read κριθηναι.

[2] ℵ* has εστως at commencement of verse, B has it in both places, Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Blass, Wendt place it at commencement.

[3] For ηδικησα (T.R. Lach.) ℵB have ηδικηκα, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, Blass.

[4] For γαρ ℵABCEgr. 61 read ουν, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. but [Blass].

Sanhedrim would judge, whilst Festus would ratify their judgment or not as seemed good to him, as Pilate had acted in the case of Christ. On the other hand it is possible that Festus may have been quite sincere in his proposal: his words at least showed that in his judgment there was no case against Paul of a political nature, and he may have thought that religious questions could be best decided before the Sanhedrim in Jerusalem, whilst he could guarantee a safe-conduct for Paul as a Roman citizen.

Ver. 10. ἑστώς εἰμι: "I am standing," used rhetorically, Blass, Gram., p. 198; on the position of ἑστ. see critical note.—Καίσαρος: because the procurator was the representative of Cæsar: "quæ acta gestaque sunt a procuratore Cæsaris sic ab eo comprobantur, atque si a Cæsare ipso gesta sint," Ulpian, Digest., i., 19, 1.—δεῖ: because a Roman citizen, no need to suppose that the word has reference here to any divine intimation.—Ἰουδ. . . .: "to Jews have I done no wrong," the omission of the article in translation makes Paul's denial more forcible and comprehensive; for ἀδικεῖν with οὐδέν and the double accusative cf. Luke x. 19.—ὡς καὶ σὺ κάλλιον ἐπιγ.: "as thou also art getting to know better," Rendall (see also Page and Weiss): this rendering, it is said, saves us from the ungracious and unjust retort which A. and R.V. ascribe to Paul. But ver. 18 seems to show us by the confession of Festus himself that the Apostle might fairly have imputed to him a keeping back of his better and fairer judgment, whilst in the expression χαρίσασθαι, ver. 11, there seems to be an intimation that the Apostle felt that Festus might make him a victim. Zöckler sees in the comparative "a gentle reproach," as if St. Paul would intimate to Festus that he really knew better than his question (ver. 9) would imply.

Ver. 11. εἰ μὲν γὰρ, see critical note, "if then (οὖν) I am a wrongdoer," referring to his standing before Cæsar's judgment-seat, and not to the ἠδίκησα in ver. 10.—ἀδικεῖν: only here absolutely in N.T.; the verb occurs five times in Acts, once in Luke's Gospel, and once in St. Matthew, but not elsewhere in the Gospels (Friedrich, p. 23).—ἄξιον θαν., i.e., according to Roman law.—οὐ παραιτοῦμαι τὸ ἀποθανεῖν: non recuso, Vulgate, so Blass; the verb is only used here in Acts, but it occurs three times in St. Luke's Gospel, three times in Hebrews, once in Mark xv. 6, W.H. —In the present passage, and in 1 Tim. iv. 7, v. 11, 2 Tim. ii. 23, Tit. iii. 10, Heb. xii. 25 (twice), the word is rendered "refuse," R.V. text; but in Luke xiv. 18, 19, the word is rendered "to make excuse"; "excused": Jos., Ant., vii., 8, 2; but in each case the Greek verb literally means "to beg off from," and the Latin deprecor might well express the verb both here and in Luke xiv., l.c., cf. Esth. iv. 8 in the sense of supplicating, and for the sense as above 2 Macc. ii. 31, 3 Macc. vi. 27; see also Grimm sub v. for different shades of meaning. In Jos., Vita, 29, we have the phrase θανεῖν οὐ παραιτοῦμαι: upon which Krenkel insists as an instance of dependence upon Josephus, but not only is the phrase here somewhat different verbally, οὐ παραι. τὸ ἀποθ., the article expressing more emphatically, as Bengel says, id ipsum agi; but cf. the instances quoted by Wetstein of the use of similar phrases in Greek, and of the Latin deprecor, e.g., Dion. Hal., A.V., 29. τὸν μὲν οὖν θάνατον . . . οὐ παραιτοῦμαι. See further Introd., p. 31.—χαρίσασθαι: "to grant me by favour," R.V. margin, cf. iii. 14, xxv. 16, xxvii. 24 (Philem. ver. 22), only in Luke and Paul in N.T.; see on its importance as marking the "We" section, xxvii. 24, and other parts of Acts, Zeller, Acts, ii., 318, E.T. Paul must have known what this "giving up" to the Jews would involve.—Καίσαρα ἐπικ.: Appello: provoco ad Cæsarem: "Si apud acta quis appellaverit, satis erit si dicat: Appello." Digest., xlix., 1, 2, except in the case of notorious robbers and agitators whose guilt was clear, ibid., 16. But we must distinguish between an appeal against a sentence already pronounced, and a claim at the commencement of a process that the whole matter should be referred to the emperor. It would appear from this passage, cf. vv. 21, 26, 32, that Roman citizens charged with capital offences could make this kind of appeal, for the whole narrative is based upon the fact that Paul had not yet been tried, and that he was to be kept for a thorough inquiry by the emperor, and to be brought to Rome for this purpose, cf. Pliny, Epist., x., 97, quoted by Schürer, Alford, and others, and similar instances in Renan, Saint Paul, p. 543, Schürer, Jewish People, div. 1., vol. ii., p. 59, and div. ii., vol. ii., p. 278, E.T., and also "Appeal," Hastings' B.D., and below, p. 514.—This step of St. Paul's was very natural. During his imprisonment under Felix he had hoped against hope that he might have been released, but although the character of Festus might have given him a more reasonable anticipation of justice, he had seen enough of the procurator to detect the vacillation which led him also to curry favour with the Jews. From some points of view his position under Festus was more dangerous than under Felix: if he accepted the suggestion that he should go up to Jerusalem and be tried before the Sanhedrim, he could not doubt that his judges would find him guilty; if he declined, and Festus became the judge, there was still the manifest danger that the better judgment of the magistrate would be warped by the selfishness of the politician. Moreover, he may well have thought that at a distant court, where there might be difficulty in collecting evidence against him, he would fare better in spite of the danger and expense of the appeal. But whilst we may thus base St. Paul's action upon probable human motives, his own keen and long desire to see Rome, xix. 21, and his Lord's promise of the fulfilment of that desire, xxiii. 11, could not have been without influence upon his decision, although other motives need not be altogether excluded, as St. Chrysostom, Ewald, Neander and Meyer (see Nösgen, 435). It has been maintained that there was every reason to suppose that St. Paul would have obtained his acquittal at the hands of the Roman authorities, especially after Agrippa's declaration of his innocence, xxvi. 32. But St. Paul's appeal had been already made before Agrippa had heard him, and he may well have come to the conclusion that the best he could hope for from Festus was a further period of imprisonment, whilst his release would only expose him to the bitter and relentless animosity of the Jews. Two years of enforced imprisonment had been patiently borne, and the Apostle would be eager (can we doubt it?) to bear further witness before Gentiles and kings of his belief in Jesus as the Christ, and of repentance and faith towards God.

Ver. 12. μετὰ τοῦ συμβ., i.e., his assessors, assessores consiliarii, with whom the procurators were wont to consult in the administration of the law. They were probably composed, in part at all events, of the higher officials of the court, cf. Suet., Tiber., 33, Lamprid., Vita Alex. Sev., 46, Jos., Ant., xiv., 10, 2, Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 60, E.T.; and see further on the word Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 65, and references in Grimm-Thayer, sub v. It would seem that the procurator could only reject such an appeal at his peril, unless in cases where delay might be followed by danger, or when there was manifestly no room for an appeal, Dig., xlix., 5, and see Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden, p. 252, and Blass, in loco.—Κ. ἐπικ.: no question, W.H., R.V., Weiss (as in A.V.); "asynd. rhetoricum cum anaphora," Blass, cf. 1 Cor. vii. 18, 21, 27. Hort (not Westcott) says the authority for -αμενοι is absolutely overwhelming, and as a matter of transmission -ομενοι can be only a correction. But he adds that it is difficult to remain satisfied that there is no prior corruption of some kind. Blass, Gram., p. 193, rejects -αμενοι as impossible, and reads, -ομενοι, so Hilg. Wendt (1899), p. 386 strongly supports -αμενοι, and explains the aor. part. after the anal. of i. 24, x. 13, xiii. 27.

announced were not meant to frighten Paul, as Bengel supposed, but at the same time they may have been uttered, if not with a sneer, yet with the implication "thou little knowest what an appeal to Cæsar means". Moreover, Festus must have seen that the appeal was based upon the prisoner's mistrust of his character, for only if the accused could not trust the impartiality of the governor had he any interest in claiming the transference of his trial to Rome.

Ver. 13. Ἀγρ. ὁ βασιλεὺς: this was Herod Agrippa II., son of Agrippa I., whose tragic end is recorded in chap. xii. At the time of his father's death he was only seventeen, and for a time he lived in retirement, as Claudius was persuaded not to entrust him with the kingdom of Judæa. But on the death of Herod, king of Chalcis, A.D. 48, Claudius not only gave the young Agrippa the vacant throne, A.D. 50, but transferred to him the government of the Temple, and the right of appointing the high priest. His opinion on religious questions would therefore be much desired by Festus. Subsequently he obtained the old tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, and the title of king was bestowed upon him. We have thus a proof of St. Luke's accuracy in that he calls him βασιλεύς, cf. xxvi. 27, but not king of Judæa, although he was the last Jewish king in Palestine. Bernice and Drusilla were his sisters. He offended the Jews not only by building his palace so as to overlook the Temple, but also by his constant changes in the priesthood. In the Jewish war he took part with the Romans, by whom at its close he was confirmed in the government of his kingdom, and received considerable additions to it. When Titus, after the fall of Jerusalem, celebrated his visit to Cæsarea Philippi—Herod's capital, called by him Neronias in honour of Nero—by magnificent games and shows, it would seem that Agrippa must have been present; and if so, he doubtless joined as a Roman in the rejoicings over the fate of his people, Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie des Judentums, ii., 1, 30, "Agrippa II."; Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 191 ff., "Herod' (6), Hastings' B.D., Farrar, The Herods, p. 193 ff. (1898).—Βερνίκη (Βερεν. = Macedonian form of Φερενίκη, see Blass, in loco, and C.I.G., 361; C.I. Att., iii., i., 556, Headlam in Hastings' B.D.): the eldest of the three daughters of Agrippa I. She was betrothed, but apparently never married, to Marcus, son of Alexander, the Alabarch of Alexandria (see Schürer for correct reading of Jos., Ant., xix., 5, 1, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 342, note). On his death at the age of thirteen she was married to her uncle, Herod of Chalcis, Jos., u.s., but after a few years she was left a widow, and lived in the house of her brother Agrippa II. In order to allay the worst suspicions which were current as to this intimacy, she married Polemon, king of Cilicia, Ant., xx., 7, 3 (Juv., Sat., vi., 156 ff.), but she soon left him and resumed the intimacy with her brother. Like Agrippa she showed openly at least a certain deference for the Jewish religion, and on one occasion, says Schürer, u.s., p. 197, we find even her, a bigot as well as a wanton, a Nazirite in Jerusalem, B.J., ii., 15, 1. This was in A.D. 66, and she endeavoured while in the capital to stay the terrible massacre of Florus—"the one redeeming feature of her career," B.D.². But later on, exasperated by the Jewish populace who burnt her palace, she became, like her brother, a partisan of the Romans, and in turn the mistress of Vespasian and of Titus, Tac., Hist., ii., 81; Suet., Tit., 7; Jos., B.J., ii., 17, 6. speaks of Drusilla as a worthy sister of Bernice: he might have said the same of the other sister, Mariamne, since she too left her husband for the wealth of Demetrius, the Jewish Alabarch of Alexandria, Jos., Ant., xx., 7, 3.—ἀσπασόμενοι, see critical note. No doubt an official visit of congratulation paid by Agrippa as a Roman vassal upon the procurator's entry on his office. The future participle makes the sense quite easy, but if we read the aorist it looks as if Agrippa and Bernice had previously saluted Felix, and afterwards came to his official residence, Cæsarea. Rendall includes in κατήντησαν not only the notion of arrival but also of settling down for a stay short or long: "came to stay at Cæsarea and saluted Felix" (aorist), but see Simcox, *Language of the N. Ver. 19. ζητήματα . . . τινα: plural contemptuously (Weiss). — δεισιδαιμονίας, see on xvii. 22, "religion," R.V.: in addressing a Jewish king Felix would not have used the term offensively, especially when we consider the official relation of Agrippa to the Jewish religion (see above, ver. 13), but he may well have chosen the word because it was a neutral word (verbum μέσον, Bengel) and did not commit him to anything definite.—περί τινος Ἰ.: we note again the almost contemptuous, or at least indifferent, tone of Festus. At the same time this and the similar passage xviii. 15 are proofs of the candour of St. Luke in quoting testimonies of this kind from men of rank: in this "aristocratic ignorance of the Roman" Zeller sees a trait taken from life, so in Agrippa's answer to Paul's urgency, xxvi. 28. Festus does not even deign to mention the kind of death (but he accepts the fact of the death as certain); "crucem aut nescivit, aut non curavit," Bengel; see further Luckock, Footsteps of the Apostles as traced by St. Luke, ii., p. 269.—ἔφασκεν: with the notion of groundless affirmation, "alleging"; see Page, in loco, and Meyer on Rom. i. 22 (Rev. ii. 2). Blass and Knabenbauer take it as = dictitabat.

Ἰησοῦ τεθνηκότος, ὃν ἔφασκεν ὁ Παῦλος ζῆν. 20. ἀπορούμενος δὲ ἐγὼ[1] εἰς τὴν περὶ τούτου ζήτησιν, ἔλεγον, εἰ βούλοιτο πορεύεσθαι εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, κἀκεῖ κρίνεσθαι περὶ τούτων. 21. τοῦ δὲ Παύλου ἐπικαλεσαμένου τηρηθῆναι αὐτὸν εἰς τὴν τοῦ Σεβαστοῦ διάγνωσιν, ἐκέλευσα τηρεῖσθαι αὐτόν, ἕως οὗ[2] πέμψω αὐτὸν πρὸς Καίσαρα.

[1] εις om. ℵABHP, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, but retained by Blass, Hilgenfeld. Although απορ. not elsewhere in N.T. with simple acc., but as this is good Greek no need to read the prep. For τουτου ℵABCEL read τουτων, so Tisch. and authorities above, so Blass, but brackets περι τουτων at end of verse.

Ver. 20. ἀπορούμενος δὲ: "being perplexed how to inquire concerning," R.V., omitting εἰς, the verb ἀπορ. talking a direct accusative. See above on ii. 12. Festus might have truly said that he was perplexed, as he still was, concerning Paul, and it is possible that the positive motive assigned for his action in ver. 9 was an honest attempt on his part to get more definite information at Jerusalem than he would obtain in Cæsarea—but we know how St. Paul viewed his question. On the other hand he may have wished to conceal his real motive (Weiss).

Ver. 21. ἐπικ. τηρηθῆναι αὐτὸν: on the construction after words of request or command of the infinitive passive see Simcox, Language of the N. T., p. 121, and also Blass, Gram., p. 222.—εἰς τὴν τοῦ Σεβαστοῦ διάγνωσιν: "for the decision of the Emperor," R.V., "the Augustus," margin; cf. xxiv. 22, and for the noun Wisd. iii. 18.—Σεβ.: here and in ver. 25 rendered "Emperor," R.V.—the title Augustus, A.V., might lead to confusion. The Cæsar Augustus in Luke ii. 1 was Octavian, upon whom the title of Augustus was first conferred, Suet., Aug., 7, B.C. 27. The title was inherited by his successors, and thus it is ascribed to Nero here and in ver. 25. The divine sacredness which the title seemed to confer (cf. its Greek form, and the remark of Dio Cassius, liii., 16, 18, that Augustus took the title as being himself something more than human) excited the scruples of Tiberius, but succeeding emperors appear to have adopted it without hesitation.—πέμψω, see critical notes; the reading ἀναπέμψω would mean, literally, "till I should send him up," i.e., to a higher authority, cf. Luke xxiii. 7, where it is used of "referring" to another jurisdiction, and in vv. 11, 15, of "sending back" (Philem. ver. 12); see Plummer's note. For the use of this word in its technical sense of sending to a higher authority (as it is used in Plut., Phil., Jos., Polyb.) see further instances from inscriptions, Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, ii., 56. The verb is only used by Luke and Paul.—Καίσαρα: in N.T. the name is always official, never personal. It was first assumed as an official title by Octavius, the nephew of Julius Cæsar (see above), who doubtless took it on account of the fame of his uncle, and as a name not likely to be hated and despised by the Romans like that of "king". After the death of Gaius Cæsar, the last of the Julian stock,

22. Ἀγρίππας δὲ πρὸς τὸν Φῆστον[1] ἔφη, Ἐβουλόμην καὶ αὐτὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἀκοῦσαι. ὁ δέ, Αὔριον, φησίν, ἀκούσῃ αὐτοῦ.

23. Τῇ οὖν ἐπαύριον ἐλθόντος τοῦ Ἀγρίππα καὶ τῆς Βερνίκης μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, καὶ εἰσελθόντων εἰς τὸ ἀκροατήριον, σύν τε τοῖς χιλιάρχοις καὶ ἀνδράσι[2] τοῖς κατ᾽ ἐξοχὴν οὖσι τῆς πόλεως,

[1] εφη om. ℵAB 13, so Tisch. and other authorities as in ver. 21, except Hilg. ο δε om. ℵAB, Vulg., Boh., so Tisch. and other authorities as above.

[2] For τοις . . . πολεως Syr. H. mg. reads qui descendissent de provincia; in β text Blass adds the words after πολεως (και). τοις om. before χιλ., so ℵABCE, so Tisch. and other authorities as above.

it was adopted by Claudius and by succeeding emperors, Tac., Hist., ii., 80, until the third century, when the title Augustus was reserved for the supreme ruler, and that of Cæsar was adopted for those who shared his government as his possible heirs, as earlier still it had been conferred upon the heir presumptive: "Cæsar," Hastings' B.D. and B.D.².

Ver. 22. ἐβουλόμην καὶ αὐτὸς: "I also was wishing to hear the man myself," R.V., margin, imperfect, as of a wish entertained for some time; it was probable from Agrippa's position, and his official relationship to Judaism, that he would have been already interested in Paul. Bethge takes it as if it meant that a strong desire had been already awakened by the governor's statement to hear Paul, see also Winer-Moulton, xli. a, 2; but it is most usual to explain the imperfect here (without ἄν) rather than the direct present as used out of politeness, softening the request, "I should like," Burton, p. 16, Page, in loco; Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision, etc., p. 16. Calvin strangely takes the imperfect to mean that Agrippa had long cherished the wish to hear Paul, but had checked it hitherto, lest he should seem to have come with any other motive than to see Festus.—αὔριον: emphatic (and emphasised by φησίν), indicating the immediate compliance with Agrippa's wish.

Ver. 23. φαντασίας, Polyb., xv., 25, 15, etc.; Diod. Sic., xii., 83, and instances in Wetstein, cf. Herod., vii., 10. φαντάζεσθαι (Page); "in eadem urbe, in qua pater ipsorum a vermibus corrosus ob superbiam perierat" (Wetstein). The word here in the description may point to the presence of an eyewitness (Plumptre).—τὸ ἀκροατήριον: auditorium, but the article need not be pressed, as here the word may simply imply the chamber used on this occasion; it would scarcely have been the place of formal trial, as this was not in question.—χιλιάρχοις: there were five cohorts stationed at Cæsarea, Jos., B.J., iii., 4, 2, but see the remarks of Belser, Beiträge, pp. 138-140.—ἀνδράσι τοῖς κατ᾽ ἐξοχὴν: evidently from the context to be regarded as heathen. Both Jew and heathen in Cæsarea had equal civil rights, and had to conduct the public affairs in common; the expression here used does not mean that Jews were excluded from the government, although it is quite in accordance with the fact of the preponderating Gentile element mentioned by Josephus, B.J., iii., 9, 1; Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. i., p. 86, note, E.T.—κατ᾽ ἐξοχήν: here only in N.T., not in classical Greek in this sense; primarily of any prominence, cf. LXX, Job xxxix. 28, ἐξόχως, 3 Macc. v. 31; cf. for its meaning here Cic., Ad Att., iv., 15, 7, in classical Greek ἔξοχος; for the phrase, Winer-Moulton, li., 2, g.

Ver. 24. βασιλεῦ, see above on p. 495.—συμπαρόντες: only here in N.T., cf. Wisd. ix. 10, Tobit xii. 12 AB.—πᾶν τὸ πλ.: the statement is not in the least inconsistent with vv. 2, 7, 15. In Jerusalem at all events it is easily intelligible that a noisy crowd would second the actual accusers, cf. xvii. 5, 6, while in connection with Cæsarea we know from the latter years of the government of Felix how bitter the Jews were against the Gentiles, and how natural it would be for them to oppose the Apostle of the Gentiles, Jos., B. J., ii., 13, 7; Ant., xx., 8, 7.—ἐνέτυχόν μοι: "made suit to me," R.V., Wisd. viii. 20, 3 Macc. vi. 37, so in Plut., Pomp., 55, cf. Polyc., Martyr., xvii., 2, with dative only; it is used also of those making complaint before some authority, 1 Macc. viii. 32, x. 61, xi. 35, 2 Macc. iv. 36, see Westcott on Heb. vii. 25. The verb with the exception of Heb. vii. 25 and text is only found in καὶ κελεύσαντος τοῦ Φήστου, ἤχθη ὁ Παῦλος. 24. καί φησιν ὁ Φῆστος, Ἀγρίππα βασιλεῦ, καὶ πάντες οἱ συμπαρόντες ἡμῖν ἄνδρες, θεωρεῖτε τοῦτον, περὶ οὗ πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος τῶν Ἰουδαίων [1] ἐνέτυχόν μοι ἔν τε Ἱεροσολύμοις καὶ ἐνθάδε, ἐπιβοῶντες μὴ δεῖν ζῆν αὐτὸν μηκέτι. 25. ἐγὼ δὲ [2] καταλαβόμενος μηδὲν ἄξιον θανάτου αὐτὸν πεπραχέναι, καὶ [3] αὐτοῦ δὲ τούτου ἐπικαλεσαμένου τὸν Σεβαστόν, ἔκρινα πέμπειν αὐτόν. 26. περὶ οὗ ἀσφαλές [4] τι γράψαι τῷ κυρίῳ οὐκ ἔχω· διὰ προήγαγον αὐτὸν ἐφ᾽ ὑμῶν, καὶ μάλιστα ἐπὶ σοῦ, βασιλεῦ Ἀγρίππα, ὅπως τῆς ἀνακρίσεως γενομένης σχῶ τι γράψαι. 27. ἄλογον γάρ μοι δοκεῖ, πέμποντα δέσμιον, μὴ καὶ τὰς κατ᾽ αὐτοῦ αἰτίας σημᾶναι.

[1] ενετυχον ℵCAEHLP, Tisch., W.H. marg., Weiss, but in text W.H. read ενετυχεν (so Blass in β text), with B.H. 40, 105. For επιβοωντες ℵAB 61, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt read βοωντες. After ενετυχον μοι Blass in β text omits τε and και ενθαδε (retained by Hilgenfeld) with Cod. Dublin, Berger, and proceeds with the same Codex, and Vers. Bohem. (Tisch.), and especially with Syr. H. mg. to reconstruct the text in β (see also Hilgenfeld's reconstruction). οπως παραδω αυτον εις θανατον. (εν) ακατηγορητον δε ουκ ηδυναμην παραδουναι αυτον δια τας εντολας ας εχομεν παρα του Σεβαστου. εαν δε τις αυτου κατηγορειν θελη, ελεγον ακολουθειν μοι εις Καισαρειαν, ου φυλασσεται. ελθοντες δε εβοησαν αιρεισθαι αυτον. ακουσας δε αμφοτερων κατελαβομην εν μηδενι αυτον ενοχον θανατου ειναι. λεγοντος δε μου· θελεις κρινεσθαι μετ' αυτων εν Ιεροσολυμοις; Καισαρα επεκαλεσατο. Belser sees in this, as compared with the shortened form in α, a weighty confirmation of Blass's theory, p. 140, and cf. Blass, Philology of the Gospels, p. 150.

[2] For καταλαβ. ℵcABCE 40, 61, 68, Vulg., Boh., Syr. P., read κατελαβομην; so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt, R.V., Hilg.

[3] και before αυτου om. ℵABCE 13, 40, 68, Vulg., Boh., and other authorities as above.

[4] For τι γραψαι ℵABC 5, Syr. H., Tisch., and other authorities above; so Blass, τι γραψω, but Hilg., γραψαι.

Rom. viii. 27, 34, xi. 2, in each place of making supplication to God. For its use cf. ἔντευξις and ἐντυχία, of making request to one in authority, cf. Deissmann, Bibelstudien, i., pp. 117, 118, 143, 144, e.g., the frequent formula on the papyri, ἔντευξις εἰς τὸ τοῦ βασιλέως ὄνομα. Clemen regards the whole speech of Festus to Agrippa, vv. 24-27, as an interpolation on account of the repetition of ver. 21 in ver. 25, and of the contradiction supposed to exist between vv. 27 and 19. But Jüngst differs from him with regard to the latter point, and although admitting the hand of a reviser freely in the first speech, and also in vv. 14-21, he hesitates to define the revision too exactly in the latter speech.

Ver. 25. καταλαβόμενος, cf. iv. 13 and x. 34; Ephes. iii. 18.—τὸν Σ.: "sanctius hoc nomen erat quam Cæsar," Blass.—αὐτοῦ δὲ τούτου, cf. xxiv. 15, Thuc., vi., 33 (Wetstein).

Ver. 26. ἀσφαλές τι γράψαι, Dig., xlix., 6. "Post appellationem interpositam litteræ dandæ sunt ab eo, a quo appellatum est, ad eum qui de appellatione cogniturus est, sive principem, sive quem alium, quas litt. dimissorias sive Apostolos appellant" (Wetstein and Blass).—τῷ κυρίῳ: title refused by Augustus and Tiberius because it savoured too much of the relationship between a master and a slave, and perhaps because it seemed a title more fitting to God (as Wetstein explains it), cf. Suet., Aug., 53, Tiber., 27, and Tacitus, Ann., ii., 87. It was accepted by Caligula and succeeding emperors (cf. Pliny's Letter to Trajan with the frequent Dominus), although Alexander Severus forbade it to be applied to him; for other instances, and instances on inscriptions, see Wetstein, in loco, Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, 44, and Bibelstudien, 77, 78, and Tert., Apol., 34, Polyc., Martyr., viii., 2, ix. 2, who refused to utter it with reference to Cæsar. For the due significance of the word in St. Luke, who uses it more fre-

XXVI. 1. ʼΑΓΡΙΠΠΑΣ δὲ πρὸς τὸν Παῦλον ἔφη, Ἐπιτρέπεταί σοι ὑπὲρ[1] σεαυτοῦ λέγειν. τότε ὁ Παῦλος[2] ἀπελογεῖτο, ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα, 2. Περὶ πάντων ὧν ἐγκαλοῦμαι ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων, βασιλεῦ Ἀγρίππα, ἥγημαι ἐμαυτὸν μακάριον[3] μέλλων ἀπολογεῖσθαι ἐπὶ σοῦ σήμερον, 3. μάλιστα γνώστην ὄντα σε πάντων τῶν κατὰ Ἰουδαίους ἐθῶν τε καὶ ζητημάτων[4]· διὸ δέομαί σου μακροθύμως ἀκοῦσαί μου.

[1] υπερ, so BLP, W.H., Weiss, but W.H. marg. have περι, so Tisch., Wendt undecided, but apparently preferring περι.

[2] After Παυλος Blass in β adds θαρρων και εν τῳ αγιῳ πνευματι παρακλησιν λαβων with Syr., Harcl., mg.

[3] R.V. reads επι σου μελλων σημερον απολογεισθαι, with ℵABC, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Blass.

[4] After ζητηματων ℵcAC add επισταμενος, so Blass and Hilgenfeld to avoid the anacoluthon; for the same purpose after οντα σε, 6, 29, 31, insert ειδως, but neither part. is retained by W.H., R.V., Wendt, Weiss.

quently of Christ than the other Evangelists, see especially Wetstein, in loco.—ἀνακρίσεως: here not in its strictly legal and judicial sense of a preliminary inquiry, but an inquiry into the case, cf. ver. 22 (iv. 9), with a view to sending a report to the emperor as judge, Renan, Saint Paul, p. 544, and Zöckler, in loco. Festus knew what the charges were, but not their significance, and he hoped to obtain some definite information from Agrippa or Paul—he wanted something ἀσφαλές; Paul had contradicted the charge of treason, and what was left, ver. 19, seemed full of obscurity and absurdity.

Ver. 27. ἄλογον, cf. Thuc., vi., 85, Xen., Ages., xi., 1 (elsewhere in N.T., 2 Pet. ii. 12, Jude ver. 10, cf. Wisd. xi. 15, 16, 3 Macc. v. 40 (A om.), 4 Macc. xiv. 14, 18). It would seem from the verse that the procurator was not bound to send the litteræ dimissoriæ (O. Holtzmann).—πέμποντα: for construction cf. Heb. ii. 10, or the expression may be quite general "that any one sending," etc.—σημᾶναι: here per litteras significare, as in classical Greek (Wetstein). This decisive turn given to events by Paul's appeal is regarded by Weizsäcker (Apostolic Age, ii., 124, E.T.) as the most certain event in the whole history of the case; Paul as a prisoner could only be taken to Rome if he was to be brought before the emperor's court, and this had to be done if he invoked such intervention. On Zeller's and Weizsäcker's attempt to see in the appearance of Paul before Agrippa a mere repetition of the episode of our Lord before Annas cf. Spitta's reply, Apostelgeschichte, p. 281.

CHAPTER XXVI.—Ver. 1. ἐπιτρέπεται, Burton, p. 9, on "the aoristic present". Agrippa as a king and as a guest presides; and Paul addresses himself specially to him, cf. vv. 2, 7, 13, 19, 27; cf. xxviii. 16, 1 Cor. xiv. 34, for the passive with infinitive, and for other instances of the word in the same sense as here xxi. 39, 40, xxvii. 3; the verb is similarly used in all of the Gospels (three times in Luke), and in 1 Cor. xvi. 7, 1 Tim. ii. 12, Heb. vi. 3.—ἐκτείνας: not the same as in xii. 17, xiii. 16; here not to ensure silence, but gestus est oratorius, cf. ver. 29. — ἀπελογεῖτο, see above, xxiv. 10, although not formally on trial, the word shows that the Apostle was defending himself.

Ver. 2. ἐπὶ σοῦ, cf. xxiv. 19.—ἐγκαλοῦμαι, see on xix. 38.—ὑπὸ Ἰουδ.: "by Jews" simply (cf. xxv. 10), and therefore he is glad to address one acquainted with Jewish customs, but see on ver. 4.—ἥγημαι ἐμαυτὸν μακ.: only here by Luke in this sense, but frequently so used by St. Paul in his Epistles eleven times, cf., e.g., Phil. iii. 7, 1 Tim. vi. 1. St. Paul too commences with a "captatio benevolentiæ," "sed absque adulatione," Blass: "and yet had he been conscious of guilt, he should have feared being tried in the presence of one who knew all the facts; but this is a mark of a clear conscience, not to shrink from a judge who has an accurate knowledge of the circumstances, but even to rejoice and to call himself happy," Chrys., Hom., lii.

Ver. 3. μάλιστα: (1) "especially because thou art expert," R.V. (so Blass, Felten, Weiss), or (2) "because thou art specially expert," margin, R.V. (so Wendt, Rendall, Bethge, Zöckler). See critical notes, and for construction Winer-Moulton, lxiii., 2, a, and xxxii. 7, Wendt (1899), p. 389.—γνώστην ὄντα: an anacoluthon, as if an accusative had been previously used, πρός σε . . . ἀπολ., cf. xxii. 1. Zöckler takes it as an accusative absolute, following A. Buttmann (see Winer-Moulton., u. s.), but no clear example (cf. Ephes. i. 18, and Hackett's note, in loco).—γνώστην, cf. Susannah, ver. 42 (Theod., not LXX), with genitive as here.—ἐθῶν τε καὶ ζητ.: "consuetudinum in practicis, quæstionum in theoreticis," Bengel, on ver. 32 see above, xxv. 19.—μακροθύμως, only here in N.T., but μακροθυμία frequent in St. Paul's Epistles (cf. Ecclus. v. 11).

4. τὴν μὲν οὖν βίωσίν μου[1] τὴν ἐκ νεότητος, τὴν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς γενομένην ἐν τῷ ἔθνει μου ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις, ἴσασι πάντες οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, 5. προγινώσκοντές με ἄνωθεν, (ἐὰν θέλωσι μαρτυρεῖν,) ὅτι κατὰ τὴν ἀκριβεστάτην αἵρεσιν τῆς ἡμετέρας[2] θρησκείας ἔζησα Φαρισαῖος·

[2] θρησκειας, so W.H., Weiss, Blass, Hilg., with ABHLP; Tisch. with ℵCE read θρησκιας, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 44.

Ver. 4. μὲν οὖν: with no formal antithesis, but as marking the opposition between his present and former mode of life, a contrast dropped for the moment, and resumed again in ver. 9; see Rendall, Appendix on μέν οὖν, but also Page, in loco, and notes below on ver. 9.—βίωσιν: vivendi et agendi ratio, Grimm; cf. the same word used in the description of a life very similar to that of Paul before he became a Christian, Ecclus., Prol., 12, διὰ τῆς ἐννόμου βιώσεως (Symm., Ps. xxviii. (xxxix.) 6).—νεότητος, 1 Tim. iv. 12, only elsewhere in N.T. in Luke xviii. 21, and in parallel passage, Mark x. 20, in LXX Gen. xliii. 33, Job xxxi. 18, etc. From its use with reference to Timothy it is evident that the word did not imply the earliest years of life, and although Paul may probably have removed to Jerusalem at an early age, the context does not require a reference to the years he had lived before his removal.—τὴν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς γεν.: explanatory of preceding,—the commencement of his training, which was not only amongst his own nation, but also specially τε, at Jerusalem, cf. xxii. 3. The Apostle presses the point to show that he was most unlikely to act in violation of Jewish feeling—he is still a Jew.—ἴσασι: only here in N.T., perhaps a conscious classicism, Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 33; on the classical forms in this speech see Blass, Proleg., p. 14, and Gram., p. 49, and especially p. 5, Philology of the Gospels, p. 9. These literary forms are what we should have expected the Apostle to employ before an audience so distinguished.—Ἰουδαῖοι: Blass gives a further reason for the omission of article, "abest ut 2, 3, 7, 21, sec. usum Atticorum, cf. xvii. 21".

Ver. 5. προγιν. με: knowing me beforehand, i.e., ἄνωθεν, from the beginning of my public education in Jerusalem. προγ.: twice elsewhere by Paul, Rom. viii. 29, xi. 2, also in 1 Pet. i. 20, 2 Pet. iii. 17. For ἀπ' ἀρχῆς and ἄνωθεν cf. Luke i. 2, 3, and for the former also 2 Thess. ii. 13.—ἀκριβ.: "the straitest sect," R.V., on the double accusative in A.V. see Humphry, Commentary on R.V. For this classical form, the only instance of a superlative in -τατος in N.T., see especially Blass, u. s., cf. ver. 4; on the term in its close connection with Pharisaism cf. Jos., B.J., i., 5, 2; Ant., xvii., 2, 4, and references above on xxii. 3. Their "straitness" included not only observance and interpretation of the Mosaic law, but also of the whole παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων.—αἵρεσιν, see on v. 17, the word in the sense of "a sect" was rightly applied to the exclusiveness of Pharisaism as in the N.T., cf. xv. 5, and in Jos., cf. Vita, 38.—θρησκείας: "cultus religionis, potissimum externus," Grimm, so here and in the other places where it occurs in N.T., Col. ii. 18, James i. 26, 27; twice in Wisdom, xiv. 18, 27, of the worship of idols; in Ecclus. xxii. 5 the reading is doubtful; in 4 Macc. v. 6, 13, of the religion of the Jews. The instances of its use both in Philo and Josephus show that it was plainly distinguished from εὐσέβεια and ὁσιότης. Thus it is contrasted with the latter by Philo, Quod det. potiori insid., c. 7: θρησκείαν ἀντὶ ὁσιότητος ἡγούμενος; and in Josephus it is frequently used of the public worship of God, worship in its external aspect, cf. Ant., ix., 13, 3; xii., 5, 4; v., 10, 1; xii., 6, 2. It was therefore a very natural word for St. Paul to use, and it is not necessary to suppose that he did so merely for the sake of Festus and the Romans (Blass), although the word was used of one mode of worship when contrasted with another; see further Hatch, Essays in B.G., p. 55; Trench, Synonyms, i., p. 200, and Mayor on James i. 26.—Φαρισαῖος: emphatic at the end, expressing the "straitest sect" by name, cf. Gal. i. 14, Phil. iii. 5, 6.

6 καὶ νῦν ἐπ' ἐλπίδι τῆς[1] πρὸς τοὺς πατέρας ἐπαγγελίας γενομένης ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἕστηκα κρινόμενος, 7. εἰς ἣν τὸ δωδεκάφυλον ἡμῶν ἐν ἐκτενείᾳ νύκτα καὶ ἡμέραν λατρεῦον ἐλπίζει[2] καταντῆσαι· περὶ ἧς ἐλπίδος ἐγκαλοῦμαι, βασιλεῦ Ἀγρίππα, ὑπὸ τῶν Ἰουδαίων. 8. τί;

[1] For προς ℵABE have εις; so Tisch., W.H., Blass, R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Hilgenfeld; for T.R., cf. xiii. 32. After πατερας ℵABCE 61, Vulg., Syr. P.H., Boh. add ημων, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Hilg., but Blass brackets.

[2] For καταντησαι B has καταντησειν, so W.H. marg., Weiss, βασ. at end of verse ℵBCEI, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. After υπο, των is omitted by ℵABCEHLP, so by Tisch and other authorities above.

Ver. 6. καὶ νῦν: the expression does not indicate any contrast with ver. 4: this hope for which he stands to be judged is in full accord with his whole past life.—ἐπ' ἐλπίδι: phrase only found elsewhere in St. Paul's Epistles, where it is frequent; Rom. viii. 20, 1 Cor. ix. 10, Tit. i. 2. A hope not merely of the resurrection of the dead, but of the Messiah's kingdom with which the resurrection was connected, as the context points to the national hope of Israel; cf. Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 175, E.T., see also pp. 137, 148, 149, and Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i., pp. 75, 79, on the strong bond of the common hope of Israel.—πρὸς τοὺς πατέρας, see critical note. With either preposition we have a Pauline expression; on the force of εἰς see Alford and Weiss, in loco. If we read ἡμῶν after πατ. perhaps including Agrippa with himself as a Jew.

Ver. 7. εἰς ἣν: unto which promise, not spem (Grotius, Bengel), καταντῆσαι εἰς, cf. the same construction with the same verb, Phil. iii. 11, Ephes. iv. 13, only in Luke and Paul, but never by the former elsewhere in metaphorical sense; in classical Greek after verbs of hoping we should have had a future, but in N.T. generally aorist infinitive, Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 154 (1893).—τὸ δωδεκάφυλον: here only in biblical Greek; perhaps used after the mention of the fathers, as the heads of the tribes; for the word cf. Prot. Jac., i., 3, Clem. Rom., Cor., lv., 6 (cf. xxxi. 4), and Orac. Syb., λαὸς ὁ δωδεκάφυλος; the expression was full of hope, and pointed to a national reunion under the Messiah; for the intensity of this hope, and of the restoration of the tribes of Israel, see on iii. 21 (p. 115), and references in ver. 6, Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 67, and especially Psalms of Solomon, xviii., 28, 30, 50.—ἐν ἐκτενείᾳ, cf. xii. 5, 2 Macc. xiv. 38, 3 Macc. vi. 41, Jud. iv. 9 (twice?); Cic., Ad Att., x., 17, 1. See Hatch, u. s., p. 12.—νύκτα καὶ ἡμέραν, cf. xx. 31, also used by Paul; elsewhere in his Epistles five times, and once in Mark v. in genitive, 1 Thess. ii. 9, iii. 10; 2 Thess. iii. 8; 1 Tim. v. 5; 2 Tim. i. 3; Mark v. 5. The precise phrase in the accusative also occurs in Luke ii. 37, Mark iv. 25.—λατρεῦον, cf. Luke ii. 37, joined with νύκτα καὶ ἡμ. as here, and in both places of the earnest prayer for the Messiah's coming; same phrase elsewhere in N.T. only in Rev. vii. 15. For the force of the expression here and its relation to the Temple worship see Blass, in loco, and Schürer, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 174, E.T.—ὑπὸ Ἰουδ.: by Jews, O King! Agrippa knew that this hope, nowever misdirected, was the hope of every Israelite, and the Apostle lays stress upon the strange fact that Jews should thus persecute one who identified himself with their deepest and most enduring hopes.

Ver. 8. R.V. gives more clearly the significance of the original, "Why is it judged incredible with you, if God (as He does) raises the dead?" εἰ with indicative assumes that the hypothesis is true, Vulgate "si Deus mortuos suscitat?" cf. Luke xvi. 31. It has sometimes been thought that St. Paul ἄπιστον κρίνεται παρ' ὑμῖν, εἰ ὁ Θεὸς νεκροὺς ἐγείρει; 9. ἐγὼ μὲν οὖν ἔδοξα ἐμαυτῷ πρὸς τὸ ὄνομα Ἰησοῦ τοῦ Ναζωραίου δεῖν πολλὰ ἐναντία πρᾶξαι· 10. ὃ καὶ ἐποίησα ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις, καὶ πολλοὺς τῶν ἁγίων ἐγὼ φυλακαῖς κατέκλεισα, τὴν παρὰ τῶν ἀρχιερέων

here makes a special appeal to the Sadducean part of his audience—παρ' ὑμῖν—including among them Agrippa, with his indifference and practical Sadduceism (Alford), with his policy favouring the Sadducees in the appointment of the high priests (Felten): others have seen in the words a reference to the general resurrection with which the Apostle's Messianic belief was connected, or to cases of resurrection in the history of Israel, as, e.g., 1 Kings xvii., 2 Kings iv., as if the speaker would ask: Why is it judged a thing incredible in your judgment when you have instances before you in the sacred books accepted by Agrippa and the Jews? But it is far better to consider the words in connection with the great truth to which the whole speech was meant to lead up, ver. 23, viz., that Jesus, although crucified, had risen again, that He was at this moment a living Person, and by His resurrection had been proved to be the Messiah, the fulfiller of the hope of Israel. Zöckler regards the question as forming a kind of transition from the general hope of the Jews in a Messiah to the specific Christian hope in Jesus. —ἄπιστον: only here in Acts, twice in Luke's Gospel, but frequent in St. Paul's Epistles of those who believed not. See further Nestle, Philologica Sacra, p. 54, 1896, and Wendt, p. 391 and note (1899). Nestle proposes to place the verse as out of connection here between vv. 22 and 23, with a full stop at the end of the former; and Wendt commends this view.

Ver. 9. ἐγὼ μὲν οὖν: the words may be taken as simply resuming the narrative of the Apostle's life which he had commenced in vv. 4 and 5, the three succeeding verses forming a parenthesis, or as an answer to the question of ver. 8, the real antithesis to μὲν οὖν, ver. 9, and the narrative, vv. 9-11, being found in ver. 12 and what follows. On μὲν οὖν see Rendall, Acts, Appendix, p. 163, and also Page on ii. 41, Acts, pp. 94, 95; see also critical note above.—ἔδοξα ἐμαυτῷ: mihi ipsi videbar; so in classical Greek. If with Weiss, Wendt, Bethge we lay stress on ἐμαυ., the Apostle explains the fact that this obligation was his own wilful self-delusion. In classical Greek instead of the impersonal construction we have frequently the personal construction with the infinitive as here, cf. 2 Cor. x. 9—only in Luke and Paul, indication of literary style, Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 152 (1893).—τὸ ὄνομα Ἰ. τοῦ Ν., see on iv. 10, 12.—ἐναντία πρᾶξαι, cf. xxviii. 17, and also 1 Thess. ii. 15, Tit. ii. 8.

Ver. 10. ὃ καὶ ἐποίησα, cf. Gal. ii. 10 (Bethge, p. 272), on the distinction between πράσσειν and ποιεῖν Westcott on St. John iii. 22.—ἐγὼ: emphatic.—τῶν ἁγίων, see above ix. 13, cf. its use in ix. 32; the word aggravates St. Paul's own guilt. Agrippa too would know of pious Jews by the same designation.—ἀναιρ. τε αὐτῶν: probably pointing to more deaths, not as expressing the death of Stephen alone, cf. viii. 1, ix. 1, xxii. 4. The state of affairs which rendered the murder of St. Stephen possible in the capital would easily account for similar acts of outrage in other places, so that there is no need to suppose with Weiss that the notice here is unhistorical.—κατήνεγκα ψῆφον: "I gave my vote," R.V., the ψῆφος, literally the pebble used in voting, calculum defero sc. in urnam (Grimm), i.e., addo calculum, approbo, cf. ψῆφον φέρειν, ἐπιφ. or ἐκφ. If the phrase is taken quite literally, it is said to denote the vote of a judge, so that Paul must have been a member of the Sanhedrim, and gave his vote for the death of St. Stephen and other Christians. On the other hand the phrase is sometimes taken as simply = συνευδοκεῖν τῇ ἀναιρέσει (so amongst recent writers, Knabenbauer), xxii. 20. (C. and H. think that if not a member of the Sanhedrim at the time of Stephen's death, he was elected soon after, whilst Weiss holds that if the expression does not imply that the writer represents Paul by mistake as a member of the Sanhedrim, it can only be understood as meaning that by his testimony Paul gave a decisive weight to the verdict in condemnation of the Christians.) Certainly it seems, as Bethge urges, difficult to suppose that Paul was a member of such an august body as the Sanhedrim, not only on account of his probable age at the time of his conversion, but also because of his comparatively obscure circumstances. The Sanhedrim was an assembly of aristocrats, composed too of men of mature years and marked influence, and the question may be asked how Saul of Tarsus, who may not even have had a stated residence in the Holy City, could have found a place in the ranks of an assembly numbering the members of the high priestly families and the principal men of Judæa: see Expositor, June, 1897, and also for the bearing of the statement on the question of Paul's marriage, with Hackett's note, in loco. For the voting in the Sanhedrim see Schürer, div. ii., vol. i., p. 194. E.T. Rendall, p. 336, meets the difficulty above by referring the expression under discussion to a kind of popular vote confirming the sentence of the court against Stephen, for which he finds support in the language of the law and in the narrative of the proto-martyr's condemnation.

Ver. 11. τιμωρῶν (cf. xxii. 5), more usually in the middle voice in this sense, although the active is so used sometimes in classical Greek, Soph., O. T., 107, 140, Polyb., ii., 56, 15. For ecclesiastial censures and punishments see Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation, p. 374, cf. Matt. x. 17, xxiii. 34.—ἠνάγκαζον: "I strove to make them blaspheme," R.V., all other E.V. render "I compelled them to blaspheme," but the imperfect leaves it quite doubtful as to whether the persecutor succeeded in his attempts or not. The imperfect may thus be regarded as conative, Burton, p. 12, cf. Luke i. 59, Matt. iii. 14. Blass points out that it may have the force of repeated action (cf. ἐδίωκον), but even if so, it does not say that the compulsion was effectual, Gram., p. 186. See further Page, in loco, for the rendering of R.V., which he regards as correct. A striking parallel may be adduced from Pliny's Letter to Trajan, x., 97, where the Christians are urged to call upon the gods, to worship the emperor, and to blaspheme Christ, "quorum nihil cogi posse dicuntur qui sunt revera Christiani," cf. Polycarp, Martyr., ix., 2, 3.—βλασφημεῖν, i.e., Jesus, "maledicere Christo," Pliny, u. s., James ii. 7; cf. 1 Tim. i. 13 with this passage, and Paul's later reflections on his conduct.—ἕως καὶ εἰς τὰς ἔξω π.: "even unto foreign cities," R.V., so that other cities besides Damascus had been included in the persecution, or would have been included if Saul's attempt had been successful.—ἐδίωκον: "I set about persecuting them". The imperfect ἐδίωκ. may however denote repeated action, and may indicate that Saul had already visited other foreign cities. Weiss regards the τε as connecting the two imperfects de conatu together—the latter imperfect being regarded as a continuation of the former, in case the victims sought to save themselves by flight.—ἐμμαιν.: only in Josephus once, Ant., xvii., 6, 5, but ἐμμανής in Wisd. xiv. 23, and in classical Greek, so also ἐκμαίνεσθαι.

Ver. 12. ἐν οἷς, i.e., as I was thus engaged, inter quæ, "on which errand," R.V. margin, see xxiv. 18.—ἐπιτροπῆς, 2 Macc. xiii. 14, Polyb., iii., 15, 7, "commission," A. and R.V. "Paulus erat commissarius," Bengel, the two nouns show the fulness of the authority committed to Paul.

Ver. 13. ἡμέρας μέσης: temporal genitive, Blass, Gram., p. 107 (in classical Greek ἡμ. μεσοῦσα). The expression is perhaps stronger than in xxii. 6, in the bright full light of day.—κατὰ τὴν ὁδὸν: "on the way," and so foreboding nothing (Weiss).—βασιλεῦ: "advertitur rex ad miraculum rei," Blass, cf. ver. 7, so Weiss.—ὑπὲρ τὴν λαμπ.: here only expressly, but implied in ix. 3, xxii. 6, indicating the supernatural nature of the light; noun only here in N.T., cf. Dan. xii. 3.—περιλάμψαν: only in Luke, cf. Luke ii. 9, where the word is also used for a light from heaven; nowhere else in N.T., but the verb is found in Plutarch, τοῦ ἡλίου περιλάμψαν με φῶς καὶ τοὺς σὺν ἐμοὶ πορευομένους. 14. πάντων δὲ[1] καταπεσόντων ἡμῶν εἰς τὴν γῆν, ἤκουσα φωνὴν λαλοῦσαν πρός με, καὶ λέγουσαν τῇ Ἑβραΐδι διαλέκτῳ, Σαούλ, Σαούλ, τί με διώκεις; σκληρόν σοι πρὸς κέντρα λακτίζειν. 15. ἐγὼ δὲ εἶπον, Josephus. The fact that the light shone round about Paul and his companions is at any rate not excluded by ix. 7 or xxii. 9, as Weiss notes. It is quite in accordance with the truth of the facts that the more vivid expression should occur in Paul's own recital.

Ver. 14. See notes on ix. 7 and xxii. 7, and reading above in β.—τῇ Ἑβραΐδι διαλ.: this is intimated in ix. 4 and xxii. 7 by the form Σαούλ, but here the words are inserted because Paul was speaking in Greek, or perhaps he spoke the solemn words, indelible in his memory, as they were uttered, in Hebrew, for Agrippa (Alford). — σκληρόν σοι κ.τ.λ.: a proverb which finds expression both in Greek and in Latin literature (see instances in Wetstein): cf. Scholiast on Pind., Pyth., ii., 173: ἡ δὲ τροπὴ ἀπὸ τῶν βοῶν· τῶν γὰρ οἱ ἄτακτοι κατὰ τὴν γεωργίαν κεντριζόμενοι ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀροῦντος, λακτίζουσι τὸ κέντρον καὶ μᾶλλον πλήττονται. Cf. also Aesch., Agam., 1633 (cf. Prom., 323), Eur., Bacch., 791, and in Latin, Terence, Phorm., i., 2, 27; Plautus, Truc., iv., 2, 59; and there may have been a similar proverb current among the Hebrews. Blass, Gram., pp. 5, 6, thinks that the introduction of the proverb on this occasion before Festus and Agrippa points to the culture which Paul possessed, and which he called into requisition in addressing an educated assembly. It is not wise to press too closely a proverbial saying with regard to Saul's state of mind before his conversion; the words may simply mean to intimate to him that it was a foolish and inefficacious effort to try to persecute Jesus in His followers, an effort which would only inflict deeper wounds upon himself, an effort as idle as that described by the Psalmist, Ps. ii. 3, 4. At all events Paul's statement here must be compared with his statements elsewhere, 1 Tim. i. 13; see Witness of the Epistles, p. 389 ff., and Bethge, Die Paulinischen Reden, p. 275.

Ver. 15. Evidently the following verses contain a summary of what in the other two accounts of the Conversion is spoken to Paul by Ananias, and revealed by the Lord in a vision, cf. ix. 15, xxii. 14 (so Alford, Felten, Zöckler). This is far more satisfactory than to suppose that the two narratives in ix. and xxii. are really dependent upon xxvi., the author having employed in them an oral tradition relating to Ananias, without being at all aware that by introducing such an account he was really contradicting a point upon which Paul lays special stress, viz., the fact that he had received his apostleship neither from man nor through man, Gal. i. 1 (so Wendt (1899), p. 189, and McGiffert, pp. 120 and 355). But in the first place nothing is said as to the Apostle receiving his Apostleship from Ananias; he receives recovery of sight from him, but his call to his Apostleship commences with his call before Damascus: "epocha apostolatus Paulini cum hoc ipso conversionis articulo incipit," Bengel; and see specially Beyschlag, Studien und Kritiken, p. 220, 1864, on Gal. i. 15 (Witness of the Epistles, p. 379, 1892); and, further, the introduction and omission of Ananias are in themselves strong corroborations of the naturalness of the three accounts of the Conversion. Thus in chap. xxii., ver. 12, cf. ix. 10, "non conveniebat in hunc locum uberior de An. narratio, ix. 10 ff., sed conveniebat præconium ejus, quod non est illic" (Blass); so too it was natural and important to emphasise before a Jewish audience the description of Ananias (in ix. 10 he is simply τις μαθητής) as εὐλαβὴς κατὰ τὸν νόμον, well reported of by all the Jews, whereas in xxvi. "tota persona Ananiæ sublata est, quippe quæ non esset apta apud hos auditores" (Blass). The three narratives agree in the main facts (see notes in comment., and Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, 2nd edit., p. 216), and "the slight variations in the three accounts do not seem to be of any consequence," Ramsay, Saint Paul, p. 379, cf. also Renan, Apostles, p. 13, E.T., Salmon, Introd., p. 121. Clemen, who agrees in the main with Wendt in regarding xxvi. as the original narrative, refers chap. ix. to his Redactor Antijudaicus, and chap. xxii. to his Redactor Judaicus; he sees evidences of the hand of the former in ix., 10, 15, 17, and of the latter in xxii. 12, 14. If xxii. 17 f., and the words in ver. 15, πρὸς πάντας ἀνθρώπους, do not fit in with this theory, they are ascribed by Clemen to the later Redactor Antijudaicus; but the latter expression πρὸς π. ἀνθ. is already contained in the meaning of the original source, xxvi. 17, 20 a and c (20b belonging, according to Clemen, to the Redactor Judaicus). Space forbids any further examination of passages in the three narratives with regard to which the partition critics, Clemen and Jüngst, are again hopelessly at variance with each other, but cf. Jüngst, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 84, 87, 89, 94, and the strictures of Knabenbauer, Actus Apostolorum, p. 11 (1899). But it is strange to find that Clemen should be prepared to fall back upon the view of Baur, Paulus, ii., 13, that the narrative of Paul's blindness was derived from the spiritual blindness referred to in xxvi. 17, and that therefore this narrative is evidently older than the other accounts in ix. and xxii., which introduce a tragical blindness. As Wendt points out, there is no hint in the text that Paul's blindness was symbolical, and there is nothing to suggest the circumstantial narratives relating to Ananias in the phrase xxvi. 17, which relates not to the Apostle's own conversion, but to his power of converting others.

Ver. 16. ἀλλὰ ἀνάστηθι: "Prostravit Christus Paulum ut eum humiliaret; nunc eum erigit ac jubet bono esse animo," Calvin; for the expression cf. Ezek. ii. 1, 2.—προχειρ., cf. iii. 14, xxii. 14, ix. 15, σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς.—ὑπηρέτην καὶ μάρτυρα ὧν τε εἶδες, so like the Twelve, and cf. also αὐτόπται καὶ ὑπηρέται τοῦ λόγου, Luke i. 1; in Cor. iv. 1 St. Paul speaks of himself as ὑπηρέτης.—ὧν τε εἶδές με, see critical note, "wherein thou hast seen me," R.V., cf. 1 Cor. ix. 1, quite in harmony with the stress which the Apostle there lays upon "seeing the Lord".—ὧν τε ὀφθ. = τούτων ἅ: "and of the things wherein I will appear to thee," so A. and R.V. Cf. Acts xviii. 9, xxii. 18, 21, xxiii. 11, 2 Cor. xii. 2. ὀφθ., future passive (Grimm-Thayer), cannot be rendered "I will make thee to see," or "I will communicate to thee by vision," as if = ἐγὼ ὑποδείξω, ix. 16. For construction see Page, and Blass, in loco.

Ver. 17. ἐξαιρούμενός σε: "delivering," A. and R.V. Vulgate, eripiens, and so the word is elsewhere rendered in N.T., cf. vii. 10, 34, xii. 11, xxiii. 27, Gal. i. 4, and below, ver. 22; so very frequently in LXX (although twice in the sense below, Job xxxvi. 21, Isa. xlviii. 10). It may be called a Lucan-Pauline word (only twice elsewhere in N.T.; in St. Matt. v. 29, xviii. 9, but in an entirely different signification). Blass renders it as above, and points out that there is no reason for rendering it "choosing" in this one passage, a sense which is not at all fitted to the context; for the language cf. 1 Chron. xvi. 35, Jer. i. 8, so Wendt (1899, but in the sense below previously), Weiss, Felten, Hackett, Bethge, Knabenbauer. It is no objection to say that Paul was not delivered, but was persecuted all his life long, for he was delivered in the sense of deliverance to proclaim the message for which he was sent as an Apostle. On the other hand Overbeck, Rendall, Page, so C. and H. take it in the sense of "choosing," cf. ix. 15, σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς. Grimm-Thayer is doubtful. Rendall urges that the word cannot mean "delivering" without some phrase such as ἐκ χειρός, as common in the LXX, but cf. on the other hand LXX, Judg. x. 15, xviii. 28 A, Ps. xxx. 2, xlix. 15, Hosea v. 14, etc. But how could Paul be said to be chosen ἐξ ἐθνῶν? The phrase would certainly sound strange to him as a description of his own position. Rendall also objects that in 1 Chron. xvi. 35 the word means to gather the scattered exiles from among the heathen as the context shows, but the Hebrew verb נָצַל means to deliver, and is so rendered, l. c., in A. and R. V. It is also urged that λαός is always the name of honour, and that elsewhere the enemies of the Apostle were named Ἰουδαῖοι; but not only is the collocation "the people and the Gentiles" a common one, cf. ver. 23, Rom. xv. 10, but λαός is used of the unbelieving Jews in describing hostility to the Gospel, cf. iv. 27, xii. 4. Agrippa would understand the distinction between λαός and ἔθνη. ἐγὼ "denotat auctoritatem mittentis," Bengel.—ἀποστέλλω: Paul receives his Apostolic commission direct from Christ as much as the Twelve; Gal. i. 1, 16, 17, Rom. i. 5 (Matt. x. 16, John xx. 21-23); cf. Acts i. 25.

Ver. 18. ἀνοῖξαι ὀφθ. αὐτῶν, cf. Acts ix. 8, 40, and also Matt. ix. 30; so too Isai. xxxv. 5, xlii. 7. Both Jews and Gentiles were blinded (οὖς above, referring to both), the former because seeing they saw not, Matt. xiii. 13, Rom. xi. 8; the latter in that knowing God in His creation they glorified Him not as God, and their senseless heart was darkened, Rom. i. 21; and to both St. Paul proclaimed the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. iv. 6, Ephes. i. 18. The infinitive of purpose depending on ἀποστέλλω, Burton, p. 157; Viteau, Le Grec du N.T., p. 169 (1893).—ἐπιστρέψαι: "that they may turn," R.V. ("to turn them," margin, so A.V.); in St. Luke, who uses the verb more frequently than any other N.T. writer, it is nearly always intransitive, except in Luke i. 16, 17, Moulton and Geden, while Grimm adds ver. 20 below; so here all E.V. before the authorised, cf. Vulgate, "ut convertantur" (Humphry). If we thus take ἐπισ. as intransitive, it is subordinate to the previous infinitive of purpose, ἀνοῖξαι, and τοῦ λαβεῖν again subordinate to ἐπιστ., expressing the final result aimed at (Page, and see also Wendt's note, in loco (1899)).—ἀπὸ σκότους εἰς φῶς: throughout St. Paul's Epistles the imagery was frequent with reference not only to Gentiles but also to Jews, cf. Rom. ii. 19, xiii. 12, 1 Thess. v. 5, Ephes. v. 18, Col. i. 12. The words gain in interest here if we think of them as corresponding with the Apostle's own recovering from blindness, spiritual and physical (Plumptre).—τοῦ Σατανᾶ, Blass, Gram., pp. 32, 144; no less than ten times by St. Paul in his Epistles; cf. 2 Cor. iv. 4, Ephes. ii. 2, vi. 12 (Col. i. 13. ἐξουσία σκότους, Luke xxii. 53). There is no reason to suppose with Bengel that St. Paul is here referring to Gentiles rather than to Jews, for whilst the Jews no doubt would regard the Gentiles as loving σκότος and in the power of Satan, cf. also Luke xiii. 16, xxii. 31, Acts v. 3. For current ideas with regard to Satan and the teaching of the N.T. cf. Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii., p. 775; Charles, Book of Enoch, Introd., p. 52, and Assumption of Moses, x., 1, where Satan is apparently represented as the head of the kingdom of evil; cf. in the N.T. Ephes. i. 21, vi. 12, Col. ii. 15, for the whole hierarchy of evil spirits at the disposal of Satan, and 2 Thess. ii. 9; cf. 2 Cor. xi. 14 for his supernatural powers of deceiving or preventing men; see especially Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. 145.—τοῦ λαβεῖν: expressing the ultimate object of ἀνοῖξαι (see above, and Weiss, in loco).—ἄφεσιν ἁμαρ., iii. 16, the language here is quite Pauline, cf. Col. i. 12-14, where also deliverance out of the power of darkness and forgiveness of sins in the Son of God's love are connected as here.—τῇ πίστει εἰς ἐμέ: may be connected with λαβεῖν, faith in Christ as the condition of forgiveness placed emphatically at the end; cf. x. 43, A. and R.V. connect the words with ἡγιασμένοις, so Vulgate.—κλῆρον ἐν τοῖς ἡγιασ., cf. xx. 32, Col. i. 12.

Ver. 19. ὅθεν: "wherefore," R.V., so in Heb. ii. 17, iii. 1, vii. 25, viii. 3, ix. 18 (locally in Luke xi. 24, Acts xiv. 26, xxviii. 13); probably best taken here as πίστει τῇ εἰς ἐμέ. 19. Ὅθεν, βασιλεῦ Ἀγρίππα, οὐκ ἐγενόμην ἀπειθὴς τῇ οὐρανίῳ ὀπτασίᾳ, 20. ἀλλὰ τοῖς ἐν Δαμασκῷ πρῶτον[1] καὶ Ἱεροσολύμοις, εἰς πᾶσάν τε τὴν χώραν τῆς Ἰουδαίας, καὶ τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, ἀπήγγελλον μετανοεῖν καὶ ἐπιστρέφειν ἐπὶ τὸν Θεόν, ἄξια referring to the whole revelation from ver. 12, marking the natural result of what had gone before; not used in St. Paul's Epistles.—βασ. Ἀ.: "cum ad sua facta redeat, apte regem denuo compellat," Blass, marking the commencement of his real defence.—ἀπειθὴς: only in Luke and Paul in N.T., cf. Luke i. 17; Rom. i. 30, 2 Tim. iii. 2, Tit. i. 16, iii. 3; in LXX and in classical Greek.—ὀπτασίᾳ: here and here only Paul himself apparently speaks of the appearance of Christ vouchsafed to him before Damascus by this word, but ὀπτασία, as Beyschlag shows, is not confined to appearances which the narrators regard as visions, cf. Luke i. 22, xxiv. 23, and its meaning must be explained from the entire "objectivity" with which St. Paul invests the whole narrative of his Conversion, cf. Witness of the Epistles, p. 383 (1892), and p. 380 for further reference to Beyschlag in Studien und Kritiken, 1864, 1890, and his Leben Jesu, i., p. 435. In modern Greek ὀπτασία = a vision (Kennedy).

[1] After πρωτον ℵAB 25, 61, add τε, so Tisch. and other authorities in ver. 17, except Hilg. Before Ιερ. AE read εν. Hilg. has και τοις εν Ιερ. εις om. ℵAB, so Tisch., R.V., W.H., but retained by Weiss, Hilg. and Wendt, may easily have dropped out after the preceding -οις. Blass reads in α and β εις πασαν τε (την) χωραν Ιουδαιοις και τοις εθνεσιν, with support by Par.[2] "Judæis," see note below, and Wendt (1899), p. 396. Clemen, p. 144, regards τε και Ιερ. . . . Ιουδαιας as a gloss of R. Judaicus (ver. 21 being added by R. Antijudaicus), and both Wendt and McGiffert view the whole reference as added to the original source.

Ver. 20. ἀλλὰ τοῖς ἐν Δ.: "both to them of Damascus first, and at Jerusalem," reading τε (see critical note) after πρῶτον, thus closely connecting Damascus and Jerusalem as the scenes of Paul's first activity, cf. ix. 20, 28.—εἰς πᾶσάν τε τὴν χώραν τῆς Ἰ., see critical note. If we read accusative simply without εἰς = accusative of space marking the extension of the preaching. Blass solves the difficulty by regarding εἰς = ἐν, ut sæpe. The statement seems to contradict Gal. i. 22, and there is no mention of such a widely extended preaching at this time in Acts. It has therefore been held by some that reference is made to the preaching at the time of Saul's carrying relief with Barnabas from Antioch to Jerusalem, xi. 30, xii. 25 (Zöckler and Rendall), while others refer the passage to Rome xv. 10 (Weiss), and others combine xi. 29, 30, xv. 3 = Rom. xv. 10. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 382, regards the statement as so directly contradictory to all other authorities that he practically follows Blass in β text, and reads εἰς πᾶσαν χώραν Ἰουδαίοις τε καὶ τοῖς ἔθνεσι, "in every land to both Jews and Gentiles". The text he regards as not Lucan and hardly Greek, see also Blass, in loco; ἡ χώρα τῆς Ἰουδαίας ought to be τῶν Ἰουδ., as in x. 39, etc. But see in defence of reading in T.R. as against Blass, and the reference of the words to the journeys in xi. 30, xv. 3, Wendt, in loco (1899). The general meaning given to the words by Blass is at all events in accordance with the view of the speech as a summary, and not as an account in detail, of the Apostle's work (C. and H., p. 620). Dr. Farrar, St. Paul, i., 228, ingeniously supposes that Paul may have preached on his way from Damascus to Jerusalem in the guest chambers of the Jewish synagogues, so that he may not have come into contact with any Christian communities, and he would thus explain Gal. i. 22.—ἀπήγγελλον: imperfect, denoting continuous preaching; here only of preaching the Gospel, but cf. xvii. 30 W.H., where God announces to men everywhere to repent, μετανοεῖν, a striking similarity in language with Paul's words here (cf. 1 John i. 2, 3).—ἐπιστρέφειν, cf. for the expression xiv. 15, and see above on ver. 18.—ἄξια τῆς μετανοίας ἔργα: "worthy of their repentance," R.V. margin, i.e., of the repentance which they profess. In the Gospels καρπούς, καρπόν, here ἔργα, but cf. Ephes. ii. 10, v. 11, Col. i. 10, Tit. iii. 8, and ἀξίους with genitive rei, more frequent in St. Luke and St. Paul than in any other N.T. writers.—πράσσοντας: used in N.T. sometimes of good, sometimes of evil, actions; in τῆς μετανοίας ἔργα πράσσοντας. 21. ἕνεκα τούτων με[1] οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι συλλαβόμενοι ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ ἐπειρῶντο διαχειρίσασθαι. 22. ἐπικουρίας οὖν τυχὼν τῆς[2] παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἄχρι τῆς ἡμέρας ταύτης ἕστηκα, μαρτυρούμενος μικρῷ τε καὶ μεγάλῳ, οὐδὲν ἐκτὸς λέγων ὧν τε οἱ

[1] The art. before Ιουδ. om. ℵ*BL 13, 61, 105, so Tisch., R.V., Hilgenfeld, W.H., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, but Lach. and Meyer follow T.R. After συλλ. Tisch., Hilgenfeld, with ℵcE, Vulg. Chron. reads οντα, but the word may easily have been added to express more clearly that the temple, xxi. 30, was the place where they found Paul, not where they sought to kill him (Wendt).

[2] For παρα ℵABE, Chron. read απο, so Tisch., R.V., W.H., Hilgenfeld, Blass, Weiss, Wendt. ℵABHLP, Chrys., so Tisch. and authorities in ver. 21, read μαρτυρομενος.

classical Greek ποιεῖν is more frequent de inhonestis, cf. Xen., Mem., iii., 9, 4, see Grimm, sub v.

Ver. 21.—ἕνεκα τούτων: because I preached to Jews and Gentiles alike, proclaiming one Gospel to both, and placing both on an equality before God (not for profaning the Temple), cf. xxi. 28. On ἕνεκα see Blass, Gram., p. 21. This Attic form of the word is read here by all authorities, and Blass notes it as characteristic of the literary style of this address before Agrippa, see above on ver. 4.—συλλαβόμενοι, i. 16, xii. 3. So also in each of the Gospels in the active voice, of a violent arrest; in passive see above, xxiii. 27, and frequent in same sense in LXX, and 1 and 2 Macc.—ἐπειρῶντο: here only in N.T. in middle, but see critical note on ix. 26. Cf. 1 Macc. xii. 10, 2 Macc. x. 12, 3 Macc. i. 25, ii. 32, 4 Macc. xii. 3. Imperfect because the attempt was not actually made.—διαχειρ., see on v. 30. The whole description ranks as a summary without giving all the details of the events which led up to the Apostle's imprisonment.

Ver. 22. ἐπικουρίας . . . τῆς παρὰ (ἀπὸ) Θεοῦ: "the help that is from God," R.V., i.e., the help which cometh from God only; only here in N.T., cf. Wisdom xiii. 18 (ἐμπειρίας, S²), for the use of the same phrase cf. instances in Wetstein from Polybius; the word is found in Josephus, but also frequently in classical Greek, of succour against foes.—τυχὼν: no idea of chance, cf. 2 Tim. ii. 10; the aid was divine, not human.—οὖν, see Wendt, and references, Blass, Gram., p. 267, Winer-Moulton, liii., 10, 4.—ἕστηκα: sto salvus, Bengel, after these repeated dangers. The A.V. hardly gives the force of the word; it is a Pauline expression, cf. Ephes. vi. 13, 14, Col. iv. 12, so Knabenbauer, subsisto incolumis.—μαρτυρούμενος: "testifying," A.V., yet μαρτυρόμενος, see critical note, would rather signify "testifying," so R.V., see on vi. 3. Grimm-Thayer, if the reading in T.R. is retained, evidently considers that it should be rendered as passive, "testified to both by small and great". But μαρτυρόμενος marks most appropriately the office of bearing testimony to which Paul was appointed.—μικρῷ τε καὶ μεγάλῳ: if taken to mean "both small and great," the words would have a special force in thus being spoken before Festus and Agrippa, but if = young and old, i.e., before all men, cf. viii. 10, Heb. viii. 11; cf. Gen. xix. 4, 11, etc., but in Rev. xi. 18, xiii. 16, xix. 5, reference is made rather to rank than to age, and the latter meaning may well be included here; cf. Deut. i. 17, Job iii. 19, Wisd. vi. 7.—οὐδὲν ἐκτὸς λ. ὧν τε οἱ πρ. . . . μελλόντων = οὐδὲν ἐκτὸς τούτων ἃ . . . ἐλάλησαν μέλλοντα, cf. Rev. xvii. 8 Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 135. μελλ. γίγ., cf. Luke xxi. 36; ἐκτὸς, cf. 1 Cor. xv. 27; the word is only used by St. Paul elsewhere in N.T. (except Matt. xxiii. 26), cf. 1 Kings x. 13, 2 Chron. ix. 12, xvii. 19.—οἱ προφ. . . . καὶ M.: more naturally Moses and the prophets, Luke xvi. 29, 31, and cf. xxviii. 23, but Moses may have been mentioned to influence the Sadducean element in the audience: the historical Christ was always the subject of St. Paul's preaching "Jesus is the Christ," and the historical Christ was also the ideal Christ; cf. iii. 13, 1 Cor. xv. 3. See on this verse critical note, and Wendt (1899), p. 397, note.

Ver. 23. εἰ = Heb. vii. 15, i.e., as is most certain from the authority of Scripture, "how that the Christ," R.V.—παθητὸς: "must suffer," R.V. ("although is subject to suffering," margin), cf. Vulgate, passibilis (not patibilis); no question here of the abstract possibility of, or προφῆται ἐλάλησαν μελλόντων γενέσθαι [1] καὶ Μωσῆς, 23.[2] εἰ παθητὸς ὁ Χριστός, εἰ πρῶτος ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν φῶς μέλλει καταγγέλλειν τῷ λαῷ καὶ τοῖς ἔθνεσι. 24. Ταῦτα δὲ αὐτοῦ ἀπολογουμένου, ὁ Φῆστος μεγάλῃ τῇ φωνῇ ἔφη,[3] Μαίνῃ, Παῦλε· τὰ πολλά σε γράμματα

[1] For και Μωσης Flor. and Gig. have "scriptum est in Moysen". Blass regards this as the remaining fragment of the original β text, which ran somewhat as follows: γεγραπται γαρ εν Μωυσει και τοις προφ. πολλα περι τουτων, τοις ερευνησασιν (1 Pet. i. 11).

[2] ει παθητος κ.τ.λ., Corssen, G. C. A., 1896, p. 429, points out that Tert., De resurr. carn., 39, presupposes the reading of Flor. and Gig., and regards the passage, Gen. ix. 5, in support of bodily resurrection, as quoted by Paul. According to Corssen's view, this passage was noted in the margin of the Western text. Flor. and Gig. make Paul refer to some particular passage of the Pentateuch, instead of generally to Moses and the prophets, but in Corssen's view Blass has not helped the recovered reading, but rather destroyed its force by his conjectured additions (see further Wendt (1899), p. 397). But Blass in his β text leaves a lacuna: γεγραπται γαρ εν Μωυσει (και τοις προφηταις) . . .

capacity for, suffering, although primarily the Greek word implies this, but of the divine destination to suffering, cf. Luke xxiv. 26, 44, 1 Cor. xv. 2, 3, see Grimm-Thayer, sub v.; Justin Martyr, c. Tryph., c. 89, παθητὸν τὸν Χριστόν, ὅτι αἱ γραφαὶ κηρύσσουσι, φανερόν ἐστι. But the same dialogue, c. 90, enables us to realise that even where the idea of a suffering Messiah was entertained, nothing was more abhorrent than the idea of the cross as the outward expression of such sufferings: "If the Messiah can suffer," cries the Jew Trypho, "yet he cannot be crucified; he cannot die such a shameful, dishonourable death". See also cc. 36, 76. For the incompatibility of the idea of a suffering Messiah with the ideas current in the time of Jesus see Dalman, Der Leidende und der Sterbende Messias, p. 30, and references may be made to Witness of the Epistles, pp. 360, 361, for other authorities to the same effect; cf. Matt. xvi. 22, Luke xviii. 34, xxiv. 21, John xii. 34, 1 Cor. i. 23, Gal. v. 11; see above on iii. 18 (p. 113). If we render εἰ if or whether it does not indicate that there was any doubt in Paul's mind; but he simply states in the hypothetical form the question at issue between himself and the Jews.—εἰ πρῶτος: "that he first by the resurrection of the dead," R.V., closely connected with the preceding; the Messiah was to suffer, but "out of his resurrection from the dead" assurance was given not only that the Suffering Messiah and the Triumphant Messiah were one, but that in Him, the true Messiah, all the O.T. prophecies of the blessings of light and life, to Jew and Gentile alike, were to be fulfilled, cf. Isai. xlix. 6, Acts xiii. 47 (Isai. ix. 1, 2, lx. 1). This on the whole seems better than to limit the words to the fact that life and immortality had been brought to light by the resurrection of the Christ: φῶς means more than the blessing of immortality in the future, it means the present realisation of the light of life, cf. ver. 18, and Luke ii. 32, of a life in the light of the Lord. πρῶτος closely connected with ἐξ ἀναστ., as if = πρωτότοκος ἐκ νέκρων, Col. i. 18, 1 Cor. xv. 20, 23, or as if the Apostle would emphasise the fact that Christ first rose in the sense of rising to die no more, Rom. vi. 9, and so proclaimed light, etc.—καταγγέλλειν: "to proclaim," R.V., cf. xvi. 17, xvii. 3, 23. —λαῷ καὶ τοῖς ἔθνεσι, see above ver. 17; even in the Pharisaic hope expressed in Psalms of Solomon, xvii., cf. ver. 32, we see how far the Gentiles would necessarily be from sharing on an equality with the Jews in the Messianic kingdom, see Ryle and James, Introd., liii., and also for later literature, Apocalypse of Baruch, lxxii., Edersheim on Isaiah lx., Jesus the Messiah, ii., pp. 728, 729.

Ver. 24. ἀπολ.: the present participle, indicating that Festus broke in upon the speech, cf. iv. 1.—μεγ. τῇ φ.: raising his voice, because interrupting in surprise and astonishment, and no doubt with something of impatience if not of anger (Chrysostom). — Μαίνῃ: a hyperbolic, but not a jesting expression; the mention

εἰς μανίαν περιτρέπει. 25. ὁ δέ, Οὐ μαίνομαι, φησί, κράτιστε Φῆστε, ἀλλ' ἀληθείας καὶ σωφροσύνης ῥήματα ἀποφθέγγομαι. 26. ἐπίσταται γὰρ περὶ τούτων ὁ βασιλεύς, πρὸς ὃν καὶ[1] παῤῥησιαζόμενος λαλῶ[2]· λανθάνειν γὰρ αὐτόν τι τούτων οὐ πείθομαι οὐδέν· οὐ γάρ

[1] και after προς ον is omitted by W.H., following B, Boh., Arm., but retained by W.H. marg., Weiss, Hilg.

[2] λανθ. γαρ αυτον κ.τ.λ., Wendt decides in favour of T.R. here, with ℵHLP. In B 36, 69, 137, 180, τι is omitted, so by W.H. text, Weiss, Blass; in ℵcAE 13, ουδεν is omitted, so by Lach. ℵB read ουθεν, see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 61. Blass in β text, following Flor., reads ουδεν γαρ τουτων αυτον λανθανει, and omits ου γαρ . . . τουτο.

not only of a resurrection, but the expressed belief that this Christ Whom Festus could only describe as "one who was dead," xxv. 19, should bring light not only to Jews but even to Gentiles, to Romans like himself, was too much—such a belief could only result from a disturbed brain, cf. xvii. 32 for the effect of the announcement of a resurrection and a judgment on the polished Athenians, cf. St. John x. 20, where our Lord's words provoked a similar pronouncement by the Jews, the learned Jews of the capital. μαίνεσθαι: "qui ita loquitur ut videatur mentis non compos esse," Grimm, cf. xii. 15, 1 Cor. xiv. 23, opposite to σωφροσύνης ῥήματα ἀποφθ. (see also Page's note); cf. the passage in Wisd. v. 3, 4, and Luckock, Footsteps of the Apostles, etc., ii., p. 263.—τὰ πολλά σε γράμματα: "thy much learning," R.V., giving the force of the article perhaps even more correctly, "that great learning of thine". It is possible that the words may refer simply to the learning which Paul had just shown in his speech, of which we may have only a summary, and γράμμ. may be used of the sacred writings from which he had been quoting, and to which in his utterances he may have applied the actual word, and so Festus refers to them by the same term, cf. 2 Tim. iii. 15. Others refer the word to the many rolls which St. Paul had with him, and which he was so intent in studying. It is possible that the word may be used here as in John vii. 15, of sacred learning in general, of learning in the Rabbinical schools, and perhaps, as it is employed by a Roman, of learning in a more general sense still, although here including sacred learning = μαθήματα, cf. Plat., Apol., 26 D. If books alone had been meant βιβλία or βίβλοι would have been the word used.—περιτρέπει εἰς μανίαν: "doth turn thee to madness," R.V., cf. our English phrase "his head is turned," literally "turn thee round" (Humphry), cf. Jos., Ant., ix., 4, 4, ii., 4, 1. It is possible that Festus used the expression with a certain delicacy, since in using it he recognises how much wisdom Paul had previously shown (Weiss, Bethge). After such an expression of opinion by Festus, and owing to the deference of Agrippa to the Romans, Knabenbauer thinks that the king could not have expressed himself seriously in the words which follow in ver. 28.

Ver. 25. Οὐ μαίνομαι κ. Φ.: whatever may have been the sense in which Festus addressed Paul, there is no doubt as to the courtesy of the Apostle's answer, μετὰ ἐπιεικείας ἀποκρινόμενος, Chrys. κράτιστε: "most excellent," R.V., see above, i. 1.—ἀληθ. καὶ σωφροσ.: veritas not veracitas, objective truth; no suspicion had been raised against St. Paul's truthfulness of character (cf. John xviii. 37); as our Lord stood before Pilate as a witness for the truth, so His Apostle stands face to face with a Roman sceptic as a witness to the existence of a world of real existences and not of mere shadows and unrealities (Bethge, p. 294). σωφρ.: the opposite of madness, cf. Plato, Protag., 323 B (Xen., Mem., i., 1, 16), ὃ ἐκεῖ σωφροσύνην ἡγοῦντο εἶναι τἀληθῆ λέγειν, ἐνταῦθα μανίαν. The two nouns are only found here in St. Luke's writings, but cf. σωφρονεῖν, Luke viii. 35, Rom. xii. 3, 2 Cor. v. 13; cf. ῥήματα ζωῆς, chap. v. 20.—ἀποφθ., cf. ii. 4 and 14, of the Pentecostal utterances, and of the solemn utterances of St. Peter; "aptum verbum," Bengel. St. Paul was speaking with boldness like St. Peter, and under the same divine inspiration; in LXX of the utterances of the prophets, cf. 1 Chron. xxv. 1, of philosophers, and of oracular responses; like the Latin profari and pronuntiare, see above on ii. 4, and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.

ἐστιν ἐν γωνίᾳ πεπραγμένον τοῦτο. 27. πιστεύεις, βασιλεῦ Ἀγρίππα, τοῖς προφήταις; οἶδα ὅτι πιστεύεις. 28. ὁ δὲ Ἀγρίππας πρὸς τὸν Παῦλον ἔφη,[1] Ἐν ὀλίγῳ με πείθεις Χριστιανὸν γενέσθαι.

[1] εν ολιγῳ με πειθεις Χριστ. ποιησαι ℵB 13, 17, 40, 61, Syr. H., mg., Boh., Tisch., Weiss. Instead of πειθεις A, so Lach., Blass (Nösgen, Belser, Alford) πειθῃ, but prob. this was an attempt to solve the difficulty of the reading given above, and with the same purpose EHLP, Vulg., Syr. P. Harcl. text, Cyr.-Jer., Chrys. have γενεσθαι for ποιησαι, so Meyer and Hilg. Both Alford and Blass, while adopting πειθῃ, read ποιησαι. W.H. (and to this view apparently Wendt inclines, 1899) think that there must be some corruption in text, see App., p. 100. Hort adds that possibly πεποιθας should be read for με πειθεις, for the personal με loses no force by being left to implication, and the changes of letters are inconsiderable, but at the same time he thinks it equally possible that the error may lie elsewhere.

Ver. 26. ἐπίσταται γὰρ: here only with περί: in proof that his words were words of soberness, and that he was basing his statements on facts, St. Paul appeals to the knowledge of Agrippa, a knowledge which he would have gained from his close connection with the Jewish religion, but also to some extent perhaps from the events of his father's reign, for Herod Agrippa had beheaded James with a sword, and had cast Peter into prison: "patet hoc," says Bengel, "nam etiam Christianum nomen sciebat".—If καὶ is retained, "to whom also," i.e., because of his knowledge just mentioned.—παῤῥησιαζ.: "freely," R.V., everywhere else R.V. renders "boldly"; verb only in Luke and Paul, see on ix. 27; the Apostle spoke freely because of the king's full knowledge, but his boldness is also shown in his question to the king, and to the reply which he makes to it in the king's name, ver. 27.—λανθάνειν γὰρ αὐτόν κ.τ.λ.: if οὐδέν and τι are both retained, see critical note, τι may be taken adverbially, "in any degree," but see Winer-Moulton, lv., 9, b., and Wendt's note, in loco, p. 399 (1899).—ἐν γωνίᾳ πεπραγ., cf. Luke vii. 17, xxiii. 8. Blass notes this expression, Gram., p. 4, as a proof that Paul used more literary expressions than usual in addressing his audience, and no doubt the expression was used by classical writers, cf. Plato, Gorg., 485 D; Epict., Diss., ii., 12, 17, and other instances in Wetstein, cf. angulus, Ter., Adelph., v., 2, 10.

Ver. 27. πιστεύεις; the question and answer were quite natural as addressed to a Jewish king; it was a belief which St. Paul could justly presuppose in every Jew, even in one like Agrippa, educated amongst the Romans. The question may well have been asked as a proof that the words which had preceded were words of truth and soberness, and that the king could so regard them, even if Festus could not; if Agrippa believed the prophets—as Paul affirmed—he could not regard the fulfilment of their prophecies as irrational. Or we may view the question as taking up, after the interruption of Festus, the statement of vv. 22, 23, and as a forcible appeal to Agrippa, as to one who could judge whether in the death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth there was anything really contrary to the picture of the Messiah drawn by the Hebrew prophets. It is possible that the Apostle meant to add a second ground for the knowledge of the king; not only were these events not done in a corner, but they had been prophesied by the prophets, in whom Agrippa believed; but instead of thus stating a fact, he addresses the king with increasing urgency and emotion, as one specially interested in religious questions, ver. 3 (Zöckler, Meyer).

Ver. 28. ἐν ὀλίγῳ με πείθεις Χ. γένεσθαι, see critical note, "with but little persuasion thou wouldest fain make me a Christian," R.V. reading ποιῆσαι, and πείθεις being used de conatu (so Zockler in his 2nd edition); cf. προσήλυτον ποιεῖν, Matt. xxiii. 15. Schmiedel, Encycl. Bibl., i., 754, inclines to explain the phrase Χ. ποιῆσαι as a Latinism: Christianum agere, to play the part of a Christian. Weiss sees in the words a gentle irony, as if Agrippa would answer St. Paul's appeal to his belief in the prophets by intimating that it was not so simple a matter to become a Christian, even if one, as a Jew, believed in the prophets. Or we may regard Agrippa as rejecting, not so much in banter as in cold disdain, the enthusiasm of the orator, and adopting the tone of a certain Jewish orthodoxy (Zockler), not, i.e., the indifference of the Roman, but that of the Sadducees to the prophets. The A.V. "almost" must be abandoned, even if we retain γενέσθαι, for ἐν ὀλίγῳ cannot be so rendered, either here or elsewhere in the N.T.; παρ' ὀλίγον, or ὀλίγου or ὀλίγον δεῖ would be required as the classical expression for "almost". The best parallel is Ephes. iii. 3, ἐν ὀλίγῳ: "in a few words": so A. and R.V. (cf. 1 Pet. v. 12). But if in the next verse we read μεγάλῳ instead of πολλῷ, so R.V. (see critical note), it seems best to understand πόνῳ with ὀλίγῳ, as this noun could fitly stand with both μεγάλῳ and ὀλίγῳ = with little trouble, with little cost. The R.V. rendering of the two verses reads as if πολλῷ was retained in ver. 29, whereas μεγάλῳ is the reading adopted in R.V. text. So far as N.T. usage is concerned, ἐν ὀλίγῳ might be rendered "in a short time" (cf. James iv. 14, 1 Pet. i. 6, Rev. xvii. 10, so in classical Greek), but this rendering also is excluded by ἐν ὀλίγῳ καὶ ἐν μεγάλῳ in the next verse. Wendt maintains that ἐν ὀλίγῳ may still be rendered "almost"; the phrase is instrumental, as if expressing the thought contained in ὀλίγου δεῖ, and meaning that a little was wanted to attain the aim = almost; so St. Chrysostom, St. Cyril of Jerusalem; Luther, Beza, Grotius = propemodum. The answer of Agrippa, therefore, need not be taken ironically, as by most moderns, but in earnest (cf. ver. 32, where his favourable opinion supports this view), although Wendt acknowledges that his confession was only half-hearted, as is seen by his desire to conclude the interview (Wendt, 1888, note, p. 530, and 1899, p. 400, to the same effect, so too Schürer, Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 198, note). If we read πείθῃ, see critical note, we render "with but little thou art persuading thyself that thou canst make me a Christian," taking up πείθομαι of ver. 26. This reading is adopted by Blass and Belser, but the former takes ἐν ὀλίγῳ as meaning brevi tempore in this verse (so in Plato, Apol., 22 B), but in ver. 29 he takes it as = facile, whilst ἐν μεγάλῳ (which he reads) = difficile. Belser, however, takes the phrase ἐν ὀλίγῳ in the same sense in both verses, "with little trouble or pains". St. Chrysostom thought that the phrase ἐν ὀλίγῳ was used by Agrippa in one sense and by St. Paul in another (so too Lewin, cf. Grimm-Thayer and Plumptre); Blass apparently obliges us to adopt the same view, but there is nothing in the context to support it (Wendt, Belser).—Χριστ.: there is nothing strange in this use of the word by Agrippa; he may have become acquainted with it in his knowledge of the Christian movement (see above), and the term could easily have spread from Antioch over the district which he ruled. It is difficult to say in what sense he used the term; and no doubt the shade of meaning which we attach to his employment of it will depend upon the meaning which we give to the rest of his answer—a meaning earnest or contemptuous. Thus on the former supposition it is possible that he may have used the word instead of the despised "Nazarene," to indicate his half-friendly attitude towards Christianity, and his relative recognition of it by connecting it with the name which was cherished by every Jew, although the context shows that he had no intention whatever of allowing Paul's persuasive powers further scope; see Wendt (1899), who points out as against Lipsius that there is nothing unhistorical in the introduction of the name here, as if the writer presupposed that it would be familiar to every Jew. On the other hand, although a Jew, Agrippa, before such an audience, might well have used a term with which the Romans also would probably have been familiar, and if he spoke contemptuously (so Blass, Rendall) he would naturally employ a title which had been given in scorn, and which apparently at this period even the Christians themselves had not accepted; see below, and note on xi. 26.

See critical note and ver. 28, i.e., with little or much trouble, and cost.—σήμερον: to be joined not with γενέσθαι (as Chrysostom, Bengel), but with τοὺς ἀκούοντάς μου.—οὐ μόνον, Burton, pp. 183, 184, μὴ μόνον with infinitive only in Gal. iv. 18.—τοιούτους ὁποῖος κἀγώ εἰμι, he does not repeat the word "Christian," which perhaps he would not recognise (Blass): "tales qualis ego sum, sive Chr. appellare vis, sive alio vel contemptiore nomine". γενέσθαι . . . εἰμι: "might become such as I am," R.V., thus giving the difference between γέν. and εἰμι; by whatever name he might be called, the Apostle knew what he actually was (1 Cor. ix. 9).—παρεκτὸς τῶν δεσμῶν τούτων; not figurative but literal; although the plural may be used rhetorically (Weiss), cf. Tac., Ann., iv., 28. παρεκτὸς: Matt. v. 32, xix. 9 (see W.H.) Faith and Hope—of these the Apostle had spoken, and his closing words reveal a Love which sought not its own, was not easily provoked, and took no account of evil: "totum responsum et urbanissimum et Christiano nomine dignissimum," Blass.

Ver. 30. καὶ ταῦτα εἰπόντος αὐτοῦ: if these words are not retained, see critical note, their omission seems to make the rising up more abrupt (subito consurgit, Blass), and probably this is the meaning of the passage, although the order of rank is maintained in leaving the chamber. For the vividness of the whole narrative see Zöckler and Wendt, and cf. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, p. 355.—ἀνέστη, Lucan, see on ἀναχωρ. Suet., Nero, 15; cf. xxiii. 19, and note on xxv. 12.

Ver. 31. πράσσει, present tense: "agit de vitæ instituto" (Grotius, Blass).

Ver. 32. ἐδύνατο: a true affirmative imperfect of verbs denoting obligation or possibility, when used to affirm that a certain thing could or should have been done under the circumstances narrated; therefore not correct to speak of an omitted ἄν, since the past necessity was not hypothetical or contrary to fact, but actual, Burton, p. 14, but cf. Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 114; cf. xxiv. 19, xxvii. 21.—εἰ μὴ ἐπεκ. Καίσαρα: the appeal had been made and accepted and Paul must be sent to Rome, but doubtless the decision of Agrippa would have great weight with Festus, and would greatly modify the letter which he would send to Rome with the prisoner (see above, p. 499), and we may thus account for the treatment of Paul on his arrival in the capital, xxviii. 16. The circumstance that the innocence of Paul is thus established at the mouth of various personages, and now by Agrippa, himself a Jew, as well as by Festus, a Roman, has been made the ground of objection to the narrative by Baur, Zeller, Overbeck, Weizsäcker, Schmiedel. But whilst we may frankly admit that St. Luke no doubt purposely introduced these varied testimonies to Paul's innocence, this is no proof of the incorrectness of his statements (Wendt, Matthias). If we grant, as St. Luke affirms, that the primary cause of the Apostle's imprisonment was the fanatical rage of the Jews against him as a despiser and enemy of the national religion, it is quite conceivable that those who were called to inquire into the matter without such enmity and prejudice should receive a strong impression of his innocence, and should give expression to their impressions. On the other hand, the description in Acts enables us to see how Paul, in spite of such declarations in his favour, might find himself compelled to appeal to Cæsar. Had he acted otherwise, and if release had followed upon the verdict of his innocence, he was sure that sooner or later the implacable Jews would make him their victim. McGiffert, u. s., p. 356, observes that even if both Agrippa and Festus were convinced of the Apostle's innocence, this would not prevent Festus from seeing in him a dangerous person, who would stir up trouble and cause a riot wherever he went; such a man could not have been set at liberty by Festus as a faithful Roman official; but see above on xxv. 12. On the whole narrative see Zöckler, p. 311; Bethge, p. 260 (for phraseology). Zöckler supposes as a foundation for the narrative a written account by Luke himself, perhaps an eyewitness, at an early period after the events. Wendt (1899) also takes the view that the writer of the narrative had probably been in the personal company of St. Paul at Cæsarea before the start on the journey for Rome, xxvii. 1, and that the reason that he does not employ the first person in the narrative of xxv., xxvi., is because the facts narrated in these two chapters did not immediately concern him, although he was in Cæsarea during their process. In referring to the account of St. Paul's conversion as given in ch. xxvi. it is noteworthy that McGiffert, p. 120, speaks of it as occurring "in a setting whose vividness and verisimilitude are unsurpassed".

CHAPTER XXVII.—Ver. 1. Blass at the outset speaks of this and the next chapter as "clarissimam descriptionem" of St. Paul's voyage, and he adds that this description has been estimated by a man skilled in nautical matters as "monumentum omnium pretiosissimum, quæ rei navalis ex tota antiquitate nobis relicta sint". He refers to Die Nautik der Alten by Breusing, formerly Director of the School of Navigation in Bremen, 1886; a book which should be read side by side with J. Smith's well-known Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 4th edit., 1880 (cf. also J. Vars, L'Art Nautique, 1887, and see also Introd., p. 8).—ὡς: particula temporalis, often so used by St. Luke in Gospel and Acts, and more frequently than by the other Evangelists; in St. Matthew not at all, in St. Mark once; often in O.T., Apoc., and especially in 1 Macc.—ἐκρίθη τοῦ ἀποπ.: common construction in LXX with kindred words, e.g., βουλεύομαι, but no other instances of the genitive with infinitive after κρίνω (except 1 Cor. ii. 2, T.R.) in N.T., Lumby; see also Burton, p. 159. ἀποπ.: St. Luke stands alone amongst N.T. writers in the number of compounds of πλεῖν which he employs, no less than nine, J. Smith, u.s., p. 28, 61.—ἡμᾶς: "with this section we tread the firm ground of history, for here at Acts xxvii. 1 the personal record of the book again enters, and that in its longest and fullest part" (Weizsäcker): see also on ἡμᾶς, as intimating by its recurrence the narrative of an eyewitness, Hilgenfeld, Zw. Th., iv., p. 549 (1896), Wendt (1899), p. 402, note. The ἡμᾶς included Paul, Luke, Aristarchus; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 315, maintains that both Luke and Aristarchus must have accompanied Paul as his slaves, and that they would not have been permitted to go as his friends, but see Gilbert, Student's Life of Paul, p. 201; and Wendt (1899) in reply to Ramsay points out that as the ship was not sailing as a transport vessel with the prisoners direct to Rome, but that a vessel engaged in private enterprise and commerce was employed, it is quite possible that Paul's friends may have travelled on the same ship with him as independent passengers. But see further Ramsay, p. 323. So far as Luke is concerned, it is possible that he may have travelled in his professional capacity as a medical man, Lekebusch, Apostelgeschichte, p. 393.—παρεδίδουν: assimilated to form of contracted verbs, so most certainly in Acts, cf. iii. 2, iv. 33, 35, Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 37. Winer-Schmiedel, p. 121.—δεσμώτας, see below, p. 516.—That Paul commanded respect is implied by the whole narrative: some of the other prisoners may also have been sent to Rome on the ground of an appeal, cf. Josephus, Vita, 3, but others may have been already condemned, Ramsay, p.

ὀνόματι Ἰουλίῳ, σπείρης Σεβαστῆς. 2. ἐπιβάντες δὲ πλοίῳ Ἀδραμυττηνῷ, μέλλοντες πλεῖν[1] τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους, ἀνήχθημεν,

[1] After πλειν ℵAB add εις, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt. Instead of μελλοντες ℵAB, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt read μελλοντι; perhaps changed into plural after επιβαντες. Blass reconstructs with Flor., Gig., Syr. P. μελλοντες δε πλειν επεβημεν πλοιῳ Αδραμυττηνῳ, omitting μελλοντι πλειν . . . τοπους with Flor., retained, however, by Hilgenfeld, 1899, with Gig. and Syr. P. Blass continues in β text, so Hilgenfeld, επεβη δε συν ημιν Αρισταρχος Μακεδων Θεσσαλονικευς with the same authority, except that Flor. omits Θεσσ. AB*, so Weiss, W.H. read Αδραμυντηνῳ; see further Winer-Schmiedel, p. 58, and W.H., p. 313 (for aspirate Ἁδρα.), and App., p. 167.

314.—ἑτέρους: Meyer and Zöckler take the word to indicate prisoners of a character different from Paul, i.e., heathen, not Christians; but Wendt (so Hackett) points out that Luke in Acts uses ἕτερος in singular and plural as simply = another, or other, additional; vii. 18, viii. 34, xv. 35, xvii. 34. As against this Zöckler quotes Luke xxiii. 32, Gal. i. 7. —Ἰουλίῳ: name far too common for any identification; Tacitus speaks of a Julius Priscus, Hist., ii., 92, iv., 11, a centurion of the prætorians, but see below on xxviii. 16.—σπείρης Σ.: "of the Augustan band," R.V. It is suggested that the term is here used is a popular colloquial way by St. Luke, and that it is not a translation of a correct Roman name, but rather "the troops of the emperor," denoting a body of legionary centurions who were employed by the emperor on confidential business between the provinces and the imperial city, the title Augustan being conferred on them as a mark of favour and distinction. If this is so we gather from this notice in Acts a fact which is quite in accordance with what is known from other sources, although nowhere precisely attested. But can any connection be established between such a body and any branch of the imperial service which is actually known to us? There were certain legionary centurions who went by the name of frumentarii, who were employed not only, as their name implied, on duties connected with the commissariat, but also with the custody of prisoners and for purposes of police. In xxviii. 16, A.V. and R.V. margin, we have the remarkable reading: "and the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the [prætorian] guard" (see on l.c.). But it is urged that we cannot understand by this expression the Prefect of the Prætorian Guard, who would not be concerned with the comparatively humble duty of receiving and guarding prisoners. But in the Old L.V. called Gigas (unfortunately the only representative of the Old Latin for this passage) we have for a translation of the Greek στρατοπεδάρχης, in itself a very rare word, princeps peregrinorum. Now the legionary centurions who formed the frumentarii were regarded in Rome as being on detached duty, and were known as peregrini; on the Cælian Hill they occupied the camp known as the castra peregrinorum, and their commander bore the name of princeps peregrinorum. If therefore we may identify the Stratopedarch in Acts xxviii. 16 with this commanding officer, we may also infer that Julius was one of the Peregrini, and that he hands over his prisoners to his superior officer, Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 315, 347, Mommsen, Sitzungsberichte d. Berl. Akad., 1895, p. 495 ff., Rendall, Acts, p. 340. But see on the other hand Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 389 (1897), Knabenbauer, Actus Apostolorum, p. 448, Belser, Beiträge, p. 147 ff., who point out amongst other reasons (1) that there is no clear evidence of the title princeps peregrinorum before the reorganisation of Sept. Severus, (2) that we have evidence that prisoners were sent from the provinces and committed to the care of the præfectus prætorio, cf. Traj., Ad Plin., 57, with reference to one who had appealed: "vinctus mitti ad præfectos prætorii mei debet," and other instances in Zahn, u. s., and Knabenbauer. See further for the value of the Old Latin reading in Gigas "Julius" (Headlam), Hastings' B.D., and below on xxviii. 16. But whether we adopt the explanation suggested by Prof. Ramsay or not, it is still open to us to maintain that the title "Augustan" was a title of honour and not a local title; not connected with Sebaste the chief town of Samaria, or with Cæsarea Sebaste. Schürer in answer to Mr. Headlam's criticism ("Julius," Hastings' B.D.) is still of opinion, Theol. Literaturzeitung, ὄντος σὺν ἡμῖν Ἀριστάρχου Μακεδόνος Θεσσαλονικέως. 3. τῇ τε ἑτέρᾳ κατήχθημεν εἰς Σιδῶνα· φιλανθρώπως τε ὁ Ἰούλιος τῷ Παύλῳ χρησάμενος, ἐπέτρεψε πρὸς φίλους [1] πορευθέντα ἐπιμελείας τυχεῖν.

[1] Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt read πορευθεντι with ℵAB 13, 36, 68. Blass in β text follows Flor. according to which Paul's friends come to him, "permisit amicis qui veniebant (ad eum) uti curam ejus agerent".

20, 1899, that reference is here made to one of the five cohorts of Cæsareans and Sebasteni mentioned by Josephus (for references see Jewish People, div. i., vol. ii., p. 53, E.T., and Schmiedel, Encyclop. Biblica, i., 909, 1899), and therefore a σπεῖρα Σεβαστηνῶν; but he maintains that this same cohort was distinguished by the title Augusta from the other four cohorts, and that the writer of Acts is rendering this title in the word Σεβαστή (see also below). It is possible (as Wendt admits, although he prefers Schürer's view, 1899) that Julius might have belonged to the cohors Augusta, cf. C. I. L., iii., 66, 83, Augustiani, Suet., Nero, 25, Augustani, Tac., Ann., xiv., 15, etc. (Belser, Beiträge, p. 154, Knabenbauer, p. 425), a select number of Roman knights who formed a kind of body-guard for the emperor, instituted about 59 A.D., and that he may have been in Cæsarea on some temporary special duty; but on the other hand see Page's note, in loco (cf. note on x. 1). Grimm-Thayer, sub v. Σεβαστός (2), describes it as (an adj.) a title of honour given to certain legions, or cohorts, or battalions, for "valour": "Ala Augusta ob virtutem appellata," C. I. L., vii., 340, 341, 344, but there is no inscriptional proof that this title was given to any Cæsarean cohort; see "Augustan Band" (Barnes), Hastings' B.D., and Wendt can only refer to the bestowal of the title as "probable".

Ver. 2. πλοίῳ Ἀδραμ.: a boat which belonged to Adramyttium in Mysia, in the Roman province Asia, situated at the top of the gulf Sinus Adramyttenus, to which it gives its name (Ramsay, Hastings' B.D., sub v.). It was of considerable importance as a seaport and commercial centre, and under Roman rule it was the metropolis of the north-west district of Asia. Not to be confounded as by Grotius and others with Adrumetum on the north coast of Africa. For the spelling see critical note.—μέλλοντες· the usual route to Rome would have been by way of Alexandria, cf. the route taken by Titus from Judæa to the capital, Suet., Tit., 5. But apparently there was no ship sufficiently large at hand. From some of the great harbours of the Asian coast the centurion might have passed to Italy, or probably from Adramyttium (if the ship was going home) he intended to go to Neapolis, and take the great high road to Rome, if no ship could be found in the Asian harbours so late in the season.—τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀ. τόπους: "to sail by the coasts of Asia," A.V.; but with εἰς after πλεῖν see critical note, "to sail unto the places on the coast of Asia," R.V., cf. for the phrase, xi. 1, Polyb., i., 3, 6. In xvi. 3 τόποι is similarly used. See J. Smith's note, u.s., p. 63.—ἀνήχ., see above on xiii. 13; in the preceding verse we have the corresponding nautical term κατάγεσθαι, to come to land.—Ἀριστ., cf. xix. 39, xxi. 4. Perhaps the expression σὺν ἡμῖν may mean that he was with them, but only for a time, not being actually one of them, i.e., of Paul's company; he may have gone in the Adramyttian ship on his way to his native home, and left Paul at Myra. On the other hand, Col. iv. 10, he is named as one of Paul's companions in Rome, and as his "fellow-prisoner," see Salmon, Introd., p. 383. Whether he made the journey as an actual fellow-prisoner with Paul cannot be proved, although Col., u. s. (Philem. ver. 24), may point to it, see Lightfoot, Philippians, 35, 36, Lewin, St. Paul, ii. 183; "one Aristarchus," A.V., as if otherwise unknown; R.V. gives simply his name. Jüngst refers Μακεδ. Θεσσ. to his Redactor.

Ver. 3. τῇ δὲ ἑτέρᾳ: an easy journey to Sidon—distance 69 sea miles (Breusing).—κατήχ.: technical nautical term, opposite of ἀνάγειν in ver. 2, see above.—φιλανθ. τε ὁ Ἰούλιος . . . χρησ.: "and Julius treated Paul kindly," R.V., cf. xxviii. 2. Bengel says "videtur audisse Paulum," xxv. 32. Hobart, so also Zahn, sees in φιλανθ., which is peculiar to Luke in N.T., the word a medical man might be likely to use. See also on φιλανθρωπία, xxviii. 2, below, but in Dem., 411, 10, we have the phrase φιλανθ. τινὶ χρῆσθαι, so in Plutarch, and the adverb occurs in 2 Macc. ix. 27, 3 Macc. iii. 20. χρησ. only in Luke and Paul, cf. 2 Cor.

[1] At the beginning of verse Blass in β text, with Flor., reads και μετα ταυτα διαπλευσαντες τον Κιλικιον κολπον και το Παμφυλιον πελαγος, and with 137, Syr. H. c*, Flor. adds δι' ημερων δεκαπεντε, which Wendt (1899) seems inclined to retain, and which is read by Hilg. (1899), W.H. marg. Μυρα, neut. plur.; in B Μυρρα, so Tisch., W.H., Weiss, but the reading in T.R. is supported by inscriptions, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 58, so Hilg., Blass, Wendt; ℵA have Λυστραν, and see further W.H., App., p. 167.

[2] Blass accentuates Ἀλεξανδρῖνον.

xiii. 10, in LXX Gen. xxvi. 29.—πρὸς τοὺς φίλους πορευθέντα: probably with the soldier to whom he was chained, but see also β text, critical note.—ἐπιμελείας τυχεῖν: "to receive attention," R.V. margin, cf. Isocr., 113 D. The noun is found in Prov. iii. 8, 1 Macc. xvi. 14, 2 Macc. xi. 23, 3 Macc. v. 1, and also in classical Greek; it was also frequently employed in medical language for the care bestowed upon the sick, and it may be so here; so Hobart, Zahn, Felten, Vogel, Luckock. St. Luke alone uses the word in the N.T., and he alone uses the verb ἐπιμελεῖσθαι in the sense of caring for the needs of the body, Luke x. 24, 35, another word frequently employed with this meaning by medical writers (Zahn). A delay would be made at Sidon, no doubt, for merchandise to be shipped or unladen. There is no occasion to regard the verse, with Overbeck, as an interpolation; see Wendt's note in favour of its retention, p. 543 (1888)).

Ver. 4. ὑπεπλεύσαμεν τὴν Κ.: "we sailed under the lee of Cyprus," R.V. So Wetstein with whom James Smith is in agreement, i.e., to the east of the island, as was usual for ships westward bound, to avoid the prevalent west winds. Otherwise the direct course would have been to make for Patara in Lycia across the open sea to the south-west of Cyprus (cf. xxi. 1-3, where Paul makes a direct run from Patara to the Syrian coast (Ramsay, Goerne)).

Ver. 5. τό τε πέλαγος τὸ κατὰ τὴν Κ. καὶ Π. διαπλ.: the ship in its northerly course would reach the coast of Cilicia, and then creep slowly along from point to point along the Cilician and Pamphylian coast, using the local land breezes when possible, and the current constantly running to the westward along the southern coast (Ramsay, J. Smith, Breusing). Blass takes πέλαγος as "mare vaste patens" and thinks that the ship did not coast along the shore, but J. Smith gives several instances of ships following St. Paul's route. On the additional reading in β text see critical note.—Μύρα τῆς Λυκίας: two and a half miles from the coast of Lycia; on the spelling see critical notes. On its importance as one of the great harbours in the corn trade between Egypt and Rome see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 298, 318, Lewin, Saint Paul, ii., 186, and for later notices Zöckler, in loco. As a good illustration of the voyage of the Adramyttian and Alexandrian ship see Lucian's dialogue, Πλοῖον ἢ Εὐχαί, 7-9; Ramsay, p. 319; Breusing, 152.

Ver. 6. πλοῖον: St. Luke does no mention what kind of ship, but the fact that it was on its way from Egypt to Italy, and that in ver. 38 the cargo was evidently grain, makes it a reasonable inference that the ship was carrying corn for conveyance to Rome. On this trade to Rome, Seneca, Epist., 77, and for the large size of the ships (cf. ver. 37) so employed cf. references in Wetstein to Lucian and Plutarch, and Breusing, p. 157, Goerne, and also for the reputation of the Alexandrian ships and sailors.—εὑρὼν: there was nothing unlikely in this, if Myra was situated as above described. The ship, therefore, Ramsay holds, had not been blown out of her course, and the westerly winds, prejudicial to the run of the Adramyttian ship from Sidon to Myra, were favourable for the direct run of a ship from Alexandria, cf. ver. 9, and the course taken by the Alexandrian ship was probably a customary one during a certain season of the year for the voyage from Alexandria to Italy. Blass, on the other hand, quoting from Lucian, maintains that the ship was obliged to quit the usual course owing to the winds, but Ramsay has here the entire support of J. Smith, u. s., p. 73.—ἐνεβίβασεν: vox nautica, Holtzmann, cf. Thuc., i., 53.

Ver. 7. ἐν ἱκαναῖς ἡμέραις or ἱκανός: in temporal sense only in Luke in N.T., see Hawkins, p. 151, and cf. Vindiciæ Lucanæ (Klostermann), p. 51.—βραδυπλοοῦντες: Artemid., Oneir., iv., 30; ταχυπλοεῖν, Polyb. (Blass), evidently on account of the strong westerly winds; the distance was about a hundred and thirty geographical miles to Cnidus.—καὶ μόλις γεν. κατὰ τὴν Κ.: "and were come with difficulty off Cnidus," R.V., to this point the course of the two ships would be the same from Myra; here they would no longer enjoy the protection of the shore, or the help of the local breezes and currents; "so far the ship would be sheltered from the north-westerly winds, at Cnidus that advantage ceased" (J. Smith).—Κνίδον: the south-west point of Asia Minor, the dividing line between the western and southern coast; a Dorian colony in Caria having the rank of a free city like Chios; see 1 Macc. xv. 23.—μὴ προσεῶντος: "as the wind did not permit our straight course onwards," Ramsay, so Blass, J. Smith, p. 79: the northerly wind in the Ægean effectually prevented them from running straight across to the island of Cythera, north of Crete; cf. Wendt's note (1899), in loco, inclining to agree with Ramsay, see critical note; others take the words to mean "the wind not permitting us unto it," i.e., to approach Cnidus (Hackett), so too R.V., margin. But there does not seem to have been any reason why they should not have entered the southern harbour of Cnidus. They might have done so, and waited for a fair wind, had they not adopted the alternative of running for the east and south coast of Crete. The verb προσεῶντος does not occur elsewhere, and the same must be said of the conjecture of Blass, προεῶντος.—ὑπεπλεύ.: "we sailed under the lee of Crete off Cape Salmone" (Ramsay), i.e., a promontory on the east of the island, and protected by it from a north-westerly wind (Ramsay). Strabo has Σαλμώνιον and Σαμώνιον (Pliny, Sammonium); Σαλμώνις is also found; Σαλμώνιον (or Σαμμ.) may be explained, sc. ὄρος, Winer-Schmiedel, p. 65.

Ver. 8. μόλις τε παραλεγ. αὐτὴν: "and with difficulty coasting along it," i.e., Crete on the southern side—with difficulty because under the same conditions as in their journey along the coast of Asia Minor (Breusing) (this is better than to refer αὐτήν to Σαλμώνην, and render to work past, to weather, cf. Grimm-Thayer); παραλέγομαι, oram legere, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo.—Καλοὺς Λιμένας: a small bay two miles east of Cape Matala, in modern Greek, Λιμεῶνας Καλούς, J. Smith, p. 82, and Appendix, p. 251 ff., 4th edition; not mentioned, however, elsewhere. This harbour would afford them shelter for a time, for west of Cape Matala the land trends suddenly to the north, and they would have been again exposed to the north-westerly winds; see further for a description of the place Findlay's Mediterranean Directory, p. 66, quoted by Breusing and Goerne, who also have no doubt that the place is identical with that mentioned by St. Luke (see also Wendt, 1898 and 1899).—Λασαία, see critical note; like the Fair Havens not mentioned by name in any ancient writer.

10. Ἄνδρες, θεωρῶ ὅτι μετὰ ὕβρεως καὶ πολλῆς ζημίας οὐ μόνον τοῦ[1] φόρτου καὶ τοῦ πλοίου, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ψυχῶν ἡμῶν, μέλλειν but since 1856 it may be fairly said that its identification has been established with a place some four miles to the east of Fair Havens, or rather the ruins of a place to which the name Lasea was still given, see J. Smith, 4th edition, p. 82, and p. 268 (Appendix); Alford, Proleg. to Acts, p. 27. If Lasea was one of "the (ninety or) hundred towns of Crete," and one of the smaller amongst them, it ceases to be strange that no precise mention of it should occur in ancient writers (Grimm).

Ver. 9. ἱκανοῦ δὲ χρ. γεν.: not since the commencement of the voyage (as Meyer), but since they lay weather-bound. Wendt (1899) agrees with Meyer as against Weiss and Ramsay, on the ground that there is no ἐκεῖ, so Hackett.—ἐπισ. τοῦ πλοός: "terminus proprie nauticus," Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, J. Smith, p. 84, who refers to Jul. Pollux, i., 105, although the adjective was not distinctively so. It is only used by St. Luke, and although it is frequently employed by medical writers, it is found also in Plato, Polybius, Plutarch (cf. also Wisd. ix. 14, and for the adverb iv. 4). τοῦ πλοός: "the voyage," R.V., but perhaps "sailing," A.V., is best, so Ramsay—the dangerous season for sailing had commenced; in the next verse = "voyage," i.e., to Rome (Alford); only in Luke, cf. xxi. 7, on the form of the genitive see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 84, cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 15, 19, 2 Thess. ii. 2. The dangerous season was reckoned from 14th September to 11th November, and from 11th November to 5th March all navigation was discontinued; see Blass, in loco, and Ramsay, Saint Paul, p. 322; according to Hesiod, Works and Days, 619, navigation ceased after the setting of the Pleiades about 20th October. The Jewish period for navigation ended 28th September.—διὰ τὸ καὶ τὴν νηστείαν ἤδη παρεληλυθέναι: the mention of the fact that the Fast, i.e., the Great Day of Atonement, Lev. xvi. 29, Jos., Ant., xiv., 16, 4, was over, Tisri the 10th, made the danger more apparent. According to Mr. Turner, "Chronology," Hastings' B.D., the great Fast on Tisri 10 in 58 A.D. fell circa 15th September, so that the dangerous sailing season would have just commenced. In A.D. 59, the date preferred by Ramsay, the Fast would be on 5th October. Starting from the view that a considerably later point of time than Tisri 10 is implied, cf. xxviii. 11, various attempts have been made to interpret νηστεία differently, and it has been referred to the Athenian festival of the Thesmophoria, the third day of which was so called; or to some nautical mode of expression not elsewhere employed equivalent to extremum autumni, but all such attempts are based upon no authority (Zöckler, in loco), and there can be no doubt that the expression "the Fast" κατ' ἐξοχήν refers to the Jewish Fast as above. St. Paul usually reckoned after the Jewish calendar, 1 Cor. xvi. 8, and as Wendt observes there is nothing strange in the fact that his travel-companion should also so reckon, cf. xx. 6 above, even if he was a Gentile Christian, an observation to be noted in face of Schmiedel's recent arguments against the Lucan authorship, Encycl. Biblica, p. 44, 1899. The indication that St. Paul kept the Jewish Fast Day is significant. —παρῄνει: "admonished," R. and A.V., in N.T. only here, and in ver. 22, see note. The Apostle had sufficient experience to justify him, 2 Cor xi. 25 (Weiss), his interposition is all an indication of the respect which he had secured: "the event justified St. Paul's advice," J. Smith.

Ver. 10. θεωρῶ: here used of the result of experience and observation, not of a revelation, cf. xvii. 22, xix. 26, xxi. 20.—θεωρῶ ὅτι . . . μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι: anacoluthon. ὅτι: forgotten by the number of words intervening in the flow of speech—a vivid dramatic touch; cf. Xen., Hell., ii., 2, 2, see Blass, Gram., p. 279, Winer-Moulton, xliv., 8, A 2. μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι, cf. xi. 28, xxiv. 15, 25, only in Luke, Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 120. μετὰ ὕβρεως καὶ πολλῆς ζημίας, cf. ver. 21: "with injury and much loss," A. and R.V. ὕβρις: used of the injury inflicted by the elements, injuria tempestatis, cf. Jos., Ant., iii., 6, 4. τὴν ἀπὸ τῶν ὄμβρων ὕβριν: Anthol., vii., 291, 3. δείσασα θαλάττης ὕβριν: Grimm-Thayer renders "injury inflicted by the violence of a tempest," and this well combines the active and passive shades of meaning; for the passive signification of ὕβρις cf. 2 Cor. xii. 10. ζημίαν: only elsewhere in Paul, cf. Phil. iii. 7, 8. οὐ μόνον: occurs regularly with the infinitive in the N.T. instead of μὴ μόνον, Burton, p. 183. φόρτου, see critical note, if we read φορτίου the word which is dim. in form not in significance is often found of the freight of a ship; but see also Blass and Wetstein, in loco, for distinction between φορτίον and φόρτος.

Ver. 11. ὁ δὲ ἑκατόν.: the centurion evidently presides at the Council as the superior officer, see Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 324, 325, but, as Wendt notes (and so Blass), the majority decide, not the centurion alone.—τῷ κυβερ. καὶ τῷ ναυκλ.: "to the master and to the owner of the ship," A. and R.V., better "to the pilot and the captain"; ναύκληρος was not the owner, although the word might denote ownership as well as command of the ship, for the ship if it was a corn ship would belong to the imperial service, and would form a vessel of the Alexandrian fleet. In Breusing's view, p. 160, ναύκληρος is owner of the ship, but κυβερνήτης is better rendered, he thinks, "captain" than "pilot," cf. Plut., Mor., 807 B (Wetstein and Blass).—ἐπείθετο μᾶλλον τοῖς λεγ.: "locutio Lucana," cf. xxviii. 24, the centurion's conduct was natural enough; what would be said of him in Rome, where provision ships for the winter were so eagerly expected, if out of timidity he, though a soldier, had hindered the captain from continuing his voyage? Breusing, pp. 161, 162, and quotations from Suet., Claudius, 18, as to the compensation offered by the emperor to merchants for losses in winter and storm. Goerne points out that it may have been also to their interest to proceed on the voyage, rather than to incur the responsibility of providing for the keep of the large crew during a long stay at Fair Havens.

Ver. 12. ἀνευθέτου: here only, but in later Greek we have δύσθετος, so in Jos. St. Luke, however, uses εὔθετος in his Gospel, ix. 62, xiv. 35 (found only once elsewhere in N.T., Heb. vi. 7). We may compare J. Smith's 1st and 4th edition, p. 85. In the latter he points out that recent surveys show that Fair Havens may have been a very fair winter harbour, and that even on nautical grounds St. Paul's action may have been justified, but Blass, in loco, adheres to the view that the harbour was only fit for use during the summer.—πρὸς παραχειμασίαν: noun only here in N.T., not found in LXX, but in Polyb. and Diod. Sic. παραχειμάσαι: only in Luke and Paul in N.T., 1 Cor. xvi. 6, cf. Acts xxviii. 11, Tit. iii. 12, not in LXX, but used by Dem., Polyb., Plut., Diod. Sic.—οἱ πλείονες: πλείονες (πλείους) with the article only by Luke and Paul in N.T., cf. xix. 32; by St. Paul seven times in his Epistles. Bengel well says, "plura suffragia non semper meliora".—ἔθεντο βουλὴν: on the noun and its use by St. Luke see above, ii. 23, and for the phrase cf. Luke xxiii. 51, in LXX, Ps. xii. 2 (Judg. xix. 30, A al.); so also in classical Greek.—ἀναχθῆναι: "to put to sea," R.V., see on xiii. 13.—εἴ πως δύναιντο: on the optative see Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 172; and Burton, p. 111; cf. Mark xi. 13, Acts viii. 22, xviii. 27, Rom. i. 10, xi. 14, Phil. iii. 11.—καταντήσαντες: Lucan and Pauline, see above, xvi. 1.—εἰς Φοίνικα, Strabo, x., 4; Ptolemy, iii., 17. Generally taken as = modern Lutro, so Ramsay, Alford, Renan, Rendall, Blass, J. Smith (pp. 87, 88), Lewin, Rendall, Plumptre, and Muir in Hastings' B.D., "Fair Havens"; so amongst recent German writers on this voyage, cf. Breusing, p. 162, and Goerne, u. s., p. 360, both of whom quote Findlay, Mediterranean Directory, p. 67, "Port Lutro, the ancient Phœnix, or Phœnice, is the only bay on the south coast where a vessel could be quite secure in winter"; but on the other hand Hackett, in loco, Wordsworth, λίβα καὶ κατὰ χῶρον. 13. ὑποπνεύσαντος δὲ νότου,[1] δόξαντες τῆς προθέσεως κεκρατηκέναι, ἄραντες[2] ἆσσον παρελέγοντο τὴν Κρήτην.

[2] For ασσον Blass in β with Flor. reads θασσον, so Hilg. (1899); Vulg., so Erasmus, "cum sustulissent de Asson," taking Assos as Ασος (Asus, Pliny) as the name of one of the Cretan towns; Luther takes it as acc., "cum sustulissent Assum". Wycl. and Rhem. follow the Vulg., and Tynd. and Cranm. follow Luther, but there is no clear trace of the existence of a town so called in Crete, and Assos lay far to the north, xx. 13 (Plumptre).

Humphry and Page (whose full note should be consulted) suppose the modern Phineka to be meant; so also C. H. Prichard in Hastings' B.D., "Crete"; see below. Alford, Acts, Proleg., p. 28, quotes from J. Smith's Appendix (2nd edition) the words from Mr. G. Brown's Journal (1855, 1856) stating that Lutro is the only secure harbour in all winds on the south coast of Crete, words quoted by Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 326, and Muir, Hastings' B.D., "Fair Havens".—λιμένα τῆς Κ. κ.τ.λ.: "a harbour of Crete which faces south-west and north-west," so Ramsay, and so A.V. and Vulgate. But R.V. so Rendall, "looking north-east and south-east," which is a correct description of the entrance of the harbour of Lutro, so J. Smith, Alford, Lumby and Plumptre, who interpret "looking down the south-west and north-west winds," literally translated as = in the direction of these winds, i.e., the direction to which they blew, and so north-east and south-east, κατά indicating the line of motion, cf. R.V. margin, and so Rendall and Knabenbauer, in loco. C. and H., so Ramsay and Farrar, find an explanation of the rendering in A.V. in the subjectivity of the sailors, who describe a harbour from the direction in which they sail into it; and thus by transmission from mouth to mouth the wrong impression arose that the harbour itself looked south-west and north-west. As against Rendall's interpretation and that of R.V., see Page and Hackett's learned notes in loco. Both lay stress upon the phrase, βλέπειν κατά τι, as used only of that which is opposite, and which you face. Cf. Luke's own use of κατά, iii. 13, viii. 26, xvi. 7, xxvii. 7. Page, and so C. H. Prichard, Hastings' B.D., "Crete," would adopt A.V. reading, but would apply it to the harbour Phineka, opposite Lutro, which does look south-west and north-west. λίψ, (prob. λείβω) Herod., ii., 25, Polyb., x., 103, etc., south-west wind Africus, χῶρος, north-west wind Corus or Caurus.

Ver. 13. ὑποπνεύσαντος: leniter aflante, aspirante, cf. ὑποκινέω, ὑπομειδιάω, a moderate breeze from the south arose which would favour their westerly course. Cf. Luke xii. 55, not in LXX or Apocrypha, but see Heliod., iii., 3 (Wetstein). — δόξαντες, xii. 9, τῆς προθ. κεκρατηκέναι: their purpose, i.e., of starting from Fair Havens for the more desirable anchorage of Lutro some forty miles distant. προθέσεως, cf. xi. 23; in N.T. only in Luke and Paul in this sense; cf. 2 Macc. iii. 8. κεκρατ.: only here in this sense in N.T., cf. Diod. Sic., xvi. 20, κεκρατηκότες ἤδη τῆς προθέσεως (Grimm-Thayer, Page), and for instances of the same collocation of words in Galen, and in Polyb. (κατακρατεῖν), see Wetstein and Blass, in loco. Breusing, p. 164, takes the phrase to refer here to their purpose of continuing their voyage to the end (so too Goerne).—ἄραντες: "they weighed anchor," R.V. So Ramsay, J. Smith, pp. 65, 97; only here in N.T. in this sense, sc. τὰς ἀγκύρας, cf. Thuc., i., 52, and ii., 23, but the word may imply simply profecti, of movement, whether by sea or by land, of armies or ships; so Breusing takes it intransitively, no need of any noun, Thuc., iv., 129; vii., 26 (p. 164): see also ver. 17. For aorist participle of an action antecedent in time to that of the principal verb cf. xiv. 19: Burton, pp. 63, 64.—ἆσσον παρελ. τὴν Κ.: "sailed along Crete, close in-shore," R.V., i.e., as they rounded Cape Matala, about six miles west of Fair Havens; the statement so emphatically introduced by St. Luke seems to imply that their ability to weather the point was for some time doubtful, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 326. ἆσσον: "if the wind went round a point towards the west they would fail; and the anxious hour has left its record in the single word of ver. 13, 'ἆσσον,'" Ramsay, u. s. See critical note, and above on ver. 8. ἆσσον, an adverb comparative of ἄγχι; the comparative degree makes it more emphatic (see above), as they had been coasting for weeks, and they now went "closer" in shore (see R.V.); Wendt (1899) takes it, however, not as a comparative with reference to ver. 8 (so Meyer, Weiss), but as a superlative, cf. xxiv. 22, xxv. 10.

Ver. 14. μετ' οὐ πολὺ δὲ, cf. xx. 12. οὐ μετρίως, Luke xv. 15, Acts i. 5, "observe the 'Litotes' of οὐ with an adjective or adverb, four times in 'We' sections, twelve in rest of Acts, twice in Luke vii. 6, xv. 13, rare in rest of N.T.," Hawkins, p. 153.—ἔβαλε κατ' αὐτῆς: intransitive, as often in classical Greek since Homer: "there beat down from it," R.V., i.e., from Crete and its mountains over 7,000 feet in height; so also Blass, Holtzmann, Ramsay, Zöckler, Page, Rendall, Wendt, Weiss, Knabenbauer, and J. Smith, in later editions, see p. 100, 4th edition; a graphic description of a common experience in the Cretan waters; as the ship crossed the open bay between Cape Matala and Phœnice, the wind suddenly shifting to the north, a violent hurricane (strictly from east-north-east) burst upon them from Mount Ida, cf. St. Luke's κατέβη, Luke viii. 23, of a squall descending from the hills on the Lake of Gennesaret, and κατὰ τοῦ κρημνοῦ, Luke viii. 33, cf. Matt. viii. 32 (J. Smith, Weiss, Zöckler). Breusing, p. 164 (so Hackett, Lewin, Farrar), takes κατ' αὐτῆς as = against the ship, but the word πλοῖον is used for ship, and not ναῦς until ver. 41. Luther regarded αὐτῆς as agreeing with προθέσεως (so Tyndale and Cranmer).—τυφωνικός: formed from τυφώς, turbo, denoting not the direction, but the vehemence of the wind (Breusing, Page), a heavy, eddying squall (J. Smith, Ramsay), vorticosus (Bentley).—Εὐροκλύδων, see critical note. If we read with ℵAB* Εὐρακύλων, render "which is called Euraquilo," R.V. Perhaps the irregularly formed Euraquilo occasioned the corrections. V. Euroaquilo. Blass calls it vox hybrida from εὖρος and Aquilo (qui Latin = κυ, ut Ἀκύλας, xviii. 2), strictly the "East-north-east" wind (Breusing thinks "North-east" sufficient; so Wycliffe and Tyndale in their translations). Such a wind would drive the ship into the African Syrtis as the pilot feared, ver. 17, and the word is apposite to the context, to all the circumstances, and is so well attested as to fairly claim admission as the word of St. Luke. The Latin had no name for the Greek Καικίας blowing between Aquilo and Eurus, and it is quite possible that the Roman seamen, for want of a specific word, might express this wind by the compound Euro-Aquilo; cf. ὁ καλούμενος, which seems to point to some popular name given to the wind; for similar compounds cf. Εὐρόνοτος and Euro-Auster, and Gregalia, the name given to the same wind by the Levantines, as Euripus has become Egripou (Renan, Saint Paul, p. 551); see Bentley, Remarks on a late Discourse on Freethinking, p. 97, quoted at length by Breusing, "Euraquilo," Hastings' B.D. and B.D.², i.

Ver. 15. συναρπασθέντος δὲ τοῦ πλοίου: "and when the ship was caught by it" (Ramsay), a graphic word as if the ship was seized in the grasp of the wind; only in Luke, cf. Luke viii. 29, Acts vi. 12, xix. 29; in LXX cf. Prov. vi. 25, 2 Macc. iii. 27, iv. 41, 4 Macc. v. 4; so in classical Greek, e.g., Soph., Electr., 1150.—ἀντοφθαλμεῖν: "and could not face the wind," R.V., "look at the wind eye to eye": eyes were painted on the prows of vessels, but Alford thinks that the word was not originally a nautical term derived from this practice, but that more probably the expression was transferred to a ship from its usage in common life; it is used in Polybius of facing an enemy, Polyb., i., 17, 3, of resisting temptation, xxviii. 17, 18, with δύνασθαι as here, and also with δύνασθαι in Wisd. xii. 14, cf. Acts vi. 11, β text. For the fit application of the word to a ship see Breusing, p. 168.—ἐπιδόντες ἐφερόμεθα: "we gave way to it (to the wind), and were driven," or τὸ πλοῖον may be regarded as the object, "we gave up the ship to the winds," "data nave fluctibus

[2] Κλαυδην HLP d; ℵ* Κλαυδα Syr. H., Arm., Boh., so Tisch., Weiss; A has first three letters Κλα; but ℵcB, Vulg. have Καυδα, W.H., Blass, so R.V. text (Κλαυδα marg.), Hilg. (1899), and the form Κλαυδα is supported by Κλαυδος in Ptolem., iii., 15, 8, and other authorities in Hastings' B.D., "Cauda" (Ramsay). See note in comment., and Wendt, p. 408 (1899). The variation cannot be accounted for by the mere dropping out of Λ before Α as Weiss maintains, for the difference of spelling occurs in other than MS. authorities. But see further Winer-Schmiedel, p. 65, note.

ferebamur," Vulgate, so Holtzmann, Zöckler, Hackett, Wordsworth, and J. Smith, p. 106. The instances in Wetstein justify either rendering, see also references in Blass, in loco. ἐφερόμεθα: "and let the ship drive," Ramsay and A.V., others render as passive, so Grimm-Thayer, sub v.; in classical Greek it is often used passively for being borne along by wind, or storm, or wave, cf. Hom., Odys., v., 343 (Page); Diod. Sic., xx., 16.

Ver. 16. ὑποδραμόντες: "and running under the lee of a small island," R.V. J. Smith calls attention to the nautical accuracy of St. Luke's terms; they ran before the wind to leeward of Cauda; ὑποδραμ., they sailed with a side wind to leeward of Cyprus and Crete, ὑπεπλεύσαμεν, ver. 4, see also Ramsay, Saint Paul, p. 328, to the same effect; here was calmer water, and the island (see below) would afford them a refuge for a time from the gale. Breusing, pp. 167, 168, 181, thinks that the great sail had been struck at once, and that the artemon or small foresail was kept up as a storm sail; otherwise the ship would have been simply the plaything of the waves. But Ramsay and others (see Farrar) think, on the contrary, that the one huge sail, in comparison with which all others were of little importance, was kept up, but that the strain of this great sail on the single mast was more than the hull could sustain; the timbers would have started, and the ship foundered, had she not gained the smooth water to the lee of Cauda.—μόλις ἰσχύσ.: "we were able with difficulty to secure the boat," R.V., the boat had not been hauled in, as the storm was so sudden; and now as it was nearly filled with water, and battered by the waves and storm, it was hard work to haul it in at all (J. Smith), as Luke himself experienced (pressed into this service of hauling in the boat; note first person, Hackett, Ramsay, p. 327); clearly they could not afford to lose such a means of safety; even as it was, the boat was dragging along as a heavy weight retarding the ship (Breusing, p. 169).—περικ., cf. Susannah, ver. 39, A, for ἐγκρατεῖς in B.—σκάφης: a small boat towed behind, only in this passage in N.T., cf. vv. 30, 32, Latin, scapha; Cic., De Invent., ii., 51 (Humphry).—Κλαύδην, see critical note, an island twenty-three miles from Crete, nearly due south of Phœnice. Ramsay (but see on the other hand Wendt, p. 408, 1899) maintains that preference be given to the forms of the name in which the letter L is omitted, cf. the modern Gavdho in Greek, and Gozzo in Italian; not to be confounded with Gozzo near Malta (Renan, Saint Paul, p. 551), and see further on its present name, J. Smith, pp. 95, 259, 4th edition.

Ver. 17. ἣν ἄραντες: "and when they had hoisted it up" into the ship, see on ver. 13.—βοηθ. ἐχρῶντο: they used helps ὑποζ. τὸ πλοῖον undergirding the ship, A. and R.V., on ἐχρῶντο see ver. 3, cf. 1 Cor. ix. 12, 15; often compared to the custom called in modern language frapping, or undergirding the ship with cables to prevent the timbers from being strained, or to hold them together during a storm, Plato, Rep., 616, C, Polyb., xxvii., 3, 3, Horace, Od., i., 14, 6. The difficult point to decide is whether the girders were put longitudinally round the ship, i.e., passed from stem to stern, or under the ship transversely. Breusing, p. 670 (so Goerne and Vars), defends the former at great length, following Böckh. The passage from Plato, u. s., he admits may possibly make for the latter view, but it is evident that the description is not ὑποζωννύντες τὸ πλοῖον· φοβούμενοί τε μὴ εἰς τὴν σύρτιν ἐκπέσωσι, χαλάσαντες[1] τὸ σκεῦος, οὕτως ἐφέροντο. 18. Σφοδρῶς δὲ χειμαζο-

very definite or precise, and the passage in Isidore of Seville, Orig., xix., 4, 4, "tormentum (ὑπόζωμα) funis in navibus longus, qui a prora ad puppim extenditur, quo magis constringantur," which Bōckh quotes (so also Vars, L'Art Nautique, p. 219) is much clearer. Moreover, the girding was often performed when the ships were on land, on the stocks, and it is not likely that the operation in the circumstances under discussion could have meant passing a cable under the keel. Further, by girding the ship transversely, i.e., underneath the ship (p. 175), only the timbers in the middle of the ship would be held together, whilst a girding longitudinally was needed to secure the whole plankage of the ship. But see on the other hand Ramsay, p. 329, who agreeing with Smith holds that the cables were passed underneath round the ship transversely. Either operation, one would suppose, would have been difficult during a storm. For instances of this practice in modern times, see Smith, and C. and H., small edit., p. 645. Wendt (1899) refers to Naber's conjecture of βοείαις for βοηθ. as very plausible.—μὴ εἰς τὴν Σ.: "on the great quicksands," Ramsay; "the Syrtis," R.V., not merely "the quicksands," as A.V., but the Syrtis Major, "the Goodwin Sands of the Mediterranean" (Farrar), lying at a distance to the south-west of Clauda; upon them the sailors knew that they would be cast, unless they could manage by some means to alter their course.—ἐκπέσωσι: a regular nautical term, to fall off, ἐκ, i.e., from a straight course, εἰς—Eur., Hel., 409, Herod., viii., 13, others supply "from deep water" and render ἐκπ. to be cast away, Grimm-Thayer, sub v., cf. vv. 26, 29.—χαλάσ. τὸ σκεῦος: "lowered the gear," R.V., "they reduced sail," Ramsay; here and in ver. 30 used as a nautical term; the tempting reference to Isa. xxxiii. 23, LXX, cannot be sustained, for the meaning of the words is very doubtful. The article with the singular (in ver. 19, the plural) seems to indicate "the gear," the mainyard carrying the mainsail (so Page, Wordsworth, Humphry). Of the A.V., J. Smith says that no more erroneous translation could be imagined, as "they struck sail" would imply that the ship had no means of escaping danger, but was left to flounder hopelessly in the storm, although Meyer-Wendt take the words to mean that they preferred to let the ship drift without any mast or sail than to be driven on upon the Syrtis, as was inevitable with the ship kept in full sail. Chrysostom explains τὸ σκ. as = τὰ ἱστία, but some sail was necessary, and they had still the artemon or storm sail, so J. Smith, who thinks that they lowered the great sail and mainyard some way, but not apparently entirely. The aim of the sailors was not merely to delay their course (which would only bring them upon the Syrtis), but to alter it, and it is therefore quite possible that χαλάσ. τὸ σκεῦος may denote a series of operations, slackening sail, lowering as much of the gear as they could, but leaving enough sail spread to keep the ship's head to the wind, i.e., to the north instead of drifting to south-west upon the quicksand (Ramsay). Breusing, p. 177 ff., who thinks that the mainsail had been lowered at the commencement of the storm, adopts quite a different meaning for the words, and interprets them as implying that weights and great stones were let down by ropes into the sea for the purpose of retarding the progress of the vessel, and with this view Blass and Knabenbauer are in agreement (Wendt, 1899, evidently inclines to it, and Goerne adopts it); this curious view, which Ramsay finds it difficult to regard seriously, Breusing supports by a passage in Plut., Moral., p. 507, A (so Hesychius' explanation, ἄγκυρα τὸ ναυτικὸν σκεῦος), which intimates that σπεῖραι and ἄγκυραι were frequently employed to check the course of a ship in a storm; but even if the Greek words admit of this explanation, the object of the sailors was nothing less than to alter the course of the vessel, and Breusing's supposition would not conduce to this.—οὕτως ἐφέροντο: "so were driven," R.V., i.e., in this state, "and drove on so," Rendall; meaning that we let the ship drift in that position, viz., undergirded, with storm sail set and on the starboard tack; J. Smith, so Ramsay, not simply "were driven hopelessly". For οὕτως, xvii. 33, xx. 11.

Ver. 18. σφοδρῶς δὴ χειμαζ. ἡμῶν:

[1] Instead of 1st pers. pl. ℵAB*C, Vulg., Arm., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass in β, Weiss, Wendt have 3rd pers. (W.H., so Tisch., with one ρ with ℵB*, while AB³C have double ρ); HLP, Syr. H. and P., Boh. have 1st pers. pl., and so Hilg. (1899) with one ρ. 137 Syr. H., Wern. add εις την θαλασσαν, so Blass in β text, and Hilg.; Winer-Schmiedel, p. 56.

"and as we laboured exceedingly with the storm," R.V., Ramsay, Rendall, a regular nautical and classical term; cf. Thuc., ii., 25; iii., 69; viii., 99; Plato, Ion, 540 B. In Attic Greek usually σφόδρα, but cf. LXX, Josh. iii. 16, Ecclus. xiii. 13, 4 Macc. vi. 11; only here in N.T. Weiss thinks that it is used to express how severely they were distressed by the storm.—τῇ ἑξῆς . . . καὶ τῇ τρίτῃ, cf. Luke xiii. 32, connected with the words which follow in R.V. and by Ramsay. For τῇ ἑξ. cf. Luke vii. 11 (but see W.H.), ix. 37, and above on xxi. 1, xxv. 17; nowhere else in N.T.—ἐκβολὴν ἐποιοῦντο: "they began to throw the freight overboard," R.V., Ramsay, Felten, a technical term, so in classical Greek, for throwing out cargo to lighten a ship; Latin jactura, LXX, Jonah i. 5, with τῶν σκευῶν, and Julius Pollux, i., 99, who also has the phrase κουφίσαι τὴν ναῦν, cf. ver. 38 below. The imperfect marks that they began by throwing away the cargo, probably what was on deck, so that the vessel would ship less water; and in ver. 19 they cast out (ἔῤῥιψαν, aorist) the furniture of the ship, its fittings and equipment, anything movable lying on the deck upon which the passengers could lay their hands (αὐτόχειρες only here in N.T. representing the haste, Weiss). Others include under the word the actual baggage of the passengers, but we should have expected ἡμῶν instead of τοῦ πλοίου, whilst others explain of beds and crockery, tables, etc., furniture in this sense (Zöckler and Felten, exclusive of beds which were not in use). Breusing rejects this interpretation as "too silly," and he thinks that the expression really means that by thus throwing overboard the poles and tackling, room was found for the crowd of passengers on the deck, as the hatchways could not be kept open, since the heavy sea would have swamped the ship, p. 186. J. Smith takes σκεύη to mean the mainyard, but the word is here apparently used in a more general sense, as above, R.V., margin, "furniture of the ship".

Ver. 19. ἐῤῥίψαμεν, see critical note. Ramsay prefers the first person, although not well supported, because it increases the effect; but in any case the scene is graphically described, ἔῤῥιψαν may be due to ἐποιοῦντο, but, as Wendt notes, ἐῤῥίψαμεν may have been equally due to αὐτόχειρες. Breusing rejects the first person, p. 187, from a seaman's point of view; the sailors would have kept the passengers in their places, and not have allowed them to engage in a work in which they might perchance have done more harm than good.

Ver. 20. μήτε δὲ ἡλίου μήτε ἄστρων: the omission of the article here intensifies the meaning, Blass, Gram., p. 143, "weder etwas von Sonne".—ἐπιφαινόντων, cf. Luke i. 79; only in Luke and Paul, Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4; "shone upon us," R.V., thus their only guidance, humanly speaking (for, of course, they had no compass), was taken from them, cf. Æneid, i., 88; iii., 195; Horace, Epod., x., 9, and for the phrase, Polyb., v., 6, 6.—ἐπὶ πλείονας: often in Luke ἐπί with acc. of time, cf. xxviii. 6, and for instances in Luke and other parts of Acts of the same usage as predominant (though not exclusive) in Luke see Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 152; Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 53; Luke x. 35, xviii. 4, Acts iii. 1, iv. 5, xiii. 31, xvi. 18, xvii. 2, xviii. 20, xix. 8, 10, 34.—οὐκ ὀλίγου: only in Luke, eight times in Acts; see above on ver. 14.—ἐπικειμ., cf. 1 Cor. ix. 16, Heb. ix. 10, Luke v. 1, xxiii. 23 (John xi. 38, xxi. 9, literal sense), and for its use here, Plut., Timol., 28, τέλος δὲ τοῦ χειμῶνος ἐπικειμένου. In LXX, Job xix. 3, Wisd. xvii. 21 S, 1 Macc. vi. 57, 3 Macc. i. 22, etc.—

λοιπὸν (cf. Matt. xxvi. 45), "now," R.V., jam, Blass; often = ἤδη, L. and S.; others render it: for the future (2 Tim. iv. 8), finally, at last.—περιῃρεῖτο: "was gradually taken away," Ramsay, "imperf. quod in dies magis," Blass; Page renders "was being gradually stripped from us," a very vivid word, cf. 2 Cor. iii. 16, Heb. x. 11 (ver. 40, see below), and its use in LXX and Psalms of Solomon, ii. 22; cf. Westcott's note on Heb., l.c., but on the other hand Blass, in loco, regards the force of περί as lost in the word in N.T. J. Smith (so Breusing) sees in the expression more than the hopelessness arising from the force of the storm—we have also to consider the fact that they could not see their course, and the increasing leakage of the vessel.

Ver. 21. δέ: if we read τε, see critical note, the word closely connects what follows as the result of the hopelessness.—πολλῆς δὲ (τε) ἀσιτίας ὑπαρχ.: "and when they had been long without food," R.V.; "abstinence" A.V. and Tyndale, "fasting" in Wycl., Rhem., imply rather a voluntary refraining which is not in the Greek; disinclination for food may have resulted from their anxiety (Humphry), and to the same effect Breusing, Goerne, "and little heart being left for food," Rendall. But the storm may also have prevented the preparation of food (so Smith, Ramsay, Page, Farrar); the former gives instances to show that ἀσιτία was one of the most frequent concomitants of heavy gales, owing to the impossibility of cooking food, and to the destruction of provisions by leakage. ἀσιτίας, see below, ver. 33, for the adjective: both noun and adjective peculiar to St. Luke, and much employed in medical language, both so noted by Hobart and Zahn, the noun often meaning "want of appetite," see instances in Hobart, p. 276, Hipp., Galen, Aret. The word was no doubt similarly used in classical Greek, so in Jos., but cf. the striking parallel in ver. 33 in medical phraseology. For the genitive absolute cf. locutiones Lucanæ (Klostermann, p. 53), xv. 7, xix. 40, xxi. 40. xxiii. 10. Felten, Zöckler, Bethge (and so Wendt, 1888, but cf. p. 410 (1899)), rightly refuse to regard vv. 21-26 or ver. 10 as interpolations in the "We" section, or a "vaticinium post eventum," and no one has contended more forcibly than Weizsäcker that the narrative is to be taken as an indivisible whole, and that it is impossible to disentangle the mere history of travel from it, or to strip away the miraculous additions, see especially Apostolic Age, ii., pp. 126, 127, E.T.—τότε: in this state of things, at this juncture,—hungry, and thirsty, and their soul fainting in them; cf. xxviii. 1, so also in classical Greek.—σταθεὶς ὁ Π. ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν, cf. i. 15, ii. 14, xvii. 22; vividness and solemnity of the scene (αὐτῶν, not ἡμῶν), characteristically marked by Luke; Mr. Page well says that it is impossible not to recall Horace, Od., iii., 3, 1, "vir justus et propositi tenax," unmoved amidst the storms "inquieti Adriæ".—ἔδει μὲν: antithesis, not strictly expressed. . . . καὶ τὰ νῦν, ver. 22, "modestiam habet," Bengel. For μέν answered not by δέ, but occasionally by other particles, as here by καί, cf. Luke xxii. 22, Acts iv. 16; see Simcox, Language of the N.T., p. 168, and for τὰ νῦν, see iv. 29, v. 38, xvii. 30, xx. 32, and note on p. 135. On the imperfect ἔδει cf. Burton, p. 14; Winer-Moulton, xli., 2.—ὦ ἄνδρες: "gentlemen," "viri quos decet virtus," Bengel, the word may thus mark St. Paul's courtesy, and also his firmness; in counsel, ver. 10, he had been prudent and confident; in danger he was equally so; cf. especially Weizsäcker, u. s.—πειθαρχ.: only in Acts in N.T., v. 29, 32, except once again as used by St. Paul, Tit. iii. 1.—ἀνάγ., see above, xiii. 13, and Blass, in loco, on the tense.—κερδῆσαι: "and have gotten this injury and loss," R.V., carrying on μή; Page on the other hand prefers the combination ἔδει τε κερδῆσαι ("hoc non pendet a μή," Bengel), i.e., you ought not to have put to sea, and (you ought by so not putting to sea) to have gained this loss, i.e., not suffered it; with nouns signifying loss, injury, the verb κερδαίνειν is used of the gain arising from shunning or escap-

The Genevan Version adds an explanatory note, "that is, ye should have saved the losse by avoyding the danger"; see also ver. 10. κερδῆσαι = κερδᾶναι, -δῆναι; almost always in N.T., cf. Winer-Schmiedel, p. 110.

Ver. 22. καὶ τὰ νῦν, see on ver 21, Paul would spare their reproaches, and rather awaken hope in their hearts (Bethge).—παραινῶ: only in Luke, here and in ver. 9. Hobart speaks of it as the verb employed for a physician giving his advice, and although the word is common in classical Greek, cf. also 2 Macc. vii. 25, 26 R, 3 Macc. v. 17, vii. 12 A, its frequency in medical usage may account for its occurrence in this "We" section only; see also Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 153.—εὐθυμεῖν, cf. vv. 25, 36, and xxiv. 10, elsewhere in N.T. only in James v. 10, but in classical Greek, and εὔθυμος in 2 Macc. xi. 26. The verb, adjective, and adverb εὐθύμως are used in medical language of the sick keeping up spirit, opposed to ἀθυμία and δυσθυμία; εὐθυμεῖν παραινῶ might therefore well be a medical expression, Hobart, p. 280, although the verb εὐθ. is used intransitively, as here, in classical Greek, and in Plutarch.—ἀποβολὴ: only here in N.T., "there shall be no loss of life among you, but only of the ship," R.V., Winer-Moulton, lxvii. I.e., πλὴν with the genitive, Acts viii. 1, xv. 28 (once elsewhere in N.T., Mark xii. 32).

Ver. 23. παρέστη . . . ἄγγελος: on this Lucan phrase and description of angelic appearances cf. Luke ii. 9, xxiv. 4, Acts xii. 7 (xxiii. 11), and see above, i. 10.—τοῦ Θεοῦ: "of the God whose I am, whom also I serve," R.V., Ramsay, Rendall, not "an angel of God," as A.V.; the R.V. rendering gives the force of the Greek more naturally in addressing a heathen; see also critical note.—λατρεύω, see on xxiv. 14; cf. Rom. i. 9, and LXX, Jonah i. 9.

Ver. 24. μὴ φοβοῦ, see above, xviii. 9.—παραστῆναι, cf. Rom. xiv. 10, the words emphatically bear out the prominence already laid upon the Apostle's witness in Rome.—καὶ ἰδού, see on i. 10.—κεχάρισταί σοι: "hath granted them as a favour"; see on iii. 14, no doubt Paul had prayed for this, cf. especially Philemon ver. 22. The statement in ver. 24 looks back to xxiii. 11, which, as Wendt allowed (1888), is only to be rejected if one presupposes that Paul could not have confidently looked forward to a visit to Rome, or at least if we suppose that the confidence could not have been created and sustained by a heavenly vision. Wendt, however, in 1899 edition, speaks much more doubtfully as to the existence of vv. 21-26 as part of the original source; see also on ver. 21.

Ver. 25. πιστεύω γὰρ τῷ Θ. ὅτι οὕτως ε. καθ' ὃν τρόπον, cf. xv. 11, and also i. 11, Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 53.

Ver. 26. εἰς νῆσον δέ κ.τ.λ.: the words do not form part of the message of the angel as they stand, but they may be considered as forming part of the contents of that message, and the Apostle may himself be regarded as speaking μαντικῶς. With Jüngst's question "How could Paul know anything of an island?" and his dismissal of the statement here as a vaticinium ex eventu, cf. Weizsäcker, u. s., see ver. 21; in the section, vv. 33-36, which Jüngst defends and refers to his source A, the element of prophecy is equally present, ver. 34, as in the verse

before us.—ἐκπεσεῖν, cf. ver. 17, and further instances in Wetstein, see also vv. 29, 32, below.

Ver. 27. τεσσαρεσκαιδεκάτη νύξ, i.e., since their departure from Fair Havens, cf. vv. 18, 19, see also the reckonings of mileage in Breusing, p. 189, and Goerne, who reckons from the departure from Cauda.—διαφερομένων ἡμῶν: "as we were driven to and fro," R.V., so Ramsay; "huc illuc ferri," Blass, cf. for a similar meaning of the verb Philo, De Migr. Abr., 27, Strabo, 3, p. 144, and other instances as in Plutarch, see Wetstein, Grimm-Thayer, sub v. But J. Smith (so Breusing, Goerne, Rendall) takes the word as signifying that they were driven through the waters of the Adria uniformly in the same direction, i.e., right across from Cauda to Malta, and not as moving up and down, or to and fro. Ramsay (so Farrar) holds that St. Luke writes as a landsman who supposes that they drifted to and fro, whilst a sailor would have known that they drifted in a uniform direction (an explanation which Page describes as easy but unsatisfactory, but he thinks that the Greek word cannot be used as J. Smith believes); Rendall however maintains that throughout the Acts the habitual force of διά in composition, e.g., διέρχεσθαι, διαπλεῖν, διαφεύγειν, διαπερᾶν, διοδεύειν, whether governing an accusative or used absolutely is to express continuous movement onwards over an intervening space.—ἐν τῷ Ἀδρίᾳ: "in the sea of Adria," R.V. (on the form of the word see Hastings' B.D., more properly "Adrias"); not in the narrower sense of the Adriatic, the Gulf of Venice, or as we now speak of "the Adriatic," but as including the whole sea which lay between Malta, Italy, Greece and Crete; St. Luke probably used the term as it was colloquially used by the sailors in this wider sense. For Mommsen's objection to the term here see above, Introd., p. 8. The passage in Strabo, ii., 123 (cf. vii., 187), where the Ionian sea is spoken of as a part of what is now called Adria plainly justifies a wider use of the term in St. Paul's day than had been originally attached to it, cf. Ptolemy, Geogr., iii., 4, 14, 15, 16, who applies it to the sea extending from Sicily to Crete, and thus represents, although living some sixty or seventy years after him, what was no doubt the current usage in St. Luke's day; so J. Smith, Breusing, Goerne, Vars, Ramsay, Renan, Blass, etc. Josephus, Vita, 3, speaks of being taken up in the middle of Adria, κατὰ μέσον τὸν Ἀδρίαν, when his ship foundered, by a vessel sailing from Cyrene to Puteoli. See further "Adria," Hastings' B.D., where a full criticism of the attempt made by W. Falconer (and others), Dissertation on St. Paul's Voyage, 1817, republished with additions in 1870, to limit the term to the branch of the sea between Italy and Illyria, and to identify Melita with an island off its Illyrian shore, will be found; see further on xxviii. 1, and C. and H., small edition, p. 660 ff., for other references to the meaning of the term "Adria," and Renan, Saint Paul, p. 552, J. Smith, p. 280 ff., 4th edit. (editor's note), and Encycl. Bibl., i., 72, 1899.—κατὰ μέσον τῆς ν., cf. xvi. 25 for a similar expression, only in Luke.—ὑπενόουν: only in Luke; "surmised," R.V., less decided than "deemed," A.V., see on xiii. 25 (cf. 1 Tim. vi. 4).—προσάγειν τινὰ αὐτοῖς χ.: "that some land was approaching them," R.V., so Breusing and Ramsay; intransitive in LXX, Josh. iii. 9, 1 Sam. ix. 18, Jer. xxvi. (xlvi.) 3, etc., "Lucas optice loquitur, nautarum more," Kypke; the opposite verb would be ἀναχωρεῖν, recedere, see Wetstein and Blass for illustrations. J. Smith thinks that probably they heard the breakers on the shore, but Breusing and Goerne (so Blass) think that the anchor or whatever weight was dragged behind the ship appeared to strike the ground, see above on ver. 17, cf. critical note for προσαχεῖν, Doric for προσηχεῖν.—χώραν: the point of Koura, east of St. Paul's Bay, J. Smith; the ship would pass within a quarter of a mile of it, and while the land is too low to be seen when the night is stormy, the breakers can be heard for a considerable distance; cf. the description of the wreck of the Lively in 1810, Smith, p. 123, 4th edition.

Ver. 28. βολίσαντες: having let down

βολίσαντες, εὗρον ὀργυιὰς δεκαπέντε· 29. φοβούμενοί τε[1] μήπως εἰς τραχεῖς τόπους ἐκπέσωσιν, ἐκ πρύμνης ῥίψαντες ἀγκύρας τέσσαρας, ηὔχοντο ἡμέραν γενέσθαι. 30. τῶν δὲ ναυτῶν ζητούντων φυγεῖν ἐκ τοῦ πλοίου, καὶ χαλασάντων τὴν σκάφην εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν,[2] προφάσει

[1] For μηπως, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss read μηπου with ℵBC 13, 40, 61. Hilgenfeld (1899) retains μηπως with HLP (A μηπω). Instead of εις ℵABC have κατα, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, but Hilgenfeld has εις (Vulg., Gig., in). εκπεσωμεν ℵABCHLP Vulg., Syr. P. and H., Boh., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg. After γενεσθαι Blass in β text (so Hilg.) adds του ειδεναι ει σωθηναι δυναμεθα with Gig.

the sounding-lead (βολίς), elsewhere only in Eustath., in active voice, but see also Grimm-Thayer, sub v.—ὀργυιὰς: five or six feet, a fathom, Grimm; Breusing compares Herod., iv., 41, and gives six feet; on the accent see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 72. "The ancient fathom so nearly agrees with the English that the difference may be neglected," J. Smith, p. 131.—βραχὺ δὲ διαστήσαντες: "and after a little space," so Ramsay, Rendall; the phrase may refer to space or time; if we understand τὸ πλοῖον or ἑαυτούς we should take it of the former (Grimm); but if we explain = βραχὺ διάστημα ποιήσαντες (Blass), it may be taken of either. διΐστημι is only found in Luke for signifying any space of time, Luke xxii. 59, cf. Acts v. 7; but Luke xxiv. 51, διέστη ἀπ' αὐτῶν. J. Smith shows how exactly the geographical details in the traditional St. Paul's Bay correspond with the description here. Before a ship drifting from Cauda could enter the bay it would not only pass within a quarter of a mile of Point Kaura, north-east of Malta, but the measurements of 20 and 15 fathoms exactly correspond to ascertained soundings according to the vessel's average of speed.

Ver. 29. φοβούμενοι: the diminution of the depth of water increased the danger of running aground, perhaps on some hidden reef of rocks.—τραχεῖς τόπους, cf. Luke iii. 5, in quotation Isa. xl. 4; nowhere else in N.T., cf. Bar. iv. 26 (3 Macc. i. 23), so in Diod. Sic., xii., 72, of rocks, Polyb., i., 54. It was evidently a hydrographic term, and classed with δύσορμος, ἀλίμενος, etc., Jul. Pollux, i., 101; J. Smith, p. 132.—ἐκπέσωμεν, see ver. 17, "to cast ashore," R.V., or simply "cast on rocky ground," which is more indefinite than the former rendering, and perhaps correctly so, as there were possible dangers from sunken reefs as well as from a rocky coast. On the subjunctive after verbs of fear and danger cf. Burton, p. 15.—ἐκ πρύμνης: this was unusual, but to anchor was their only chance of safety, and four anchors would make the vessel more secure: ancient vessels carried as a rule several anchors. Athenæus speaks of a ship which had eight iron anchors, cf. for the number here, and the security which they gave, Cæsar, Bell. Civ., i., 25, "naves quaternis anchoris destinabat, ne fluctibus moverentur"; anchorage from the prow would have caused the ship to swing round from the wind, whereas anchorage from the stern would enable the sailors to manage the ship far more easily, and to bring her under control of the helm when they wished to run her aground (see the description in Ramsay, Rendall, Farrar, and J. Smith). On the interesting parallels of anchoring ships from the stern in our own naval engagements see C. and H., small edition, p. 653, and J. Smith, p. 133, 4th edition.—ηὔχοντο: "prayed," R.V. margin, the Greek sailors might pray at such a crisis (Rendall).—ἡμέραν γενέσθαι, cf. vv. 33, 39, characteristic of Luke, cf. Luke iv. 42, vi. 13, xxii. 26, Acts xii. 18, xvi. 35, xxiii. 12.

Ver. 30. ζητούντων: "and as the sailors were seeking," R.V.; "about to flee," A.V. is incorrect, for they were planning possible means of escape, and could scarcely be said to be about to escape, cf. β text—if they succeeded the passengers and the soldiers would thus be left to their fate.—προφ. ὡς: under colour, under pretence, specie, cf. Mark xii. 40, Luke xx. 47, John xv. 22, Phil. i. 18, 1 Thess. ii. 5. Cf. for its use here Thuc., v., 53, vi., 76. For ὡς cf. xvii. 14, xxviii.

ὡς ἐκ πρώρας μελλόντων ἀγκύρας ἐκτείνειν, 31. εἶπεν ὁ Παῦλος τῷ ἑκατοντάρχῃ καὶ τοῖς στρατιώταις, Ἐὰν μὴ οὗτοι μείνωσιν ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ, ὑμεῖς σωθῆναι οὐ δύνασθε. 32. τότε οἱ στρατιῶται ἀπέκοψαν τὰ σχοινία τῆς σκάφης, καὶ εἴασαν αὐτὴν ἐκπεσεῖν. 33. ἄχρι δὲ οὗ ἔμελλεν ἡμέρα γίνεσθαι, παρεκάλει ὁ Παῦλος ἅπαντας μεταλαβεῖν τροφῆς, λέγων, Τεσσαρεσκαιδεκάτην σήμερον ἡμέραν προσδοκῶντες, 19, Luke xxiii. 14, and ὡς μέλλων with present infinitive active as here, Acts xxiii. 15, 20, Klostermann, Vindiciæ Lucanæ, p. 54.—ἐκτείνειν: "lay out anchors," R.V., Ramsay, i.e., at the full length of the cable. The sailors pretended that more anchors from the prow would help to steady the ship, and that they must go off in a boat to carry them out to cable's length, rather than drop them out as in ver. 29.—ἐκτ.: a technical expression (cf. élonger, Vars, p. 248, and so ῥίπτειν in ver. 29, mouiller), Breusing, p. 195. It seems impossible to suppose with Breusing, p. 194, and Vars, p. 248 (so also Goerne), that the sailors may have been actuated by an honourable motive, and that they wished to put off in the boat to see if the soundings and the nature of the ground allowed the ship to get nearer shore, for although St. Paul's words do not expressly accuse them of treachery, yet the narrative of his companion does so, cf. προφάσει, etc. But, as Breusing himself points out, St. Paul's words issued in the best result, for the centurion's counsel prevented a terrible scene of sauve qui peut (as in the stranding of the Cimbria, Goerne).

Ver. 31. ὑμεῖς not ἡμεῖς: St. Paul appeals to the law of self-preservation, and the centurion acts promptly on his advice; although safety had been divinely promised, human means were not excluded, and it is altogether hypercritical to find any contradiction here with vv. 24-26, as Holtzmann supposes.

Ver. 32. τότε οἱ στρ. ἀπέκ.: Lewin, Saint Paul, ii., 202, sees in this the absolute ascendency which St. Paul had gained; he had said that their lives should be spared, and although, humanly speaking, the boat offered the best prospect of reaching land, yet at a word from St. Paul the soldiers deprived themselves even of this last resource.—σχοινία: only elsewhere in N.T. in John ii. 15; in classical Greek, and also frequently in LXX. For the terrible scene which would doubtless have ensued if the soldiers had not thus acted, Breusing and Vars (so Wetstein, in loco) strikingly compare the description of a shipwreck in Achilles Tatius, iii., 3; the whole passage is cited by Breusing, p. 194.

Ver. 33. ἄχρι δὲ οὗ: only used by Luke in the historical books of the N.T., cf. Luke xxi. 24, Acts vii. 18; in St. Paul's Epistles three or four times, Heb. iii. 13, Rev. ii. 25. Ramsay renders "and while the day was coming on," so A. and R.V.; dum with imperfect, Heb. iii. 13 (Blass). But Rendall takes it as = until, as if Paul had continued his entreaties until close on dawn (imperfect).—μεταλαβεῖν τροφῆς, cf. ii. 46 for the same phrase, only in Luke in N.T.—τεσσαρεσκ. . . . προσδοκῶντες κ.τ.λ.: "this is the fourteenth day that ye wait (A.V. 'tarry,' Ramsay, 'watch') and continue fasting". Rendall renders "this is the fourteenth day that ye have continued fasting on the watch for the dawn"—προσδ. sc. ἡμέραν, as if St. Paul did not mean a fourteenth day of continuous fasting, but fourteen successive nights of anxious watching for the dawn, all alike spent in restless hungry expectation of what the day might reveal (Acts, p. 347), but προσδοκᾶν is here without an object as in Luke iii. 15 (Weiss). For the word see further xxviii. 6, and cf. προσδοκία only in Acts xii. 11 and Luke xxi. 26. On the accusative of time, as expressed here, cf. Blass, Gram., p. 93.—ἄσιτοι διατελεῖτε: precisely the same collocation of words occur in Galen, εἴ ποτε ἄσιτος διετέλεσεν, so also καὶ ἄδιψοι διατελοῦσιν, and Hippocrates speaks of a man who continued suffering πάσχων διατελέει for fourteen days (see Hobart and Zahn). It must however be admitted that the same collocation as in this verse ἄσιτοι and διατελεῖν is found in Dion. Hal. (Wetstein, in loco). For the construction see Winer-Moulton, xlv., 4; cf. Thuc., i., 34.—μηδὲν προσλ., i.e., taking no regular meal, so Weiss, Blass, Zöckler, Alford, Plumptre, Felten, Bethge, Wendt. Breusing, p. 196, and Vars, p. 250, both explain the word as meaning that in their perilous and hopeless condition those on board had not gone to fetch their regular food and rations, but had subsisted on any bits of ἄσιτοι διατελεῖτε, μηδὲν[1] προσλαβόμενοι. 34. διὸ παρακαλῶ ὑμᾶς προσλαβεῖν[2] τροφῆς· τοῦτο γὰρ πρὸς τῆς ὑμετέρας σωτηρίας ὑπάρχει· οὐδενὸς γὰρ ὑμῶν θρὶξ[3] ἐκ τῆς κεφαλῆς πεσεῖται. 35. εἰπὼν δὲ ταῦτα, καὶ λαβὼν ἄρτον, εὐχαρίστησε τῷ Θεῷ ἐνώπιον πάντων, καὶ κλάσας ἤρξατο ἐσθίειν.[4] 36. εὔθυμοι δὲ γενόμενοι πάντες, καὶ αὐτοὶ

[2] Instead of προσλ. ℵABC, Chrys., so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt read μεταλ. For υμετ. ALP have ημετ., so Hilg.

[3] For εκ ABC minusc., Tisch., W.H. and other authorities above read απο, but Hilg. has εκ with ℵHLP. For πεσειται ℵABC Vulg., Syr. P., Boh., Arm., Aethpp. have απολειται, so Tisch., W.H. and other authorities above; but πεσ. is supported by HLP, Sah., Syr. H., so Hilg. and Meyer who suppose that απολ. is from Luke xxi. 18; but see on the other hand Alford's note. After υπαρχει Blass in β text and Belser, so Hilg., add ελπιζω γαρ εν τῳ Θεῳ μου οτι with Gig.

food they might have by them; in ancient ships there were no tables spread, or waiters to bring food to the passengers, and each one who wanted refreshment must fetch it for himself. Plumptre takes πρός as meaning no extra food, only what would keep body and soul together, but it is doubtful whether the Greek will bear this or Breusing's interpretation.

Ver. 34. διὸ: so that they might be ready for the work which would be necessary.—προσλαβεῖν, see critical note. —πρὸς: here only with genitive in N.T., cf. Blass, Gram., p. 136; i.e., stands, so to speak, on the side of our deliverance, Latin a parte, cf. Thuc., ii., 86; iii., 59; Plat., p. 459 C; Winer-Moulton, xlviii. f. —ὑμετ., emphatic. — σωτ.: "safety," R.V., only used here and in Heb. xi. 7 of the preservation of physical life, safety, so in classical Greek and in Greek medical writers, see on xvi. 17; "health," A.V., not limited formerly as now to the condition of body and mind, cf. Luke i. 77, "science of health" Wycliffe = "knowledge of salvation," and cf. also Ps. lxvii. 2, "thy saving health," literally "thy salvation" (Humphry). Effort on their part was necessary, and yet no hair of their heads should perish; what a significant union of faith in God and self-help! (Bethge.)—οὐδενὸς γὰρ . . . πεσεῖται, see ver. 22, cf. Luke xxi. 18, nowhere else in N.T., but the proverbial phrase, as it apparently was, is found in 1 Sam. xiv. 45, 2 Sam. xiv. 11, 1 Kings i. 52 (cf. Matt. x. 29), see critical note, and cf. Shakespeare, Tempest, Act i., Scene 2.

Ver. 35. λαβὼν ἄρτον εὐχαρίστησε τῷ Θ., cf. Luke xxii. 19, xxiv. 30, with intentional solemnity (Weiss, Weizsäcker). The words are sometimes taken to mean that Paul simply encourages them by his own example to eat. But Blass, see critical note, who comments "et oratione confirmat et exemplo," adds in β text ἐπιδιδοὺς καὶ ἡμῖν, i.e., to Luke and Aristarchus, in which he sees a distinct reference to the cœna sacra (so Belser). But quite apart from this reading in β the peculiar language of St. Luke seems to intimate such a reference. Olshausen and Ewald (so Plumptre) take the words to refer to the Agape, whilst Meyer (so Hackett) sees a reference to the act of the Jewish house-father amidst his household; but Wendt simply refers it to the act of a pious Jew or Christian giving thanks before eating a meal and sharing it, so Zöckler. Bethge, more specifically, sees in the act a thanksgiving of a Christian to God the Father, an instance of what St. Paul himself recommends, Ephes. v. 20, Col. iii. 17, and both Felten and Knabenbauer apparently prefer to interpret the words as marking Paul's reverence towards God before the Gentiles around him. Breusing shows, p. 196, that ἄρτος might = panis nauticus, but in the passage which he quotes from Lucian we have ἄρτους ναυτικούς.

Ver. 36. τροφῆς: with a partitive meaning; cf. γεύσασθαι, xxiii. 14, μεταλαβεῖν, ver. 33, κορέννυσθαι, ver. 38. Cf. Herod., viii., 90. Luckock points out that St. Luke distinguishes between the bread of which the Apostle partook and προσελάβοντο τροφῆς· 37. ἦμεν δὲ ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ αἱ πᾶσαι ψυχαὶ διακόσιαι[1] ἑβδομηκονταέξ. 38. κορεσθέντες δὲ τροφῆς, ἐκούφιζον τὸ

[1] For διακοσιαι W.H. read in text ως (so R.V. marg.) (in marg. διακ.) with B, Sah. Epiph., so Hilgenfeld; Weiss however declines here to follow B, and speaks of "the impossible" ως before 76 which is no round number, Apostelgeschichte, p. 34 (so Blass); the mistake seems best explained by supposing that the last letter of πλοιῳ was read as if Σ = 200, and thus = ΩΣ. Or, to explain it more fully, by supposing that the sign for 200, Σ, was misunderstood, and with the double reading of the ω in πλοιω easily became ως; this is of course if we read with W.H. αι πασαι ψ. εν τῳ πλοιῳ, a different order from T.R. (see also Hilgenfeld's note, where explanation of the reading διακ. from ως is certainly not so obvious). For εξ A has πεντε.

the food, τροφῆς, taken by the rest, and certainly the expression κλάσας is remarkable, cf. Luke xxii. 19, 1 Cor. xi. 23, 24; but it is perhaps noteworthy that the Romanist Felten (see above) sees no reference to the Eucharist, although he fully admits that this act of Paul in thus giving thanks must have made a great impression at such a moment.—εὔθυμοι, ver. 22, cf. 2 Macc. xi. 26.—καὶ αὐτοί: "also themselves," following his example. For the second time Paul had restored their courage by his faith and prudence; the event had already shown that he deserved confidence, and it is evident that he inspired it; see the testimony of Breusing, pp. 198, 199.

Wendt, so too Jüngst, and Clemen see no reason to regard vv. 33-36 as an interpolation in the "We" source, as vv. 21-26 above. Overbeck regards both sections as standing or falling together, and treats them both as interpolations, but Ramsay, whilst regarding the two sections as inseparably connected, treats them both as belonging to the original "We" source, and he rightly expresses surprise at those who accept ver. 33 ff., and refuse to accept vv. 21-26 (Saint Paul, p. 337); much more intelligible is the judgment of Weizsäcker than that of the other German critics in question when he describes the narrative as an indivisible whole, and considers it impossible to disentangle the mere history of travel from it, or to strip away the miraculous additions.

Ver. 37. The number was large, but nothing is told us of the size and manning of the Alexandrian ship, and Josephus, Vita, 3, mentions that there were about 600 in the ship which took him to Italy. On the large size of the ships engaged in a traffic similar to that of the corn ship in this chapter see Breusing, p. 157; Vars, p. 191; Hackett and Blass, in loco, and ver. 6; Lucian, Πλοῖον ἢ Εὐχαί., 5. The number may be mentioned at this point that they might know afterwards that all had been saved. But Breusing thinks that it would have come perhaps more naturally at the end of the narrative, and that it is given here because the rations were distributed to each on board at this juncture. For the phrase cf. xix. 7.

Ver. 38. κορεσθ., 1 Cor. iv. 8, nowhere else in N.T., with genitive of the thing with which one is filled, as in classical Greek. Alford refers to LXX, Deut. xxxi. 20, but see Hatch and Redpath, sub v.—ἐκούφιζον: de nave, Polyb., i., 60, 8; LXX, Jonah i. 5.—τὸν σῖτον: "the wheat," A. and R.V., Vulgate, triticum; so Ramsay, Breusing, Vars, J. Smith, Page, and so too Erasmus, Bengel, etc., i.e., the cargo, cf. ver. 6. Blass thinks that the word used is decisive in favour of this interpretation; otherwise we should have had σιτία or ἄρτοι if merely food had been meant; not only was the cargo of sufficient weight really to lighten the ship, but there was need for the ship being as clear as possible for the operations in ver. 40. Wendt 1899 appears also to favour this view, cf. his comments with those in 1888 edition, where he adopts the view of Meyer and Weiss, that the word means provisions of food, as at first sight the context seems to indicate. But the latter would not have made much appreciable difference in weight, nor would those on board have been likely to throw them away, since they could not tell on what shore they might be cast, whether hospitable or not, or how long they would be dependent on the food which they had in the ship. In ver. 18 the reference may be to the cargo on deck, or at all events only to a part of the cargo (Holtzmann). Naber conjectured ἱστόν, but no such emendation is required (Wendt).

πλοῖον, ἐκβαλλόμενοι τὸν σῖτον εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν. 39. Ὅτε δὲ ἡμέρα ἐγένετο,[1] τὴν γῆν οὐκ ἐπεγίνωσκον· κόλπον δέ τινα κατενόουν ἔχοντα αἰγιαλόν, εἰς ὃν[2] ἐβουλεύσαντο, εἰ δύναιντο,[3] ἐξῶσαι τὸ πλοῖον. 40. καὶ τὰς ἀγκύρας περιελόντες εἴων εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν, ἅμα ἀνέντες τὰς ζευκτηρίας τῶν πηδαλίων· καὶ ἐπάραντες τὸν[4] ἀρτέμονα τῇ

[1] Before την γην Gig., Syr. P. add οι ναυται, so Blass in β and Hilg.

[2] For εβουλευσαντο ℵBC, Vulg., Syrr. P. and H., Boh., Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilgenfeld read εβουλευοντο; A 40, 61 have εβουλοντο.

[3] For εξωσαι B*C, Boh., Aeth., Arm. have εκσωσαι, so W.H. text, R.V. marg., but Tisch., W.H. mg., R.V. text, Blass, Weiss, Hilgenfeld read εξωσαι (Wendt doubtful).

[4] αρτεμονα LP, Chrys., but -ωνα W.H., Weiss, Blass with ℵABCH, B¹ has αρτομωνα, see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 86.

Ver. 39. τὴν γῆν οὐκ ἐπεγ.: "they did not recognise the land," Ramsay; the sailors probably knew Malta, since, xxviii. 11, there was evidently nothing unusual in eastern ships touching at the island on their way to Rome. But they did not know St. Paul's Bay, which is remote from the great harbour, and was not distinguished by any marked features to secure recognition, Ramsay, J. Smith; see also note on xxviii. 1. C. and H. lay stress on the imperfect, "they tried to recognise . . ., but could not"; but in xxviii. 1 we have the aorist indicating that the land was recognised immediately on landing.—κατενόουν: "perceived," R.V., cf. Matt. vii. 3, Luke vi. 41, xx. 23.—κόλπον τινα: a sort of bay or creek, "a bay," R.V., the word means a bay either small or large, and St. Paul's Bay may be described as a small bay or creek (Rendall); ἔχοντα αἰγιαλόν "with a sandy beach," Ramsay, with a beach, R.V., i.e., smooth and fit for a vessel's landing-place, cf. xxi. 5, Matt. xiii. 2, 48, John xxi. 4; cf. Xen., Anab., vi., 4, 4 (see Page's note); in LXX, Judg. v. 17 A, Ecclus. xxiv. 14 S², al. J. Smith adds that St. Luke here again employs the correct hydrographical term, frequently used by Arrian in this sense. The traditional St. Paul's Bay may certainly well have been the place meant (so Wendt, 1899, and Blass). On the smooth, sandy beach see Hackett, note, p. 334, who has also visited the spot, and confirmed Smith's view, although both admit that the former sandy beach has been worn away by the action of the sea; Smith, p. 247, 4th edition, and see also Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 341.—ἐξῶσαι τὸ πλοῖον: "to drive the ship upon it," R.V., i.e., the beach, so Ramsay, Rendall, Breusing, Vars, Goerne, J. Smith (4th edit., p. 142); the object was not to save the ship from being destroyed, but the crew from perishing; under like circumstances the same would be done to-day (so Breusing, Vars), cf. Arrian, Peripl. Pont. Eux., 6. ἐξῶσαι: so in Thuc., ii., 90; viii., 104 (and see Wetstein); see also critical note on ἐκσῶσαι εἰ δύναιντο, and Burton, p. 106, and Grimm-Thayer, sub εἰ, i., 7, c., with optative, where the condition represents the mind and judgment of others . . ., as if the sailors had said amongst themselves ἐξώσομεν εἰ δυνάμεθα, cf. xxiv. 19.

Ver. 40. καὶ τὰς ἀγκ. περιελόντες: "and casting off the anchors," R.V., cf. ver. 20 for the same verb, so that the meaning cannot be as A.V., following Vulgate, "having taken up"; in fact it is the very reverse. The sailors loosed the cables of the anchors which were fastened within the ship, that they might fall off into the sea (Blass); Breusing and Vars compare Xen., Hell., xvi., 21, τὰς ἀγκύρας ἀποκόπτοντες = τὰ σχοινία τῶν ἀγκυρῶν.—εἴων εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν: "they left them (the anchors) in the sea," R.V., relinquebant, Blass; so Breusing, Vars, Goerne, as against A.V., and Vulgate, committebant se, or Luther's rendering (Beza and Grotius), εἴων τὸ πλοῖον ἰέναι εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν. Grimm-Thayer renders "they let down into the sea," i.e., abandoned, which gives better the force of εἰς than regarding it simply as = ἐν.—ἅμα: "at the same time," R.V., "simul laxantes," Vulgate, "loosing withal," Rhem., but in no other E.V. (Speaker's Commentary).—τὰς ζευκτ. τῶν πηδαλίων: the bands of the rudders, the fastenings of the rudders, i.e., the two paddle-rudders with which Greek and Roman ships were supplied, one on each quarter, C. and H. and J. Smith, p. 183, 4th edition, πνεούσῃ κατεῖχον εἰς τὸν αἰγιαλόν. 41. περιπεσόντες δὲ εἰς τόπον διθάλασσον,[1] ἐπώκειλαν τὴν ναῦν· καὶ ἡ μὲν πρῶρα ἐρείσασα ἔμεινεν

[1] For επωκειλαν (B³LP, Chrys., Meyer, Hilgenfeld), ℵAB*C 13, 40, 61, 73 have επεκειλαν, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, see note below (and Wendt's note in both edit., 1888 and 1899), and Blass, in loco. After την ναυν Blass in β and Hilgenfeld adds εις συρτιν with Syr. H. c* (so Hilg.).

these rudders had been lifted from the water and lashed up while the ship was anchored by the stern (see Breusing's description, p. 98, cf. Eur., Hel., 1536: πηδάλια ζεύγλαισι παρακαθίετο), but the rudders were wanted when the ship again got under weigh.—τῇ πνεούσῃ, sc. αὔρᾳ.—ἐπάραντες: technical word for spreading out the sail, opposite to ὑφίεσθαι.—κατεῖχον εἰς τὸν αἰγ.: "they made for the beach," R.V., in order to land, cf. Xen., Hell., ii., 1, 29; others take it as meaning to check the ship's headway, but better, to hold or head the ship, Herod., vii., 59, 188, so Grimm-Thayer, sub v., sc. τὴν ναῦν, whilst others take the verb intransitively as above in R.V.—τὸν ἀρτέμονα: "the foresail," R.V., Ramsay, J. Smith. The word has been interpreted by various writers as meaning nearly every sail which a vessel carries. If the interpretation of ver. 17 is correct, it could not mean the mainsail as A.V. Others apply it to the stern-sail, which bears the name to-day (Italian, artimone; French, voile d'artimon), but to set this sail would have been the most foolish thing they could have done, so Vars, Breusing. The word is found only here for the foresail, and its meaning is fixed by the fact that no other sail could be so well used by sailors under the circumstances, see Breusing, p. 79, J. Smith, pp. 141 and 193 ff., 4th edit. In his edition, 1899, Wendt thinks it probable that the sail here meant is otherwise called δόλων, but see J. Smith, p. 200, 4th edit. In his former edition he preferred to interpret it of the topsail (Meyer, Weiss, Zöckler, Baumgarten), but Breusing, p. xii., points out that only in the sixteenth century were topsails introduced; see also Vars, p. 93.

Ver. 41. περιπ. δὲ εἰς τ. διθ.: Luke x. 30, James i. 2, with the dative, as generally, but Arrian, περιπίπτειν εἰς τόπους πετρώδεις (Wetstein), 2 Macc. vi. 13, x. 4, Polyb., i., 37, 1. εἰς τόπον διθ.: a bank or a ridge between two seas, which has sea on both sides; cf. Dio Chrys., 5, p. 83, where reference is made to the dangers of the sea: βραχέα καὶ διθάλαττα καὶ ταινίαι μακραὶ . . . ἄπορον . . . παρέχουσι τὸ πέλαγος (Wetstein and Blass). Breusing, Vars and Goerne (so Blass) take the words εἰς τ. δ. to refer to a hidden ridge beneath the water, and the aorist περιπ. in contrast to the imperfect κατεῖχον seems to favour this, as expressing that they came upon a τόπ. διθ. unexpectedly, cf. Page's note and Ramsay's translation, "chancing on a bank between two seas". But the latter writer adds that the περιπ. does not imply want of purpose, as ἐπώκειλαν shows, and the meaning is that while at anchor they could not see the exact character of the spot (see also C. and H.), but as they approached they found that they had lighted on the channel not more than a hundred yards in breadth between the island of Salmonetta and the mainland; this might very properly be called "a place where two seas meet," A. and R.V., as it formed a communication between the sea within the bay and the sea outside. The adjective διθ. is as applicable to water uniting two seas, e.g., the Bosphorus, cf. Strabo, ii., 5, 12 (quoted by Smith), as to land like the Isthmus of Corinth; see J. Smith, pp. 142, 178, 4th edit., Hackett, C. and H., Lumby, Rendall, and note in Speaker's Commentary. Breusing, p. 204, Goerne, Wendt (1899) take it of St. Paul's Bank which lies just in front of St. Paul's Bay, so too Vars, p. 258, for the same view and its support.—ἐπώκειλαν τὴν ναῦν: "they ran the vessel aground" (cf. J. Smith, p. 143, 4th edit.), see critical note. ἐποκέλλω and ἐπικέλλω are both used in classical Greek, but the latter is "altogether poetical" (Blass), and more usually intransitive. In Homer, Odys., ix., 148, however, we have νῆας . . . ἐπικέλσαι, and 546, νῆα ἐκέλσαμεν (cf. adpellere navem). Blass, Philology of the Gospels, p. 186, sees in this sudden introduction of the phrase ἐπώκειλαν τὴν ναῦν an indication that St. Luke had read his Homer, since in no other passage in the N.T. do we find the obsolete word ἡ ναῦς, the commoner expression τὸ πλοῖον occurring in this chapter no less than thirteen times. R.V. renders τὴν ναῦν "the vessel." all other E.V. "the ship," and

[1] των κυμ., but ℵ*AB, so Tisch., W.H., R.V. have only υπο τ. βιας. The words των κυμ. are, however, retained here by Weiss, Blass, Hilg.; Vulg., Gig. have maris.

[2] Before τους δεσμ. Blass (not Hilg.) with Gig. in β text adds παντας.

[3] διαφυγοι, but very slight authority. Tisch., W.H., Blass, Hilg., Weiss, Wendt διαφυγῃ ℵABCHLP 61, Chrys.

[4] After εκατον. Blass adds with Gig. εκωλυσεν τουτο γενεσθαι, μαλιστα δια τον Π. ινα διασωσῃ αυτον.

it has been thought that the word is so changed here because that which had hitherto been a πλοῖον capable of sailing was now reduced to a mere hulk (Wordsworth, Humphry).—καὶ ἡ μὲν πρῴρα ἐρείσασα: "and the prow struck," R.V., Ramsay, this is accounted for by the peculiar nature of the bottom in St. Paul's Bay, see J. Smith, Ramsay, Hackett, Alford, "a bottom of mud graduating into tenacious clay, into which the fore part would fix itself, and be held fast while the stern was exposed to the force of the waves". For the verb in intransitive sense as here cf. Prov. iv. 4, cf. Æneid, v., 206 (Wetstein).—ἀσάλ.: only in Heb. xii. 8 in N.T., but σαλεύειν several times in Luke, in Gospel and Acts; in classical Greek and LXX; adverb -τως, Polyb., ix., 9, 8, cf. also Ecclus. xxix. 18.—ἡ δὲ πρύμνα ἐλύετο ὑπὸ τῆς βίας: "but the stern began to break up," R.V., marking the imperfect as distinguished from aorist ἔμεινεν, Blass, Gram., p. 186; Æn., x., 303, Cic., Att., xv., 11 (Wetstein).—βίας τῶν κυμ., see critical note. βία: four times in Acts, see on v. 26, nowhere else in N.T., but frequent in LXX, Vulgate, "a vi maris," which Breusing, p. 203, strongly endorses.

Ver. 42. τῶν δὲ στρατ.: only the soldiers, since they and not the sailors were responsible for the safety of the prisoners, cf. xii. 7, xvi. 27; C. and H., small edit., p. 236.—ἐκκολ.: "swim away" (Ramsay), literally "out," Eur., Hel., 1609, Dion H., v., 24.—διαφ.: only here in N.T., LXX, Josh. viii. 22, Judg. vii. 19, Prov. xix. 5, 1 Macc. xv. 21, 2 Macc. xii. 35, etc., so absolutely in Herod., i., 10.

Ver. 43. βουλόμενος: "desiring," R.V.; the centurion had from the first, ver. 3, treated Paul with respect, and the respect had no doubt been deepened by the prisoner's bearing in the hour of danger, and he would naturally wish to save the man to whom he owed his own safety, and that of the whole crew. διασῶσαι, even if he cared little for the rest he was determined "to save Paul to the end," literally, so C. and H. There is no reason whatever to regard the words βουλ. . . . τὸν Π. as an interpolation.—ἐκώλυσεν αὐτοὺς τοῦ β.: only here with this construction, accusative of person and genitive of thing, but similar usage in Xenophon, Polybius. For the resultative aorist, i.e., the aorist of a verb whose present implies effort or intention, commonly denoting the success of the effort, cf. also Matt. xxvii. 20, Acts vii. 36, Burton, p. 21.—τοὺς δυν. κολυμβᾷν: probably Paul was amongst the number; he had thrice been shipwrecked, and had passed a day and a night in the open sea, 2 Cor. xi. 25 (Felten, Plumptre).—ἐξιέναι: four times in Acts, nowhere else in N.T., xiii. 42, xvii. 15, xx. 7.—ἀποῤῥίψαντας: "should cast themselves overboard and get first to the land," R.V., where they could help the others to safety, so Breusing, Goerne, Renan; A.V. not so expressive. ἀποῤῥίπτειν: here used reflexively, see instance in Wetstein.

[1] Instead of επεγνωσαν ℵABC* 13, 61, 68, 137, Syrr. P. and H., Boh. read επεγνωμεν, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Hilg. διασ. om. by Blass with Gig., Syr. Pesh., but retained by Hilg. Instead of Μελιτη (Tisch., R.V. text, Weiss, Blass, Hilg.), W.H., R.V. marg. read Μελιτηνη with B*, Syr. H. mg. Gk., Arm., Boh., Gig.

[2] ℵ* has προσανελαμβανον, so Blass and Hilg.; 137 has προσελαμβανον; Vulg., Par. reficiebant; Gig. refecerunt, and Blass takes the word in his text as = reficiebant. Wendt thinks that this may have been the original reading. For αναψ. (Meyer) ℵABC 61, 68, Tisch., W.H., Blass, Hilg., Weiss read αψαντες.

Ver. 44. τοὺς λ., sc. ἐξιέναι ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν.—οὓς μὲν . . . οὓς δὲ, Luke xxiii. 33, and in classical Greek.—ἐπὶ σανίσιν: "some on planks and some on pieces from the ship," Ramsay; the planks which were in use in the ship as distinguished from actual parts or fragments of the ship in the next clause; in LXX, Ezek. xxvii. 5, the word is used of planks for the deck of a ship (Cant. viii. 9, 2 Kings xii. 9 (?)). Breusing, pp. 45, 203 (so Blass), takes it of the boards or planks which were used for keeping the cargo firmly in its place. The furniture of the vessel had already been thrown overboard, so that we can only think of the pieces broken away as the ship stranded, or perhaps broken off by the escaping crew. ἐπί: here used promiscuously with dative and genitive in the same sense.—ἐγένετο: with infinitive following, characteristic of St. Luke, Friedrich, p. 13.—διασωθῆναι: on its use by St. Luke here and in xxviii. 1, 4 (Luke vii. 3), see Hobart, pp. 9, 10, 284. For the remarkable correspondence between the details of the scene of the shipwreck and the topography of St. Paul's Bay see not only J. Smith and Ramsay, but Goerne, p. 374, Breusing, p. 204, and Vars, p. 257. Breusing and Vars both admit that it is not safe to trust too much to tradition, but in this case, as they both point out, it was only likely that St. Paul would have won loyal adherents in the island who would have handed down every detail of his visit to their children, and the local tradition is in striking accordance with the description of the sacred narrative; see further Introd., p. 8.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—Ver. 1. διασωθέντες, see on xxvii. 43. Used by Josephus of his own shipwreck and escape, Vita, 3, and in Xen. and Thuc. of coming safely to a place.—τότε ἐπέγ.: not imperfect as in xxvii. 39; here denoting the immediate recognition of the place after they had once gained safety (Weiss, Rendall, C.H.). St. Paul's Bay is several miles distant from Valetta, the harbour which the sailors doubtless knew previously, see also Breusing, p. 190, Vars, p. 243, and J. Smith, pp. 140 and 148, 4th edition.—Μελίτη, see critical note; Malta, cf. Diod. Sic., v., 12, Strabo, vi., 2, Ovid, Fasti, iii., 567, Sicula Melita as distinct from Melita Illyrica (Meleda). There is no need here to refute the view that the latter, in the Adriatic Sea on the coast of Dalmatia, is meant. This view depends chiefly upon the narrow view of the meaning of the Adria xxvii. 27, see also below on vv. 2, 3. It was first put forward in the tenth century by Constantine the Porphyrogenite, and was advocated in the last century by a Dalmatian monk, Padre Georgi, himself a native of Meleda, no doubt jealous for the honour of his birthplace and his monastery. Its chief champion may be said to be W. Falconer, in his Dissertation on St. Paul's Voyage, 1817, republished in 1870 by his nephew, Judge Falconer. This last was an unsuccessful attempt to controvert the arguments of J. Smith in favour of Malta, who may be said to have established his case to demonstration (see for a candid description of Falconer's view "Adria" (Dickson), Hastings' B.D.). More recent nautical authorities have most decisively confirmed the view of J. Smith, cf. Breusing, p. 190, and Vars, p. 242. Quite apart from the strong local tradition in favour of Malta, and the testimony of the Apocryphal Acta Petri et Pauli in favour of Γαυδομελέτη (Gosso-Malta) (for references to Lipsius' edition, Wendt and Zöckler, in loco), it is not too much to say that Meleda could not have been reached without a miracle under the circumstances of weather described in the narrative, cf. Dean Howson's "Melita," B.D.[1], ii., pp. 315-317, and Zahn (in answer to Mommsen), Einleitung, ii., p. 422.

Ver. 2. βάρβαροι, i.e., they were not a Greek-speaking population, cf. Rom. i. 14 (not barbarians in the modern sense of rude and uncivilised); they were of Phœnician descent, and came under the Roman dominion in the second Punic War, Livy, xxi., 51. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 343, sees in the title an indication that the writer was himself of Greek nationality. For the use of the term in classical Greek, and by Philo and Josephus, see "Barbarian" (F. C. Conybeare), Hastings' B.D., Grimm-Thayer, sub v., and Mr. Page's note. (In 2 Macc. ii. 21 the writer describes Judas Maccabæus as chasing "barbarous multitudes," τὰ βάρβαρα πλήθη, retorting on the Greeks the epithet habitually applied by them to all nations not their own, Speaker's Commentary.) See further the evidence of coins and inscriptions in Zahn, Einleitung, ii., 422, proving as against Mommsen that the Phœnician tongue had not died out in the island, and cf. above, Introd., p. 8.—οὐ τὴν τυχ., cf. xix. 11, "no common kindness," R.V. (and so A.V. in xix. 11).—φιλαν.: see note on xxvii. 3. The word is found in LXX, Esther viii. 13, 2 Macc. vi. 22, xiv. 9, 3 Macc. iii. 15, 18, and in classical Greek, but it was a word which a physician would be very likely to employ, for Hippocrates speaks of "philanthropy" in a physician as ever accompanying a real love of his profession. Galen distinguishes between those who healed through "philanthropy" and those who healed merely for gain, and even a more generous diet for the sick was called φιλανθρωποτέρα τροφή, Hobart, p. 296. The word is used here only and in Tit. iii. 4 in N.T.—ἀνάψ. γὰρ πυράν, Luke xii. 49, James iii. 5; if we read the simple verb (see critical note) we have it three times with λύχνον in Luke viii. 16, xi. 33, xv. 8, and nowhere else in N.T. (except with meaning "to touch"). πυράν: only here and in ver. 3 in N.T., cf. Judith vii. 5, 1 Macc. xii. 28, 2 Macc. i. 22, x. 36 (see H. and R.), and similar phrases in classical Greek.—προσελάβοντο, cf. xvii. 5, xviii. 26 for similar use, and five times by St. Paul; cf. 2 Macc. x. 15, see critical note.—ἐφεστῶτα, cf. Polyb., xviii. 3, 7; in N.T. 2 Tim. iv. 6, only in Luke and Paul, præsentem, Wetstein, "present," A. and R.V. Weiss and De Wette take it as meaning that the rain suddenly came upon them.—ψῦχος: this and the mention of the rain prove that St. Paul's ship could not have encountered a sirocco wind, i.e., from the south-east, for this only blows for two or three days, and even in November is hot and sultry (Hackett). W.H. read ψύχος, but Weiss, Wendt, Blass as above, see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 68.

Ver. 3. συστρέψαντος: here only in Acts, but cf. xi. 27, xvi. 39, in β text; = exemplum αὐτουργίας, Bengel. Cf. Matt. xvii. 22, W.H., R.V. margin; of collecting men, 2 Macc. xiv. 30.—φρυγάνων: brushwood, copse; the furze still growing near St. Paul's Bay would well afford material for a fire (Lewin), and it may be quite true that wood is found nowhere else but in a place at a distance from the Bay; in classical Greek used in plural for dry sticks, especially firewood; here only in N.T., but several times in LXX, for straw, stubble, and bramble.—τι before πλῆθος, see critical note: implying as much as he could carry, Weiss; πλ. used elsewhere of persons.—ἔχιδνα: the objection that no poisonous serpents are found to-day in Malta, like that based on the absence of wood in ver. 2, may well be dismissed as "too trivial to deserve notice; such changes are natural and probable in a small island, populous and long civilised," Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 343, Breusing, p. 191, Vars, p. 243; so too J. Smith, p. 151, 4th edition, refers to the gradual disappearance of the viper in Arran as the island became more frequented, and cf.

Hackett's note for similar proof. Mr. Lewin, as late as 1853, believed that he saw a viper near St. Paul's Bay, St. Paul, ii., 208.—ἐκ: "out of," but if ἀπό "by reason of," R.V. margin, "from the heat," the viper numbed by the cold felt the sudden heat, and was restored to activity, cf. on its habits (Hackett), ἀπό "in causæ significatu sæpe apud Græcos," Grotius, Bengel. Cf. xx. 9, and Luke xxi. 26.—ἐξελθοῦσα, see critical note. διεξ. supported by Meyer and Alford, as if the serpent glided out through the sticks.—θέρμης: only in Luke in N.T., but in classics and in LXX, Job vi. 17, Ps. xviii. (xix.) 6, Eccl. iv. 11, Ecclus. xxxviii. 28; often used in medical writers instead of θερμότης (Hobart), but the latter is also used in Hipp.—καθῆψε: only here in N.T., but frequent in classical Greek, and usually in middle, although not found in LXX, cf. however Symm., καθάπτεσθαι, Cant. i. 6, cf. Epict., Diss., iii., 20, 10, i.e., τοῦ τραχήλου: (Grimm): Blass, Page, Felten render "bit," momordit. So Nösgen and Zöckler, who think that this is evidently meant from the context, although not necessarily contained in the verb itself; Dioscorides used it of poisonous matter introduced into the body (Hobart, p. 288). Blass thus expresses the force of the aorist, "momento temporis hoc factum est, priusquam P. manum retraxisset".

Ver. 4. τὸ θηρίον: "the beast," R.V. Although this is the meaning of the Greek word, it is to be noted that St. Luke uses it here exactly as the medical writers, who applied it to venomous serpents—in particular, to the viper, ἔχιδνα (so Aristotle), and an antidote made chiefly from the flesh of vipers went by the name ἡ θηριακή (Hobart, Zahn, Knabenbauer), and those bitten by a viper were called θηριόδηκτοι.—κρεμ. ἐκ: "hanging from," R.V., it clung by its mouth to the hand of Paul, construction as in classical Greek, cf. 2 Macc. vi. 10.—πάντως: only in Luke and Paul, expressing strong affirmation, cf. xxi. 22, and Luke iv. 23; cf. Tob. xiv. 8, 2 Macc. iii. 13.—φονεύς, a murderer, and therefore justice demands his life, death for death; they saw that he was a prisoner perhaps from his chains (Bengel); at all events the solders would have guarded him, as we may infer from xxvii. 42.—ἡ Δίκη: "justice," R.V., cf. Hesiod, Theog., 902; so in Soph., Ant., 544; Œd. Col., 1384; for the personification cf. Wisdom i. 8, xi. 20, and several instances in 4 Macc., see Grimm-Thayer, sub v. The Maltese may have heard the name from the Greeks or Romans, or they may have honoured a goddess of their own, whose name Luke here represents by ἡ Δ., "debile lumen naturæ . . . nec quis sit ὁ Δίκαιος Justus Ultor norunt," Bengel.—διασωθέντα, see on xxvii. 43.—οὐκ εἴασεν: "hath not suffered," they thought of him as already dead, as if the deadly bite had already done its work; not sinit, as Vulgate, but sivit.

Ver. 5. ἀποτ.: only in Luke, Luke ix. 5, in parallel in Matt. and Mark, ἐκτ., cf. Lam. ii. 7, and in classical Greek, Eur., Bacch., 253.—ἔπαθεν οὐδὲν κακόν, cf. Mark xvi. 18, Luke x. 19.

Ver. 6. οἱ δέ . . .: Paul shook off the viper—the natives looked for a fatal result. They knew the deadly nature of the bite, and their subsequent conduct shows that they regarded it as nothing short of miraculous that Paul escaped. So St. Luke evidently wishes to describe the action, see on μέν οὖν, ver. 5, and δέ, Rendall, Acts, p. 161, Appendix.—προσεδόκων, see below.—πίμπρασθαι, from the form πίμπρημι, present infinitive passive, see critical note, and Winer-Schmiedel, p. 122; cf. in LXX, Numb. v. 21, 22, 27, πρήθειν, H. and R., of parts of the body becoming swollen. In classical Greek πίμπρασθαι means "to take fire," and πρήθειν "to cause to swell," and those two ideas are combined, as in the word πρηστήρ, "a venomous snake, the bite of which caused both inflammation and swelling" (Page, in loco), cf. Lucan, ix., 790. In the N.T. the verb is peculiar to St. Luke, and it is the usual medical word for inflammation (Hobart, Zahn) in Hipp., Aret., Galen.—καταπίπτειν: only in Luke in N.T., cf. Luke viii. 6, Acts xxvi. 14, it was used by medical writers of persons falling down suddenly from wounds, or in epileptic fits; Hipp., Galen (Hobart, Zahn), cf. the asp-bitten Charmian in Ant. and Cleo. (Shakespeare), Act v., Scene 2.—ἄφνω: only in Acts ii. 2, xvi. 26.—προσδ. . . . ἄτοπον: the two words are described by Hobart as exactly those which a medical man would use (so too Zahn), and he gives two instances of the latter word from Galen, in speaking of the bite of a rabid dog, or of poison, p. 289. The word is used elsewhere in N.T. of something morally amiss; cf. Luke xxiii. 41, Acts xxv. 5, 2 Thess. iii. 2, but here evidently of something amiss physically. In R.V. it is rendered in each passage "amiss". The word in N.T. is confined to Luke and Paul, but it is found several times in LXX in an ethical sense (as in N.T., except in loco), cf. Job iv. 8, xi. 11, xxvii. 6, xxxiv. 12, xxxv. 13, Prov. xxiv. 55 (xxx. 20), cf. 2 Macc. xiv. 23; so too in Thucydides, Josephus, Plutarch, etc.; but it is used of any harm happening to a person as here, cf. Jos., Ant., viii., 14, 4; xi., 5, 2; Herodian, iv., 11. προσδοκία, peculiar to St. Luke in N.T.; cf. Luke xxi. 26, Acts xii. 11, and προσδοκάω, in Luke six times, in Acts five, was, no doubt, frequently used in medical language (Hobart, Zahn) for the expectation of the result of a disease or paroxysm "when they were long in expectation," R.V.), but in Jos., Ant., viii., 14, 4, we have καὶ μηδὲν τῶν ἀτόπων προσδοκᾷν, and in Herodian, iv., 11, μηδὲν ἄτοπον προσδοκοῦντες· εἰς αὐτὸν γιν., cf. Luke iv. 23 (Klostermann, Weiss).—μεταβαλλόμενοι, so frequently in classics without τὴν γνώμην, cf. Jos., B. J., v., 9, 3.—θεὸν αὐτὸν εἶναι: it is perhaps fanciful to suppose with Grotius and Wetstein that they compared him to the infant Hercules, or to Æsculapius represented with the serpent, but the latter is undoubtedly right in adding, "eleganter autem hic describitur vulgi inconstantia"; we naturally compare with Chrysostom the startling change in the people of Lystra, xiv., 11, 19, "Aut latro inquiunt aut deus . . . datur tertium: homo Dei" (Bengel).

Ver. 7. χωρία: "lands," R.V. Vulgate, prædia. In this passage τόπος and χωρίον occur together, but whilst the former is used of place indefinitely, the latter is used of a definite portion of space enclosed or complete in itself; cf. John iv. 5; Grimm-Thayer's Syn., sub v., τόπος.—τῷ πρώτῳ: an official title technically correct in Malta, Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 343, honoraria appellatio, so too Schmiedel, Encycl. Bibl., i., 47, 1899; as his father was alive, he would not have been called from his estates (see, however, O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 106), but the inscriptional authorities confirm the first view, a Greek inscription giving πρῶτος Μελιταίων καὶ Πάτρων, applied to a Roman Knight, Prudens by name, ἱππεὺς Ῥ., so that Publius may well have been of the same rank, and in a Latin inscription we have municipii Melitensium primus omnium, see Zahn, Einleitung, ii., p. 422; Blass, in loco; Zöckler, Holtzmann, Knabenbauer, also Alford, Lewin, Hackett, Renan; possibly the conjecture may be correct that the Greek and Latin inscriptions give a translation of a title which the Romans already found in vogue in the island. Publius would be naturally the chief authority in the island under the Roman prætor of Sicily, Cic., Verr., iv., 18.—Ποπλίῳ: Greek form for the prænomen Publius, "nomen a populus derivatum," Blass; Ramsay, p. 343, thinks that Poplius may = the Greek rendering of the nomen Popilius, but that the peasantry may have spoken of him familiarly by his prænomen Publius. Tradition makes him bishop of Malta (Felten, Knaben-bauer).—ἀναδεξ.: only here of hospitable reception = ὑποδέχεσθαι, xvii. 7; φιλοφ., 2 Macc. iii. 9, 4 Macc. viii. 5; in the former passage φιλοφ. ἀποδεχθείς, so in Jos., Ant., xiv., 8, 5, φιλοφ. ὑποδέχεσθαι, and instances in Wetstein, see above on ver. 2.—ἡμᾶς: some take the word as referring to Paul and his companions, Luke and Aristarchus (as it seems to lead on to what follows), perhaps including Julius, whilst others point out that he may have entertained the whole crew for the short space of time mentioned, as the ἡμέρας τρεῖς indicates that the entertainment was only provisional; probably he had a large number of slaves (Nösgen, Weiss). Publius may well have been officially responsible for the needs of the Roman soldiers and their prisoners, but φιλοφ. indicates that the duty was performed with generous courtesy.—ἐξένισεν: entertained (as his guests), cf. x. 6, 23, etc., Heb. xiii. 2. The traditional site was at Civita Vecchia, the old capital of the island, where St. Paul spent the three months, and another tradition places it on the way from St. Paul's Bay to the capital.

Ver. 8. πυρετοῖς: the use of the plural for a fever is peculiar to St. Luke in N.T., and quite medical, Hobart, J. Smith, Zahn (cf. Luke iv. 38, 39); although the plural is found in Dem., Lucian in the sense of "intermittent attacks of fever," but Hobart shows that the term was very common in Hipp., and he also quotes from Aretæus and Galen. Each of the other Evangelists uses πυρετός, but in the singular, never in the plural. The disease was common in Malta (J. Smith and C. and H.).—δυσεντερίᾳ, see critical note, "dysentery," R.V.; "Lucas medicus morbos accuratius describere solet," Wetstein; another medical term, peculiar to St. Luke in N.T., often joined with πυρετός by Hippocrates (Hobart, Zahn).—συνεχ., cf. Luke iv. 38, συνεχομένη πυρετῷ μεγάλῳ, where St. Luke not only speaks of πυρ. μέγας, where Matthew and Mark (viii. 14 and i. 30) have simply πυρετός, but also introduces the term συνεχ. where they have πυρέσσουσα; ἔχεσθαι and συνέχ. are both used by the medical writers as in these passages, although no doubt συνέχεσθαι is sometimes found with a word like νοσήματι in classical Greek (cf. Grotius. in loco, Hobart, Zahn, Weiss), so in Hippocrates, ὑπὸ δυσεντερίης ἐχομένῳ, and τοῖσιν ὑπὸ τῆς ἡρακλείης νόσου συνεχομένοισιν; nine times in St. Luke, elsewhere only three times in N.T., and once in St. Matt. iv. 24, in a way similar to St. Luke, but joined there not only with νόσοις, but with a word (βασάνοις) which the medical writers (so St. Luke) never employ of bodily disease.—ἰάσατο αὐτόν, cf. Mark xvi. 18, the word is more frequently used by the medical writers for "healing" than any other (Hobart), and it occurs in St. Luke's writings fourteen times and once figuratively, in St. Matthew four times and once figuratively, once in St. Mark, three times in St. John, once figuratively, and in the rest of the N.T. three times, but in each case figuratively. In answer to the attempts to regard the miraculous element as an addition to the narrative here, as in the previous chapter, it may be sufficient to quote the remarks of Weizsäcker: "The stormy voyage and shipwreck form the central point of the narrative: to this is appended the residence at Malta. In the former, Paul reveals himself as a prophet; in the latter, as the possessor of miraculous power. We should make a vast mistake, however, if we were to infer from this that the simple travel-record had here been revised by a writer intent upon artificially glorifying the Apostle as a worker of miracles. The narrative is an indivisible whole; it is impossible to disentangle the mere history of travel from it, or to strip away the miraculous additions," Apostolic Age, ii., p. 126, E.T.

Ver. 9. ἐθεραπεύοντο: "were cured," R.V. Lekebusch, pp. 382, 393, and Holtzmann, in loco, think that the medical skill of St. Luke may also have been instrumental in effecting these cures, and this is urged on the ground that ἡμᾶς, ver. 10, intimates that not only St. Paul received honour in return for the cures effected. But such a conjecture must remain quite uncertain, although it is no doubt quite possible that as we have here a verb which properly denotes medical treatment (cf. θεραπεία, Luke ix. 11) for the restoration of health, the care (cura) of medical skill was freely added by St. Luke, and enhanced the debt which the sick owed.

11. Μετὰ δὲ τρεῖς μῆνας ἀνήχθημεν ἐν πλοίῳ παρακεχειμακότι ἐν τῇ νήσῳ, Ἀλεξανδρινῷ,[2] παρασήμῳ Διοσκούροις· 12. καὶ καταχθέντες

[1] For the sing. την χρ. ℵABI 13, 40, 137 have the plural, so Tisch., W.H., R.V., Blass, Weiss, Wendt, Hilg.

Ver. 10. πολλαῖς τιμαῖς: "with many honours," A. and R.V., used quite generally, so in Vulgate, "multis honoribus"; even in the expression "honos habendus medico," Cic., Ad Div., xvi., 9, we need not limit the word to the honorarium; so in 1 Tim. v. 17 τιμῆς is used quite generally, and in Ecclus. xxxviii. 1 it is very doubtful whether in the expression "honour a physician," τίμα ἰατρόν, the verb refers to payment. There is therefore no need to take the word as referring to a physician's fee in money, as Wordsworth, Humphry, Plumptre, although the word may have been so used by a physician; but it was scarcely likely that St. Paul would have received such a reward for his services, to say nothing of the fact that it was contrary to Christ's commands, Matt. x. 8.—καὶ ἀναγ. ἐπέθεντο: "and when we sailed they put on board," R.V., so Ramsay, ἀναγ., technical term, xxvii. 2, 3.—τὰ πρὸς τὴν χ., see critical note, frequently in Luke and Paul, both in singular and plural, and often in LXX, cf. Acts xx. 34, Rom. xii. 13, used here quite generally; it may have included money, but no doubt things needful, post naufragium, Bengel.

Ver. 11. τρεῖς μῆνας: no account is given of St. Paul's doings in Malta, or of his preaching or founding a Church, but the writer's interest is centred on the Apostle's journey to Rome, and what immediately concerns it.—ἀνήχ., see above on xiii. 13; in the earlier part of February, as the shipwreck took place probably before the middle of November (Ramsay), but Blass thinks March, as he places the shipwreck about the commencement of December, but with a favourable wind the ship would risk the voyage, even before the regular sailing season commenced (so Wendt and Ramsay).—Ἀλεξ.: very likely a corn ship, driven for refuge by the same gale; on the accent here and in xxvii. 6 see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 73.—παρακεχειμακότι: only in Luke and Paul in N.T., cf. xxvii. 12, 1 Cor. xvi. 6, Tit. iii. 12, and in classical Greek.—παρασήμῳ Διοσκ.: "whose sign was the Twin Brothers," R.V., i.e., Castor and Pollux; or perhaps in a ship "marked with the image or figure of the Dioscuri," or the latter word in the dative may be a dedicatory inscription—marked "To the Dioscuri," i.e., in honour of them, so Wendt, Holtzmann, Grimm-Thayer. Others take παρασ. as a noun, so Alford, Page, quoting from an inscription found near Lutro and given by J. Smith, in which reference is made to a Dionysius of Alexandria as gubernator navis parasemo Isopharia. Phryn. prefers the form Διόσκοροι. Blass has ᾧ ἦν παράσημον Διοσκούρων, see critical note and Blass, in loco; cf. for the word 3 Macc. ii. 29. Castor and Pollux were best known as the tutelary gods of sailors, and probably at this date they were both the insigne and the tutela of the ship. St. Cyril of Alexandria tells us that it was always the Alexandrian method to ornament each side of the prow with the figures of deities, probably in this case Castor and Pollux, one on each side of the vessel; and we may further note that the twin brothers were specially honoured in the district of Cyrenaica, not far from Alexandria (Schol., Pind., Pyth., v., 6). For other classical notices cf. Hor., Od., i., 3, 2; iii., 29, 64; Catull., iv., 27; lxviii., 65; Eur., Helen., 1663, and "Castor and Pollux," B.D.[2], and "Dioscuri," Hastings' B.D. The mention of the ship's sign shows the minuteness of the information of an eye-witness, and the fact that an Alexandrian ship thus wintered in the island is a strong piece of incidental evidence in favour of the identification of the island with Malta; the latter would be a natural harbour for a ship of Alexandria on the way to Italy, but Meleda would be altogether out of the course (see J. Smith, p. 278, fourth edit.).

Ver. 12. καταχ.: "touching at," R.V., Ramsay, cf. xxvii. 3. We are not told that St. Paul landed, but the local tradition makes him the founder of the Sicilian Church, C. and H., p. 663, small edit.—Συρ.: (Siragosa) about 100 miles distant from Malta, the capital of Sicily, and a Roman colony; in a mercantile city St. Paul would find countrymen and Jewish proselytes; it was moreover a city of great historical interest, and a usual stopping-place for Alexandrian ships on their voyage to Italy; see C. and H., p. 662, u. s., and notices in Strabo, vi., p. 270 (but see also Grimm-Thayer, sub v., Συρ.); Cicero, Verr., iv., 53; Pliny, N.H., iii., 8, and B.D., sub v. For accentuation cf. also Grimm-Thayer. —τρεῖς ἡμέρας: probably to wait for a favouring breeze from the south.—ἐπεμείναμεν: with accusative of time, cf. x. 48, xxi. 4, 10, ver. 14 below, 1 Cor. xvi. 7.

Ver. 13. περιελθόντες: so A. and R.V., but latter in margin περιελόντες, see critical note. Ramsay also following T.R. points out that the latter reading could hardly signify more than "cast off" ("cast loose," margin, R.V.), unnecessary here although important information in xxvii. 40, where τὰς ἀγκ. is added, and the meaning is evidently different. Ramsay renders "by tacking" (the verb referring to the frequent alteration of the ship's course); they worked up to Rhegium by good seamanship as they could not go straight across, J. Smith, C. and H., p. 663, small edit. Mr. Lewin, St. Paul, ii., p. 736, takes a different view, and thinks that they were obliged to stand out to sea to fill their sails, and so to come to Rhegium by a circuitous sweep. R.V. renders simply "made a circuit," so Grimm-Thayer. W.H., ii., p. 226, explain their rendering "weighed anchor" by the use of the verb in xxvii. 40 (but see Blass above), the elliptic employment of transitive verbs being common in Greek nautical language as in English, and by the opinion that the run from Syracuse to Rhegium could not be described as circuitous, unless the ship was thrown out by contrary winds (but see above); Mr. Rendall supports W.H., Mr. Page the opposite, following T.R., so Smith, p. 156, fourth edit., and see critical note above, and Wendt (1899), p. 418. A.V. "fetched a compass," so Tyndale, which formerly meant that they made a circuit, but the phrase is now obsolete, cf. 2 Sam. v. 23, 2 Kings iii. 9, same Greek verb in LXX.—Ῥήγιον: Reggio, Titus put in here on his way from Judæa to Puteoli bound for Rome, Suet., Tit., 5; and we learn from Jos., Ant., xix., 2, 5, that Caligula began to construct a harbour for the corn-ships of Egypt, although he never finished it. The place was situated at the southern entrance to the Straits of Messina, here little more than a few miles in breadth between it and the city Messina (on its name from ῥήγνυμι, because Sicily was at this point rent away from Italy, see Grimm-Thayer, sub v., and Wetstein). St. Paul was said to have visited Messina, and to have given the Christians a bishop, Acta Petri, Acta Pauli, Lipsius, p. ix. (Zöckler). The coins show us that here too the Dioscuri were the patron deities. —κατην. only in Luke and Paul, see xvi. 1, cf. 2 Macc. iv. 44.—ἐπιγ.: "a south wind sprang up," R.V., here only in N.T., cf. Thuc., iii., 74, iv., 30; Xen., Hell., iii., 2, 17, oborto Austro, Blass, or it may mean coming after or in succession to, ἐπί, the previous adverse wind. —δευτεραῖοι, cf. πεμπταῖοι, xx. 6, Blass in β, John xi. 39, Phil. iii. 5, so in classical Greek. The distance is about 180 miles, and J. Smith, p. 217, 4th edit., points out that if we suppose the ship to sail at seven knots an hour the voyage would take about twenty-six hours, and St. Luke's account is shown to be very accurate; see also Ramsay and Hackett for examples of the ancient rate of sailing quite in accordance with the facts before us.—Ποτιόλους (Pozzuoli), in earlier days Dicaearchia; its new name was Latin, probably from the mineral springs in the neighbourhood a puteis, or perhaps a putendo (C. and H.). It was not only a great landing-place for travellers from the East, but the great harbour for Alexandrian corn-ships, as also for the trade from Syria and Spain (Renan, Saint Paul, p. 558). Seneca, Epist., 77, gives us a vivid description of the interest taken in the arrival of the corn-ships, since the people of Rome depended so much upon this cargo for food. The importance gained by the place is shown by the fact that it gave its name to the bay, once the Bay of Cumæ, now the Bay of Naples, but in St. Paul's day Sinus Puteolanus. Here St. Ignatius desired to land that he might follow the footsteps of St. Paul to Rome (Martyr., v.), see further Jos., Ant., xvii., 12, 1, xviii., 7, 2; Strabo, xvii., 1, 7, and Wetstein's references. For modern writers cf. also Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 218, and Farrar, ii., 386; their description shows how the Apostle's eyes now rested upon "one of the loveliest of earthly scenes".

Ver. 14. ἀδελφούς, see on i. 15, they may have been from Alexandria, as the commerce between it and Puteoli was so considerable; the absence of the article indicates that the writer knew nothing of their presence previously, but at all events Blass is right when he says, "non magis mirum est Puteolis Christianos ante Paulum fuisse quam Romæ". Probably after Rome itself Puteoli was the most ancient Jewish community in Italy. Jews were there as early as B.C. 4, after the death of Herod the Great, Jos., Ant., xvii., 12, 1; B. J., ii., 7, 1, and Schürer accepts the notice of the existence of a Christian Church as in the text, Jewish People, div. ii., vol. ii., p. 241, E.T., so too O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 108; see also Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 26. Rhegium and Puteoli are the only two Italian towns mentioned in the N.T. (except, of course, Rome itself), and when we consider that Puteoli was the most important port, not only for ships from Alexandria, but also from Syria, there is nothing surprising in the fact that Christianity found an early and an easy entrance; at Pompeii, not far from Puteoli, Christianity had made its way, and before 79 A.D. it was discussed by the gossiping loungers in the street (Ramsay).—παρεκ.: "we were entreated to tarry," R.V. Ramsay (so Blass), rendering "we were consoled among them, remaining seven days" (see critical note), thinks that R.V., although strongly supported, is irreconcilable with St. Paul's situation as a prisoner. Julius was a Roman officer, and discipline was natural to him, however friendly he was towards Paul. Blass compares xx. 12, and Zöckler also prefers the inferior reading on account of this more usual meaning of παρακαλεῖν. Probably the seven days' delay was needful for Julius to report his arrival at Rome, and to receive further orders from the capital, perhaps with regard to the disposal of the prisoners, but St. Paul must have been rejoiced at the opportunity of celebrating a Sunday with the little Christian Church at Puteoli, cf. xx. 6, xxi. 4.—καὶ οὕτως: "and so we came to Rome," about 140 miles, cf. xxvii. 25, "destinatum itineris terminum," Blass, cf. the article before Ῥ., Blass, Gram., p. 149, so Bengel (but see Page's note). Others take οὕτως as simply = after the stay of seven days, a notice which leads on to ver. 15, and makes us to understand how the brethren came to meet us, since news would easily have reached Rome, and a deputation of the brethren have arrived at Appii Forum. On the former view the writer marks the conclusion and the aim of the long journey (cf. εἰς τὴν Ῥ. before the verb; in vv. 12, 13, names of places follow the verb without any article, Weiss), and there is a kind of triumph in the words: like an emperor who has fought a naval battle and overcome, Paul entered into that most imperial city; he was nearer now to his crown; Rome received him bound, and saw him crowned and proclaimed conqueror: cf. Chrys. Others take ἤλθ. as = ἐπορευόμεθα, the actual end of the journey following in ver. 16 (see on the other hand Wendt, in loco, 1888). But ver. 15 may possibly be taken as adding an episode which commences, as it were, a new section of the Apostle's work in the meeting with the brethren from Rome, the journey itself being regarded as completed in ver. 14 (Nösgen). If we read εἰσήλθομεν in ver. 16, see critical note, the word emphasises apparently the actual entry into the city, "and when we entered into," R.V., or it may simply take up the conclusion of ver. 14 (so Wendt, who sees no difficulty in the words). Ramsay, however, draws another distinction between vv. 14 and 16 (to which Wendt (1899) refers, without endorsing it), and thinks that the double expression of arrival is due to the double meaning which the name of a city-state bears in Greek (St. Paul, pp. 111, 347, and Expositor, Jan., 1899); thus Rome might be restricted to the walls and buildings, or it might include the whole ager Romanus, and so in ver. 14, "we reached the State Rome," we passed through two points in the ager Romanus, ver. 15, and in ver. 16, "we entered the (walls of) Rome".

Ver. 15. κἀκεῖθεν, see on xiv. 26.—τὰ περὶ ἡμῶν: phrase only in Luke and Paul, see above on p. 481. The natural supposition is that there were two companies; one met them in advance at Appii Forum, and the other nearer Rome at the Tres Tabernæ.—εἰς ἀπάντησιν, cf. 1 Thess. iv. 17, Matt. xxv. 6, xxvii. 32 (W.H. margin), frequent in LXX, cf. Polyb., v., 26, 8. See Plumptre's note on the meeting of Cicero on this same road on his return from exile, Senate and people going out to meet him; for St. Paul's friends in Rome see Lightfoot, Philippians, Introd., and p. 171 ff.; Sanday and Headlam, Romans, xviii., xxvii., xxxiv., xl., etc., Godet, L'Épître aux Romains, ii., 599 ff. Aquila and Priscilla would be amongst them.—Ἀππίου Φόρου: situated on the great Appian Way, near the modern Treponti, 43 miles from Rome, Cic., Ad Att., ii., 10; Hor., Sat., i., 5, 3, and for the distance, Itin. Ant., p. 107, Itin. Hier., p. 611 (see however on this point Encycl. Bibl., p. 267, 1899). Probably its name was due to Appius Claudius as the constructor of this part of the road, Livy, ix., 29, and even in the time of St. Paul it seems to have been connected in some way with the Appian family. It was situated at the northern end of a canal which ran thither from a few miles apparently above Terracina through the district of the Pomptine Marshes. The boatmen of whom Horace speaks in his lively description, u. s., were employed in conveying passengers in boats towed by mules along this canal. The Appian Way itself was parallel with the canal, so that the centurion and the Apostle might have travelled by either, and this uncertainty as to the route no doubt made the Roman Christians wait at Appii Forum. Night travellers apparently preferred the boat. The R.V. renders "The Market of Appius" (really the Greek is a transliteration of the Latin Appii forum, as the words stood in 1611, "forum" (not Forum), Hastings' B.D.). The word apparently implied what we should call a borough or assize town, cf. Forum Julium, etc. The picture drawn by Horace suggests a sharp contrast between the holy joy of the Christian meeting and the coarse vice and rude revelry which so often filled the wretched little town (Plumptre, C. and H.).—Τριῶν Ταβ.: Tres Tabernæ, frequent halting-place, deversorium, about 33 miles from Rome on the Via Appia, probably at the point where the road from Antium crosses it, near the modern Cisterna. At this time it was a place of some importance, cf. Cic., Ad Att., ii., 12. The Latin tabernæ = a shop of any kind, and would require an adjective like deversoria (sc. taberna) to be equivalent to a tavern in the modern sense, Lewin, Saint Paul, ii., 224.—εὐχ. τῷ Θεῷ ἔλαβε θάρσος, cf. Job xvii. 9, whether Ramsay is correct in connecting this encouragement with the chronic disorder of the Apostle, which would often occasion fits of depression, it is evident that St. Paul, who was so full of sympathy, "the heart of the world," and craved for sympathy from others, may well have felt that he was still a prisoner, and the recent perilous voyage may also have left its mark upon him. Anyhow, the meeting with Christian friends, and the thought that these Christians were not ashamed either of the Gospel of Christ, or of Paul the prisoner, even in Rome, may well have endued his soul with much strength. Bishop Lightfoot, Phil., pp. 16, 17 (so too Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 113), thinks that the words may intimate that it was a relief to St. Paul to find that some members at least of the Roman Church were favourably disposed towards him; but, as Zöckler points out, there is certainly no proof here, at least, that the Church was composed preponderatingly of Jewish Christians, or that Paul was glad that he received a welcome in a Church so composed, and we have no direct evidence of the existence of an anti-Pauline Jewish party among the Roman Christians; but in the presence of the brethren St. Paul would see a proof that this love was not merely in word or in letter, but in deed and in truth: "videbat Christum etiam Romæ esse," Bengel.

[2] After Ῥ. T.R. adds ο εκατονταρχος παρεδωκε τους δεσμιους τῳ στρατοπεδαρχῃ. R.V. om. in text, not marg. The words are supported by HLP 137, Syr. H. c*, Gig., Par. Prov., Blass in β, Hilg., Zöckler. They are om. by ℵABI 13, 40, 61, Vulg., Syr. P., Syr. H. text, Boh., Arm., Chrys., Tisch., W.H., Weiss, Wendt (read simply επετραπη τῳ Π., if words are omitted); see further below.

Ver. 16.—ἤλθομεν, see critical note. They would enter by the Porta Capena. On the words which follow see critical note. They are retained by Blass and Ramsay, although these writers differ as to their interpretation, while Lightfoot, Phil., pp. 7, 8, admitting that the balance of existing authorities is against them, inclines to see in the words a genuine tradition, even if no part of the original text. For Ramsay's view see above on xxvii. 1. Blass takes the expression τῷ στρατ. to refer to Afranius Burrus (and to this identification Lightfoot attaches much probability). It is striking that both before and after Burrus there were two "prefects," Tac., Ann., xii., 42, xiv., 51, whereas Luke writes τῷ στρατ., "the captain of the guard"; but on the other hand we can scarcely draw any decisive argument from this, because the writer may refer merely to the "prefect" in charge of this particular case, whether he had a colleague or not.—καθ' ἑαυτόν, see critical note for addition in β text. Not only the goodwill of the centurion, and the services which St. Paul had rendered, but also the terms in which Festus had reported the case in the elogium, would combine to secure this favour. The words do not imply that Paul was kept in prison in the camp apart from the other prisoners, but, as in vv. 23, 30, that he was allowed to have a house or lodging in the city (Ramsay); he could scarcely have summoned the Jews to the camp, ver. 17 (Bethge), see also Lightfoot, Phil., p. 103.—τῷ φυλάσσοντι αὐτὸν στρατ.: custodia militaris, he was still bound to a soldier by a light chain, so that he could not go in and out as he pleased, but the form which his custody took has been well compared to that which Herod Agrippa underwent, who was confined at one time in Rome, Jos., Ant., xviii., 6, 5, at first in the camp, and afterwards on the accession of Gaius in a house of his own, although still under military custody, cf. xxiv. 27.

Ver. 17. The whole section vv. 17-28 is referred by Hilgenfeld to the "author to Theophilus". In ver. 20 the Paul bound for the hope of Israel belongs only to the "author to Theophilus," cf. xxiii. 6, xxvi. 6; it is only the same author who still supposes him to bear the chain, xxvi. 29, which according to xxii. 29, 30, had been long removed. A reference to the passages in question is sufficient to show the unreasonableness of this criticism. In this same section Clemen can only see his two redactors, Judaicus and Antijudaicus, at work again, the latter in vv. 25-28, and the former in vv. 16-24. But it will be noticed that Wendt (1899) still allows that an historical kernel lies at the foundation of the narrative, and although he does not speak so unhesitatingly as in 1888, he still allows that it is not inconceivable that Paul soon after his arrival in Rome should seek to enter into relations with the Jews there, to convince them if possible of his innocence, and to prevent any unfavourable influences on their part upon his trial.—μετὰ ἡμέρας τρεῖς: an intimation of Paul's continuous energy; the previous days may well have been employed in receiving his own friends, and in making his summons known.—τῶν Ἰου.: the edict of Claudius, cf. xviii. 2, had evidently been very transient in its effects, and the Jews soon returned; possibly they may only have emigrated to the neighbourhood, e.g., to Aricia (Schürer).—πρώτους, cf. xiii. 50, xxv. 2, Luke xix. 47, here including the ἀρχισυνάγωγοι, the γερουσιάρχαι, the ἄρχοντες and others, Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. xxiii., or the word may perhaps be used of social distinction, including the officers named. The Jews in Rome were divided into no less than seven synagogues. It does not of course follow that all came in answer to the Apostle's characteristic summons, as he always turned to his countrymen first. Rendall renders "those that were of the Jews first," as if Paul invited first the members of the synagogues who were Jews, intending to reserve the devout Gentiles for the second place; see R.V. renderings in loco.—συνελθ.: it was natural that Paul should thus assemble them, and that he should then endeavour to show that although a prisoner he was guiltless of any offence against the Jewish nation; otherwise he could not expect the representatives of his people to listen to his message; so far it would be difficult to find an intimation of anything unhistorical (see Blass, in loco).—ἐγὼ: the word probably occurring first, W.H., R.V. Weiss, seems to indicate from its emphatic position that the Apostle's chief concern on this occasion was to vindicate himself.—ἔλεγε: imperfect, "quia expectatur responsum," Blass, see note on iii. 3.—ἀδελφοὶ . . . λαῷ . . . πατρῴοις: all indicate the same conciliatory spirit: "mira certe Pauli mansuetudo" (Calvin).—ποιήσας: "though I had done," R.V., i.e., at the time he was taken prisoner there had been nothing done by him to merit such treatment.—τῷ λαῷ, cf. xxi. 28. The man who could write Rom. ix. 1 ff. and 1 Cor. vii. 18 (cf. ix. 21) might justly use such words.—παρεδόθην, cf. xxi. 11. The words ascribe primarily to the Jews a share in the imprisonment of which they appear as only the indirect cause, cf. xxi. 33, but Paul summarises the chief points and does not enter into minute details; moreover his words were strictly true, for he would have been freed by the Romans in Jerusalem had not the outcry of the Jews stamped him as a malefactor. For similar instances of a main summary cf. ii. 23, xiii. 29, xxi. 11, xxiii. 27.

18. οἵτινες ἀνακρίναντές με ἐβούλοντο ἀπολῦσαι, διὰ τὸ μηδεμίαν αἰτίαν θανάτου ὑπάρχειν ἐν ἐμοί. 19. ἀντιλεγόντων δὲ τῶν Ἰουδαίων,[1] ἠναγκάσθην ἐπικαλέσασθαι Καίσαρα, οὐχ ὡς τοῦ ἔθνους μου ἔχων τι

Ver. 18. ἀνακ., cf. xxiv. 8, xxv. 6, 26, referring here to the judicial inquiries of Felix and Festus.

Ver. 19. ἀντιλ.: the word is a mild one to describe the bitter enmity of the Jews ("clementer dicit," Bengel); they are not actually represented as speaking against Paul's acquittal, although they are evidently presupposed as doing so by the proposal of Festus, xxv. 9, and by the belief that sooner or later he would fall a victim to their plots the Apostle was no doubt compelled (ἠναγκάσθην) to appeal. Holtzmann seems to forget the part played by the Jews, and their bitter enmity, when he says that in reality Paul was compelled to appeal not by the Jews, but by Festus; see also critical note.—τοῦ ἔθνους μου: they were still his nation, and he was not ashamed to call them so, as a true patriot, when he stood before a foreign tribunal; cf. xxiv. 17, xxvi. 4, "see what friendliness of expression, he does not hold them in odium," Chrysostom.

Ver. 20. διὰ ταύτην . . . προσλαλῆσαι: "for this cause therefore did I intreat you to see and to speak with me," R.V. text; in margin a comma is placed after ὑμᾶς, "call for you, to see and to speak with you": but the former seems the more likely, for as a prisoner St. Paul would hardly go out into the synagogue.—ἕνεκεν, see critical note; if εἵνεκεν, the word is only used by St. Luke amongst the Evangelists; cf. Luke iv. 18 (quotation), xviii. 29, and elsewhere only by St. Paul, 2 Cor. iii. 10; Ionic form (see Winer-Schmiedel, p. 50).—τῆς ἐλπίδος τοῦ Ἰ., cf. xxvi. 6.—περίκειμαι: for construction, Winer-Moulton, xxxii., 5; cf. 4 Macc. xii. 3; Clem. Rom., 2 Cor., i., 6 (bis). Nothing could be more pathetic than this reference to the chain, cf. Ephes. iii. 1, iv. 1, vi. 20; the words might well serve as an introduction to what was to follow, the Christian prisoner and the Jewish leaders all had "one hope of their calling," and in that hope they and he were one.

Ver. 21. πρὸς αὐτὸν: the emphatic position of the words may indicate, as Weiss suggests, that as Paul had spoken to them up to this point of a personal matter, so they in reply spoke with a like reference.—οὔτε γράμματα, i.e., no official letters from the Sanhedrim—this was practically impossible, for it is not likely that any ship had left Cæsarea before Paul's departure with such intelligence (so Weiss, Blass, Hackett).—τῶν ἀδελ., i.e., of the Jewish nation, cf. ver. 17. The Jews do not assert that they know nothing of Paul, but only that with reference to the statement which he had just made they had received no report (ἀπήγ., cf. R.V., so iv. 23), or had any of his countrymen spoken evil of him. The aorists point to this limitation of the assertion (Page's note, and Nösgen, in loco), and this view prevents us from seeing any contradiction between vv. 21 and 22, for if the statement in the former verse be taken quite generally of Paul's work, the Jews contradicted themselves in ver. 22, where they evidently include Paul in this sect (ταύτης), of which they knew that it was everywhere spoken against.—πονηρόν: the stress need not be laid on this word, as if the sentence meant that they had heard something about Paul, but nothing evil; it may well have been chosen with reference to the Apostle's own expression, οὐδὲν ἐναντίον.

Ver. 22. ἀξιοῦμεν δὲ: "but we think good," cf. xv. 38. They acknowledge that no report had reached them to invalidate the statements which Paul had just made as to the causes of his imprisonment, but (δέ) they would hear not from others, but from himself (παρὰ σοῦ).—ἃ φρονεῖς: evidently no reference to any special view of Christianity as characterising St. Paul's own teaching, but a reference to his claim to be imprisoned for the hope of Israel.—αἱρ. . Christianity was for them only a sect, and therefore they could not understand the Apostle's identification of it with the Jewish national hope. See note on ver. 17.—γνωστόν . . . ἡμῖν: if the view is correct that the edict of Claudius, see chap. xviii. 2, was occasioned by the early preaching of Christianity in Rome, it is possible that the dislocation of the Jewish community then caused may help at all events to explain why the Christian Church in Rome did not grow out of the Jewish synagogue in the capital to the same context as elsewhere, see Sanday and Headlam, Romans, pp. xxi, xxii. It may no doubt be urged that the Christian Church in Rome was not entirely a heathen-Christian Church, and that, as the names in Rom. xvi. indicate, it contained a Jewish element. But it is quite conceivable that in the capital, with its two million inhabitants, the Jews, who had only recently returned to the city, should know nothing beyond what is here indicated in such general terms of a poor and obscure sect who dwelt no longer in the Jewish quarter. It is also worthy of consideration that the Jews of Rome, whilst not guilty of any untruth in what they had just said as to their knowledge of the Christian sect, may have expressed themselves in this guarded manner from political reasons. If St. Paul's statement in ver. 18 as to the favourable bearing of the Roman authorities towards him was true, it was but natural that the Jews should wish to refrain from hasty or hostile action towards a prisoner who was evidently treated with consideration in his bonds; they would rather act thus than revive an old quarrel which might again lead to their own political insecurity, see especially Lightfoot, Philippians, pp. 15, 16; Felten, in loco; and, further, Rendall, p. 352. Nothing said by the Jews contradicts the existence of a Christian community in Rome, nor is it said that they wished to learn the Christian tenets from Paul, as if they knew nothing of them from their own knowledge, or as if they knew nothing of the causes of the opposition to the Christian faith; motives of curiosity and of policy might well have prompted a desire to hear Paul speak for himself, and with such motives there was apparently mingled a tone of contempt for a sect of which they might fairly say, from the experience of their countrymen, and from their own experience in Rome, πανταχοῦ ἀντιλέγεται: ἀντιλ. Lucan-Pauline; only once elsewhere; cf. John xix. 12. See β text above.

Ver. 23. ταξάμενοι: cf. Matt. xxviii. 16, and Polyb., xviii., 36, 1, for a similar phrase; a mutual arrangement between the two parties; only here in the middle voice in Acts.—τὴν ξενίαν: may = τὸ μίσθωμα, ver. 30 (Weiss, Holtzmann), or it may refer to entertainment in the house of a friend, cf. xxi. 16, and Philem., ver. 22. Lewin urges that although we can well understand that Paul's friends would wish to entertain him, we have no evidence that the strictness of the military guard was thus far relaxed, and he also presses the fact that Suidas and Hesychius explain ξενία = κατάλυμα, καταγώγιον, as if it meant a place of sojourn for hire; see especially for the whole question Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 238; but see on the other hand Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 9, who lays stress on N.T. passages quoted above, and Grimm-Thayer, sub v.—πλείονες: more than at the first time; Blass takes it as = plurimi, cf. ii. 40, xiii. 31.—ἐξετίθετο, cf. xi. 4, xviii. 26, and in vii. 21 in a different sense, nowhere else in N.T. J. Weiss and Vogel both lay stress upon the recurrence of the word in the medical writer Dioscorides; for other references, Grimm-Thayer, sub v. It is possible that the middle here, as in xi. 4, gives it a reflexive force, the Apostle vindicates his own conduct (Rendall).—Μωσέως: from the law of Moses, whose enemy he was represented to be, no less than from the Prophets.—πείθων suavissime, Bengel; on the conative present participle see Burton, p. 59, but here the word is used not simply de conatu; it refers here to the persuasive power of St. Paul's words, although it does not say that his words resulted in conviction.—ἀπὸ πρωῒ ἕως ἑσπέρας, cf. for similar expressions Exod. xviii. 13, 14 A, Job iv. 20 AS, and other passages where πρωῒθεν is similarly used (H. and R.).

Ver. 24. οἱ μὲν . . . οἱ δὲ . . ., cf. xiv. 4, xvii. 32, whether the verb means simply listened to what was said (Rendall), or simply denotes an attitude of receptivity (Nösgen), the fact that Paul addresses to both classes his final words indicates that the degree of belief to which they attained was not sufficient to convince even the well-disposed Jews to throw in their lot with Paul. Perhaps it is best to remember that the tenses are in the imperfect: "some were being persuaded of the things, etc.," and this also keeps up the reference to the previous πείθων, persuadere studens (Blass, Plumptre).—οἱ δὲ ἠπίσ.: "and some disbelieved," R.V., or "continued in their disbelief". The verb only here in Acts, but cf. Luke xxiv. 11, 41, Mark xvi. 11, 16, 1 Pet. ii. 7, Wisd. x. 7, xii. 17, xviii. 13 (see H. and R.), etc.

Ver. 25. ἀσύμφωνοι, cf. Wisd. xviii. 19 and Dan., LXX, Bel., ver. 15; cf. for the phrase Diod. Sic., iv., 1, the word is found in Josephus, but also in classical Greek.—δέ: the best attested reading marks sharply and emphatically the turn of affairs; there may have been Pharisees among the well-disposed Jews, and to these Paul may have made an appeal when the hope of Israel, now as formerly, was in question, cf. xxiii. 6; but if so, they would not decide to rank themselves amongst "the Pharisees that believed" however imperfectly, and of them as well of the unbelievers the writer can only say ἀπελύοντο, cf. for middle Exod. xxxiii. 11, and so Polyb., iii., 34, 12.—εἰπόντος τοῦ Π.: the words do not mean that they departed because Paul so spoke, but almost = ἀπολυομένων εἶπεν (so Blass, Nösgen). It may be that Paul's words of censure were partly directed against the spirit which prompted the Jews to depart all together; in other words to suppress the differences which had evidently arisen amongst them, for the sake of an outward show of fellowship, lest they should again be charged as tumultuantes (Nösgen); but beyond all this, in their absence of brotherly love for one who still claimed them as his ἀδελφοί, in the unbelief of some, in the want of the courage of their convictions in others, St. Paul saw a fulfilment of that hardness and dulness of heart of which the prophet had spoken.—ῥῆμα ἕν: "one word," emphatically drawing attention to the prophetical utterance which followed; it was evening, the night was drawing on, and (ver. 23) so too for the disbelieving nation: the day was far spent, the night was at hand (Bethge).—καλῶς, cf. Matt. xv. 7, Mark vii. 6, 9 (as in these two passages placed first with strong indignation, Page), xii. 28, Luke xx. 39, the word often occurs in St. Paul's Epistles. It is remarkable that the same prophetic quotation with which the Christ had opened His teaching by parables, which is cited in all four of the Evangelists, should thus form the solemn close of the historical books of the N.T. See above on Matt. xiii. 14, Mark iv. 12, Luke viii. 10, and John xii. 40, where the same words are quoted by St. John to explain the rejection of Christ's own teaching, just as here by St. Paul to explain the rejection of the teaching about Christ. "Est hoc extremum dictum Pauli in Actis, neque fortuito esse videtur; totius enim fere libri summam continet ad gentis evangelium a Judæis jam translatum esse, quippe spretum ab eis" (Blass), cf. the course of events in Antioch, Corinth, Ephesus, xiii. 42, xviii. 6, xix. 9.—τὸ Π. τὸ Ἅ.: the solemnity of the words is intensified by thus introducing the Holy Ghost, rather than merely the human agent, as Himself speaking (see also critical note); and not only so, but by thus intimating that they were resisting not man but God, cf. vii. 51.—ἡμῶν: if we read ὑμῶν the word indicates that St. Paul would not identify himself with the unbelieving Jews, cf. vii. 52, the indignant words of St. Stephen, which the speaker had himself heard.

Ver. 26. πορεύθητι . . . εἰπέ: the quotation is accurately taken from the LXX, Isai. vi. 9, 10, and the first line is additional to the words otherwise given in full by St. Matthew; as the speaker is the messenger to the Jews who condemns this hardness of heart, he applies to himself the word πορ.

Ver. 27. ἰάσωμαι, see critical note; the indicative future as in R.V. adds to the force and vigour of the passage; after μή it represents the action of the verb as more vividly realised as possible and probable than is the case when the subjunctive is used (Page), see also Winer-Moulton, lvi., 2*a*; Bethge, p. 331; cf. Luke xii. 58, Acts xxi. 24 (Blass). It is significant that Luke the physician should thus cite as almost the last words of his record a prophecy ending with ἰάσομαι (Plummer, St. Luke, Introd., p. lxvi.).

Ver. 28. γνωστὸν οὖν: for the word similarly used cf. ii. 14, iv. 10; xiii. 38.—τοῦτο τὸ σωτ., see critical note; cf. LXX, Ps. lxvi. 2, xcvii. 2, 3. σωτ., adjective, neuter of σωτήριος, used substantively (as in classical Greek), so often in LXX of the Messianic salvation; cf. Luke ii. 30, iii. 6, Ephes. vi. 17, and Clem. Rom., Cor., xxxv., 12, xxxvi., 1. The word is used only by St. Luke and St. Paul, see Plummer, note on Luke iii. 6. For the whole expression here cf. xiii. 26, where words very similar are used by Paul, and with very similar results, ver. 46. τοῦτο, emphatic this, the very message of God's salvation, this is what I am declaring to you.—αὐτοὶ καὶ ἀκούσονται: "they will also hear," R.V. The words thus rendered may not convey so plainly a reproach to the Jews as in A.V., but at the same time they express something more than the mere fact that Gentiles as well as Jews will now hear the message; that message will not only be sent (ἀπεστάλη), but also heard; the καί may well indicate that whilst the Jews will hear with the ear only as distinct from the understanding, the Gentiles will not only hear, but really (καί) listen (see Rendall and Weiss, in loco). At the same time we must remember that as a background to what the Apostle here says we have his words in Rom. ix.-xi., and the thought which he had expressed to the Roman Church that God had not really cast away His people, but whilst through their unbelief the Gentiles had been called, yet that inclusion of the heathen in the Messianic kingdom would rouse the Jews to jealousy, and that thus all Israel would be saved, Rom. xi. 11; cf. x. 19; Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. 341 ff. We can scarcely doubt that the words are uttered not merely to condemn, but to lead to repentance; at all events it would not be possible to find stronger words against his own countrymen than those written by St. Paul in his earliest Epistle, 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16; and yet we know how St. Paul, for those same countrymen, could wish himself accused; so Bethge, as against Overbeck, who can only see that in Acts the belief of the Gentiles results not in a noble jealousy, but in the bitter envy of the Jews. But there blends with the tone of sadness a note of triumph in the words αὐτοὶ καὶ ἀκούσονται, the future of his message is assured, and we may borrow two words as an inscription for these closing pages of St. Luke's second treatise—the last word of the Apostle, and the last of the historian

30.[1] Ἔμεινε δὲ ὁ Παῦλος διετίαν ὅλην ἐν ἰδίῳ μισθώματι, καὶ ἀπεδέχετο πάντας τοὺς εἰσπορευομένους[2] πρὸς αὐτόν, 31. κηρύσσων

[1] For εμεινε (Lach., Blass, Hilg.) ℵ*B 13, 61, Tisch., W.H., R.V., Wendt, Weiss have ενεμεινε; Blass in β has μενων with Par. ο Π. om. W.H., R.V., Weiss (not Blass, Hilg.), cf. αυτον for τον Π. in ver. 17, R.V., W.H.

[2] After προς αυτον 137 Syr. H. c*, Gig., Par. add Ιουδαιους τε και Ελληνας explanatory of παντας, so Blass in β text, Hilg.; Blass also adds και διελεγετο προς before the inserted words just mentioned, with Gig., Par. Χριστου om. by Tisch., Hilg., with ℵ* Syr. H.

—ἀκούσονται . . . ἀκωλύτως—the word of God was heard and welcomed, and that word was not bound, see the suggestive remarks of Bethge, p. 335, and Zöckler on ver. 31.

Ver. 29. See critical note.—συζήτησιν, rixa, Blass; possibly this may have helped to delay the Apostle's trial, as apparently some of the Jews would not have moved in the matter.

Ver. 30. ἔμεινε δὲ: Blass (so also Hackett, Lekebusch) makes the important remark that the aorist shows that Paul's condition was changed after the two years, cf. ἐκάθισε, xviii. 11 (see also Burton, pp. 19, 20). When, therefore, Luke wrote his history, the inference is that the Apostle had been liberated either from prison or by death. Blass indicates another change, viz., that he may have been removed into the prætorium, and that his trial was just coming on.—ἰδίῳ μισθ., see above on ver. 23. That the Apostle should have been able to hire a house at his own expense receives confirmation from the coincidence with Phil. iv. 10, 14, 18; others have suggested (Wendt, 1899, Knabenbauer) that he may have gained the means of hiring it by his own work. See in this connection Rendel Harris, Four Lectures, etc., pp. 50, 51, and the extract from the Armenian Version of Ephrem's Commentary on the Acts. It would seem that Ephrem imagined that the rent of the lodging was paid by the proceeds of the cloak and books (2 Tim. iv. 13). Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 9, holds that ἰδίῳ certainly distinguishes the μίσθωμα here from the ξενία above, see his note, and Grimm-Thayer, in loco. It is quite true that μίσθωμα is not used in this sense of a hired house elsewhere (indeed it is used especially of the wages of hire in a bad sense, Deut. xxiii. 18, Mic. i. 7, Ezek. xvi. 31), but Lightfoot admits that it may be used here exceptionally as a translation of the Latin conductum, meaning here a suite of apartments only, not the whole house (Lewin), the Latin meritoria (sc. loca) seems to be used very much in this same double sense of μίσθωμα.—διετίαν ὅλην, cf. xxiv. 27, only in Luke, not in classical Greek, but in Philo (see also Grimm-Thayer, and Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, p. 86), so too τριετίαν only in Luke; see on xx. 31. The two years were spent not only in preaching, but in writing, as we may fairly believe, Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon, and Philippians.—ἀπεδέχετο, see above, xv. 4, xxi. 7, apparently greater freedom than in Cæsarea, xxiv. 23; if it was not for the notice in Phil. i. 13, 17, we might almost suppose that the Apostle was liberated on security or on bail; cf. the account of the imprisonment of Agrippa I. in Rome; see p. 486.—πάντας: all, both Jews and Gentiles; not only the latter, as Bengel thought: "neminem excludebat Dei exemplo," Grotius.—εἰσπορ., see on ix. 28, most frequent in Luke, Friedrich, p. 7; see critical note.

Ver. 31. τὰ περὶ: on the phrase see p. 481.—τοῦ Κ. Ἰ. Χ., see critical note, and cf. xi. 17, xv. 26, the full phrase corresponds with the solemn conclusion of the book.—μετὰ π. παῤῥ.: the phrase with or without πάσης four times in Acts, and nowhere else in N.T., see on p. 128. In Jerusalem by the Twelve, iv. 29, and in Rome no less than in Jerusalem by St. Paul, the witness was given "with all boldness," cf. Phil. i. 14; and so the promise in the vision vouchsafed to the Apostle of the Gentiles was verified, xxiii. 11, and the aim of the Gentile historian fulfilled when the Gospel was thus preached boldly and openly, ἕως ἐσχ. τῆς γῆς, see note on i. 8.—ἀκωλύτως: "eadem plane dicuntur in ep. ad Phil. Roma data, i. 12 sqq.," Blass, and the word of God had free course and was glorified. The adverb is found in Plato, Epict., Herodian, and also in Josephus. In LXX the adjective is found in Wisd. vii. 22, and the adverb is used by Symm., Job xxxiv. 31. There is a note of triumph in the word, Bengel, Zöckler, τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ,[1] καὶ διδάσκων τὰ περὶ τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, μετὰ πάσης παῤῥησίας ἀκωλύτως.

and we may note with Wordsworth and Page the cadence of these concluding words, μετα π. π. ἀκωλ. But all this does not forbid the view that the writer intended to give a third book to complete his work. This latter view is strongly insisted upon by Prof. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 23 ff., while Bishop Lightfoot, B.D.[2], i., 27, can see no conceivable plea for any third treatise, if the purpose of the narrative is completed by Paul coming to Rome and there delivering his message, so, although less strongly, Harnack, Chron., i., p. 248, see note on i. 8. But Prof. Ramsay has received the strong support not only of Zöckler, and curiously enough of Spitta, Apostelgeschichte, p. 318, but still more recently amongst English writers of Rendall, and in Germany of Dr. Zahn. Just as in St. Luke's Gospel xxiv. 44 forms not merely a starting-point for, but an anticipation of, the succeeding history, or just as xxiv. 44-53 contain in a summary what is afterwards related in greater detail, Acts i. and ii., so in vv. 30, 31 of Acts xxviii. we have, as it were, a brief sketch of what succeeded the events hitherto recorded, and an anticipation of what followed upon them. This probability remains quite apart from the additional force which is given to it if Ramsay is right in regarding πρῶτος, Acts i. 1, as signifying not simply πρότερος, but the first of a series, a view strongly supported by Zahn, Einleitung, ii., p. 371. Certainly the aorist, ver. 30 (see above), and the expression διετίαν ὅλην seem to show that some fact was known to the writer which followed the close of the two years, and we can therefore hardly say that he wrote no more because he knew no more, unless we also suppose that he wrote his history at the conclusion and not during the course of the two years. This he may have done while the result of St. Paul's first trial was still unknown, although Phil. i. 25-27, ii. 24, Philem. ver. 22, show us plainly with what confidence the Apostle awaited the issue. At all events almost any conjecture seems more probable than that the writer should have concluded so abruptly if he had nothing more to chronicle than the immediate and tragic death of his hero! Zöckler, Apostelgeschichte, p. 162, Spitta, Zur Geschichte und Litteratur des Urchristentums, I., 15, 16. To say with Jülicher, Einleitung, p. 27, that he refrained from doing this because in such an event he would chronicle not the triumph but the defeat of the Gospel is certainly a strange argument, and no one has given a better answer to it than Harnack by asking, Since when did the early Christians regard martyrdom as a defeat? Is the death of Christ, or of Stephen, in the mind of the author of Acts a defeat? is it not rather a triumph? Chron., i., 247. The elaborate discussion of the abrupt conclusion in Acts by Wendt, 1899, pp. 31, 32, is entirely based upon the assumption that Luke was not the author of Acts, and that therefore this author, whoever he was, wrote no more because his information failed him, and he knew no more. This could not have been so in the case of Luke, who was with the Apostle at Rome, as we have from undoubted testimony quite apart from Acts. See further Introd. For the release of St. Paul, his subsequent journeys to Spain and to the East, and his second imprisonment, see in support, Zahn, Einleitung, i., p. 435 ff., Harnack, Chron., i., 239, Spitta, u. s., Salmon, Introd., p. 403 ff., Die zweite römische Gefangenschaft des Apostels Paulus, Steinmeyer (1897), and Critical Review (July), 1898. There were many possible reasons why the hearing of St. Paul's appeal was so long delayed. The record of the previous proceedings forwarded by Festus may have been lost in the wreck, and it was therefore necessary to wait for fresh official information, as the prisoner's accusers had not arrived. And when they arrived, it is very possible that they may have been glad to interpose fresh obstacles, and that they would be content to keep Paul bound as before; as evidence was probably wanted, not only from Jerusalem, but from various parts of the empire, the interposition of these fresh delays was easy. St. Paul had himself suggested that the Jews in Asia ought to be summoned, or to be present, xxiv. 19. That such delays would not be unusual we may learn from Tacitus, e.g., Ann., xiii., 43; cf. Suet., Nero, 15. When we remember how long a delay occurred in the case of the Jewish priests, the friends of Josephus, Vita, 3, who were sent to Rome by Felix to plead their cause, it ceases to be surprising that St. Paul was detained so long without a trial; see on the whole question Lewin, St. Paul, ii., 277 ff.; Lightfoot, Phil., p. 4; Knabenbauer, Actus Apostolorum, pp. 453, 454, 1899.

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLE

TO THE

ROMANS

INTRODUCTION.

CHAPTER I.

ORIGIN OF THE CHURCH AT ROME.

Of the beginnings of Christianity in Rome nothing whatever is known on direct evidence. The tradition which assigns the founding of the Church there to Peter cannot possibly be maintained. In one form it assumes that Peter, on the occasion referred to in Acts xii. 17, travelled to Rome, and there propagated the Church from the synagogue as a centre. As this departure of Peter from Jerusalem took place, on the usual reckoning, about 42 A.D., there would be time for his twenty-five years' episcopate of Rome, which was once the accepted Romish idea, though now given up even by Romish scholars. But it is clear from the book of Acts (chap. xv.) that Peter was in Jerusalem ten years after this, and it is equally clear from the Epistle to the Romans that he had not been in Rome when this letter was written, seven years later still. In face of a passage like chap. xv. 20 it is impossible to suppose that the Church of Rome had already been the scene of another Apostle's labours. Three years later, when Paul at length arrived in Rome, it had still been unvisited by Peter, to judge from what we read in Acts xxviii.; and even when he wrote the Epistle to the Philippians, towards the close of his first imprisonment, there is no indication that his brother Apostle had yet seen the capital. The earliest tradition represents Peter and Paul as in Rome together, and, indeed, as suffering together, in the Neronian persecution. All the evidence for this will be found in Euseb., Hist. Eccl., II., xxv. What the worth of it is, it is not easy to say. It is not incredible that Peter may have been in Rome about the date in question, especially if Babylon in 1 Peter v. 13 means Rome, as it does in the Apocalypse. But in any case Peter can have had no direct part in founding the Church. In Iren., iii., 1, 2, Peter and Paul are spoken of as "preaching the Gospel in Rome, and founding the Church," at the time that Matthew published his gospel,

That Christianity was there long before this time is indubitable, but the Roman Christians, it has been suggested (see Harvey's note on Iren. ad loc.), "appear neither to have had an ecclesiastical polity nor to have been under the regular regimen of the Church. . . . Several expressions in the epistle seem to indicate a crude, unsettled state of things there. . . . They are spoken of as depending rather upon mutual exhortation and instruction than upon any more authoritative communication of evangelical truth (xv. 14) . . . and the Apostle expresses his intention to visit them, according to a purpose entertained ἀπὸ πολλῶν ἐτῶν [ἱκανῶν is the true reading] with the hope that he might come ἐν πληρώματι εὐλογίας (τοῦ εὐαγγελίου) τοῦ Χριστοῦ, i.e., in the collation of spiritual gifts which as yet they had not, and in the establishment of that Apostolical order and government among them which should complete their incorporation with the Body Catholic of Christ's Church." It is quite true that the epistle reveals nothing of the organisation of the Church at Rome, but it reveals just as little of any intention on Paul's part to bestow on the Church the supposed benefits of "Apostolical order and government". The assumption underlying this expression is quite unhistorical. There was no uniform legal organisation of the Church in the apostolic age; and the Christians in Rome not only depended upon mutual exhortation and instruction, but, as Paul acknowledges, were well able to do so. They had χαρίσματα differing according to the grace given to them, and if they had no legal organisation, they had a vital and spiritual differentiation of organs and functions, for which the other is but a makeshift (chap. xii. 3-8). Sanday and Headlam think that though the Church did not, in the strict sense, owe its origin to Peter and Paul, it may well have owed to them its first existence as an organised whole (Commentary, p. xxxv.). This may be, for it was Paul's habit to appoint elders in all the churches he planted (Acts xiv. 23, Tit. i. 5); but, as the gospel was known at Rome, and believers were baptised there, and no doubt observed the Lord's Supper, it is clear that no particular organisation was wanted either to ensure or to perfect their standing as Christians.

Where tradition fails, we can only fall back on conjecture—conjecture to be verified by its coherence with what the epistle itself reveals. In this connection it has long been customary to refer to Acts ii. 10 (οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες Ῥωμαῖοι). There were Roman Jews in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, and even if they were domiciled there and did not return to Rome, there must have been many visitors who did. The Jews in Rome were numbered by thousands; they occupied a large ward of the city, beyond the Tiber, by themselves, and they had ceaseless communications with Jerusalem. Hence many have supposed that Christianity came to Rome by some such channel as this. If it did, we should expect it to have originated in the synagogues, the existence of nine of which is definitely attested (Sanday and Headlam, p. xxiv.). The epistle itself gives no direct evidence of any such connection : if the Church originated in the synagogue at Rome, the connection had been completely severed by the time Paul wrote. It has been supposed that the well-known sentence in Suetonius, Claud., 25 ("Iudaeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit": see also Acts xviii. 2) refers to conflicts which arose in the synagogues over the alleged Messiahship of Jesus, and that the separation of the Church and the synagogue, and even a change in the prevailing complexion of the Church, which from Jewish-Christian became mainly Gentile-Christian, date from this event; but no stress can be laid on this. It is clear from Acts xxviii. 17-22 that when Paul came to Rome the leaders of the synagogue either knew nothing or affected to know nothing about the new sect which was growing up beside them. This makes it at least improbable, whatever its actual origin, that the Christian Church at Rome can have had strongly Jewish sympathies. Besides, even if the Church had originated in the synagogue, it is practically certain, from the analogy of other places whose history is known, that the mass of the members would not be Jews by birth, but of the class of proselytes (εὐσεβεῖς, φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν), whose attachment to Judaism was less rigid, and whose spiritual receptivity was as a rule greater.

Many scholars, impressed by these considerations, have sought rather a Gentile-Christian origin for the Church. Communication, they point out, was constant, not only between Rome and Jerusalem, but between Rome and all the East, and especially all the great towns. There was constant coming and going between Rome and such cities as Antioch, Corinth and Ephesus, not to mention others which had been the scene of Paul's labours. Early Christianity, too, was largely self-propagating. "They that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word" (Acts viii. 4). Hort (Romans and Ephesians, p. 9) speaks of "a process of quiet and as it were fortuitous filtration"; and it was probably by such a process, initiated, suspended, and renewed on different occasions, that the new religion was introduced to Rome. To conceive the matter in this way is no doubt to conceive it very indefinitely, but it is hardly possible to go further. Attempts have been made to do so. Assuming, for instance, that chap. xvi. is in its right place, and really formed part of the Epistle to the Romans, it has been argued that the large number of friends and acquaintances Paul had in the Church, and especially the conspicuous place given to his old associates Prisca and Aquila, prove that the Christianity of the Romans was essentially of the Pauline type, and that the Church therefore owed its origin and its character, indirectly no doubt, to him. The epistle certainly does not bear this on its face; Paul never says a word which implies that the Romans owed anything, even remotely, to him; there is rather an impression of regret that they did not. Besides, it is a mistake to assume that all Paul's friends were necessarily "Paulinists"—an expression which neither he nor they could have understood. Among those at Rome, and among the most important, as we should judge by the honourable terms in which they are mentioned (xvi. 7), were some who had been Christians longer than he; and "the quiet and as it were fortuitous filtration" was that of Christianity, undoubtedly of some universal type, but not distinctively of Paulinism.

CHAPTER II.

CHARACTER OF THE CHURCH AT ROME.

HARDLY any question in New Testament criticism has been more elaborately discussed than this. The traditional opinion was that the Church consisted of Gentile Christians. The idea that it consisted of Jewish Christians, first broached apparently by Koppe in 1824, gained currency through Baur, and for a generation after his essay (1836) commanded wide assent among critics. A strong protest in favour of the old opinion was kept up all the time, but it was not till 1876 that Weizsäcker produced a decisive reaction in its favour. The great mass of the Church, he argued, must have been Gentile-Christian, though there was no doubt a Jewish-Christian minority. An attempt to construct a theory answering more closely to the facts presented by the epistle is that of Beyschlag. He supposes that the Church consisted mainly of proselytes—that is, of persons who were Gentiles by birth, but had passed through the Jews' religion. This would explain the great difficulty of the epistle, that Paul addresses his readers as if they were Gentiles, but argues with them as if they were Jews. Schürer, again, conceives of the Church as non-Jewish, and at the same time non-Pauline; the Hellenistic Jews of the diaspora would make Christians comparatively free in their relations to the ceremonial law, but with no adequate comprehension of the Pauline freedom, in principle, from law in every sense; it is an audience like this Paul is trying to elevate to his own standpoint. That such an audience could be found is not to be denied; whether it is to be found here we can only ascertain by comparing this theory with the facts of the epistle. Finally, Holtzmann gives up the attempt to realise the character of the Church. St. Paul had never been in Rome, did not really know the situation there, and has no distinct idea of his audience. When he finds it necessary to explain why he writes to them at all he thinks of them as Gentiles; when their previous culture and spiritual history, their sympathies, antipathies, and mode of reacting toward the Gospel generally, are in question, they are Jews. All this shows that the problem is a complex one; and there is no means of doing anything to solve it but to examine the facts once more. They are all contained in the epistle itself, and it will be convenient to adduce the evidence (1) for the Gentile-Christian character of the readers; (2) for the Jewish-Christian character; and then to ask what conception covers and combines all the facts.

1. Evidence for the Gentile-Christian character of the Church.

(a) Chap. i. 5 f. Paul writes: "We received grace and Apostleship, with a view to obedience of faith ἐν πᾶσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν . . . ἐν οἷς ἐστε καὶ ὑμεῖς". Paul's conception of himself as Apostle of the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 8), and his appeal to this vocation in the salutation of his letter, put it beyond doubt that ἔθνη here means Gentiles, as opposed to Israel, and not nations generally. He is exercising his calling as Apostle to the Gentiles in writing to the Romans; for they, too, are in that class. Those who take the Jewish-Christian view argue that Paul would have had no need to tell a Church consisting of Romans by birth that they were included within the scope of his calling as Apostle to the Gentiles. But surely the Apostle's expression is perfectly natural; whereas if ἐν πᾶσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν means "among all the nations," it becomes perfectly meaningless.

(b) Chap. i. 13. "I purposed often to come to you, . . . ἵνα τινὰ καρπὸν σχῶ καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν καθὼς καὶ ἐν τοῖς λοιποῖς ἔθνεσιν." This case is quite unambiguous. The Roman Christians are put on a level with the rest of the ἔθνη, and it agrees with this that the distinction of classes in ver. 14 (Greek and barbarian, wise and unintelligent) belongs to the pagan world.

Of course it is not meant here that Paul was Apostle of the Gentiles in such a sense that he would not have preached the Gospel to the Jews; but as far as he has a special vocation—and it is on a special vocation, and not on the duty of preaching the Gospel to every creature, that he bases his right to address the Romans—it is to the Gentile world. The Roman Church, therefore, belonged to that world.

(c) Chap. xi. 13. ὑμῖν δὲ λέγω τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. Here the whole Church is addressed in its character as Gentile. To this it has been replied that the whole Church is not addressed here; with ὑμῖν δὲ Paul expressly turns aside to address only a part of the Church. If the words stood alone, this might be maintained, but the context is decisive in favour of the former meaning. In the continuation of the passage (see especially xi. 25-28) the Church as a whole is warned against contempt for the Jews; it is addressed in the second person (xi. 25, 28, 30 f.), without any suggestion of distinctions in it, whereas the Jews are spoken of throughout in the third. Further, when Paul speaks of the Jews in chaps. ix.-xi., it is as "my brethren," "my kinsmen according to the flesh," not ours nor yours, as would have been the case had the bulk of the Church been of Jewish origin.

(d) Chap. xv. 15 f. τολμηροτέρως δὲ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν κ.τ.λ. Here Paul justifies himself, in closing, for writing as he has done—especially, perhaps, for writing so decidedly in chap. xiv.-xv. 13 — to the Romans. The reason he gives is unmistakable. He is a minister of Jesus Christ, a priest in the service of the Gospel; the offering he has to lay on the altar is the Gentiles, and he writes to the Romans because they are Gentiles, to further them in their faith, that when they are presented to God it may be an acceptable offering, sanctified in the Holy Spirit. There is no evading this argument; to say that in vers. 17-20 Paul's justification of this presentation of himself as minister of Jesus Christ εἰς τὰ ἔθνη is directed against Jewish-Christian suspicions and insinuations (cf. 2 Cor. x. 12-18, xii. 11, 12) may or may not be true, but is quite irrelevant; even if there were such suspicions, and even if they had begun to find acceptance in Rome, the Gentile character of the Church at Rome as a whole is here put beyond question.

(e) Less stress can be laid on passages like vi. 17 f. (ἦτε δοῦλοι τῆς ἁμαρτίας), though they have undoubtedly something which recalls the ἐξ ἐθνῶν ἁμαρτωλοὶ of Gal. ii. 15. By the time he has reached chap. vi. Paul is quite entitled to assume that his readers were once slaves of sin, without suggesting anything about their nationality. Neither do the suggestions of particular sins (e.g., in vi. 12-14) throw any real light on the question. All kinds of bad things are done both by Gentiles and Jews. But discounting weak and uncertain arguments, there is a plain and solid case for maintaining that the great bulk of the Church at Rome was of Gentile origin.

2. Evidence for the Jewish-Christian character of the Church.

(a) There are passages in which Paul includes himself and his readers in the first person plural; now no one, it is to be observed, is included with him in the superscription, so that "we" must mean "you and I". Thus iii. 9 προεχόμεθα; are we (Jews) surpassed? But it is very natural to suppose that Paul here, as is his rule, allows his opponents (real or imaginary) to state their own objections in their own person, the "we" neither including himself nor his readers; or if he speaks in his own person, it is the national consciousness of the Jew, which Paul of course shared, and not the joint consciousness of Paul and his readers, which is conveyed by the plural. Another passage of the same kind is iv. 1: Ἀβραὰμ τὸν προπάτορα ἡμῶν κατὰ σάρκα. Here also the explanation is the same. Paul says "our" forefather because he has no choice. He could speak of his fellow-countrymen as "my kinsmen according to the flesh"; but it would have been obviously absurd for him to speak of Abraham as "my" forefather. It is only through his relation to the nation that he can claim a connection with Abraham, and hence the "our" in iv. 1 is national, not individual, and has nothing to do with the Romans. Cf. the precisely similar case in ix. 10 (Isaac our father). The same use of the first person plural is found in 1 Cor. x. 1 (All our fathers were under the cloud), which no one doubts was written to a thoroughly Gentile Church. As far therefore as passages like these are concerned, they do not invalidate in the least the evidence adduced for the Gentile character of the Church at Rome.

(b) Not so simple are those passages which speak either in the first or second person plural of the relation of the readers, or of Paul and his readers alike, to the law. The most important of these is chap. vii. 1-6. Paul here speaks to his readers as persons γινώσκουσι νόμον, knowing what law is. Even if we admit—which is not necessary, nor I believe right—that the reference is to the Mosaic law, it does not follow that the readers were Jews. Indeed the explicit recalling of the law to mind, while he assumes it to be known, might plausibly be alleged as an argument against a Jewish origin. But to pass that by, does not vii. 4, it is argued—So then, my brethren, ye also were made dead to the law by the body of Christ—imply that the persons addressed had lived under the law as well as the writer?—in other words, that they were Jews? And is this not confirmed, when we read in ver. 5 f., "When we were in the flesh, the sinful passions, which were through the law, wrought in our members to bring forth fruit unto death. But now we have been discharged from the law"? Have we not here, in relation to the law, an experience common to Paul and those whom he addressed, and does not this imply that antecedent to their conversion they and he had lived under the law—that is, were Jews by birth? It is natural, at first sight, to think so, but it is certainly wrong. There is an experience common to Paul and to all Christians, whatever their birth; if it were not so, they would not be Christians. It is possible also for him to describe that experience in relation to the law; once all Christians were under it, now they are so no more. All Christians were under it, for all were under sin, and to the Apostle sin and law are correlative terms. The law, indeed, did not take precisely the same form for Jew and Gentile; the one had an objective revelation, the other had a substitute, if not an equivalent for this, written on his heart; but in both it wrought to the same issues. There is nothing in the world less Jewish, there is nothing more human, than Rom. vii. 7-24; but that is Paul's description of life under the law, and of the working of the law in that life. We understand it only too well, though we are not Jews; and so, no doubt, did those to whom it was first addressed. Hence Paul could quite well say to a Gentile Church: Ye were made dead to the law through the body of Christ; and could associate himself with them to say, We were discharged from the law by dying to that in which we were held. A perfectly clear case of this is to be found in Gal. iii. 13-iv. 9. No one imagines that the Galatians were Jews, yet Paul vindicates for them the very thing which he says of the Romans here. God sent forth His Son, he writes, made of a woman, made under law, to redeem those that are under law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God sent forth the spirit of His Son into our hearts, etc. The alternation of the first and second persons here shows how Paul could conceive of Jew and Gentile alike as under law in their pre-Christian days, and how in their emancipation from this in Jesus Christ one experience was common to them all. In truth, "sin," "the law," "the curse of the law," "death," are names for something which belongs not to the Jewish but to the human conscience; and it is only because this is so that the Gospel of Paul is also a Gospel for us. Before Christ came and redeemed the world, all men were at bottom on the same footing: Pharisaism, legalism, moralism, or whatever it is called, it is in the last resort the attempt to be good without God, to achieve a righteousness of our own without an initial all-inclusive immeasurable debt to Him; in other words, without submitting, as sinful men must submit, to be justified by faith apart from works of our own, and to find in that justification, and in that only, the spring and impulse of all good. It was because Paul's Jewish experience was digested into a purely and perfectly human experience that he was able to transcend his Judaism, and to preach a universal gospel; and the use of such expressions as we have in vii. 1-6 is no proof that those to whom they applied were Jews too. They apply to us.

(c) The character of the argumentation in the epistle has been adduced in support of the Jewish origin of the readers. It is quite true that in the dialectical development of his gospel in Romans Paul often states and answers such objections as would naturally occur to one representing the historical and legal standpoint of the Jews' religion. Cf. iii. 1 (What advantage then hath the Jew?), vi. 1 (Are we to continue in sin that grace may abound?), vi. 15

(Are we to sin, because we are not under law, but under grace?) vii. 7 (What shall we say then? Is the law sin?), xi. 1 (I say then, Hath God cast off His people?). There are two obvious reasons why Paul should have developed his gospel by this dialectical process apart from the assumption that he is meeting the anticipated objections of his readers. One is, that he was a Jew himself, and justified his gospel instinctively, as he went along, against the primâ facie objections to it which arose in his own mind. Here, again, however we must remember that though Paul was a Jew he was a man; and it does not strike one as rigorously historical, but as somewhat absurd, to characterise as Jewish or as Jewish-Christian the criticism of grace which comes natural to every human being. The other reason is, that Paul had heard already in other places most of the objections to his gospel which he answers in this epistle. There is only one express reference to this, in iii. 8 (As we are slandered, and as some affirm that we say, Let us do evil that good may come: for τινες here, cf. 2 Cor. iii. 1, Gal. ii. 12); but that Paul's gospel was assiduously and energetically counterworked we know quite well, and he may have heard (through some of his friends in the city) that his adversaries were forestalling him at Rome. These reasons fully explain the nature of his arguments; and in view of the direct evidence for the Gentile character of the Church they prove nothing on the other side.

(d) Great stress was laid by Baur on chaps. ix.-xi. in this connection. These, it was argued, were the real kernel of the epistle—the part for the sake of which it was really written, and by relation to which the rest has to be explained; and these, moreover, have no interest, or none worth speaking of, for a Gentile Church. It was only to a Jewish-Christian consciousness that this vindication of God's wonderful ways in the history of redemption required to be or could be addressed. Plausible as this may sound, the facts are against it. For whatever reason, it is precisely and unambiguously to the Gentiles that all this section is addressed. In ix. 1 f., x. 1 f. Paul speaks of the Jews in the third person (my prayer to God for them, etc.). He calls them my kinsmen, not yours or ours. He quotes himself, but not his readers (xi. 1), as proof that God has not cast off His people, which he would hardly have done had they also been Christian Jews (but see note on this verse). He uses the fate of the Jews, the natural branches, to warn his readers, grafted into the tree of life contrary to nature, against contempt, pride, and unbelief. Whatever the motive of these chapters may have been, it cannot have been that the bulk of the Romish Church was Jewish in origin, or strongly Jewish in sympathy. The apostle's own application of their teaching in xi. 17-24 proves exactly the reverse.

(e) Still less can anything be made of an appeal to xiii. 1-7. The Jews were certainly a rebellious and turbulent race, and inherited theocratic ideas which might make them doubt the lawfulness of paying tribute to Cæsar (Deut. xvii. 15, Mark xii. 13-17); but Christianity too in all its forms is an idealism which necessarily raises the question of the relation of God's Kingdom to the kingdoms of this world, and so gives occasion to such explanations as those of Paul in chap. xiii. 1-7. It has been pointed out, too, that echoes of this passage occur in the public prayer of the Roman Church in Clem., ad. Cor., I., lxi., at a period when the Gentile character of the Church is not questioned.

(f) As for the use of the Old Testament in this epistle, it has no bearing whatever on the nationality of the readers. To all the New Testament writers the Old Testament was revelation, and in a sense Christian revelation; and they used it in the same way no matter to whom they wrote.

None of these passages is sufficient to prove that the Church as a whole was Jewish-Christian, or even that it was strongly influenced by Jewish ideas. On the other hand, the passages quoted under 1 prove conclusively that the bulk of the Church was Gentile, so that one writing to it as a body thought of it as a Gentile Church. This, of course, would not preclude the existence in it of a minority of Jewish origin. We can hardly conceive, in the lifetime of the Apostles, a Church without such an element. The Apostles themselves were all Jews, and it was their rule—it was even Paul's rule—to preach to the Jew first. But apart from this general presumption, we have a distinct indication in the epistle itself that there was in the Roman Church a Jewish-Christian element. In chap. xiv. Paul speaks of dissensions between "the strong" and "the weak," and though it would be wrong simply to identify these with Gentile and Jewish Christians, it is a safe inference from xv. 7-13, taken in connection with what precedes, that the difference between "strong" and "weak" was not unrelated to that between Gentile and Jew (see notes ad loc.). Hence the prevailing tendency of scholars is to recognise that the Church was Gentile as a whole, but had a minority of Jewish origin. To what extent the Gentile mass was influenced by Jewish ideas—how far the Gentile members of the Church had been originally proselytes, and were therefore appreciative of the Jewish-Christian consciousness or in sympathy with it—is another question. As we have seen above, under 2, b, c, no special assumption of this kind is needed to explain the manner in which Paul vindicates his gospel to them.

CHAPTER III.

CHARACTER OF THE EPISTLE—ITS OCCASION AND PURPOSE.

THE character of the epistle has been a subject of as much discussion as the character of the readers, and the discussion is less likely ever to be closed. A writing of such vitality, which is always being in part lost, and always rediscovered in new power—a writing of such comprehensive scope and such infinite variety of application—a writing at once so personal and historical, and so universal and eternal, is not easily reduced to a formula which leaves nothing to be desired. The definitions of its purpose which have been given by scholars strike one rather as all right than as all wrong. But before entering on an examination of these it will be proper to investigate the occasion of the letter, as it may have some bearing on its purpose.

Paul's intention to visit Rome is first mentioned in Acts xix. 21, and, as Hort remarks, it is expressed with curious emphasis. "After these things were ended, Paul purposed in the spirit (ἔθετο ἐν τῷ πνεύματι), when he had passed through Macedonia, and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome." He passed through Macedonia and Achaia, as he proposed, and it was during his stay in Corinth (which, according to the usual chronology, was in the winter of 58-59), and towards the close of it, that he wrote this letter. This is a point on which all scholars are agreed. When he wrote, he was on the point of starting, or perhaps had started, on his journey to Jerusalem, with the collection for the poor saints there which had been made in the Churches of Galatia, Macedonia and Achaia (chap. xv. 25 ff., 1 Cor. xvi. 1-4, 2 Cor. viii. ix.). He had with him Timothy and Sosipater, or Sopater (chap. xvi. 21), whom we know otherwise to have been in his company (Acts xx. 4), when he started on that journey. Gaius, his host at the moment (xvi. 23), is probably the same as the Gaius whom he had himself baptised at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 14). The time and place, therefore, at which the Epistle to the Romans was written are beyond question. But we ought to notice these not only formally, as points of geography and chronology, but in their significance in Paul's life. The time was one at which he felt that his work in the East was done. From Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum he had fully preached the gospel of Christ. He had no more place in these parts (xv. 19, 23). His eye was turned westward, and rested inevitably on Rome. He had wished to visit it for a good many years (xv. 23), perhaps ever since he had first met Prisca and Aquila in Corinth (Acts xviii. 2), and he had often formed the purpose, though it had been as often disappointed (i. 13). But now it had a definiteness which it had never had before. He did not indeed look on Rome as the goal of his journey; he meant only to stay there till he had been somewhat satisfied with the Church's fellowship, and then to be convoyed by them toward Spain (xv. 24). But he was a Roman citizen, and must have been conscious, as an expression in i. 8 shows ("Your faith is proclaimed in all the world"), of the supreme importance of the Church which had its seat in the capital of the empire. He would not only wish a point of support there for his further operations in the West; he must have been more than commonly anxious that Christianity there should appear as what it truly was, and that the Romans should be firmly established in it. If Paul was going to write to the Romans at all, no matter from what immediate impulse—though it should only have been to announce his approaching visit—it would be natural that his communication, in proportion as he realized the place and coming importance of the Church at Rome, should assume a catholic and comprehensive character. We can hardly imagine the man who was conscious of his own vocation as Apostle of the Gentiles, and conscious at the same time of the central significance of this Church, writing anything of a merely formal character to such a community. When he introduced himself to them, it was a great occasion, and the epistle is the best evidence that he was sensible of its greatness.

There are other considerations which would tell on Paul's mind in the same direction. When he wrote, he was setting out on a journey the issue of which was doubtful and perilous. At the very outset he had to change his course, because of a plot formed against him by the Jews (Acts xx. 3). He dreaded what these same relentless enemies might do in Judæa; he was not sure that even the Christians in Jerusalem would receive graciously the offering which his love and zeal had raised among the Gentiles on their behalf (chap. xv. 31). He was setting out in readiness not only to be bound, but to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus (Acts xxi. 13). In a sense, therefore, this epistle might be called his testament (Weiss). He puts into it, not merely what is suggested to him by special circumstances of which he is aware in the Church at Rome—e.g., the discussion of the relations between "the strong" and "the weak"—but all that his own situation and that of the Church, looking at both in the largest aspect, determine to be of interest. He has achieved a great work in the East. By carrying the charity of the Gentile Christians to Jerusalem, and fraternising once more with the primitive Church, he hopes to secure and perfect that work, and to effect a more cordial union between the two great branches of Christendom, which so imperfectly understood each other. He has passed through great conflicts, but his mind has only been made clearer by them, and established in firmer possession of the fundamental principles of the Christian life ; he can define it without misgiving in relation to all previous modes of human experience and all earlier stages of religion, whether in Greek or Jew. His heart is set on further labours, but he is profoundly conscious of the uncertainties of the future. Such are the outward and the spiritual conditions under which Paul writes. Is it not manifest that when we give them all the historical definiteness of which they are capable, there is something in them which rises above the casualness of time and place, something which might easily give the epistle not an accidental or occasional character, but the character of an exposition of principles ? Be the immediate motive what it may, it is not incredible that the epistle should have something in it which is rather eternal than historical, and that it should require for its interpretation, not a minute acquaintance with opinion in the apostolic age, but some sense of God and man.

The various opinions as to the purpose of the letter have been classified by almost all writers on Introduction under similar heads: it is only necessary to premise that such opinions do not in fact (whatever their authors may think) necessarily exclude one another.

1. The purpose of the letter, according to some, is dogmatic. It is a systematic and formal exposition of the Gospel according to Paul. It is a doctrinal treatise, to which only accident gave the form of a letter ; in other circumstances it might have been a book. This was the opinion which ruled at the time of the Reformation. Luther calls the epistle absolutissima epitome evangelii. Melanchthon calls it doctrinæ Christianæ compendium. No one can say that these descriptions are inept. Luther did find the Gospel in Romans, and found it in a power which made him the greatest conductor of spiritual force since Paul, which directly regenerated one half of Christendom, and indirectly did much to reform the other half. Melanchthon made the epistle the basis of his Loci. He was delighted to find a theology which did not philosophise about the mysteries of the Trinity, or the modes of incarnation, or active and passive creation ; but through sin and law and grace gave the knowledge of Christ and His benefits. The dogmatic conception of the epistle has held its ground even in modern times, and among writers who pride themselves in giving the historical its due. Thus Hausrath describes it as "the essential content of what he otherwise preached by word of mouth". Hilgenfeld calls it "a complete presentation of the Gospel which Paul preaches among the Gentiles". Pfleiderer, more dogmatically still, speaks of it as "an objective development of the truth of the Gospel, drawn from the nature of the Gospel itself". And certainly, whatever the writer's motive may have been, the letter has a systematic character. There is no analogy in any other of his epistles to the connected train of thought which runs from i. 16 to viii. 39 or even to xi. 36. There is indeed a break between chaps. viii. and ix., but there is no unbridgeable gulf. Holtzmann gives, as specimens of the way in which they can be connected, the opinions of Mangold (in i.-viii. Paul justifies his doctrine of salvation, in ix.-xi. his action as a missionary), of Holsten (in i.-viii. he justifies the content, in ix.-xi. the result, of his preaching), and of Pfleiderer (in i.-viii. there is the dogmatic, in ix.-xi. the historical aspect of his gospel). This last agrees pretty much with Godet, who makes the subject of the whole eleven chapters salvation by faith, chaps. i.-viii. treating this in relation to the individual, and chaps. ix.-xi. in relation to its development in history. The systematic character of this part, therefore, is beyond doubt. Those who insist upon it are not of course blind to the parts of the epistle (chaps. xiv. and xv.) in which incidental matters affecting the Church at Rome are touched upon; but it is not in these, they would say, but in the formal presentation of the truth in chaps. i.-xi. that the purpose of the letter is revealed. Granting this, however, the question arises whether the systematic character of the epistle is equivalent to a dogmatic character. In other words, is Paul simply expounding, in a neutral, unprejudiced, objective fashion, the whole scope and contents of his gospel, or is he expounding it in relation to something present to his mind, and to the mind of his readers, which gives the exposition a peculiar character?

2. The latter alternative is affirmed by those who hold that the purpose of the epistle is controversial. It is an exposition of Paul's gospel indeed, but not a purely dogmatic one, which in an epistle would be gratuitous and out of place. The exposition is throughout conducted with reference to an attack such as would be made on Pauline Christianity from the point of view of Judaism, or even of Jewish Christianity. It is not so much an exposition as a defence and a vindication. Practically this idea governs many interpretations. e.g., that of Lipsius. That there is an element of truth in it is not to be denied. Paul does not write in vacuo, in no concrete relations at all. In iii. 8 there is a hint of actual adversaries and their criticisms on the Pauline gospel; in xvi. 17-20 there is another hint of at least possible ones. It may be, as has been noticed above (p. 566), that Jews or Jewish Christians were attempting to create prejudice against the Apostle in Rome; but we cannot, on the ground that this is a letter, and must therefore have its character explained by the circumstances of the readers, conclude for certain (with Weizsäcker), that this was the case. In expounding his gospel systematically to the Romans, Paul defines it, not necessarily against enemies who were forestalling him in Rome, but against the criticism which had followed him all through his missionary work. And we must remember, as has also been referred to already, that part of that criticism was not so much Jewish as human. It is not the Jewish or Jewish-Christian consciousness in particular—it is the consciousness of the natural man at a certain stage of moral development—which thinks that forgiveness is an immoral doctrine, and is shocked at the idea of a God "who justifies the ungodly," or on the other hand, indulges the idea that pardon procures licence to sin. Though the opposition Paul encountered everywhere was headed by Jews or by Christians of Jewish birth, what it represented was by no means exclusively Jewish; and in an epistle of this unique character, standing where it stands in the Apostle's life, and making so little express reference to actual Jewish adversaries (contrast it in this respect with Galatians or 2 Cor. x.-xiii.), we must not limit too narrowly the kind of opposition he has in view. He is stating the case of gospel against law—against all that is pre-Christian, infra-Christian, and anti-Christian; and his polemic has not a temporary but a permanent significance. It is addressed not to Jews of the first century, but to men, and to Christians, of all time. Nothing so conclusively proves its necessity as the fact that it so soon ceased to be understood. It is not easy to live at the spiritual height at which Paul lived. It is not easy to realise that religion begins absolutely on God's side; that it begins with a demonstration of God's love to the sinful, which man has done nothing and can do nothing to merit; and that the assurance of God's love is not the goal to be reached by our own efforts, but the only point from which any human effort can start. It is not easy to realise that justification, in the sense of an initial assurance of God's love, extending over all our life, is the indispensable presupposition of everything which can be called Christianity. It is not easy to realise that in the atoning death of Christ and the gift of the Holy Ghost there are the only and the adequate securities for Christian morality; that the only good man is the forgiven man, and that he is good, not because he is under law, but because he is not under law but under grace. There must have been many men who were practically Christian, and that, too, in the broad sense, which gave no advantage to the Jew over the Gentile, but who were far from realising their Christianity in principle like Paul. In his heroic sense, indeed, Christianity hardly survived him; it was recovered in something like its native power, attested even by a recrudescence of its original perils, at the time of the Reformation; and it always requires to be rediscovered again. But this is only another way of saying that the polemic of the Epistle to the Romans is not narrowly anti-Jewish; it is anti-legal; and whenever legalism establishes itself in the Church anew, whether as mere custom, or as a dogmatic tradition, or as a clerical order claiming to be essential to the constitution of the Church, the Christian conscience will find in this polemic the sword of the spirit to strike it down. We admit, therefore, that the epistle has a controversial aspect; but probably the controversy is not so much with definite adversaries at work in Rome as with those principles and instincts in human nature which long experience as a preacher had made familiar to St. Paul.

3. A third view of the epistle defines its purpose as conciliatory. This, again, by no means excludes either of the views already commented on. Even controversy may be conducted in a conciliatory tone, and with a conciliatory purpose. When Paul wrote, he was extremely anxious about the unity of Jew and Gentile in the Church. His journey to Jerusalem had mainly that in view. In the epistle, while there is much that is trenchant in argument, there is nothing that is personal in feeling. There is no contemptuous irony, such as we have in 2 Cor. x.-xiii.; no uncontrolled passion such as flashes out here and there in Galatians. Although the law works wrath and stimulates sin, he describes it as holy, spiritual, and ordained unto life. He speaks with passionate affection of the Jews (ix. 1 ff.), always recognises their historical prerogatives (iii. 1 ff., ix. 1 ff.), warns the Gentiles against self-exaltation over them, and anticipates the salvation of Israel as a whole. In chaps. xiv.-xv. also his generosity to "the weak," though his judgment is unequivocally with the strong, may be regarded in the same light; the weak are certainly connected with the Jews, and his aim in the whole passage is the peace and unity of the Church. All this confirms us in thinking that the controversial aspect of the epistle should not be urged with special severity against Jewish Christians, or their modes of thought: Paul has no desire to exasperate any one, but in the position in which he stands, "the greatest moving power in the enlargement and building up of the universal Church" (Hort), about to visit Jerusalem at once, and Rome, if he can, immediately afterwards, his desire is to win and to unite all.

From this point of view it is possible to form a conception of the purpose of the epistle which will do something like justice to it as a whole. It is an epistle, not a book. Paul wrote to Rome, not simply to clear up his own mind, not as a modern writer might do, addressing the world at large; he wrote to this particular community, and under a particular impulse. He knew something about the Church, as chaps. xiv. and xv. show; and while he might have acquired such information from members of it whom he met in Corinth, Ephesus, or elsewhere, it is quite probable, from chap. xvi., that he had friends and correspondents at Rome itself. He wrote to the Roman Christians because it was in his mind to visit them; but the nature of his letter is determined, not simply by consideration of their necessities, but by consideration of his own position. The letter is "occasional," in the sense that it had a historical motive—to intimate and prepare for the coming visit; but it is not occasional in the sense in which the first Epistle to the Corinthians is so. It is not a series of answers to questions which the Romans had propounded; it is not a discussion, relevant to them only, of points either in doctrine or practice which had incidentally come to be of critical importance in Rome. Its character, in relation to St. Paul's mind, is far more central and absolute than this would imply. It is in a real sense a systematic exposition of what he distinctively calls "my gospel" (ii. 16), such an exposition as makes him thoroughly known to a community which he foresaw would have a decisive importance in the history of Christianity. It is not an impromptu note, nor a series of unconnected remarks, each with a motive of its own; it is the manifesto of his gospel, by means of which the Apostle of the Gentiles, at a great crisis and turning point in his life, establishes relations with the Christian community in the capital of the Gentile world. It can be dated, of course, but no writing in the New Testament is less casual; none more catholic and eternal. It is quite true that in expounding his gospel Paul proceeds by a certain dialectical process; he advances step by step, and at every step defines the Christian truth as against some false or defective, some anti-Christian or infra-Christian view; in this sense it is controversial. But we have seen already the limitations under which alone a controversial character can be ascribed to it; Paul is not so much controverting anybody in particular as vindicating the truth he expounds against the assaults and misconstructions to which he had found it give rise. There is no animosity against the Jews in it; no sentence such as 1 Thess. ii. 15 f. or Gal. v. 12. It is an establishment of principles he aims at; except in iii. 8, xvi. 17-20 there is no reference to persons. Even in chaps. ix.-xi. (see the introduction at chap. ix.) the whole tone is conciliatory; the one thing which tries our faith in them is Paul's assurance of the future of his own people. But as an interpretation of the actual working out in human history of that method of salvation which he has expounded in the first eight chapters—as an exhibition of the process through which the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles alike contribute eventually to the universality of the Gospel—these chapters are an essential part of the epistle. They are mainly but not exclusively apologetic: they belong to that whole conception of the Gospel, and of the mode in which it becomes the inheritance of the world, which was of one substance with the mind of St. Paul. No one who read the first eleven chapters of the epistle could meet the Apostle as a stranger on anything essential in Christianity as he understood it. No doubt, as Grafe has remarked, it does not contain an eschatology like 1 Cor. xv. or 2 Cor. v., nor a Christology like Col. i. But it establishes that which is fundamental beyond the possibility of misconception. It vindicates once for all the central facts, truths and experiences, without which Christianity cannot exist. It vindicates them at once in their relation to the whole past of mankind, and in their absolute newness, originality and self-sufficiency. It is an utter misapprehension to say that "just the most fundamental doctrines—the Divine Lordship of Christ, the value of His death, the nature of the Sacraments—are assumed rather than stated or proved" (Sanday and Headlam, p. xli.). There can be only one fundamental doctrine, and that doctrine for Paul is the doctrine of justification by faith. That is not part of his gospel, it is the whole of it: there Luther is his true interpreter. If legalists or moralists object, Paul's answer is that justification regenerates, and that nothing else does. By its consistency with this fundamental doctrine, we test everything else that is put forward as Christian. It is only as we hold this, on principle, with the clearness with which Paul held it, that we can know what Christian liberty is in the sense of the New Testament—that liberty in which the will of God is done from the heart, and in which no commandments or ordinances of men, no definitions or traditions, no customs or "orders," have any legal authority for the conscience. And in the only legitimate sense of the word this liberty does not make void, but establishes the law. That is the paradox in the true religion which perpetually baffles those who would reduce it to an institution or a code.

CHAPTER IV.

INTEGRITY OF THE EPISTLE.

The integrity of the Epistle to the Romans has been called in question mainly in connection with chaps. xv. and xvi. Partly on the ground of textual phenomena, partly on internal grounds, the authenticity of these chapters has been denied, in whole or in part; and even among those who recognise chap. xvi. as Pauline, many are unable to recognise Rome as the place to which it was addressed. It will be convenient to consider (1) the questions raised by the position of the doxology, and the various endings; (2) questions raised by the internal character of chap. xv.; and (3) questions connected with the character and destination of chap. xvi.

1. The position of the doxology, and the various endings. The facts in regard to the doxology are as follows:—

(a) It is given at xvi. 25-27, and there only, by ℵBCDE, Vulgate, Syriac, Memphitic, Aethiopic and Latin Fathers. This is by far the best attested position for it, and that which, owing to the respect of Erasmus for the Vulgate, it occupies in the received text.

(b) At xiv. 23, and there only, it is found in L, most cursives, Greek lectionaries, and Greek commentators except Origen. Possibly the lectionaries explain its appearance at this point. The matter in chaps. xv. and xvi. being of a more personal or temporary interest was not likely to be chosen for reading in church. But in order that the great doxology, which was too short for a lesson by itself, might not be lost in public worship, it was appended to the last lesson before chap. xv.

(c) It is found both after xiv. 23 and at xvi. 25-27 in AP 17 arm.

(d) It is omitted in both places in FG, but F has space left after xvi. 24, in which f (the Latin of this bi-lingual MS.) has the doxology, while G has space left between chaps. xiv. and xv.

Besides this variety of MS. attestation, there are certain other facts to take into consideration. (a) There is the evidence of Origen (in his translator Rufinus) to the text in his time. It runs as follows (ed. Lommatzsch, vii., p. 453): Caput hoc Marcion, a quo

Scripturæ evangelicæ et apostolicæ interpolatæ sunt, de hac epistola penitus abstulit; et non solum hoc sed et ab eo loco, ubi scriptum est: omne autem quod non est ex fide peccatum est: usque ad finem cuncta dissecuit. In aliis vero exemplaribus, id est, in his quae non sunt a Marcione temerata, hoc ipsum caput diverse positum invenimus; in nonnullis etenim codicibus post eum locum quem supra diximus hoc est: omne autem quod non est ex fide peccatum est: statim cohærens habetur: ei autem qui potens est vos confirmare. Alii vero codices in fine id, ut nunc est positum, continent. This remark is made at xvi. 25, and caput hoc means, of course, this passage, i.e., the doxology. Marcion wholly omitted it there. But what do the following words mean? What strikes one at first is that he not only omitted it there, but omitted everything standing after "whatsoever is not of faith is sin"—in other words, not only the doxology, but the whole of chaps. xv. and xvi. But Dr. Hort (vide Appendix, p. 112), who reads (with what he says seems to be the best MS.) in eo loco instead of ab eo loco, and changes hoc into hic, only finds the statement that Marcion cut off the whole of the doxology at xiv. 23, as well as at xvi. 25. But usque ad finem cuncta dissecuit is a very misleading way to express this to readers whose copies of the epistle would all contain chaps. xv. and xvi., and it is hardly open to doubt that the first impression of the meaning is the correct one, and that Marcion ended his Epistle to the Romans at xiv. 23. Thus, as Gifford puts it, "we have evidence of a diversity of position before Origen's time, and regarded by him as independent of Marcion's mutilated copies. But we have no evidence of omission before Marcion, who was at Rome propagating his views about A.D. 138-140."

(b) There is the evidence of the "capitulations," or division of the epistle into sections, in some MSS. of the Latin Bible, especially the two best codices of the Vulgate, Codex Amiatinus and Codex Fuldensis, both sixth century MSS. In Codex Amiatinus there are fifty-one sections. The fiftieth, entitled De periculo contristante fratrem suum esca sua, et quod non sit regnum Dei esca et potus sed iustitia et pax et gaudium in Spiritu Sancto, evidently answers to chap. xiv. 15-23; the fifty-first, which is entitled De mysterio Domini ante passionem in silentio habito, post passionem vero ipsius revelato, as plainly corresponds to the doxology. The capitulations therefore were drawn up for a Latin MS. which omitted chaps. xv. and xvi. In another way the capitulations in Codex Fuldensis point to the same conclusion.

(c) There is the appearance, at least, of different endings. 1. When the doxology stands at xiv. 23, it indicates an ending at that point, though otherwise it is a very unnatural one, as the subject and sense of chap. xiv. run on unbroken to xv. 13. 2. There is at xv. 33 what has sometimes been taken as another ending: "The God of peace be with you all. Amen." 3. There is the benediction at xvi. 20: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you". This is genuine, and is an ordinary Pauline formula at the close of a letter. 4. There is the benediction at xvi. 24: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen." Most editors regard this as spurious; it has been transferred in Western texts from verse 20 to this place, and finally established itself in both. Gifford, however, regards it as genuine in both places. 5. There is the doxology at xvi. 25-27.

This complicated combination of facts has not yet been clearly explained, and perhaps never will be. Renan's theory was that Romans is really a circular letter, and that it was sent in various directions, with different endings, which were afterwards combined. Lightfoot thought the facts adduced amounted to irresistible evidence that in early times shorter copies of the epistle existed, containing only chaps. i.-xiv., with or without the doxology; and the theory by which he explained these facts was this, that "St. Paul, at a later period of his life, reissued the epistle in a shorter form with a view to general circulation, omitting the last two chapters, obliterating the mention of Romans in the first chapter, and adding the doxology, which was no part of the original epistle". This tempting theory was expounded in the Journal of Philology, 1871, in a review of M Renan; and this review, along with a minute criticism of Dr. Hort, and a reply by Lightfoot, can be studied in Lightfoot's Biblical Essays, pp. 285-374. An acute statement of the objections to it is also given by Gifford in the introduction to his commentary (p. 23 f.); yet when all is said, it remains the most satisfying hypothesis that has yet been suggested for the colligation of the facts. Sanday and Headlam think that Paul could not possibly have made the break at xiv. 23—he must have been too conscious that the sense ran on unbroken to xv. 13; it was probably to Marcion, therefore, to whom the references to the Jews and the Old Testament in xv. 1-13 were objectionable, that the imperfect copies of the epistle owed their existence. This is hardly convincing. If there is not a break at xiv. 23, there is at least a pause in the thought, and Paul may as easily have made a division there as the author of our present division into chapters. Besides, as Gifford points out (see above,

p. 577), there is evidence that the doxology stood in different positions (at xiv. 23 for one) before Origen's time, and independently of Marcion's mutilated copies. Hence some one must have felt that xiv. 23 was not an impossible place to stop at, and that for other than Marcion's reasons; and if some one, why not Paul himself? But in the absence of any direct evidence as to how the textual phenomena originated, it is very improbable that any certainty on the subject will ever be attained.

The Tübingen school, or at least some of its more vigorous adherents, followed Baur in finding chap. xv. too moderate in tone for Paul. Baur regarded the last two chapters as the work of some one "writing in the spirit of the Acts of the Apostles, seeking to soothe the Judaists and to promote the cause of unity, and therefore tempering the keen anti-Judaism of Paul with a milder and more conciliatory conclusion to the epistle". An argument like this rests on a general impression of what it was possible for Paul to write, and can only be met by another general impression of a different sort. It is sufficient to say that later scholars are practically at one in finding that there is nothing in the chapter inconsistent with Pauline authorship. The Paul by whom Baur measured all things in the epistles is really not the Paul of history, but of a more or less arbitrary theory; and his picture has to be corrected by taking into account precisely such revelations of his true attitude to the questions of his time as are found in this chapter. Lipsius, who thinks the fifteenth chapter as a whole genuine, nevertheless holds that it has been interpolated. He omits the latter part of verse 19—ὥστε με ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ καὶ κύκλῳ μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικοῦ πεπληρωκέναι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ Χριστοῦ—as inconsistent with Gal. i. 18-24, and unsupported by any accredited historical evidence. But he admits that it is supported by Acts ix. 28 f.; and if we compare i. 8, Col. i. 23, and remember that what we have before us is not sworn evidence but a broad rhetorical description of the Apostle's missionary labours, we shall probably think the expression characteristically Pauline rather than the reverse. In verse 20 Lipsius omits οὐχ ὅπου ὠνομάσθη Χριστός, ἵνα μὴ ἐπ' ἀλλότριον θεμέλιον οἰκοδομῶ, ἀλλά. The words, he argues, are suggested by 2 Cor. x. 15; but the purpose expressed in them, of not preaching the Gospel in Rome, because Rome is a mission-field belonging to others (who have introduced Christianity there already), is incompatible with i. 5, 13-15, xii. 3, xv. 15. It is enough to answer that the purpose of not preaching the Gospel at Rome is not expressed here at all. Paul tells the principle on which he has always acted—the principle of breaking new ground. It is the principle on which he will act still, for he takes Rome only en route for Spain; but that is not inconsistent with anything he purposes to do at Rome in the way of Christian work, nor with anything he does in this epistle. On the same principle Lipsius omits also verses 23 and 24; but with equal groundlessness. The very facts to which he refers, that the plan of travel announced in these verses is nowhere else referred to either in Acts or in the Epistles, and that it was (as he thinks) never carried out, are conclusive evidence of the genuineness of the passage What motive could a late interpolator have for putting into Paul's mind a projected voyage, of which there was no purpose on record, and which was never actually made? The unanimous testimony of all sources guarantees the integrity of the text; and there is nc reason whatever to doubt that it is Paul's.

3. Questions connected with the character and destination of chap. xvi.

When we come to this chapter the situation is changed. It is not its genuineness, but its destination, that is called in question. Since 1829, when David Schulz suggested that it was a fragment of an epistle to the Ephesians, this opinion has been widely received. The exact extent of the fragment, indeed, is disputed. Schulz made it consist of verses 1-20; Weizsäcker says verses 1-23; others, verses 3-20, or 1-15, or 1-16 and 21-23, or 3-16 only. Whatever its limits, the arguments on behalf of it can only be estimated by going over the chapter, and considering them as they emerge.

(a) The suggestion is made that Phoebe, sailing from Cenchreæ, would naturally have Ephesus rather than Rome as her goal. But there is no reason to believe that she was sailing from Cenchreæ, though she lived there. Paul may have met her in Corinth on her way to Rome.

(b) At first sight there may seem more reason to believe that Aquila and Priscilla point to Ephesus. They had gone thither with Paul at an earlier date (Acts xviii. 19), and they had a church in their house there, which joined them in a greeting to Corinth, when Paul wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians (1 Cor. xvi. 19); and they were there also some years later (2 Tim. iv. 19). The question is whether these facts, in the circumstances, outweigh the fact that the greeting is found here in a letter addressed to Rome. If we look at the whole situation, this is at least doubtful. As fellow-workers of Paul, it is plain that they shared to a large extent his wandering life, and we know that they had originally a connection with Rome (Acts xviii. 2). There is nothing in the least improbable in the idea that though they were in Ephesus, say in 54 and 57 A.D., and again say in 66, they should have been in Rome in 58. Paul must have had his information about the Church in Rome from some one; and nothing is so likely as that he had it from his old and intimate associates, Aquila and Priscilla, who had themselves a connection of old standing with the capital.

(c) There remains the case of Epænetus, who is described as the first fruits of Asia unto Christ. The received text has Achaia, but that is an error. One fails to see, however, why this Epænetus, though the first Christian convert in the province of Asia, should be bound to remain there always. There is no difficulty in supposing that he was at Rome, and that Paul, who knew him, was aware of the fact, and introduced his name to multiply for himself points of contact with the Roman Church.

These are the only definite matters of fact on which the theory of an Ephesian destination of the chapter has been based. They do not amount to anything against the weight of all the external evidence which makes them part of a letter to Rome. Nor is their weight increased by pointing out in the verses which follow the large number of persons with whom Paul had been in personal relations — persons whom he calls "my beloved," "my fellow-labourers," "my fellow-captives"; "who bestowed much labour on us"; "his mother and mine" Paul's life as a missionary brought him into contact with persons in all the great towns of the East, and though he had not yet visited Rome, it cannot be doubted that many of those with whom in the course of his twenty years' ministry he had established such relations as are referred to here, had for one cause or other found their way to the great city. Paul would naturally, in preparing for his own visit, make all that he could of such points of attachment with the Roman Church as he had. It is, as Gifford points out, a very strong, indeed a conclusive argument for the Roman destination of the letter, that of the twenty-two persons named in verses 6-15, not one can be shown to have been at Ephesus; while (1) Urbanus, Rufus, Ampliatus, Julia and Junia are specifically Roman names, and (2) besides the first four of these names, "ten others, Stachys, Apelles, Tryphaena, Tryphosa, Hermes, Hermas, Patrobas (or Patrobius), Philologus, Julia, Nereus are found in the sepulchral inscriptions on the Appian Way as the names of persons connected with 'Cæsar's household' (Phil. iv. 22), and contemporary with St. Paul". Hence, in spite of the difficulty of Paul's knowing so many people in a Church he had never visited, and the equally great difficulty that none of all these people are mentioned in the letters the Apostle afterwards wrote from Rome (see Col. iv. 10 f.), scholars like Lightfoot, Gifford and Sanday find no reason to give up the historical tradition which makes this chapter an integral part of the epistle addressed to Rome. There is really more reason to question verses 17-20 than any other part of the chapter. Words like those in verse 19—ἐφ' ὑμῖν οὖν χαίρω, θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς κ.τ.λ.—certainly strike one as in better keeping if addressed to a Church with which Paul had had such previous relations as entitled him to take a personal tone than if addressed to strangers. But we cannot tell a priori how the consciousness of an Apostle towards a Christian community he had never yet seen was determined; it may, with all the disclaiming of titles to interfere, have involved precisely that authoritativeness and sense of responsibility to and for the Church which is expressed in this passage.

As for the doxology, it stands by itself. Lightfoot thought it no part of the original epistle. Neither did Alford. "Probably," says the latter, "on reperusing his work either at the time, or, as the altered style seems to import, in after years at Rome, he subjoins the fervid and characteristic doxology with which it closes." Opinions on the genuineness of the doxology vary in part (but not exclusively) as opinions vary on the genuineness of the pastoral epistles. In spite of the vindication of the style word by word, the impression it leaves on the mind is hardly Pauline. It seems artificial rather than inspired. It is defended by Gifford, Hort, and Sanday and Headlam; by Weiss (who thinks Paul may have added it with his own hand), Godet, and many others: rejected by Delitzsch, Pfleiderer, Schultz and Lipsius. In substance it recapitulates the main ideas of the epistle.

Text.

The text printed in this commentary is the Textus Receptus, but that which is commented upon is practically that of Westcott and Hort. Various readings, of any importance, have been carefully noted in the apparatus criticus, with such an indication of the authorities for them as will be sufficient for those who do not aspire to be experts in this department: care has been taken to give the evidence for those readings in which critical editors depart from the received text. It is impossible here to do more than note the MSS. and other authorities which have been cited; information as to their characteristics and value must be sought from such sources as the Prolegomena to Tischendorf's Novum Testamentum Graecum, or Scrivener's Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament, or Westcott and Hort's Introduction, vol. ii. An easier book to begin with is Hammond's Textual Criticism applied to the New Testament. In Sanday and Headlam's Commentary (pp. lxiii.-lxxiv.), there is a lucid account of the chief sources of evidence for the text of Romans, and of their relations to one another; while B. Weiss, in his great work, Das Neue Testament: Textkritische Untersuchungen und Textherstellung, gives weight to considerations of a kind that more purely "diplomatic" constructors of texts are apt to overlook.

The principal MSS. of Romans are those which also contain the gospels, viz., ℵABC. ℵ and B belong to the fourth century, A and C to the fifth. The MSS. next in importance, DEFG, are different from those which are called by the same names in the gospels: they are all Graeco-Latin MSS. D is the Codex Claromontanus which Tischendorf assigns to the sixth century. It wants Romans i. 1-7, 27-30. Tregelles describes it as "one of the most valuable MSS. extant". E is the Codex Sangermanensis, now at St. Petersburg. It is probably not older than the ninth or tenth century, and is described by Sanday and Headlam as "nothing more than a faulty copy of D". F is the Codex Augiensis, now in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge. It is of the ninth century, and wants Romans i. 1-iii. 19 ἐν τῷ νό[μῳ]. G is the Codex Boernerianus, now in Dresden, and is a little later than F. It wants Romans i. 1 ἀφωρισμένος . . . i. 5 πίστεως, and ii. 16 τὰ κρυπτὰ . . . ii. 25 νόμου ᾖς. These four all belong to the type of text which Westcott and Hort call Western. Other uncials of less importance are K, Codex Mosquensis; L, Codex Angelicus; and P, Codex Porphyrianus, all of about the same age, i.e., the ninth century. Of cursive MSS. those quoted in this work are 17 (the same as 33 in the Gospels, and 13 in Acts), "the queen of cursives"; 47, of the eleventh or twelfth century, now in the Bodleian Library; and 67, of the eleventh century, now at Vienna. The marginal corrector of this MS., quoted as 67 , gives many peculiar and ancient readings. The versions referred to are the Latin Vulgate, especially as given in Codex Amiatinus circa 514 A.D. and Codex Fuldensis, also of sixth century; the old Latin contained in DEFG (see above); the Syriac versions, one of which (the Peshitto) was "certainly current much in its present form early in the fourth century" (Sanday and Headlam), while the other dates from the sixth: an occasional reference is also made to the Egyptian versions, and to the Armenian: the last was made in the fifth century.

To estimate the value of any reading it is necessary to consider the relations to each other of the authorities which support it. In the Epistle to the Romans, as elsewhere in the New Testament, these authorities tend to fall into groups. Thus ℵB form one; DEFG a second; and ℵACLP a third. ℵB form what Westcott and Hort describe as "neutral" authorities; DEFG are "Western"; ℵACLP include what they call "Alexandrian," but are not identical with it. Sanday and Headlam, after giving an account of the authorities for the text, define the "specific characteristics of the textual apparatus of Romans" as these: (i.) the general inferiority in boldness and originality of the Western text; (ii.) the fact that there is a distinct Western element in B, which therefore when it is combined with authorities of the Western type is diminished in value; (iii.) the consequent rise in importance of the group ℵAC; (iv.) the existence of a few scattered readings either of B alone or of B in combination with one or two other authorities which have considerable intrinsic probability, and may be right. By a little practice on the readings for which the authority is given in the apparatus criticus, the student can familiarise himself with the facts, and exercise his own judgment on them.

In the notes, Winer means Moulton's edition of Winer's Grammar; W. and H. stands for Westcott and Hort; S. and H. for Sanday and Headlam's Commentary on Romans.

I. 1. ΠΑΥΛΟΣ δοῦλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ,[a] κλητὸς ἀπόστολος, ἀφωρισμένος εἰς εὐαγγέλιον Θεοῦ, 2. (ὃ προεπηγγείλατο διὰ τῶν προφητῶν αὐτοῦ a 1 Cor. i. 1, 2.

Chapter I.—Vv. 1-7. The usual salutation of the Apostle is expanded, as is natural in writing to persons whom he has not seen, into a description both of himself and of his Gospel. . Both, so to speak, need a fuller introduction than if he had been writing to a Church he had himself founded. The central idea of the passage is that of the whole epistle, that the Gospel, as preached by Paul to the Gentiles, was not inconsistent with, but the fulfilment of, God's promises to Israel.

Ver. 1. Paul's description of himself. δοῦλος Ἰ. Χ. The use of the same expression in James, Jude, 2 Pet., shows how universal in the Church was the sense of being under an obligation to Christ which could never be discharged. It is this sense of obligation which makes the δουλεία, here referred to, perfect freedom. κλητὸς ἀπόστολος is an Apostle by vocation. No one can take this honour to himself, any more than that of a saint (ver. 7), unless he is called by God. In the N.T. it is always God who calls. It is as an Apostle—i.e., with the sense of his vocation as giving him a title to do so—that Paul writes to the Romans. ἀπόστολος is here used in the narrower sense, which includes only Paul and the twelve, see on xvi. 7. ἀφωρισμένος εἰς εὐαγγέλιον θεοῦ: for καλεῖν and ἀφορίζειν similiarly combined, see Gal. i. 15. The separation is here regarded (as in Gal.) as God's act, though, as far as it had reference to the Gentile mission, it was carried out by an act of the Church at Antioch (Acts xiii. 2, ἀφορίσατε δή μοι κ.τ.λ.). What it means is "this one thing I do". εὐαγγέλιον θεοῦ is the Gospel which comes from God, the glad tidings of which He is the source and author. As a name for the Christian religion, or the proclamation of it, it had a great fascination for an evangelist like Paul, who uses it out of all proportion oftener than any other N.T. writer.

Ver. 2. ὃ προεπηγγείλατο. The Gospel is not in principle a new thing, a subversion of the true religion as it has hitherto been known to the people of God. On the contrary, God promised it before, through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures. It is the fulfilment of hopes which God Himself inspired. διὰ τῶν προφητῶν does not restrict the reference to the prophets in the strict sense of the word. The O.T., as a whole, is prophetic of the New, and it is in the law (Abraham) and the Psalms (David), as much as in the prophets (Isaiah, Hosea), that Paul finds anticipations and promises of the Gospel: see chap. iv. The omission of the article with ἐν γραφαῖς ἁγίαις (cf. xvi. 26) is probably significant, for as against these two passages there are over forty in which αἱ γραφαὶ or ἡ γραφὴ occurs: it emphasises the Divine character of these as opposed to other writings. That is ἅγιον which belongs to God, or is connected with Him: ἅγιαι γραφαὶ is the O.T. as God's book.

Ver. 3 f. περὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ: the subject of the Gospel of God is His Son. For the same conception, see 2 Cor. i. 19: ὁ τοῦ θεοῦ γὰρ υἱὸς Χ. Ἰ. ὁ ἐν ὑμῖν δι' ἡμῶν κηρυχθείς. Taken

by itself, "the Son of God" is, in the first instance, a title rather than a name. It goes back to Ps. ii. 7; the person to whom it is applied is conceived as the chosen object of the Divine love, God's instrument for accomplishing the salvation of His people. (Weiss.) The description which follows does not enable us to answer all the questions it raises, yet it is sufficiently clear. "The Son of God" was born of the seed of David according to the flesh. For γενομένου, cf. Gal. iv. 4; for David, 2 Tim. ii. 8, where, as here, the Davidic descent is an essential part of the Pauline Gospel. That it was generally preached and recognised in the primitive Church is proved by these passages, as well as by Heb. vii. 14 and the genealogies in Matthew and Luke; yet it seems a fair inference from our Lord's question in Mk. xii. 35 ff. that for Him it had no real importance. Those who did not directly see in Jesus one transcendently greater than David would not recognise in Him the Saviour by being convinced of His Davidic descent. This person, of royal lineage, was "declared Son of God, with power, according to the spirit of holiness, in virtue of resurrection from the dead". The word ὁρισθέντος is ambiguous; in Acts x. 42, xvii. 31, it is used to describe the appointment of Christ to judge the living and the dead, and is rendered in A.V. "ordained". If to be Son of God were merely an office or a dignity, like that of judge of the world, this meaning might be defended here. There is an approximation to such an idea in Acts xiii. 33, where also Paul is the speaker. "God," he says, "has fulfilled His promise by raising up Jesus; as it is written also in the second Psalm, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee." Here the resurrection day, strictly speaking, is the birthday of the Son of God; sonship is a dignity to which He is exalted after death. But in view of passages like Gal. iv. 4, 2 Cor. viii. 9, Phil. ii. 5 f., it is impossible to suppose that Paul limited his use of Son of God in this way; even while Jesus lived on earth there was that in Him which no connection with David could explain, but which rested on a relation to God; the resurrection only declared Him to be what He truly was—just as in the Psalm, for that matter, the bold words, This day have I begotten Thee, may be said to refer, not to the right and title, but to the coronation of the King. In virtue of His resurrection, which is here conceived, not as from the dead (ἐκ νεκρῶν), but of the dead (ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν—a resurrection exemplifying, and so guaranteeing, that of others), Christ is established in that dignity which is His, and which answers to His nature. The expression κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης characterises Christ ethically, as κατὰ σάρκα does physically. Not that it makes the sonship in question "ethical" as opposed to "metaphysical": no such distinctions were in the Apostle's thought. But the sonship, which was declared by the resurrection, answered to (κατὰ) the spirit of holiness which was the inmost and deepest reality in the Person and life of Jesus. The sense that there is that in Christ which is explained by his connection with mankind, and that also which can only be explained by some peculiar relation to God, is no doubt conveyed in this description, and is the basis of the orthodox doctrine of the two natures in the one Person of the Lord; but it is a mistake to say that that doctrine is formulated here. The connection of the words ἐν δυνάμει is doubtful. They have been joined to ὁρισθέντος (cf. 2 Cor. xiii. 4: ζῇ ἐκ δυνάμεως θεοῦ): declared to be Son of God "by a miracle," a mighty work wrought by God; and also with υἱοῦ θεοῦ = Son of God, not in humiliation, but "in power," a power demonstrated by the gift of the Spirit and its operations in the Church. "Jesus, Messiah, Our Lord," summarises all this. "Our Lord" is the most compendious expression of the Christian consciousness. (A. B. Bruce, Apologetics, 398 ff.) "The whole Gospel of Paul is comprehended in this historical Jesus, who has appeared in flesh, but who, on the ground of the πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης, which constitutes His essence, has been exalted as Christ and Lord." (Lipsius.)

Ver. 5. Through Christ Paul received χάριν κ. ἀποστολήν. The plural, ἐλάβομεν, may mean no more than the

[1] For πασιν τοις ουσιν εν Ρωμῃ αγαπητοις θεου G reads πασι τοις ουσιν εν αγαπῃ θεου. The same MS. also omits τοις εν Ρωμῃ in ver. 17. This is part of the evidence on which Lightfoot relied to show that Paul had issued chaps. i.-xiv. of this Epistle as a circular letter with all local allusions (such as these, and the many in chaps. xv. and xvi.) omitted. See Introduction, p. 578.

singular, or may proceed from the latent consciousness that the writer is not the only person entitled to say this; it is not expressly meant to include others. χάρις, grace, is common to all Christians; ἀποστολὴ rests upon a specialised χάρις and implies competence as well as vocation. But in the N.T. these are hardly distinguished; it is a man's χάρισμα which constitutes his "call" to any particular service in the Church. εἰς ὑπακοὴν πίστεως: the object of the apostleship received through Christ is obedience of faith, i.e., the obedience which consists in faith (but cf. Acts vi. 7) among all the Gentiles. Cf. chap. x. 16, 2 Thess. i. 8. The meaning of ἔθνεσιν (Gentiles, not nations) is fixed by ver. 13 and by Paul's conception of his own vocation, Gal. i. 16, ii. 8, Eph. iii. 1 ff. ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος αὐτοῦ: the final purpose of his vocation is that Christ's name may be above every name.

Ver. 6. The Romans, as well as others, are included among the Gentiles, and described as Jesus Christ's called. They belong to Him, because they have heard and obeyed the Gospel. "Calling" in Paul always includes obedience as well as hearing. It is effectual calling, the κλητοὶ being those who have accepted the Divine invitation.

Ver. 7. The salutation proper. It is addressed to all who are in Rome, etc., to include Christians of Jewish as well as Gentile origin. They are ἀγαπητοὶ θεοῦ, God's beloved, because they have had experience of His redeeming love in Jesus Christ; and they are κλητοὶ ἅγιοι, saints, in virtue of His calling. See on κλητὸς ἀπόστολος above. The word ἅγιος did not originally describe character, but only a certain relation to God; the ἅγιοι are God's people. What this means depends of course on what God is; it is assumed in scripture that the character of God's people will answer to their relation to Him. It is worth mentioning that, as a synonym for Christian, it is never applied in the N.T. to an individual: no person is called ἅγιος. Phil. iv. 21 (ἀσπάσασθε πάντα ἅγιον ἐν Χ. Ἰ.) is not an exception. The ideal of God's people cannot be adequately realised in, and ought not to be presumptuously claimed by, any single person. (Hort's Christian Ecclesia, 56.) Paul wishes the Romans grace and peace (the source and the sum of all Christian blessings) from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. The greeting is followed by a thanksgiving, which passes over insensibly into an introduction of a more personal character, in which Paul explains his desire to visit the Romans and to work among them (vers. 8-15).

Ver. 8. πρῶτον μέν. Nothing can take precedence of thanksgiving, when Paul thinks of the Romans, or indeed of any Christian Church in normal health. πρῶτον μὲν suggests that something is to follow, but what it is we are not told; Paul's mind unconsciously leaves the track on which it started, at least so far as the linguistic following out of it is concerned. Perhaps the next thing was to be the prayer referred to in ver. 10. (Weiss.) διὰ Ἰ. Χ. Jesus Christ must be conceived here as the mediator through whom all our approaches to God are made (Eph. ii. 18), not as He through whom the blessings come for which Paul gives thanks. περὶ πάντων ὑμῶν: the "all" may have a certain emphasis when we remember the divisions to which reference is made in chap. xiv. ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν is "the fact that you are Christians". The very existence of a Church at Rome was something to be thankful for. ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ κόσμῳ is, of course, hyperbole, but a Church in Rome was like "a city set on a hill".

Ver. 9 f. μάρτυς γάρ μού ἐστιν ὁ θεός (Phil. i. 8): at a distance the Apostle cannot directly prove his love, but he appeals to God, who hears his ceaseless prayers for the Romans, as a witness of it. λατρεύω in the LXX is always used of religious service—worship, whether of the true God or of idols. ἐν τῷ πνεύματί μου: Paul's ministry is spiritual and rendered with his spirit—not like that of the ministers in the ἅγιον κοσμικὸν at Jerusalem. ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ: in preaching the glad tidings of His Son. ὡς ἀδιαλείπτως: the ὡς may either be "how" or "that": looking to 1 Thess. ii. 10, "how" seems more probable. μνείαν ὑμῶν ποιοῦμαι: I remember you. Cf. Job xiv. 13 (O that Thou wouldst appoint me χρόνον ἐν ᾧ μνείαν μου ποιήσῃ). ἐπὶ τῶν προσευχῶν μου: at my prayers. (Winer, p. 470.) For εἴ πως, see Acts xxvii. 12 and Burton, Moods and Tenses, § 276. ἤδη is "now at length," "now, after all this waiting". (S. and H.) The ποτὲ, which can hardly be conveyed in English, marks the indefiniteness which even yet attaches in the writer's mind to the fulfilment of this hope. εὐοδωθήσομαι: the R.V. gives "I may be prospered"; the A.V. "I might have a prosperous journey". The latter brings in the idea of the ὁδὸς, which was no doubt present to consciousness when the word εὐοδοῦσθαι was first used; but it is questionable whether any feeling for the etymology remained in the current employment of the word. The other N.T. examples (1 Cor. xvi. 2, 3 John ver. 2), as well as the LXX, suggest the contrary. Hence the R.V. is probably right. ἐν τῷ θελήματι τοῦ θεοῦ: his long cherished and often disappointed hope had taught Paul to say, "if the Lord will" (Jas. iv. 15).

Ver. 11. ἵνα τι μεταδῶ χάρισμα πνευματικόν. The χαρ. πν. may be understood by reference to 1 Cor. chaps. xii.-xiv. or Rom. chap. xii. No doubt, in substance, Paul imparts his spiritual gift through this epistle: what he wished to do for the Romans was to further their comprehension of the purpose of God in Jesus Christ—a purpose the breadth and bearings of which were yet but imperfectly understood.

Ver. 12. τοῦτο δέ ἐστιν: an explanatory correction. Paul disclaims being in a position in which all the giving must be on his side. When he is among them (ἐν ὑμῖν) his desire is that he may be cheered and strengthened with them (the subject of συνπαρακληθῆναι must be ἐμὲ in the first instance, though widening, as the sentence goes on, into ἡμᾶς) by the faith which both they and he possess (ὑμῶν τε καὶ ἐμοῦ), and which each recognises in the other (ἐν ἀλλήλοις). The ἐν here is to be taken as in 2 Tim. i. 5.

Ver. 13. οὐ θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν: a phrase of constant recurrence in Paul, and always with ἀδελφοί (1 Thess. iv. 13, 1 Cor. x. 1, xii. 1, 2 Cor. i. 8). Some emphasis is laid by it on the idea that his desire or purpose to visit them was no passing whim. It was grounded in his vocation as Apostle of the Gentiles, and though it had been often frustrated he had never given it up. ἐκωλύθην ἄχρι τοῦ δεῦρο: probably the main obstacle was evangelistic work which had to be done elsewhere. Cf. chap. xv. 22 f. The purpose of his visit is expressed in ἵνα τινὰ καρπὸν σχῶ: that I may obtain some fruit among you also. καρπὸς denotes the result of labour: it might either mean new converts or the furtherance of the Christians in their new life. καθὼς καὶ ἐν τοῖς λοιποῖς ἔθνεσιν: nothing could indicate more clearly that the Church at Rome, as a whole, was Gentile.

[2] του Χριστου om. ℵABCD, etc. πρωτον is omitted here in BG g and Tert. It is inserted in ℵACDKL. The combination of B with "Western" authorities lessens its weight in Paul's epp., where B itself has an infusion of Western readings to which this omission may belong; possibly it may be due to Marcion, who is known to have omitted both πρωτον and the quotation in ver. 17. Weiss retains it; W. and H. bracket.

Ver. 14 f. These verses are naturally taken as an expansion of the thought contained in the preceding. Paul's desire to win fruit at Rome, as among the rest of the Gentiles, arises out of the obligation (for so he feels it) to preach the Gospel to all men without distinction of language or culture. If it depended only on him, he would be exercising his ministry at Rome. The Romans are evidently conceived as Gentiles, but Paul does not indicate where they would stand in the broad classification of ver. 14. It is gratuitous, and probably mistaken, to argue with Weiss that he meant to describe them as βάρβαροι, when we know that the early Roman Church was Greek speaking. In τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ πρόθυμον, the simplest construction is to make τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ subject and πρόθυμον predicate, supplying ἐστι: all that depends on me is eager, i.e., for my part, I am all readiness. But it is possible to take τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ πρόθυμον together, and to translate: the readiness, so far as I am concerned, (is) to preach the Gospel to you also who are in Rome. The contrast implied is that between willing (which Paul for his part is equal to) and carrying out the will (which depends on God (ver. 10)). With this Paul introduces the great subject of the epistle, and, in a sense, of the Gospel—that which he here designates δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ. The connection is peculiar. He has professed his readiness to preach the Gospel, even at Rome. Anywhere, no doubt, one might have misgivings about identifying himself with a message which had for its subject a person who had been put to death as a criminal; anywhere, the Cross was to Jews a stumbling block and to Greeks foolishness. But at Rome, of all places, where the whole effective force of humanity seemed to be gathered up, one might be ashamed to stand forth as the representative of an apparently impotent and ineffective thing. But this the Gospel is not; it is the very reverse of this, and therefore the Apostle is proud to identify himself with it. "I am not ashamed of the Gospel; for it is a power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. It is such because there is revealed in it δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ—the very thing men need to ensure salvation; and that in such a manner—from faith to faith—as to make it accessible to all. And this, again, only answers to what stands in the O.T.—It is written, the righteous shall live by faith."

Ver. 16 f. δύναμις γὰρ θεοῦ ἐστιν: for it is a power of God. It does no injustice to render "a Divine power". The conception of the Gospel as a force pervades the epistles to the Corinthians; its proof, so to speak, is dynamical, not logical. It is demonstrated, not by argument, but by what it does; and, looking to what it can do, Paul is proud to preach it anywhere. εἰς σωτηρίαν: σωτηρία is one of a class of words (to which ζωή, δόξα, κληρονομία belong) used by Paul to denote the last result of the acceptance of the Gospel. It is the most negative of them all, and conceives of the Gospel as a means for rescuing men from the ἀπώλεια which awaits sinners at the last judgment. In παντὶ τῷ πιστεύοντι Ἰουδαίῳ τε πρῶτον καὶ Ἕλληνι another of the main interests of the writer in this epistle is brought forward; the Gospel is for all, the same Gospel and on the same terms, but without prejudice to the historical prerogative of the Jew. Ver. 17 shows how the Gospel is a Divine saving power. It is such because there is revealed in it δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ. Plainly, δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ is something without which a sinful man cannot be saved; but what is it? The expression itself is of the utmost generality, and the various definite meanings which have been assigned to it attempt to justify themselves as relevant, or inevitable, by connecting themselves with the context as a whole. There can be no doubt that the fundamental religious problem for the Apostle—that which made a Gospel necessary, that the solution of which could alone be Gospel—was, How shall a sinful man be righteous before God? To Luther, who had instinctive experimental sympathy with the Pauline standpoint, this suggested that δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ meant a righteousness valid before God, of which a man can become possessed through faith; for such a righteousness (as the condition of salvation) is the first and last need of the sinful soul. In support of this view reference has been made to ver. 18, where ἀσέβεια and ἀδικία ἀνθρώπων are represented as the actual existing conditions which the δικ. θεοῦ has to replace. No one can deny that a righteousness valid before God is essential to salvation, or that such a righteousness is revealed in the Gospel; but it is another question whether δικ. θεοῦ is a natural expression for it. The general sense of scholars seems to have decided against it; but it seems quite credible to me that Paul used δικ. θεοῦ broadly to mean "a Divine righteousness," and that the particular shade of meaning which Luther made prominent can be legitimately associated even with these words. Until lately, scholars of the most opposite schools had agreed in finding the key to the expression δικ. θεοῦ in two other Pauline passages, where it is contrasted with something else. Thus in chap. x. 3 δικ. θεοῦ is opposed to man's ἰδία δικαιοσύνη; and in Phil. iii. 9 the opposition is more precisely defined: μὴ ἔχων ἐμὴν δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐκ νόμου, ἀλλὰ τὴν διὰ πίστεως Χριστοῦ, τὴν ἐκ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει. If this contrast were allowed to tell here, the righteousness of which Paul speaks would be one of which God is the source or author; we do not bring it to Him, He reveals it for our acceptance. And this also, of course, answers to the facts: Gospel righteousness is a gift, not an achievement. But then, it is said, there is nothing in the passage to suggest such a contrast; there is not any emphasis whatever on θεοῦ to bring before the mind the idea of a righteousness not due to God, but a work of man's own. To this it may fairly be answered that the contrast did not need to be specially suggested; if it had not presented itself instinctively to those to whom Paul wrote, they would not only have missed the point of this expression, they would not have understood three lines anywhere. We must assume, upon the whole, in the recipients of Paul's epistles, a way of conceiving the Gospel answering broadly to his own; the invisible context, which we have to reproduce as best we can, may be more important sometimes than what we have in black and white. The broad sense of "a Divine righteousness" covers this second, which may be called the historical Protestant interpretation, as well as Luther's; and the fact seems to me an argument for that broader rendering. In view, however, of the undoubted difficulty of the phrase, new light would be welcome, and this has been sought in the O.T. use of δικαιοσύνη (צְדָקָה), especially in the Psalms and in Is. xl.-lxvi. See, e.g., Ps. xxxv. 24, 28, li. 14; Is. lvi. 1, lxii. 1; Ps. xcviii. 2. In the last of these passages we have a striking analogy to the one before us: ἐγνώρισε κύριος τὸ σωτήριον αὐτοῦ, ἐναντίον τῶν ἐθνῶν ἀπεκάλυψε τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐτοῦ; and in others we cannot but be struck with the parallelism of "righteousness" and "salvation," sometimes as things which belong to God (Ps. xcviii. 2), sometimes as things which belong to His people. On the strength of facts like these, Theod. Häring, in a stupendous programme entitled Δικ. θεοῦ bei Paulus (Tübingen, 1896), argues that δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ means the judicial action of God in which He justifies His people and accomplishes their salvation. This fits into the context well enough. Put as Paul puts it—how shall man be just with God?—the religious problem is a judicial one, and its solution must be judicial. If the Gospel shows how God justifies (for of course it must be God, the only Judge of all, who does it), it shows everything: salvation is included in God's sentence of justification. Häring himself admits that this interpretation is rather of philological than of religious import; this "rechtfertigendes Walten Gottes" cannot but have as its consequence "the justification of man, a righteousness which proceeds from God and is valid before God" (Δικ. θεοῦ bei Paulus, S. 68); that is, this meaning leads by immediate inference to the other two. But it can by no means be carried through (any more than either of the other two) in all places where the phrase occurs; in iii. 5, e.g., Häring himself admits this; in iii. 25, 26, where he insists on the same sense as in i. 17, he does not so much as refer to the clause διὰ τὴν πάρεσιν τῶν προγεγονότων ἁμαρτημάτων ἐν τῇ ἀνοχῇ αὐτοῦ, which, it is not too much to say, necessitates a different shade of meaning for δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ there: see note. The advantage of his rendering is not so much that it simplifies the grammar, as that it revives the sense of a connection (which existed for the Apostle) between the Gospel he preached, and even the language he preached it in, and the anticipations of that Gospel in the O.T., and that it gives prominence to the saving character of God's justifying action. In substance all these three views are Biblical, Pauline and true to experience, whichever is to be vindicated on philological grounds. But the same cannot be said of another, according to which righteousness is here an attribute, or even the character, of God. That the Gospel is the supreme revelation of the character of God, and that the character of God is the source of the Gospel, no one can question. Certainly Paul would not have questioned it. But whether Paul conceived the righteousness which is an eternal attribute of God (cf. iii. 5) as essentially self-communicative—whether he would have said that God justifies (δικαιοῖ) the ungodly because he is himself δίκαιος—is another matter. The righteousness of God, conceived as a Divine attribute, may have appeared to Paul the great difficulty in the way of the justification of sinful man. God's righteousness in this sense is the sinner's condemnation, and no one will succeed in making him find in it the ground of his hope. What is wanted (always in consistency with God's righteousness as one of His inviolable attributes—the great point elaborated in chap. iii. 24-26) is a righteousness which, as man cannot produce it, must be from God, and which, once received, shall be valid before God; and this is what the Apostle (on the ground of Christ's death for sin) announces. But it introduces confusion to identify with this the conception of an eternal and necessarily self-imparting righteousness of God. The Apostle, in chap. iii. and chap. v., takes our minds along another route. See Barmby in Expositor for August, 1896, and S. and H. ad loc. ἀποκαλύπτεται intimates in a new way that the Divine righteousness spoken of is from God: man would never have known or conceived it but for the act of God in revealing it. Till this ἀποκαλύπτειν it was a μυστήριον: cf. xvi. 25 f. ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν. Precise definitions of this (e.g., Weiss's: the revelation of the δικ. θεοῦ presupposes faith in the sense of believing acceptance of the Gospel, i.e., it is ἐκ πίστεως: and it leads to faith in the sense of saving reliance on Christ, i.e., it is εἰς πίστιν) strike one as arbitrary. The broad sense seems to be that in the revelation of God's righteousness for man's salvation everything is of faith from first to last. Cf. 2 Cor. ii. 16, iii. 18. This N.T. doctrine the Apostle finds announced before in Hab. ii. 14. ἐκ πίστεως in the quotation is probably to be construed with ζήσεται. To take it with δίκαιος (he who is righteous by faith) would imply a contrast to another mode of being righteous (viz., by works) which there is nothing in the text to suggest. The righteous who trusted in Jehovah were brought by that trust safe through the impending judgment in Habakkuk's time; and as the subjective side of religion, the attitude of the soul to God, never varies, it is the same trust which is the condition of salvation still.

The Gospel of God's righteousness is necessary, because the human race has no righteousness of its own. This is proved of the whole race (i. 18-iii. 20), but in these verses (18-32) first of the heathen. The emphasis lies throughout on the fact that they have sinned against light.

Ver. 18 f. The revelation of the righteousness of God (ver. 17) is needed in view of the revelation of His wrath, from which only δικ. θεοῦ (whether it be His justifying sentence or the righteousness which He bestows on man) can deliver. ὀργὴ in the N.T. is usually eschatological, but in 1 Thess. ii. 16 it refers to some historical judgment, and in John iii. 36 it is the condemnation of the sinner by God, with all that it involves, present and to come. The revelation of wrath here probably refers mainly to the final judgment: the primary character of Jesus in Paul's Gospel being ὁ ῥυόμενος ἡμᾶς ἐκ τῆς ὀργῆς τῆς ἐρχομένης, 1 Thess. i. 10, Rom. v. 9; but it is not forcing it here to make it include God's condemnation uttered in conscience, and attested (ver. 24) in the judicial abandonment of the world. The revelation of the righteousness of God has to match this situation, and reverse it. ἀσέβεια is "positive and active irreligion": see Trench, Syn., § lxvi. τῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἐν ἀδικίᾳ κατεχόντων may mean (1) who possess the truth, yet live in unrighteousness; or (2) who suppress the truth by, or in, an unrighteous life. In the N.T. ἀλήθεια is moral rather than speculative; it is truth of a sort which is held only as it is acted on: cf. the Johannine expression ποιεῖν τὴν ἀλήθειαν. Hence the latter sense is to be preferred (see Wendt, Lehre Jesu, II., S. 203 Anm.). διότι τὸ γνωστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ κ.τ.λ. There is no indisputable way of deciding whether γνωστὸν here means "known" (the usual N.T. sense) or "knowable" (the usual classic sense). Cremer (who compares Phil. iii. 8 τὸ ὑπερέχον τῆς γνώσεως, Heb. vi. 17 τὸ ἀμετάθετον τῆς βουλῆς, Rom. ii. 4 τὸ χρηστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ, and makes τοῦ θεοῦ in the passage before us also gen. poss.) favours the latter. What is meant in either case is the knowledge of God which is independent of such a special revelation as had been given to the Jews. Under this come (ver. 20) His eternal power, and in a word His (eternal) divinity, things inaccessible indeed to sense (ἀόρατα), but clear to intelligence (νοούμενα), ever since creation (ἀπὸ κτίσεως κόσμου: for ἀπὸ thus used, see Winer, 463), by the things that are made. God's power, and the totality of the Divine attributes constituting the Divine nature, are inevitably impressed on the mind by nature (or, to use the scripture word, by creation). There is that within man which so catches the meaning of all that is without as to issue in an instinctive knowledge of God. (See the magnificent illustration of this in Illingworth's Divine Immanence, chap. ii., on The religious influence of the material world.) This knowledge involves duties, and men are without excuse because, when in possession of it, they did not perform these duties; that is, did not glorify as God the God whom they thus knew.

Ver. 21 ff. εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτοὺς ἀναπολογήτους would naturally express purpose: to make men inexcusable is one, though not the only or the ultimate, intention of God in giving this revelation. But the διότι almost forces us to take the εἰς τὸ as expressing result: so that they are inexcusable, because, etc. (see Burton's Moods and Tenses, § 411). In vers. 21-23 the wrong course taken by humanity is described. Nature shows us that God is to be glorified and thanked, i.e., nature reveals Him to be great and good. But men were not content to accept the impression made on them by nature; they fell to reasoning upon it, and in their reasonings (διαλογισμοί, "perverse self-willed reasonings or speculations," S. and H.) were made vain (ἐματαιώθησαν); the result stultified the process; their instinctive perception of God became confused and uncertain; their unintelligent heart, the seat of the moral consciousness, was darkened. In asserting their wisdom they became fools, and showed it conspicuously in their idolatries. They resigned the glory of the incorruptible God (i.e., the incorruptible God, all glorious as He was, and as He was seen in nature to be), and took instead of Him some image of a corruptible, even of a vile creature. The expression ἤλλαξαν τὴν δόξαν κ.τ.λ. is borrowed in part from Ps. cv. 20 (LXX): ἠλλάξαντο τὴν δόξαν αὐτῶν ἐν ὁμοιώματι μόσχου ἔσθοντος χόρτον. The reduplication of the same idea in ἐν ὁμοιώματι εἰκόνος shows the indignant contempt with which the Apostle looked on this empty and abject religion in which God had been lost. The birds, quadrupeds and reptiles could all be illustrated from Egypt.

With ver. 24 the Apostle turns from this sin to its punishment. Because of it (διὸ) God gave them up. To lose God is to lose everything: to lose the connection with Him involved in constantly glorifying and giving Him thanks, is to sink into an abyss of darkness, intellectual and moral. It is to become fitted for wrath at last, under the pressure of wrath all the time. Such, in idea, is the history of humanity to Paul, as interpreted by its issue in the moral condition of the pagan world when he wrote. Exceptions are allowed for (ii. 10), but this is the position as a whole. παρέδωκεν in all three places (ver. 24, εἰς ἀκαθαρσίαν; ver. 26, εἰς πάθη ἀτιμίας; ver. 28, εἰς ἀδόκιμον νοῦν) expresses the judicial action of God. The sensual impurity of religions in which the incorruptible God had been resigned for the image of an animal, that could not but creep into the imagination of the worshippers and debase it, was a Divine judgment. τοῦ ἀτιμάζεσθαι τὰ σώματα αὐτῶν ἐν αὐτοῖς, in accordance with the conception of a judicial act, expresses the Divine purpose—that their bodies might be dishonoured among them. For gen. of purpose, see Winer, 408 ff. (where, however, a different construction is given for this passage, τοῦ ἀτιμάζεσθαι being made to depend immediately on ἀκαθαρσίαν).

Ver. 25. οἵτινες μετήλλαξαν κ.τ.λ.: being as they were persons who exchanged the truth of God for the lie. "The truth of God" (cf. ver. 23, "the glory of God") is the same thing as God in His truth, or the true God as He had actually revealed Himself to man. τὸ ψεῦδος, abstract for concrete, is the idol or false God. The ἐν (cf. ver. 23) answers to Hebrew בְּ. παρὰ τὸν κτίσαντα: to the passing by, i.e., disregard or contempt of the Creator. For this use of παρὰ, see Winer, 503 f. ὅς ἐστιν εὐλογητός: the doxology relieves the writer's feelings as he contemplates such horrors.

Ver. 26 f. With the second παρέδωκεν the Apostle proceeds to a further stage in this judicial abandonment of men, which is at the same time a revelation of the wrath of God from heaven against them. It issues not merely like the first in sensuality, but in sensuality which perverts nature as well as disregards God. The πλάνη, error or going astray (ver. 27), is probably still the original one of idolatry; the ignoring or degrading of God is the first fatal step out of the way, which ends in this slough.

[3] Westcott and Hort suppose some primitive error probable here; see their N. T., vol. 2, Appendix, p. 108. For ποιουσιν . . . συνευδοκουσιν B reads ποιουντες . . . συνευδοκουντες; and the construction is then completed by various additions, such as ουκ ενοησαν D, ουκ εγνωσαν G, non intellexerunt Orig. int.

Ver. 28 ff. In vers. 28-30 we have the third and last παρέδωκεν expanded. As they did not think fit, after trial made (ἐδοκίμασαν), to keep God in their knowledge, God gave them up to a mind which cannot stand trial (ἀδόκιμον). The one thing answers to the other. Virtually, they pronounced the true God ἀδόκιμος, and would have none of Him; and He in turn gave them up to a νοῦς ἀδόκιμος, a mind which is no mind and cannot discharge the functions of one, a mind in which the Divine distinctions of right and wrong are confused and lost, so that God's condemnation cannot but fall on it at last. νοῦς is not only reason, but conscience; when this is perverted, as in the people of whom Paul speaks, or in the Caananites, who did their abominations unto their Gods, the last deep of evil has been reached. Most of the words which follow describe sins of malignity or inhumanity rather than sensuality, but they cannot be classified. τὰ μὴ καθήκοντα covers all. καθήκοντα is the Stoic word which Cicero renders officia. κακοηθία, the tendency to put the worst construction on everything (Arist. Rh. ii. 13), and κακία are examined in Trench's Synonyms, § xi., and ὑβριστής, ὑπερήφανος, ἀλάζων in § xxix. θεοστυγεῖς appears to be always passive in the classics, not God hating, but God hated: Deo odibiles, Vulg. The characters are summed up, so to speak, in ver. 32: οἵτινες τὸ δικαίωμα τοῦ θεοῦ ἐπιγνόντες κ.τ.λ.: such persons as, though they know the sentence of God, that those who practise such things are worthy of death, not only do them, but give a whole-hearted complacent assent to those who follow the same practice. τὸ δικαίωμα τοῦ θεοῦ is that which God has pronounced to be the right, and has thereby established as the proper moral order of the world. θάνατος is death, not as a natural period to life, but as a Divine sentence executed on sin: it is not to be defined as physical, or spiritual, or eternal; by all such abstract analysis it is robbed of part of its meaning, which is as wide as that of life or the soul. ἀλλὰ καὶ συνευδοκοῦσιν: to be guilty of such things oneself, under the impulse of passion, is bad; but it is a more malignant badness to give a cordial and disinterested approval to them in others.

It is a mistake to read these verses as if they were a scientific contribution to comparative religion, but equally a mistake to ignore their weight. Paul is face to face with a world in which the vices he enumerates are rampant, and it is his deliberate judgment that these vices have a real connection with the pagan religions. Who will deny that he was both a competent observer and a competent judge? Religion and morality in the great scale hang together, and morality in the long run is determined by religion. Minds which accepted the religious ideas of Phenicia, of Egypt or of Greece (as represented in the popular mythologies) could not be pure. Their morality, or rather their immorality, is conceived as a Divine judgment upon their religion; and as for their religion, nature itself, the Apostle argues, should have saved them from such ignorance of God, and such misconceptions of Him, as deformed every type of heathenism. A converted pagan (as much as Paul) would be filled with horror as he reflected on the way in which he had once thought of God; he would feel in himself that he ought to have known better, and that everything in the world cried shame upon him. Now to recognise this fact is to accept the premises of the Apostle's argument, and the use to which he puts it. "Once we went after dumb idols; our very worship led us into sin, and sometimes even consecrated it; now we can only see in this our own blindness and guilt, and God's judgment upon them"—so we can fancy the converted pagan speaking. Such a world, then, as the Apostle describes in this chapter, with this terrible principle of degeneration at work in it, and no power of self-regeneration, is a world which waits for a righteousness of God.

For an interesting attempt to show Paul's indebtedness for some of the ideas and arguments of vers. 18-32 to the book of Wisdom, see S. and H., p. 51 f.

Chapter II.—Vers. 1-16. The Apostle has now to prove that the righteousness of God is as necessary to the Jew as to the pagan; it is the Jew who is really addressed in this chapter from the beginning, though he is not named till ver. 9. In vers. 1-10 Paul explains the principle on which God judges all men, without distinction.

Ver. 1. διό: The Jew is ready enough to judge the Gentile. But he forgets that the same principle on which the Gentile is condemned, viz., that he does evil in spite of better knowledge (i. 32), condemns himself also. His very assent to the impeachment in chap. i. 18-32 is his own condemnation. This is the force of διὸ: therefore. ἐν ᾧ = in that in which. τὰ αὐτὰ πράσσεις, not, you do the identical actions, but your conduct is the same, i.e., you sin against light. The sin of the Jews was the same, but their sins were not.

Ver. 2. κατὰ ἀλήθειαν is predicate: God's judgment squares with the facts—this is the whole rule of it. τοὺς τὰ τοιαῦτα πράσσοντας: those whose conduct is such as has been described. For the text, see critical note.

Ver. 3. σὺ has strong emphasis. The Jew certainly thought, in many cases, that the privilege of his birth would of itself ensure his entrance into the kingdom (Mt. iii. 8, 9): this was his practical conviction, whatever might be his proper creed. Yet the σὺ indicates that of all men the Jew, so distinguished by special revelation, should least have fallen into such an error. He is "the servant who knew his Lord's will," and whose judgment will be most rigorous if it is neglected.

Ver. 4. ἢ states the alternative. Either he thinks he will escape, or he despises, etc. χρηστότης is the kindliness which disposes one to do good; ἀνοχὴ (in N.T. only here and in iii. 26) is the forbearance which suspends punishment; μακροθυμία is patience, which waits long before it actively interposes. τὸ χρηστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ summarises all three in the concrete. It amounts to contempt of God's goodness if a man does not know (rather, ignores: cf. Acts xiii. 27, 1 Cor. xiv. 38, Rom. x. 3) that its end is, not to approve of his sins, but to lead him to repentance.

Ver. 5. The δὲ contrasts what happens with what God designs. θησαυρίζεις σεαυτῷ ὀργήν: contrast our Lord's many sayings about "treasure in heaven" (Mt. vi. 19 ff., xix. 21). ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ὀργῆς = in the day of wrath. The conception was quite definite: there was only one day in view, what is elsewhere called "the day of the Lord" (2 Cor. i. 14), "the day of judgment" (Mt. xi. 22), "the last day" (John vi. 39), "the day of God" (2 Pet. iii. 12), "that day" (2 Tim. i. 12), even simply "the day" (1 Cor. iii. 13, Heb. x. 25). This great day is so defined in the Apostle's imagination that the article can be dispensed with. But see Ps. cx. 5. (cix. LXX.) It is a day when God is revealed as a righteous judge, in the sense of Psalm lxi. 13 (LXX).

Ver. 6. The law enunciated in the Psalm, that God will render to every one according to his works, is valid within the sphere of redemption as well as independent of it. Paul the Christian recognises its validity as unreservedly as Saul the Pharisee would have done. The application of it may lead to very different results in the two cases, but the universal moral conscience, be it in bondage to evil, or emancipated by Christ, accepts it without demur. Paul had no feeling that it contradicted his doctrine of justification by faith, and therefore we are safe to assert that it did not contradict it. It seems a mistake to argue with Weiss that Paul is here speaking of the Urnorm of the Divine righteousness, i.e., of the way in which the destiny of men would be determined if there were no Gospel. The Gospel does not mean that God denies Himself; He acts in it according to His eternal nature; and though Paul is speaking to men as under the law, the truth which he is insisting upon is one which is equally true whether men are under the law or under grace. It is not a little piece of the leaven of a Jewish or Pharisaic conception of God, not yet purged out, that is found here; but an eternal law of God's relation to man.

Ver. 7. καθ' ὑπομονὴν ἔργου ἀγαθοῦ: cf. the collective ἔργον—"life-work": S. and H.—in ver. 15: "by way of stedfastness in well-doing". δόξαν = the glory of the future life, as revealed in the Risen Saviour. τιμήν = honour with God. ἀφθαρσίαν "proves that the goal of effort is nothing earthly" (Lipsius). ζωὴ αἰώνιος comprehends all these three: as its counterpart, θάνατος in ver. 31, involves the loss of all. ζωὴν is governed by ἀποδώσει.

Ver. 8. τοῖς δὲ ἐξ ἐριθείας: for the use of ἐκ, cf. iii. 26, τὸν ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ; Gal. iii. 7, οἱ ἐκ πίστεως; Ch. iv. 14, οἱ ἐκ νόμου. Lightfoot suggests that it is better to supply πράσσουσιν, and to construe ἐξ ἐριθείας with the participle, as in Phil. i. 17 it is construed with καταγγέλλουσιν: but it is simpler not to supply anything. By "those who are of faction" or "factiousness" (Gal. v. 20, 2 Cor. xii. 20, Phil. i. 16 f., ii. 3, Jas. iii. 14, 16) the Apostle probably means men of a self-willed temper, using all arts to assert themselves against God. The result of this temper—the temper of the party man carried into the spiritual world—is seen in disobedience to the truth and obedience to unrighteousness. See note on ἀλήθεια, i. 18. The moral import of the word is shown by its use as the counterpart of ἀδικία. Cf. the same contrast in 1 Cor. xiii. 6. To those who pursue this course there accrues indignation and wrath, etc.

Ver. 9. ὀργὴ is wrath within; θυμός wrath as it overflows. θλίψις and στενοχωρία, according to Trench, Synonyms, § 55, express very nearly the same thing, under different images: the former taking the image of pressure, the latter that of confinement in a narrow space. But to draw a distinction between them, based on etymology, would be very misleading. In both pairs of words the same idea is expressed, only intensified by the reduplication. Supply ἔσται for the changed construction. κατεργαζομένου τὸ κακόν: who works at evil and works it out or accomplishes it. The Jew is put first, because as possessor of an express law this is conspicuously true of him.

Ver. 10 f. εἰρήνη is probably =

שָׁלוֹם, a comprehensive term, rather = salvation, than peace in any narrower sense. The Jew still comes first, but it is only order that is involved: the same principle underlies the judgment for Jew and Gentile. It would amount to προσωποληµψία in God, if He made a difference in the Jew's favour because of his birth, or because he possessed the law. This is expanded in vers. 12-16: mere possession of the law does not count. Men are judged according to their works, whether they have or have not had such a special revelation of the Divine will as was given to Israel.

Ver. 12. ἀνόμως means "without law," not necessarily "without the law". In point of fact, no doubt, there was only one law given by God, the Mosaic, and Paul is arguing against those who imagined that the mere possession of it put them in a position of privilege as compared with those to whom it was not given; but he expresses himself with a generality which would meet the case of more such revelations of God's will having been made to man. As many as sin "without law" shall also perish "without law". Sin and perdition are correlative in Paul. ἀπώλεια (ix. 22, Phil. i. 28, iii. 19) answers to ζωὴ αἰώνιος: it is final exclusion from the blessedness implied in this expression; having no part in the kingdom of God. Similarly, as many as sin "in law" shall be judged "by law". The expression would cover any law, whatever it might be; really, the Mosaic law is the only one that has to be dealt with. The use of the aorist ἥμαρτον is difficult. Weiss says it is used as though the writer were looking back from the judgment day, when sin is simply past. Burton compares iii. 23 and calls it a "collective historical aorist": in either case the English idiom requires the perfect: "all who have sinned".

Ver. 13. This is the principle of judgment, for not the hearers of law (the Mosaic or any other) are just with God, but the law doers shall be justified. ἀκροαταὶ tends to mean "pupils," constant hearers, who are educated in the law: see ver. 10. But no degree of familiarity with the law avails if it is not done. The forensic sense of δικαιοῦσθαι is apparent in this verse, where it is synonymous with δίκαιοι εἶναι παρὰ τῷ θεῷ: the latter obviously being the opposite of "to be condemned". Whether there are persons who perfectly keep the law, is a question not raised here. The futures ἀπολοῦνται, κριθήσονται, δικαιωθήσονται all refer to the day of final judgment.

Ver. 14. There is, indeed, when we look closely, no such thing as a man absolutely without the knowledge of God's will, and therefore such a judgment as the Apostle has described is legitimate. Gentiles, "such as have not law" in any special shape, when they do by nature "the things of the law"—i.e., the things required by the law given to Israel, the only one known to the Apostle—are in spite of not having law (as is the supposition here) a law to themselves. ἔθνη is not "the Gentiles," but "Gentiles as such"—persons who can be characterised as "without law". The supposition made in τὰ μὴ νόμον ἔχοντα is that of the Jews; and the Apostle's argument is designed to show that though formally, it is not substantially true.

Ver. 15. οἵτινες ἐνδείκνυνται: the relative is qualitative: "inasmuch as they shew". τὸ ἔργον τοῦ νόμου is the work which the law prescribes, collectively. "Written on their hearts," when contrasted with the law written on the tables of stone, is equal to "unwritten"; the Apostle refers to what the Greeks called ἄγραφος νόμος. To the Greeks, however, this was something greater and more sacred than any statute, or civil constitution; to the Apostle it was less than the great revelation of God's will, which had been made and interpreted to Israel, but nevertheless a true moral authority. There is a triple proof that Gentiles, who are regarded as not having law, are a law to themselves. (1) The appeal to their conduct: as interpreted by the Apostle, their conduct evinces, at least in some, the possession of a law written on the heart; (2) the action of conscience: it joins its testimony, though it be only an inward one, to the outward testimony borne by their conduct; and (3) their thoughts. Their thoughts bear witness to the existence of a law in them, inasmuch as in their mutual intercourse (μεταξὺ ἀλλήλων) these thoughts are busy bringing accusations, or in rarer cases (ἢ καί) putting forward defences, i.e., in any case, exercising moral functions which imply the recognition of a law. This seems to me the only simple and natural explanation of a rather perplexed phrase. We need not ask for what Paul does not give, the object to κατηγορούντων or ἀπολογουμένων: it may be any person, act or situation, which calls into exercise that power of moral judgment which shows that the Gentiles, though without the law of Moses, are not in a condition which makes it impossible to judge them according to their works. The construction in ix. 1 suggests that the συν views the witness of conscience, reflecting on conduct, as something added to the first instinctive consciousness of the nature of an action. συνείδησις does not occur in the Gospels except in John viii. 9; twice only in Acts, xxiii. 1, xxiv. 16, both times in speeches of St. Paul; twenty times in the Pauline epistles. It occurs in the O.T. only in Ecc. x. 20 (curse not the King, ἐν συνειδήσει σου = ne in cogitatione quidem tua): the ordinary sense is found, for the first time in Biblical Greek, in Sap. xvii. 11. It is a quasi-philosophical word, much used by the Stoics, and belonging rather to the Greek than the Hebrew inheritance of Paul.

Ver. 16. The day meant here is the same as that in ver. 5. Westcott and Hort only put a comma after ἀπολογουμένων, but a longer pause is necessary, unless we are to suppose that only the day of judgment wakes the conscience and the thoughts of man into the moral activity described in ver. 15. This supposition may have some truth in it, but it is not what the Apostle's argument requires. The proof he gives that Gentiles are "a law to themselves" must be capable of verification now, not only at the last day. Hence ver. 16 is really to be taken with the main verbs of the whole paragraph, ἀπολοῦνται, κριθήσονται, δικαιωθήσονται: the great principle of ver. 6—ἀποδώσει ἑκάστῳ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ—will be exhibited in action on the day on which God judges the secret things of men through Christ Jesus. A final judgment belonged to Jewish theology, and perhaps, though this is open to question, one in which the Messiah acted as God's representative; but what Paul teaches here does not rest merely on the transference of a Jewish Messianic function to Jesus. If there is anything certain in the N.T. it is that this representation of Jesus as judge of the world rests on the words of our Lord Himself (Mt. vii. 22 f., xxv. 31 ff.). To assert it was an essential part of the Gospel as preached by Paul: cf. Acts xvii. 31. (Baldensperger, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, S. 85 f., thinks that in the circles of Jewish Pietism, in the century before Christ, the Messiah was already spoken of as the Divine judge, and as sharing the titles and attributes of Jehovah.)

In vers. 17-24 the Apostle brings to a point the argument for which he has been clearing the way in vers. 1-16.

The Jew makes much of the possession of the law, but when we pass from possession to practice, he is not a whit better than the "lawless" Gentile. The construction is not quite regular, but the meaning is clear. The natural order would be: If thou bearest the name of Jew, and restest upon the law, and yet in thy conduct settest the law at nought, art not thou equally under condemnation with sinners of the Gentiles? But the construction is interrupted at the end of ver. 20, and what ought in logic to be part of the protasis—if in thy conduct thou settest the law at nought—is made a sort of apodosis, at least grammatically and rhetorically: dost thou, in spite of all these privileges, nevertheless set the law at nought? The real conclusion, which Paul needs for his argument, Art not thou then in the same condemnation with the Gentiles? is left for conscience to supply.

Ver. 17. Ἰουδαῖος ἐπονομάζῃ: bearest the name of "Jew". The ἐπὶ in the compound verb does not denote addition, but direction: Ἰουδαῖος is not conceived as a surname, but a name which has been imposed. Of course it is implied in the context that the name is an honourable one. It is not found in the LXX, and in other places where Paul wishes to indicate the same distinction, and the same pride in it, he says Ἰσραηλεῖται (ix. 4, 2 Cor. xi. 22). The terms must have had a tendency to coalesce in import, though Ἰουδαῖος is national, and Ἰσραηλείτης religious; for the religion was national. ἐπαναπαύῃ νόμῳ: grammatically νόμῳ is law; really, it is the Mosaic law. The Jew said, We have a law, and the mere possession of it gave him confidence. Cf. Mic. iii. 11, ἐπὶ τὸν Κύριον ἐπανεπαύοντο. καυχᾶσαι ἐν θεῷ: boastest in God, as the covenant God of the Jews, who are His peculiar people. καυχᾶσαι = καυχᾷ: the longer form is the usual one in the κοινή.

Ver. 18. τὸ θέλημα is God's will. Lipsius compares the absolute use of ὁδός, θύρα and ὄνομα. Cf. Acts ix. 2, xix. 9, 23, xiv. 27, v. 41. Also 1 Cor. xvi. 12, where God's will is meant, not the will of Apollos. The words δοκιμάζεις τὰ διαφέροντα κατηχούμενος ἐκ τοῦ νόμου are to be taken together. In virtue of being taught out of the law (in the synagogue and the schools) the Jew possesses moral discernment: he does not sink to the νοῦς ἀδόκιμος, the mind which has lost all moral capacity (i. 28). But a certain ambiguity remains in δοκιμάζειν τὰ διαφέροντα: it may mean either (1) to distinguish, by testing, between things which differ—i.e., to discriminate experimentally between good and evil; or (2) to approve, after testing, the things which are more excellent. There are no grounds on which we can decide positively for either.

Ver. 19 f. πέποιθάς τε κ.τ.λ. The τε indicates that this confidence is the immediate and natural result of what precedes: it is not right, in view of all the N.T. examples, to say that πέποιθας suggests an unjustifiable confidence, though in some cases, as in the present, it is so. Cf. 2 Cor. x. 7, Lk. xviii. 9. The blind, those in darkness, the foolish, the babes, are all names for the heathen: the Jew is confident that the Gentiles must come to school to him. παιδευτὴς has reference to moral as well as intellectual discipline: and ἄφρονες are, as in the O.T. (Ps. xiii. 1, LXX), persons without moral intelligence. For the other figures in this verse, cf. Mt. xv. 14, Is. xlix. 6, 9, xlii. 6. The confidence of the Jew is based on the fact that he possesses in the law "the outline of knowledge and truth". Lipsius puts a strong sense upon μόρφωσιν—die leibhaftige Verkörperung: as if the Jew conceived that in the Mosaic law the knowledge and the truth of God were incorporated bodily. Possibly he did, and in a sense it was so, for the Mosaic law was a true revelation of God and His will: but the only other instance of μόρφωσις in the N.T. (2 Tim. iii. 5 ἔχοντες μόρφωσιν εὐσεβείας) rather suggests the same disparaging note which here belongs to πέποιθας. The μόρφωσις τῆς γνώσεως is in point of fact only a form: valuable as the outline or definition of truth was, which the Jew possessed in the law, it was in reality ineffective, so far as the practical authority of the law in the Jew's conduct was concerned.

ἀληθείας ἐν τῷ νόμῳ. 21. ὁ οὖν διδάσκων ἕτερον, σεαυτὸν οὐ διδάσκεις; ὁ κηρύσσων μὴ κλέπτειν, κλέπτεις; 22. ὁ λέγων μὴ μοιχεύειν, μοιχεύεις; ὁ βδελυσσόμενος τὰ εἴδωλα, ἱεροσυλεῖς; 23. ὃς ἐν νόμῳ καυχᾶσαι, διὰ τῆς παραβάσεως τοῦ νόμου τὸν Θεὸν ἀτιμάζεις; 24. p Is. lii. 5.

Ver. 21. Here the grammatical apodosis begins, the οὖν resuming all that has been said in vers. 17-20. κηρύσσων and λέγων are virtually verbs of command: hence the infinitives. The rhetorical question implies that the Jew does not teach himself, and that he does break the law he would enforce on others.

Ver. 22. βδελυσσόμενος properly expresses physical repulsion: thou that shrinkest in horror from idols. Cf. Dan. ix. 27, Mk. xiii. 14. ἱεροσυλεῖς: dost thou rob temples, and so, for the sake of gain, come in contact with abominations without misgiving? This is the meaning, and not, Dost thou rob the temple, by keeping back the temple dues? as has been suggested. The crime of ἱεροσυλία is referred to in Acts xix. 37, and according to Josephus, Ant., iv., 8, 10, it was expressly forbidden to the Jews: μὴ συλᾶν ἱερὰ ξενικά, μηδ' ἂν ἐπωνομασμένον ᾖ τινὶ θεῷ κειμήλιον λαμβάνειν.

Ver. 23. Here again the construction is changed, and probably the use of the relative instead of the participle suggests that the sentence is to be read, not as interrogative, but as declaratory. "Thou who makest it thy boast that thou possessest a law, by the transgressing of that law dishonourest God: that is the sum of the whole matter, and thy sole distinction in contrast with the heathen."

Ver. 24. And this is only what Scripture bids us expect. The Scripture quoted is Is. lii. 5, LXX. The LXX interpret the Hebrew by inserting δι' ὑμᾶς and ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. Both insertions are in the line of the original meaning. It was owing to the misery and helplessness of the people of God, in exile among the nations, that the heathen scoffed at the Divine name. "The God of Israel is not able to deliver His people: He is no God." Paul here gives the words quite another turn. God, he says, is now blasphemed among the nations because of the inconsistency between the pretensions of the Jews and their behaviour. As if the heathen were saying: "Like God, like people; what a Divinity the patron of this odious race must be". It is surely not right to argue (with Sanday and Headlam) that the throwing of the formula of quotation to the end shows that Paul is conscious of quoting freely: "it is almost as if it were an after-thought that the language he has just used is a quotation at all". The quotation is as relevant as most that the Apostle uses. He never cares for the context or the original application. When he can express himself in Scripture language he feels that he has the Word of God on his side, and all through this epistle he nails his arguments so, and insists on the confirmation they thus obtain. What the closing of the sentence with καθὼς γέγραπται suggests is not that it occurred to Paul after he had finished that he had almost unconsciously been using Scripture: it is rather that there is a challenge in the words, as if he had said, Let him impugn this who dare contest the Word of God.

In vers. 25-29 another Jewish plea for preferential treatment in the judgment is considered. The μὲν in ver. 25 (περιτομὴ μὲν γὰρ ὠφελεῖ) implies that this plea has no doubt something in it, but it suggests that there are considerations on the other side which in point of fact make it inapplicable or invalid here. It is these considerations which the Apostle proceeds to explain, with a view to clenching the argument that the wrath of God revealed from heaven impends over Jew and Gentile alike.

Ver. 25. περιτομή: the absence of the article suggests that the argument may be extended to everything of the same character as circumcision. ὠφελεῖ: Circumcision was the seal of the covenant, and as such an assurance given to the circumcised man that he belonged to the race which was the heir of God's promises. That was undeniably a great advantage, just as it is an advantage now to be born a Christian; but if the actual inheriting of the promises has any moral conditions attached to it (as Paul proceeds to show that it has), then the advantage of circumcision lapses unless these are fulfilled. Now the persons contemplated here have not fulfilled them. ἐὰν νόμον πράσσῃς: the habitual practice of the law is involved in this expression: as Vaughan says, it is almost like a compound word, "if thou be a law doer". Similarly παραβάτης νόμου a law-transgressor. The law, of course, is the Mosaic one, but it is regarded simply in its character as law, not as being definitely this law: hence the absence of the article. γέγονε: by the very fact becomes and remains.

Ver. 26 f. Here the inference is drawn from the principle laid down in ver. 25. This being so, Paul argues, if the uncircumcision maintain the just requirements of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be accounted circumcision, sc., because it has really done what circumcision pledged the Jew to do? Cf. Gal. v. 3. ἡ ἀκροβυστία at the beginning of the verse is equivalent to the Gentiles (ἔθνη of ver. 14), the abstract being put for the concrete: in ἡ ἀκροβυστία αὐτοῦ, the αὐτοῦ individualises a person who is conceived as keeping the law, though not circumcised. As he has done what circumcision bound the Jew to do, he will be treated as if in the Jew's position: his uncircumcision will be reckoned as circumcision. λογισθήσεται may be merely a logical future, but like the other futures in vers. 12-16 it is probably more correct to refer it to what will take place at the last judgment. The order of the words in ver. 27 indicates that the question is not continued: "and thus the uncircumcision shall judge thee," etc. κρινεῖ is emphatic by position: the Jew, in the case supposed, is so far from being able to assert a superiority to the Gentile that the Gentile himself will be his condemnation. Cf. Mt. xii. 41 f. ἡ ἐκ φύσεως ἀκροβυστία should properly convey one idea—"those who are by nature uncircumcised". But why should nature be mentioned at all in this connection? It seems arbitrary to say with Hofmann that it is referred to in order to suggest that uncircumcision is what the Gentile is born in, and therefore involves no guilt. As far as that goes, Jew and Gentile are alike. Hence in spite of the grammatical irregularity, which in any case is not too great for a nervous writer like Paul, I prefer to connect ἐκ φύσεως, as Burton does (Moods and Tenses, § 427), with τελοῦσα, and to render: "the uncircumcision which by nature fulfils the law": cf. ver. 14. τὸν διὰ γράμματος καὶ περιτομῆς παραβάτην νόμου. The διὰ is that which describes the circumstances under which, or the accompaniment to which, anything is done. The Jew is a law-transgressor, in spite of the facts that he possesses a written revelation of God's will, and bears the seal of the covenant, obliging him to the performance of the law, upon his body. He has an outward standard, which does not vary with his moral condition, like the law written in the pagan's heart; he has an outward pledge that he belongs to the people of God, to encourage him when he is tempted to indolence or despair; in both these respects he has an immense advantage over the Gentile, yet both are neutralised by this—he is a law-transgressor.

Ver. 28 f. The argument of the foregoing verses assumes what is stated here, and what no one will dispute, that what constitutes the Jew in the true sense of the term, and gives the name of Jew its proper content and dignity, is not anything outward and visible, but something inward and spiritual. And the same remark applies to circumcision itself. The most natural way to read the Greek seems to me to be this. "Not he who is so outwardly (ὁ ἐν τῷ φανερῷ) is a Jew (in the true sense), nor is that which is outward, in flesh, the true circumcision; but he who is inwardly a Jew (is the true Jew), and heart circumcision, in spirit, not in letter (is the true circumcision)." Thus in the first pair of clauses there is not anything, strictly speaking, to be supplied; the subject is in each case involved in the article. But in the second pair the predicate has in both cases to be supplied from the first—in the one case, Ἰουδαῖος; in the other, περιτομή. Heart circumcision is an idea already familiar to the O.T. From the Book of Deuteronomy (x. 16, for the meaning comp. xxx. 6) it passed to the prophetic writings: Jer. iv. 4. The contrary expression—uncircumcised in heart and in flesh—is also found: Jer. ix. 26, Ez. xliv. 7. A difficulty is created by the expression ἐν πνεύματι οὐ γράμματι. After ver. 28 we rather expect ἐν πνεύματι οὐ σαρκί: the circumcision being conceived as in one and not another part of man's nature. Practically it is in this sense most commentators take the words: thus Gifford explains them by "a circumcision which does not stop short at outward conformity to the law, but extends to the sphere of the inner life". But there is no real correspondence here, such as there is in ἐν πνεύματι οὐ σαρκί; and a comparison of 2 Cor. iii., a chapter pervaded by the contrast of πνεῦμα and γράμμα, suggests a different rendering. πνεῦμα and γράμμα are not the elements in which, but the powers by which, the circumcision is conceived to be effected. "Heart circumcision," without any qualifying words, expresses completely that contrast to circumcision in the flesh, which is in Paul's mind; and what he adds in the new words, ἐν πνεύματι οὐ γράμματι is the new idea that heart circumcision, which alone deserves the name of circumcision, is achieved by the Spirit of God, not by the written law. Whether there is such a thing as this heart circumcision, wrought by the Spirit, among the Jews, is not explicitly considered; but it is not a refutation of this interpretation to point out that πνεῦμα in 2 Cor. is characteristically the gift of the New Covenant. For the very conclusion to which Paul wishes to lead is that the New Covenant is as necessary for the Jew as for the Gentile. οὗ ὁ ἔπαινος κ.τ.λ. The οὗ is masculine, and refers to the ideal Jew. The name Ἰουδαῖος (from Judah = praise, Gen. xxix. 35) probably suggested this remark. οὐκ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων: the love of praise from each other, and religious vanity, are Jewish characteristics strongly commented on by our Lord (John v. 44, xii. 42 f.).

CHAPTER III.—Vers. 1-8. It might easily seem, at this point, as if the Apostle's argument had proved too much. He has shown that the mere possession of the law does not exempt the Jew from judgment, but that God requires its fulfilment; he has shown that circumcision in the flesh, seal though it be of the covenant and pledge of its promises, is only of value if it represent inward heart circumcision; he has, it may be argued, reduced the Jew to a position of entire equality with the Gentile. But the consciousness of the Jewish race must protest against such a conclusion. "Salvation is of the Jews" is a word of Christ Himself, and the Apostle is obliged to meet this instinctive protest of the ancient people of God. The whole of the difficulties it raises are more elaborately considered in chaps. ix.-xi.; here it is only discussed so far as to make plain that it does not invalidate the arguments of chap. ii., nor bar the development of the Apostle's theology. The advantage of the Jew is admitted; it is admitted that his unbelief may even act as a foil to God's faithfulness, setting it in more glorious relief; but it is insisted, that if God's character as righteous judge of the world is to be maintained—as it must be—these admissions do not exempt the Jew from that liability to judgment which has just been demonstrated. The details of the interpretation, especially in ver. 7 f., are somewhat perplexed.

The combination of B with such later Western authorities as G here also lessens its weight; its reading is probably part of that Western element which it contains, i.e., B and G here represent practically one authority. But the other group of MSS. represents at least two groups of witnesses, the "neutral" in ℵA, and the Western in D, and its reading is therefore to be preferred. Weiss, however (Textkritik der paulinischen Briefe, S. 46), would reject the indicative both here and in 2 Cor. xii. 21. The change of ει and η he regards as accidental; in KLP it occurs some sixty times.

περιτομῆς; = "What good does his circumcision do him?" πολὺ goes with τὸ περισσόν. κατὰ πάντα τρόπον: however you choose to view the position. πρῶτον μὲν suggests that such an enumeration of Jewish prerogatives might have been made here as is given at length in ix. 4 f. In point of fact, Paul mentions one only, in which the whole force of the Jewish objection to the arguments of chap. ii. is contained, and after disposing of it feels that he has settled the question, and passes on. The first, most weighty, and most far-reaching advantage of the Jews, is that "they were entrusted with the oracles of God". They were made in His grace the depositaries and guardians of revelation. τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ must be regarded as the contents of revelation, having God as their author, and at the time when Paul wrote, identical with the O.T. Scriptures. In the LXX the word λόγιον occurs mainly as the equivalent of אִמְרָה, which in various passages (e.g., Ps. cxix. 38) has the sense of "promise"; in ordinary Greek it means "oracle," the Divine word given at a shrine, and usually referring to the future; hence it would be natural in using it to think of the prophetic rather than the statutory element in the O.T., and this is what is required here. The O.T. as a whole, and as a revelation of God, has a forward look; it anticipates completion and excites hope; and it is not too much to say that this is suggested by describing it as τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ. The sum of it was that God had promised to His people "a future and a hope" (Jer. xxix. 11: see margin, R.V.), and this promise seemed threatened by the argument of the last chapter.

Ver. 3 f. τί γάρ; For how? i.e., Well then, how stands the case? Cf. Phil. i. 18. εἰ ἠπίστησάν τινες = if some did disbelieve. It is not necessary to render this, with reference to ἐπιστεύθησαν in ver. 2, "if some proved faithless to their trust". What is in Paul's mind is that "the oracles of God" have had their fulfilment in Christ, and that those to whom they were entrusted have in some cases (whether few or many he does not here consider) refused their faith to that fulfilment. Surely it is no proper inference that their unbelief must make God's faithfulness of no effect. He has kept His promise, and as far as it lay with Him has maintained the original advantage of the Jews, as depositaries and first inheritors of that promise, whatever reception they may have given to its fulfilment. Away with the thought of any reflection upon Him! When the case is stated between God and man there can only be one conclusion: let God come out (γινέσθω) true, and every man a liar; let Him be just, and every man condemned. This agrees with the words of Scripture itself in Ps. li. (l.) 6, which Paul quotes exactly after the LXX: the Hebrew is distinctly different, but neither it nor the original context are regarded. ἐν τοῖς λόγοις σου is a translation of Hebrew words which mean "when Thou speakest," i.e., apparently, when Thou pronouncest sentence upon man; here the sense must be, "that Thou mayest be pronounced just in respect of what Thou hast spoken," i.e., the λόγια, the oracles or promises entrusted to Israel. νικήσεις: win thy case (see note on text). Burton, Moods and Tenses, §§ 198, 199. ἐν τῷ κρίνεσθαί σε: Probably the infinitive is passive: "when thou art judged"; not middle, "when thou submittest thy case to the judge". The quotation from Ps. cxvi. 11, πᾶς ἄνθρωπος ψεύστης, is not important: the main thing, as the formal quotation which follows shows, is the vindication of God from the charge of breach of faith with the Jews in making Christianity the fulfilment of His promises to them.

Ver. 5 f. Here another attempt is made to invalidate the conclusion of chap. ii., that the Jew is to be judged "according to his works," exactly like the Gentile. If the argument of ver. 3 f. is correct, the unbelief of the Jews actually serves to set off the faithfulness of God: it makes it all the more conspicuous; how then can it leave them exposed to judgment? This argument is generalised in ver. 5 and answered in ver. 6. "If our unrighteousness" (in the widest sense, ἀδικία being generalised from ἀπιστία, ver. 3) demonstrates (cf. v. 8) God's righteousness (also in the widest sense, δικαιοσύνη being generalised from πίστις, ver. 3), what shall we say? i.e., what inference shall we draw? Surely not that God, He who inflicts the wrath due to unrighteousness at the last day (i. 18), is Himself unrighteous, to speak as men speak. Away with the thought! If this were so, how should God judge the world? That God does judge the world at last is a fixed point both for Paul and those with whom he argues; hence every inference which conflicts with it must be summarily set aside. God could not judge at all if He were unjust; therefore, since He does judge, He is not unjust, not even in judging men whose unrighteousness may have served as a foil to His righteousness. It is not thus that the conclusions of chap. ii. can be evaded by the Jew. ὁ ἐπιφέρων τὴν ὀργήν: the "attributive participle equivalent to a relative clause, may, like a relative clause, convey a subsidiary idea of cause, purpose, condition or concession" (Burton, Moods and Tenses, § 428, who renders here: is God unrighteous, who (because He) visiteth with wrath?). κατὰ ἄνθρωπον λέγω: cf. Gal. iii. 15, Rom. vi. 19, 1 Cor. ix. 8. There is always something apologetic in the use of such expressions. Men forget the difference between God and themselves when they contemplate such a situation as that God should be unrighteous; obviously it is not to be taken seriously. Still, in human language such suppositions are made, and Paul begs that in his lips they may not be taken for more than they really mean.

Ver. 7 f. These verses are extremely difficult, and are interpreted variously according to the force assigned to the τί ἔτι κἀγὼ of ver. 7. Who or what supplies the contrast to this emphatic "I also"? Some commentators, Gifford, for instance, find it in God, and God's interest in the judgment. If my lie sets in relief the truth of God, and so magnifies His glory, is not that enough? Why, after God has had this satisfaction from my sin, "why further am I also on my side brought to judgment as a sinner?" It is a serious, if not a final objection to this, that it merely repeats the argument of ver. 5, which the Apostle has already refuted. Its very generality, too—for any man, as Gifford himself says, may thus protest against being judged,—lessens its relevance: for Paul is discussing not human evasions of God's judgment, but Jewish objections to his previous arguments. Lipsius finds the contrast to κἀγὼ in the Gentile world. A Jew is the speaker, or at all events the Apostle speaks in the character of one: "if my unbelief does magnify His faithfulness,
